As Benoît alluded to, 88% of Ontario's merchandise exports go to the US. A lot of them go through the Golden Horseshoe region. I think if you're looking for some areas where you will see growth in the long term, structural changes suggest more service employment, but in the short term, in terms of Ontario's near-term recovery, a lot of that's going to come through manufacturing exports. The manufacturing sectors in the near term may be those that turn around the quickest, those that have experienced the most pain in the past as well.

Ms Harrington: Can you see, say, foreign investment coming into our area to set up small manufacturing?

Mr Chandler: I think we've already seen it in terms of some of the auto investments that have been announced in the Windsor area and the Hamilton area in particular. I'm sorry, I don't know. I'm not aware of any projects, but there have been some new investments announced in the auto assembly area that are encouraging, because it suggests Ontario can recapture a manufacturing competitiveness. It's just going to be tough work.

Mr Durocher: I would like to follow up on Mark's comments. Indeed, for your particular region, we have to think more globally, not only in terms of selling to other global markets but also that there is global competition out there and that Hamilton-Niagara—the way it traditionally manufactured steel or steel products may not be the most efficient way in light of global competition.

We're seeing the process provincially, we're seeing it in manufacturing, we're seeing it in Canada, where we talked about declining labour and the use of more advanced technology. That is all part of the solution. It's not overnight. This process of restructuring didn't happen in 1990 in the second quarter when we went into recession. This restructuring process in manufacturing started way back in 1989, possibly 1988.

What we're seeing is that this global competition is hurting, so we have to think—I'm not much aware of the problems of the Hamilton-Niagara steel complex—but is it worth producing, say, 100 million pounds of steel rail when there are no railways being built and actually there are rail lines being cut? Is that the product you want to do? If so, where is it needed? We have to answer to a need. This is basic economics. How can we do it cost-efficiently or cost-competitively?

Japanese and Korean manufacturers are making steel much more competitively than we are. They've been accused of dumping or stuff like that by other governments, even our own, but the fact of the matter is they're being aggressive in our markets and we have to do that. To do it requires labour training or manpower retraining.

Obviously, displaced workers in the steel industry cannot find a job in, say, mini-mills, which are more automated, which use more information technology. Obviously, this displaced worker will have to have training in that area. I think maybe governments are at fault for not providing the correct incentives but, as I pointed out earlier, they may not have the means to provide these incentives, these moneys, for retraining. Debt service costs are actually preventing them from doing so.

The Chair: Okay, I'm going to have to go on to Mr Kwinter.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Durocher, I found some of your comments interesting and a bit of a conundrum; not a conundrum in what you're saying but in the reality of the situation. You said that last year one of the bright spots in our economy in Ontario was that we had a 12% increase in exports, most of that US. In your projections for 1993, you again see American exports as being one of the bright spots in the economy.

When you consider that over 30% of our gross domestic product is based on exports, how do you square that with the fact that every time anyone, particularly the government, mentions the recession, it is coupled with free trade, when in fact one of the bright spots in our economy last year was the fact that our US exports grew so dramatically, given that the total growth in the economy was only 1.2%?

Mr Durocher: What can I say? We feel the FTA has been beneficial to the Canadian economy overall and to the Ontario economy in particular, but it's not the only factor affecting the Canadian economy. The FTA is not, for instance, instantaneous in its effects. In some industries and for some goods the tariff reduction period extends out to 10 years, so it's not instantaneous, for one thing. The FTA has opened up markets for some goods in the United States, but conversely, it has opened up the Canadian market to goods for exporters in the United States.

I think the FTA on balance has had a generally positive effect, but the FTA couldn't counterbalance by itself the problems we ran ourselves into in the 1980s with productivity declines and horrendous unit-labour cost increases, which have been detrimental to the competitiveness of the Canadian economy. If we've been so bad competitively that we actually couldn't overcome our reduction in tariff barriers or that the reduction in tariff barriers actually exacerbated that competitiveness loss, then it's our fault. We let it go; we were veiled by the wall of protectionism. Now that the wall is down, it's a new game. We're in a world event here.

To answer your question, I think the FTA is generally positive or favourable for the Ontario economy, but then again it does not overcome all the other structural problems the Ontario economy has run itself into. So it's a positive contributor to growth.

Mr Conway: One of the interesting things about these submissions is the extent to which governments have behaved with a credit-card mentality, "Consume now and pay later," and the whole psychology that the people around to pay will be the ones to consume and all of that sort of stuff. I saw something not too long ago about the level of personal consumer debt. It was staggering. I couldn't believe it. I can't believe it, which leads me to my question.

These things apparently are an individual and a collective evil, if for no other reason than that they are just inducing a whole bunch of people—a lot of people individually and, maybe more importantly, the community as a collective—to be grossly ill-disciplined and irresponsible in terms of the way they behave. It is to such an extent that good bankers like you come and say: "Hey, this is getting a little out of hand. You can't keep doing this."

Should we start to take, individually and collectively—let's start with the individual. These things are really bad, aren't they, apparently, in practice though not in principle?

Mr Chandler: I think you're asking a couple of questions there. First of all, that's a TD credit card, so if you're going to stop, that would be a good place to start.

Mr Conway: Apparently, they're enormously attractive profit centres for all of you.

Mr Chandler: That's not true. If you look at some of the breakdowns in the bank statements, it's not the area where we make most of our money. But in answer to your question, it's talking about whether you restrict availability of credit to the nation's individuals. Is that the sort of thing you'd want to do in a democracy?

First of all, we do not say that you cannot buy beer, alcohol or wine in Ontario. Instead, what we do is make it available. We also tax it very heavily, but we make it available and we put regulations around it that will control its use. Similarly, I think what you see in the financial institutions is that you give financial institutions rights to do things and at the same time you regulate them through things like the Bank Act.

Mr Conway: But I don't think we—

The Chair: Sorry to interrupt you, Mr Conway. Mr Carr.

Mr Carr: You can have a bit of my time, if you want.

The Chair: You want to give him your time?

Mr Conway: I'll conclude with sort of a supplementary. Of course they're a good thing. I think they're a wonderful thing. But apparently there's an awful lot of very bad behaviour out there. My friends who are in the banks, my friends who attend at bankruptcy court—I was talking to a friend of mine, a lawyer, who does a fair bit of work around bankruptcy court, and he said it's a scandal, it's a perfect scandal. These financial institutions, he tells me, will give anybody, no matter how profligate—no matter how bad your past is, apparently, they'll give you another one.

I want to reduce this to the micro level. We talk about the macro, and it's very useful, but I'm just a poor old practical politician and I'm a bit of a Cassandra. I think I know the medicine we have to start administering and I just know how pleased the judges are going to be to be told: "I know it's tough, but $130,000 or $160,000—you're just going to have to make do. And you may take us to court and all the rest of it."

You people are coming in here and making very compelling arguments about the way in which we, as governments, are living beyond our means. I guess I just ask a trifling little question. Maybe it starts at home. Maybe the financial institutions need more encouragement from government and the bankruptcy courts to start to show a little more discipline and responsibility about the way these things are issued and the way in which poor performance is not being dealt with.

Mr Chandler: I think you're simplifying the issues a lot.

Mr Conway: Of course I am.

Mr Chandler: The banks have some blame in this as well, but I would argue that one of the reasons that personal debt to net worth increased a lot in the late 1980s was, of course, that net worth fell. A lot of mortgages were lent on the value of housing. The value of housing took an unprecedented decline in Ontario and people lost their homes. In part, some of the fault is that people in the banks as well as people in the economy as a whole didn't expect us to move from a level of inflation of 5% and asset inflation of much more than that, if you look at things like house prices, to, instead, a level of inflation generally of 2% and asset deflation in a lot of categories. That's where the problems in debt occurred.

And it's a wrenching, heartbreaking adjustment to move to that low-inflation environment. Now people do not expect their homes, as they did in 1988 and 1989, to increase by 10% or 20% a year, and they will not be granted mortgages on the basis of homes increasing 10% to 20% a year. Rather, we have, we hope, adjusted to a low-inflation environment, and the credit approval process will reflect that.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you gentlemen for appearing before this committee.

Mr Sterling: Mr Chair, could I just add—

The Chair: Have you got a statement or a question?

Mr Sterling: I want to ask a question.

The Chair: I'm sorry, but Mr Carr gave up your time. We have Mr Stokes back there, patiently waiting to come before this committee.

Mr Sterling: This question will take a minute. We haven't had an opportunity to ask a question. We gave some of our time, but we didn't expect the—

The Chair: He took all your time. Look, he's got his card out. He's buying lunch today, Norm.

Mr Conway: No, I'm not. Don't you know there's no free lunch? That's what this is all about.

The Chair: It wouldn't be free. You'll pay for it when you get your statement. I'm sorry, we're going to have to carry on. Norm, you can see the gentleman out in the corridor if you've got a very important question.

WEFA GROUP

The Chair: Our next presenter is Mr Ernie Stokes. Would you come forward. It's the Wefa Group. What was that called before? Is that a new name for the group?

Mr Ernest Stokes: No, it's the same name.

The Chair: Okay. It was someone else who had some change in name. We have until 12:30, but could you leave some time at the end? As you can see, some of the committee members are very eager to ask questions, so make sure there's enough time left that Norm doesn't miss out.

Mr Stokes: Obviously everybody's getting ready to go for lunch, so I'll try to keep it brief.

Our forecast for the Ontario economy and the Canadian economy is probably not a lot different from most forecasts. For 1993, we look for growth around 3%; in Ontario around 3% to 3.5%. Inflation is going to stay low, around 2.5%. Interest rates have come down and we think they're going to stay down, and we think the dollar is going to average around 78 cents.

Over the medium term, we expect growth to improve, to stay in the 3% to 4% range in Ontario and Canada; inflation to remain low in the 1.5% to 2.5% range; interest rates generally to trend down over the next five or six years, and the Canadian dollar to stay pretty well where it is and maybe depreciate a bit.

That's all nice, but what I want to really talk about here are some key issues behind the forecast which have policy implications. Everybody here is getting impatient about the economy recovering. I just want to talk a little bit about why we think it's going to have difficulty and why the recovery is going to be slow.

I'll walk through this handout. I'm on page 2 now. What I want to look at are some of the forecast assumptions and discuss those, and the policy implications associated with those.

When we do forecasts, what we look at are two main sets of factors. One set is what's going on in the rest of the world; Canada is a small, open economy and what happens in the rest of the world is very important to us. The second set of issues is really what governments are doing, what domestic policy is doing. Those are the two main issues that drive our forecast.

On the external environment side, the US is our most important trading partner, so I'll concentrate on it. What we look at there is what's happening to growth. The reason we look at growth is because we export things and that's important to us. Stronger growth in the US means stronger growth in Canada because of exports. We tend to import things from the US, so if the inflation rate in the US is high, we'll import their inflation; the prices of their goods will be going up.

Interest rates: Everybody knows that capital markets are global these days; you've heard that over and over again. That means if interest rates are high in the US, it's difficult for us to have low interest rates.

What we see for the US economy is probably what everybody else is saying: a fairly slow recovery, continued low inflation and interest rates pretty well staying low and maybe gradually rising over the next few years. That's fairly non-controversial.

One thing I'd like to bring out, though, and point out to people is that everybody's sitting around waiting for the US to pull us out of what I call stagnation. That's the key policy response so far, just to wait for the US to do something. I think that's a mistake. One reason I think that's a mistake is what the previous speaker was talking about. We had export growth of 12% in Ontario last year, and in Canada, we expect to have export growth of 8%. Well, that's 3% above average growth. If you look back 20 years, we're growing at above-average export growth. So if you're waiting for the US economy to pick up and increase its export growth, I think you're wasting your time. We can get a little bit more growth through that route, but not a lot.

So 1992 was not a poor year for trade; it was a good year for trade from a historical perspective. So what's wrong? Well, what is wrong is that we're not adding value to our exports. One of the things that's happening is that our economy grew 1% last year in Canada and imports grew 6%. What that means is that we're not competitive. When we export things, we measure the total value of the export, but how much does Canada contribute to that? We got 8% real export growth in 1992 but no growth. What happened? The problem is that when we export things, we don't contribute much to those exports.

We got lucky last year on the auto side. We happen to produce trucks in Ontario, and trucks were very popular in the US. In 1993, trucks will probably hold their own, but there won't be any increase, so we don't expect autos to do well. I wouldn't look for strong growth. The main reason is simply that we're not competitive. When an auto producer sells something to the rest of the world, it imports parts to produce the cars. How much does it add to value? It may put some of the car together, but 80% of the car may simply be imports. If you observe auto exports and auto imports over time, you find out that when auto exports go up, auto imports go up. So on a net basis, you're not any better off.

So our problem on the trade sector is to make sure our value added share of the exports goes up, ie, the amount we produce in Canada. If we simply export a car, it looks like good stuff: you know, a $10,000 or $20,000 car. Unfortunately, the Canadian contribution to that is small, because we import everything to produce that car and sell it abroad. On a net basis, we're no better off. We have to add value to the product before we resell it, ie, we should be producing more things domestically rather than importing them so we can export them. It's just a matter of re-exporting. We can make exports look really good by simply importing everything and exporting everything. It looks great, but we're not adding any value to it.

The idea of waiting around for the US to pull us out of stagnation is crazy, because we had above-average export growth in 1992 and we couldn't grow. That is not our problem. Our problem is that we can't add value to anything. We need to improve our competitive position. The US economy is going to do better this year and we think exports will do all right, but so what? If you look at a lot of the forecasts, you'll probably notice that imports are still growing fairly rapidly, and that reflects the fact that we're not competitive.

We have to make sure that we import less. Even if we import less and export the same, we're going to do better. The idea is to get our competitive position up so the share of exports we actually produce in Canada goes up. It's not just waiting for the US. If you go back to 1982 and 1974-75 and look at the previous recessions, you find out that this recession is above average in terms of export performance. The trouble is that we're not producing any of those exports, we're only producing part of those exports. I don't know if that's confusing. It's just that we're not adding much value to the exports.

On the US side, the implications for Ontario and Canada are, one, there's going to be stronger growth so our exports will do okay. That doesn't guarantee growth here; it guarantees that exports will still flow. Secondly, inflation will remain low in the US, so that will mean we'll be able to keep our inflation rate low in Canada, because we import so many things from them. Interest rates are not going to go up, skyrocket in the US, so that allows us to keep our rates down, and that will help us out. Those are the implications of what's happening in the US.

If you look at the three charts I have following that page, you'll see US inflation, US growth and US interest rates and how Canada follows them around. That will give you an idea of what I'm talking about.

The rest of what I want to talk about is really what's impeding Canada from performing in the next few years. If you go to the page on structural change in Canada, these I think are the major reasons we're having difficulty in this country. In the early 1980s and the late 1970s, we had very poor productivity performance, and this led to a number of changes.

Governments felt they were the reason we had poor performance, so they started putting into place a number of different policies: deregulation, privatization, tax reform and so forth. The impact of these policies is to cause people to change what they do. Obviously, that's what we're trying to do. Governments go in and say, "You should produce this," and they do that by subsidizing industries and offering preferential taxes. If governments take that out, it means the industries that were previously profitable are no longer profitable and those products don't get produced. That means the people who were working in those industries have to change jobs. That's structural change. You've heard about that.

What we've had over the past 10 years is a lot of structural change, and that raises what we call structural unemployment. It's difficult for people to change jobs, so one of the things these changes are doing is making it more difficult for us to keep unemployment rates low. If people don't have jobs, they're not buying things, and governments can't raise revenues if nobody's buying anything, because they tax things. It makes it very difficult. Structural change is causing us difficulties and will continue to cause us difficulties over the next few years.

The Canada-US FTA is just like the other ones. It's just changing where resources go and it's causing difficulties. The GST was another example. You're saying, "We're going to tax services now and we're not going to tax goods so much." That means that people who are in the service sector are going to do worse than they did before and people in the goods-producing sector are going to do better than they did before, and resources move. If you happen to get caught in the middle, you could be out of a job and you're in trouble.

All these things are going on, and the implications of free trade and GST and NAFTA and so forth are going to continue to cause that over the next five years. We're going to have people losing their jobs and having to move to different jobs, and it's just going to be a difficult adjustment. The household sector is going to bear a lot of the burden of adjustment because those are the people losing the jobs. But that's going to happen.

The impacts of this are positive in the long run, but unfortunately, in the transition period they are not necessarily positive. So if somebody says that free trade has a positive impact, you have to ask if that is in the short run or the long run. I think in the long run it does, but for some people it's going to cause trouble.

Governments, the federal government in particular, suggested it would provide funds for adjustment of people; it never did. So what we've done is decided that we're going to impose all these policies and not help people out. That's causing difficulty for people, and that's going to make it difficult for the economy to perform strongly over the next few years. But once we get all these adjustments taking place, then we will be in better shape.

Two of the areas I think that have caused and are continuing to cause severe problems are government deficit reduction and zero inflation. We've decided now that government is too big and we want to get it out of the economy. That's a similar structural change to everything else. You're saying that government consumption is too big, so we have to reduce. If I sell to the government or you work for the government, you're in trouble; you're not going to be working for it any more, and I can't sell you anything. So that's another structural adjustment.

In the longer run, that means that more resources will be devoted to the private sector, which, depending on your ideology, is good or bad. But it implies structural change: people are going to be out of work, some of us who sold to government have to find new customers and so forth. So there is going to be damage done in the short term. In the long term, you may end up giving more money for private investment, which will make you better off, but there is this transition period during which you're going to cause difficulties. But you don't get something for nothing. Somebody said that just before I got here. If you're going to make these changes, you've got to pay for them. There's no free lunch in this case. There have to be adjustments made or we don't become more productive.

We see over the last two years that where governments have been trying to reduce deficits when there's a recession, it makes the thing worse. That's what governments have been doing for the past three years; they've been making a bad situation worse by trying to solve deficit problems. That's okay in the long run, but you can ask yourself, "Should we be reducing deficits in a recession or should we wait till the recovery comes?" There was no excuse for not trying to reduce the deficits in the late 1980s. In 1988 we could have reduced the deficit dramatically, and we didn't; we increased it. Now we're trying to do it in a recession. It's not a good idea.

What's going to happen over the next few years as governments try to wind down these big deficits? I predict that we're going to lose 0.5% off growth every year for the next five years because we have to reduce the deficit. So the government deficit in the country is about $50 billion, which is 7% of Canadian GDP. We've got to take 7% out of the economy in the next five years to balance the budget; that is a lot. So in a sense you're taking 7% of GDP away to balance the budgets. It will in the longer run lead to lower interest rates etc, but it's going to cost us. So don't expect anything else other than slower growth because of it. It's going to cost. That's going to make it difficult. To try to reduce deficits any more quickly is going to make things worse, not better.

Zero inflation: I think that's caused considerable damage to the economy. The main reason it has is that nobody has gone along with it. None of you were willing to take salary cuts; I wasn't either, but I am now. In fact, I did anyway.

Ms Swarbrick: Three years of freezes.

Mr Stokes: Freeze isn't enough. Your salaries have to all be cut. It's not good enough, and I'll go through why. The main problem here is that the Bank of Canada has decided to go to zero inflation. When you do that, you have to get everybody to change their expectations of the future. Nobody went along with the bank. They just ignored it, and that's the reason we've had a severe recession.

In order to get inflation down, how do you do it? Nobody here will willingly lower prices or wages, will they? So you've got to threaten them. You say, "If you don't lower your wages and prices, I'm going to put you out of a job or put you out of business." That's how monetary policy works: It has to frighten people enough that they won't ask for big wage increases, or it has to bankrupt businesses so they're afraid to raise prices or they actually lower them. That's how we do it in this country. We have to be honest about it. That's exactly how it works.

If everybody went along with the governor of the Bank of Canada and lowered their wages and prices, there wouldn't be a recession. It's as simple as that: All the wages come down, all the prices come down, no effect on the economy. But the way we get it down is to put people out of work so that they won't try to get high wages, and we put businesses out of business so that they'll lower their prices. That's exactly what we've been doing since 1988, and that's why we're in so much trouble. The impact of this is going to continue over the next few years.

What I want to go through now is what I consider the major transitional problem. If you go to the next chart, which says "Canadian Exchange Rate," there are two lines there. The bottom, the dark one, is the actual value of the Canadian dollar, like 80 cents. The top line is a measure of the competitiveness of Canadian manufacturing relative to US manufacturing. The top line going up means the costs in Canada are going up relative to the US. That top line is made up of two things. It's made up of the Canadian dollar, because I have to put both costs in the same currency. So as the Canadian dollar rises, our costs rise relative to the US. It becomes more expensive to buy things from Canada. The line will also go up if our wage rates go up faster than the US or if our productivity grows slower than the US.

So there are a number of things in there: If the dollar goes up, our cost competitiveness worsens; if our wage rates go up faster than the US, our cost competitiveness worsens; if our productivity goes up slower than the US, our cost competitiveness worsens. All those factors can make it difficult for manufacturers to compete.

Why is Canadian manufacturing, in particular Ontario manufacturing, in trouble? You just look at that line. Since 1986, the competitive position of manufacturers in Canada has deteriorated almost 50%. Why? Part of it, you can see, is the dollar; the dollar has gone up. The other part is the fact that we've been paying people too much money in this country relative to the US, and our productivity performance isn't keeping up. You must have seen these numbers, this story before. This is a serious problem. What is the consequence of this? We've seen what's happened to manufacturing in this province.

If you look at the next chart, we have the current account balance, which is essentially the trade balance, the exports minus imports, as well as the interest payments that we pay to the rest of the world. As a percentage of GDP, that simply tries to adjust it for the size. The bigger the negative number, the worse the current account deficit is. So if you look at the two charts, you see that cost competitiveness worsens and the current account worsens. So what happens is that as we become less competitive, we export less and import more. So the consequence of the rising costs in Ontario and Canada has been a deterioration in our current account balance. It's a terrible trade balance, the biggest current account balance we've ever had. It's a record.

The other consequence is the next page, which is the share of profits in GDP. If costs are going up and we're not selling anything, we're in trouble. Profit share of the economy now is the lowest it's ever been. This is all a consequence of that one chart, our cost competitiveness. You can argue, "What about the rest of the economy, not just manufacturing?" Oil and gas prices are fixed in US dollars. If the Canadian dollar goes up, their prices go down in Canadian dollars; they lose money.

What has happened is that since the mid-1980s our costs relative to the US have gone up, and that's basically been a result of the industry and one policy. The one policy is the Bank of Canada tightening up monetary policies. This caused the exchange rate to go up, and that's contributed about 20% to 30% of the increase in the costs. The rest is because our wages are going up too fast relative to the US and our productivity hasn't been matching the US; it has actually been growing slower than the US.

This all started quite a while ago. In the 1980s the US went through a period when its exchange rate went way up. Remember when Reagan came in? The exchange rate went way up in the United States. Do you remember the rust belt stories in the US? Well, we're the rust belt. The same thing is happening here, only it's happening five years after it did in the US. In the US, what happened is that the exchange rate went up and the manufacturing sector became completely uncompetitive in the States. What they did is they restructured. They moved from the northern states to the southern states to take advantage of lower costs, all sorts of structural change, which is continuing to go on. One of the consequences was that productivity went up in the US quite rapidly and the wage rates didn't grow in the US at all, adjusting for inflation in the 1980s. Not so in Canada. So what happened is that we're five years behind the US in our adjustment to this situation.

What has to happen in the future for us to get out of this mess? I call it a mess. We have a terrible current account deficit, we have a terrible profit position and we have terrible government deficits. The government deficit is of course completely associated with this problem. If government revenues fall it's because profits fall, because you get corporation taxes. Employment's fallen apart because of this. You lose all your personal income taxes. That's what it is, and then your expenditures go up because of high interest rates, which are associated with zero inflation, and also because of your social assistance payments. These have all gone up, and it's all because of this problem.

This is only labour-cost competitiveness in this. It doesn't include the cost of capital, which is also higher in Canada. It also doesn't include a lot of the property taxes and other taxes in Canada that affect the cost of doing business here, and I don't think you could argue from a tax or the cost-of-capital point of view that we have an advantage over the US. So one of our major problems in this country to solve or to get out of this situation is to reduce costs relative to the US.

What we see in our forecasts is a suggestion, but it's very painful. If you go back to the exchange rate table, the solution to our problem is to get the top line down, which means to get Canadian costs down relative to US costs.

How do we do it? I gave you the three sources. One is that the Canadian dollar can come down. Wage rates can fall relative to the US or our productivity can grow faster than the US. Everything you hear out there is some combination of these.

Why we are so preoccupied with productivity and competitiveness in this country is this: Productivity has got to go up, and productivity is going up, and wage rates aren't growing as fast as they used to and the dollar's coming down, so this is all helping.

A lot of this governments can't do anything about. Some of them are structural problems they really can't do anything about. Fiscal policy can't handle this in the short run. You can stimulate the economy. This is why when you see exports increase, you don't see the GDP increase, because we're not producing GDP any more. We're exporting things we've imported. We're adding just a little bit to those products and reselling them.

If we can get this line down, we can start getting a bigger share of those exports that are attributable to Canada rather than to some other country. The solution is to get that line down. This is difficult.

You have to remember, first of all you could say: "Well, we've got wages growing slowly in this country now. They're growing much slower than they used to." That's not good enough. They have to grow slower than in the US. If US wage settlements are 2% and ours are 2%, that doesn't do any good. We're not improving our competitive position; we're maintaining our bad competitive position. If our productivity growth in this country is 2% and it's 2% in the US, it doesn't do us any good. It's got to be better than theirs.

What's the way out? If we can't have lower wages and we can't have higher productivity, what's the way out? The dollar falls apart, right? The dollar's the safety valve in this. If the dollar can come down, what happens is that we improve our competitive position, and that's what it has done. The reason the dollar fell from 88 cents or 89 to where it is now is because of this. We cannot support an 89-cent dollar with this current account problem and this profitability problem. You've got to get this competitiveness problem solved, and the way it always gets solved is some combination of higher productivity, lower wage rates or a lower dollar. In the US they solve their competitiveness problem to a large extent by exchange rate depreciation. If you look at the US dollar, what happened is that from 1985 on it collapsed, absolutely collapsed, and that helped them out.

Now, what's the problem here? Why can't we just have the dollar come down? Remember I talked about zero inflation? John Crow says he wants inflation at 1% to 2% for the next five years. If the dollar comes down, what happens? Well, we import 25% to 30% of our products. If the dollar comes down, our inflation goes up. The rule of thumb we use is that if our imports are about one third of our consumption, then if the dollar comes down 10%, our inflation will go up 3%, one third.

Ms Swarbrick: Or we choose to buy Canadian.

Mr Stokes: That's right. You can do that. If you can get people to buy Canadian and not go to the Price Club etc, that's fine. I won't argue that. But the point here is that the dollar depreciation route, which is normally used, which has been used for ever—we did this in 1971, in the mid-1970s etc, we've depreciated our way out of these problems every time.

What Crow is saying is that, "No, you're not." He's come down 10%. That's what we've come down now, about 10% on the currency. He's saying here, "We don't want it to come down any more." Why are interest rates still high? Why did they go up in the fall? Partly it was the Constitution, but that was associated with the dollar, wasn't it? The Constitution caused the dollar to be weak. I don't like attributing a lot of the constitutional problems—

The Chair: Ernie, can I just break you here, because—Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: I have to go. Not that I'm not keenly interested by this.

The Chair: I know Mr Sterling didn't get a chance to ask any questions last time and I think there are some questions of the committee. If you could just sort of wind up.

Mr Stokes: Two minutes, I'll finish it up.

The Chair: We can wind up going to the two parties that are left here.

Mr Stokes: The main point here is the banks are not going to let us depreciate our way out of this unless we fire the governor. That may happen in the next election, but I think that would be a mistake. Anyway, we can't depreciate our way out of this, so the other thing is that when I mentioned that zero wasn't good enough for wages, it isn't. This is a 50% loss in our competitive position.

Now, you're always nervous about data, but what we're looking for is a 10% to 20% reduction in wages relative to the US. Nobody's going to do that here, are they? We can't convince people to do that. We've got to cut our costs. So if you eliminate wages, that leaves productivity. One of the reasons you're having a high unemployment is that firms can't get their wages down, but they've got to get their costs down, so they just lay off people.

The exchange rate isn't allowed to come down, so they can't recover their competitiveness that way. It all goes out the unemployment rate. That's what's happening. Interest rates go up and the unemployment rate goes up. That's why we are forecasting high unemployment for the next five years. It's simply that the only solution to this problem is increased productivity. We think the dollar will come down more, but the bank won't let it, so it's a long painful process. The major adjustment we have in this country is to get businesses more competitive.

Another solution, of course, is to reduce business costs through taxes etc. If you start imposing taxes and so forth, it increases the business costs to doing business. Goodbye jobs. It's simple as that, because they have this problem faced and if you raise their taxes and let the dollar depreciate, then that's fine, but if you raise their taxes and don't let the dollar depreciate, they're dead.

That means unemployment is going to be the residual and that's exactly what the unemployment rate has done. It's gone up to try and solve this problem because you're trying to solve it all through productivity, which is not possible in the short run. I'll stop.

The Chair: We'll lead off with Mr Sterling.

Mr Sterling: I think you told us the same story as our first witness here today, that basically those who have jobs have been too greedy in the last five, six, seven years in terms of taking more out of the economy than they're entitled to. Is that correct?

Mr Stokes: If you're a true capitalist-type person, you try and get as much as you can; it doesn't matter. I guess the problem is that when we talk in economics about the efficiency of the market system, we're assuming there are no labour unions, no wage restrictions etc, that the regulated industries are a minor consequence and so forth. What happens is that if you're a competitive industry, your wage rates don't grow much. If you look at a lot of industries, that retail trade sector, they've been taking wage cuts and a lot of industries have been taking wage cuts.

The hydros etc are not taking wage cuts. Government, zero, that's a good idea. I think that's a good idea as a signal to the private sector that we can't have high wages, but if you've got major power groups' ability to extract—we call them rent seekers—if they have the ability to extract high wages and we don't stop them, we can't solve the problem. So I wouldn't call the people greedy. The basis of our whole system is that if people maximize their own wellbeing, we'll all be better off, but that presumes there's no major power groups.

You may be right in the sense that there have been some areas of the economy that have market power or the ability to raise their wages and they've made it worse for everybody else because if the governor of the Bank of Canada says, "I want 2% inflation," and the regulatory agencies or the governments are giving 5% wages, that must mean the rest of the economy's getting zero or negative.

It's an income distribution issue here. The people with the power get what they want and the rest of the people—well, I'm a small business person. I'd like to get zero. That would be nice. So I guess that's what it is. It's a matter of certain groups get the higher wages and—

Mr Sterling: If it's income distribution, which was Mr de Bever's argument as well, then that says to me that the function of government is to change the labour policy to make the powerful less powerful.

Mr Stokes: Labour and business, because—

Mr George Mammoliti (Yorkview): Change the mentality of the capitalists.

Mr Stokes: No, it's not labour necessarily. If you have market power, if you can control your price, then you're just as bad as the labour union. Suppose you're a big firm, an oligopoly, a big set of firms, and you have a labour union working for you. They raise their wages or you'll give them their wages, because you figure you can just pass it on to the consumer.

Mr Sterling: I agree, but the profit pictures that are presented to us don't say that business has the power. They don't have the flexibility.

Mr Stokes: I asked some business people—for example, in 1991, wages went up by 5% in manufacturing and prices went down by 2%. How do you explain that? I asked the manufacturer: "What's going on here? How come you're giving your employees 5%?" They say, "If I don't give my employees 5%, they'll go on strike and I'll lose my market share." Dead, because it's an adversarial system. The workers in the firm have no perceived incentive to go along with the producer. As long as it's adversarial, you can't do anything about it. I mean, that's how our system works. You go out and try and get as much as you can and the other person does, and that should all—that's Adam Smith.

Mr Sterling: But that relates to the power that various groups have in society.

Mr Stokes: That's right.

Mr Sterling: All the evidence that's been presented to me today says that the powerful groups have done okay, but they have done so at the expense of costing jobs to the less powerful.

Mr Stokes: The purpose of competition policy, for example, or free trade is to stop those powerful groups. In other words, if you have a lot of competition, you don't get anybody with power. So free trade opens the border up. Look at what's happening to the retail sector in this country. I saw a show on TV last night where they were talking about a 25% reduction in prices because of the new retail structure. I think you have to have competition.

In the case of hydro or something where it is a regulated industry, then it's really up to the regulators to make sure that they're going along. But in terms of overall competition policy, I think free trade is good for that, or trying to make sure that you don't have industries that misuse their power. But that's difficult.

The Chair: We have two minutes left. Mr Carr.

Mr Carr: I have a quick question and it's kind of a strange question. It doesn't relate to any of the figures. As we sit here, one of the things that strikes me is that economics are fairly simple. Yet in our education system, unless you go on to universities or colleges, you don't take economics and many don't understand.

We heard the previous person talk about how without having US exports we would have been in trouble, yet if you ask 80% of the people in this province, they would say, like the government does, the problem is the free trade agreement. The statistics don't show that. One of the problems we've got is, people don't understand economics. As an economist, do you think we should be teaching economy to our kids and, if so, at what grade? High school? At what grade should we be teaching economics to the people in this province?

Mr Stokes: I think they already teach it in high school right now, so I'm not sure. Economics is not very exciting when you're a high school kid.

Mr Carr: It's probably not worse than math or anything else.

Mr Stokes: They take it and they read it; it goes in this ear and out this ear. It's even tough for adults to read. Somebody told me once that you should keep an economics book beside your bed if you want to go to sleep at night.

Mr Mammoliti: I think that as well as economics we should have some courses, perhaps mandatory, in terms of labour relations in our high schools. That's a personal opinion. I think that would go a long way in perhaps bringing a better relationship in the workforce, something we have got a lot to learn about here in Canada.

That leads me into my question. In some of the countries in Europe the labour unions and employees have the ability to perhaps sit on boards of directors or make the crucial budget decisions in companies, which is not possible here. Do you think perhaps one of the government's responsibilities, and perhaps a way in which government can participate in getting a better relationship in terms of understanding company budgets and in terms of understanding the crucial decisions that would mean keeping a business afloat or going under—do you think government should perhaps do something in the way of having labour or perhaps educating the public on the benefits of having labour involved in their boards of directors, opening up the books per se, so that decisions such as those 5% raises that you were talking about earlier might be easily rectified without folding the company? Do you think that this might be a way of—

Mr Stokes: No. I think the adversarial system is what's causing the trouble. Let's put it this way: You get a 5% raise, you still think you're working. What is a union bargaining for? Are they bargaining for jobs or wages? The example, I think, was given that Air Canada wanted to bargain for the GST. They gave their employees the GST wage increase, but then they laid everybody off. So you got the wage increase, but you didn't get the job.

I guess to the extent that the employer and the employees can get together and agree on what's going to happen, it's got to be a positive outcome. If you're there and you're basically saying, "I want a bigger share of the pie"—

Mr Mammoliti: How do we do that? I don't think we're going to have a problem with convincing the labour unions that this is a good thing to do. I think where we're going to run into a problem is with corporations and companies and the head honchos in some of those companies. I think they're the ones who would say: "No way. I'm not going to have my employees looking into my books." How do we do that as a government? How would we go about doing that?

Mr Stokes: I'm not really sure how you actually do that. I think it's a necessary thing. The problem is the mentality. You said you thought you could convince labour unions. I've heard that it's like the concept of profit-sharing. Some unions don't want to have anything to do with that.

Mr Mammoliti: Perhaps a long-term approach, like education, labour relations courses in high school—that's mandatory labour relations courses in high schools—that sort of thing might help.

Mr Stokes: Yes, if it makes people think differently. It's got to be cooperation. That sort of system works under ideal conditions. When you go back to Adam Smith, as I mentioned before, his system worked well because nobody had any power. Once that system breaks down, once people get power, you're in trouble. Why would you give a 5% salary increase when your prices are falling? It means somebody's got some power over you. Because you're insane; you know you're going to lose money.

What happened in the past is, when manufacturers or exporters gave these big wage increases, they simply knew that the dollar would depreciate by the amount and they got away with it. If you go back to 1976—remember, competitiveness was a problem in 1976—when we put wage and price controls on, the wage increases that were granted in the early 1970s never led to problems because the dollar depreciated. It went from $1.03 to 85 cents. Manufacturers don't care. They got their wage increases back through the dollar depreciation and higher prices.

What the difference is between then and now and what's making the difficult situation is the fact that the bank is saying, "Forget it, we're not going to let you do it this time," and I don't think it should.

Maybe if the unions and management realize that we can't do this any more, they will cooperate. There has to be some incentive. I really believe in incentives. If a union has no incentive to bargain or to cooperate with management, or vice versa, then they won't. It won't do any good. If the unions continue to think that management's trying to screw them or whatever, it won't work. Maybe education will help, I don't know.

The Chair: Ms Harrington, and at 12:30, I'm dropping the mallet. This committee will be dismissed.

Mr Brad Ward (Brantford): Maybe we should have more questions.

The Chair: At 2 o'clock, okay. The floor is yours.

Ms Harrington: We heard yesterday that this was a policy-induced recession, groups such as the Department of Finance, the Bank of Canada causing this recession to some degree. In your paper you also state here some degree of agreement—I'm interpreting anyway—that is, the structural change that you've seen in Canada coming from government, such as deregulation, the privatization, the free trade agreement, GST, deficit reduction and the zero inflation policy. Would you not say that we should therefore fire that government?

Mr Stokes: Put it this way. I like every one of their policies, but I don't like the fact that they put them all together at one time and threw them at us. I think every one of the policies was designed to make us better off. The problem with it is that they threw everything together at once in the middle of a world recession.

I did a paper last year trying to sort out what was the main reason for the severity of the recession and I came to the conclusion that monetary policy was. The Bank of Canada's goal of getting inflation down was the major reason for the severity; not necessarily the recession, but it was worse in Canada. That was one reason it was worse. The world recession also explains part of it. When you think of it, a lot of people are upset at the Conservatives, at least in terms of the coordination of the policies.

If you put in free trade at the same time you try to go to zero inflation without asking anybody, then you throw the GST on top of that, look out.

Ms Harrington: You would agree that it is a policy-induced recession.

Mr Stokes: Yes. I guess the problem is, and what I fault the government for, is not getting the cooperation of the private sector, because the private sector never went along. They put the GST on and the first thing everybody said was, "I'm getting it back through higher wages."

You're asking for it. You can't inflate. It's a tax increase. It's like what you're doing is, they raise your income tax, you go out and demand higher wages to get your income tax back. It doesn't work. So it's not just the government's fault. It's the government's fault for not getting the cooperation of everybody in doing it. Zero inflation is a good idea, but don't do it when nobody will go along with you. It's like I said. The way we get inflation down is to put people out of business or out of work, and that's what they did. That's the only way it works when we won't go along.

I would fault the government for the implementation of the policies, not for the policies per se. I like the policies, but the implementation was an absolute disaster. But I'm not sure. The government in Ontario, when you try and implement policies, if you do it when the people disagree with you and you impose a policy that they should go along with, you're asking for trouble.

Ms Harrington: I think that the last line here is that we need total commitment to restraint.

The Chair: I'm sorry. It's 12:30, Margaret.

I'd like to thank Ernie for appearing before this committee. We'll make sure that he gets a copy of Hansard. All your remarks will be in Hansard. Thank you for attending.

This committee will be recessed until 2 o'clock in room 151 this afternoon from 2 until 4. If everyone will note on their sheet for tomorrow, we actually start at 1:30 in the afternoon, not 2 o'clock, but you can sleep in an extra half-hour because we're not starting until 10, not at 9:30.

The committee recessed at 1234.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1404 in room 151.

HON FLOYD LAUGHREN

The Chair: I would like to welcome everybody to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. This afternoon we have the Honourable Floyd Laughren, MPP and Treasurer of Ontario, coming before this committee. Mr Treasurer, go ahead.

Hon Floyd Laughren (Treasurer and Minister of Economics): With me at the table are David Trick and Simon Rosenblum from Treasury. I want first of all to thank you for the invitation. I always enjoy spending time with my peers. I sometimes get withdrawal symptoms when we're not in session. I'm joined now by Jay Kaufman, who is the secretary of treasury board and deputy minister in Treasury.

I want to do a couple of things this afternoon, with your permission, Mr Chair. One is to give an overview of what I think will interest the committee as to what we're doing in an attempt to help rebuild the economy, to the extent that governments can do that, to provide an update on the budgetary initiatives that we've already announced and to make some comments about what lies ahead, and then, perhaps even more importantly, to have an exchange with members of the committee. I'll try and move fairly quickly because I know it would be unfair to use all of the hour that's available for me to make a speech to you. I don't think that's what committee members want.

The committee members have been distributed a package of information, I hope. The first one is entitled "Recession in Ontario," which shouldn't come as any surprise to committee members. I assume all committee members have that information.

I think we all know how seriously the recession has hit Ontario. In all of Canada, between three quarters and 80% of all the job losses were in this province. Manufacturing has been the hardest hit of all. That's made it very difficult.

The problem has not been made any easier, quite frankly—and I really believe it's important to speak directly and bluntly to you today—by the very serious offloading that's been done by the federal government. I won't get into a long tirade there, although it is tempting, believe me, because of what they have done on transfers. Most members will know that less than three years ago, the federal government was paying about 50% of all our health care and post-secondary and social assistance costs. Now it's down around 30%. While the absolute numbers have gone up, for obvious reasons, their proportion, their share has dropped that dramatically and we've had to pick up the balance. Obviously, that's had a very serious effect on our fiscal situation.

We also are absolutely convinced that the monetary and fiscal policies of the federal government have played a role in that. On December 2, the federal Minister of Finance, when he made a statement in the House of Commons, referred to the policies of his government for the last eight years and indicated that he thought those policies had positioned this country well for recovery. I must take issue with him. Although I do believe in the fundamental strength of the Canadian economy and the Ontario economy, I simply cannot bring myself to support the policies of the federal government for the last eight years.

On the second sheet that you have, which is entitled "Shattering the Myths," I want to spend a little bit of time—I'll go through this fairly quickly—talking about some of the myths that have been spouted by the federal government people over the last number of years.

The number one argument the federal Minister of Finance keeps making, and I've heard the Prime Minister refer to it too, is that tight monetary policy has lowered the inflation rate and that this was a big plus for Ontario. I would remind you that it has done so at the price of the highest unemployment rate in the G-7 countries, and that the higher interest rates and the higher dollar level it has promoted have indeed led to higher deficits in this country.

Also, the impact of the free trade agreement has been negative, both in terms of Canada's trade balance and employment. That is in spades in this province, which is why I made special reference to manufacturing being in such a decline in the last couple of years.

I'm also very concerned that NAFTA, the North American free trade agreement, will, if anything, make matters worse because it's not going to relieve us from the problem of future trade harassment by the United States. We're already seeing that now—not as a result of NAFTA—with the steel industry. I'm worried that while the free trade agreement indicated there was going to be an agreement on problems such as with steel, with NAFTA that's not going to happen now. That removes it. So we're very worried that we'll see a continuation of what I would call harassment at the trade level such as we're experiencing with the steel industry. I really believe that NAFTA is not going to get us where the federal government thinks it will get us and will not have the benefits it seems to think it will.

Ontario has done some things to try to cope with the recession, because if there's one component of it that's hit us the hardest, it's the impact on our revenues as a province. We've worked very, very hard on the expenditure side to contain the growth in the expenditures. I think we've had some success in that, although of course when your revenues are plummeting the way they have in the province, it becomes very difficult to match the revenue decline with parallel reductions in expenditures without really decimating essential services in the province.

Excluding debt interest this year, spending in Ontario is going to be growing by 2.8%. If you took out social assistance, which is a statutory requirement for us, there's virtually no growth in expenditures at all in the province this year. I think that's a major accomplishment, given that the rate of spending growth in this province in the last 10 years was very substantial. Because it was on an incline like that, it's not easy to simply turn off the tap overnight when a recession occurs. It takes time to get that under control, because it certainly wasn't. We've had some success at that, however.

I want to make one other comment on the free trade agreement, because I heard Mr Mazankowski talk about how there had been record exports to the US since the free trade agreement. While that's true, there have also been record imports from the US, and I suspect those imports would have even been higher if it hadn't been for the recession in this province.

In 1987, for example, we exported $13 billion more to the US than—in goods and services; I'm not talking about interest and dividends and so forth. By 1991, that surplus had dropped to $3 billion. So it's fine for the federal government to talk about how wonderful free trade has been in terms of record exports. They always fail to ignore the other part of the equation, namely, imports, and that certainly has caused us some problems as well.

Despite those factors, however, we have an obligation to get on with it and to do what we can as a province to rebuild the economy, and I won't dwell further on that.

The next sheet that you have before you deals with "Ontario Government's Economic Action Plan," because from time to time I hear people say to me: "Well, do you have a plan? We know you're in a recession. We know your revenues are down. We know your expenditures are difficult to control. Do you have a plan at all to get us out of this recession and take us where you think we should be going?" There's a very simple graph—

Interjection.

Hon Mr Laughren: Each one of those is expanded upon later, Mr Carr, if you will just be patient.

Mr Carr: There should be more.

Hon Mr Laughren: It is divided into two sections. One is a "Response to Economic Downturn" and the other is "Response to Structural Change," because I believe most people acknowledge that this recession has two parts to it. One is the cyclical economic downturn, the other is the more profound structural change that's going on underneath this. We've tried to respond to both of those components.

If you look to the next chart, Mr Carr, you will see that we're trying to deal with the economic downturn part of it in the ways that are on this page. It says that the Jobs Ontario initiatives that we announced in the budget, the non-profit housing initiatives—I won't go back, but the previous year we did the $700 million anti-recession package as well and announced the manufacturing recovery program in the previous budget. So that's the economic downturn component and the cyclical problem that we're trying to deal with in those ways. But some of those will also overlap into trying to deal with the structural problems as well.

The next slide deals with the response to structural change, the more profound changes that are going on underneath this. You can see, if you look at all of those initiatives, they add up to quite a bit. The training and adjustment initiative—we're spending $930 million this year on training. That's a record for this province, ever. We've put a lot of effort into our Jobs Ontario Training. That's coming along. It started off slowly but we're getting there. It's a complex program, which I think was one of the reasons it started off slowly, plus the depth of the recession, but I think we're on the right track. There's the training and adjustment board initiative.

We haven't forgotten equity either. We've got employment equity, pay equity and minimum wage increases, which I think are important.

We're trying to elicit more co-operation with our partners out there. That's what the training and adjustment board does. The Premier's councils are at work. The changes to the Ontario Labour Relations Act, which some of you didn't like, nevertheless I believe are indicative of the direction in which we want to head, because they do indicate a need for more partnership at work out there.

Supporting workers in new roles—I'm talking about the Ontario Investment Employee Ownership Plan, infrastructure support, all the base capital spending. Keep in mind that what we've committed to capital despite the recession is also at record levels.

There's the industrial policy framework through our sector strategies and our sector partnership fund of $150 million. There's the long-term financing we're dealing with through the Ontario Investment Employee Ownership Plan and the Ontario investment fund, which also has taken us longer to get off the ground than we thought, but at least we're still churning away there and we still intend to have an Ontario investment fund for members of the Legislature to examine and comment on.

We've also provided a lot of support for research and development and capital investment. Most of it was announced in the budget this year.

Those are some of the ways we're trying to cope with the structural problems we're facing out there.

Could we move to the fiscal outlook for 1993-94, because we're three quarters of the way through 1992-93 now. Keep in mind that we're going through the estimates process now in which all the ministries come before the treasury board with their expenditure requests. That is ongoing right now, so obviously I couldn't give you a final figure, even if I wanted to, for 1993-94 expenditures. We think we're going to be on track for our expenditure target that was laid out in the medium-term plan of $53 billion for 1993-94.

You could say: "Well, that's nice. How are your revenues doing?" You will know we announced earlier that we know our revenues are going to be the problem. There's going to be a $4.2-billion shortfall in meeting the revenue target we had for 1993-94 of $48 billion. Obviously, that's a major challenge for us to try to cope with so that we don't get involved in too many tax increases, in letting the deficit go crazy and at the same time manage somehow to maintain the essential services of this province. That's our goal.

We've already announced some measures to deal with that and they're outlined here: $600 million in 1993-94. That annualizes to $1.2 billion in the following year. That included slowing down the pace of the introduction of pay equity, restructuring the Ontario student assistance program, freezing senior-level salaries and limiting grant increases to major transfer recipients.

Of course, I'm talking about our major transfer announcements there. That's 30% of our budget, so we felt we had to do something. We announced a 2% increase for 1993-94, but that will not be built into the expenditure bases of all those transfer agencies. They're going to have to go back to this year's level in 1994-95. That's going to be tough, but I think when you're dealing with 30% of the Ontario budget, it's something we have to do if we're going to contain the growth in our expenditures and the growth in our deficit.

There are some very tough decisions still to be made, but we're determined to keep on track with economic renewal initiatives—that means job creation—with maintaining the essential services of this province and with keeping the deficit in check. It's a tall order, but I really believe we can accomplish it, perhaps not to everyone's satisfaction, but we're going to give it a good try.

The next page talks about managing better. It's taking one major ministry. Certainly, people in this room will appreciate the fact that health care spending is about a third of the budget, so if we're going to have major savings in the province, you can't do it without tackling health care. Hopefully, we're able to maintain the essential ingredients of our medicare system of which we're all so proud, but at the same time we've got to contain its costs. I don't think it's trite to say that if we're going to save medicare, we've got to contain the growth in its costs.

This page shows the annual rate of growth of Ministry of Health spending from 1983-84 on. It averages over 11% a year. You can see that in 1986-87 there was a 13.3% increase in the growth of health care spending. It dropped then to 10%, then to 9%, then back up to 9.8%, 11.2%, 9.7% in 1991-92, and this year 1.6%. I hope you won't accuse me of boosterism when I give Frances Lankin, the Minister of Health, a bouquet for her efforts, because that has been a major effort on her part and on the part of the government. I give them a lot of credit for having been able to accomplish that. You know and I know, when you push a button in the health care system, you make somebody mad. I think Frances has been able to do it in a remarkable way.

Also this year, for every dollar in new taxes we were able to reduce the growth rate in expenditures by $4. So we've worked very hard at that.

The next page has to do with the continuation of managing the system better. Fifteen ministries of government this year will actually spend less than they spent last year. I'd like to know the last time that happened. Keep in mind that I know people don't like our deficit, but the growth in spending this year will be the lowest in 39 years. That is an accomplishment in the middle of a recession, when there are enormous pressures on our health care system, our social assistance system and enrolments are going up in our education system. I really believe that's a major accomplishment.

Ministries' budgets have been cut by over 15% for travel, supplies, consulting and other overhead costs.

Salaries of cabinet ministers—I know you'll know this one—MPPs and senior management have been frozen. As a matter of fact, for cabinet ministers it's the fourth year in a row, and for MPPs I believe it's the third year in a row that salaries have been frozen. As someone who spent most of his life as an MPP without the increase in pay that comes with being in cabinet, I know that's not as easy as the public would like to believe it is sometimes, so I appreciate the efforts that have been made by MPPs.

We are on track to reduce the size of the public service by 2,500 positions over two years.

We announced $400 million in savings in the budget. We're on track. We have achieved about $350 million of that already. In our second quarter finances, because of revenue losses, we announced a further $500-million savings by the end of the year and we're working away at that. We're not there yet on that $500 million but we're getting there. If there are more specific questions on that, Jay Kaufman is the secretary of the treasury board and knows a great deal about that problem—not that he caused it, of course.

The next item has to do with the economic outlook as we look ahead. For 1992-93 you can see that real growth in the year we're in now will be about 1.5%, and for 1993, about 3.8%. Nominal growth, meaning basically with inflation built into it, is 2% and 5.5% respectively, and an inflation rate of 1.4% this year and 2% next year. Employment growth is negative again this year. That's a major problem, but at least a positive number for 1993. The unemployment rate is still disturbingly high at 10.8% this year and 10.6% next year. The unemployment rate is probably the part, when you look at it, that is most bothersome, because it doesn't drop dramatically even in the next two or three years. Along with that come a lot of other problems, as members of the committee will know.

There are, however, some good signs. The Ontario economy has grown about 3% since the spring of 1991, 48,000 jobs have been created since last August and CPI, the inflation rate, is low. The US economy seems to be firming up. There seems to be a recovery going on there. The uncertainty of the Canadian dollar may keep interest rates higher than we'd like, but the dollar has dropped by about 11% since a year ago, since the fall of 1991. That should help our exports, although of course it will add to inflation because of the finished goods that we import. So it will have that impact.

The next slide has to do with the sectoral outlook, and it's really meant simply to show where the growth will be in the next few years. This is between 1992 and 1996 and shows that the recovery is going to be led by the traditional industries such as housing and auto exports, that growth in consumer products will remain modest and that strong business investment and restructuring will underpin growth in business services and knowledge-based industries.

If you look at it, the highest there is the knowledge-based and business services sector, which in my view is a good incentive for keeping our expenditures up on education and training because that's where the growth has to come from.

It's a little disturbing if you look at the growth in non-residential construction, industrial materials and resources. You can see how low that is going to be, we think, and the physical and social infrastructure. But then it starts to build after that and you get all industries at 3.5% in real output and then the automotive sector, residential construction and the knowledge-based sectors accordingly.

The final paper in front of you is, as much as anything else, a challenge to this committee, if it chooses to take it. That's up to the committee, of course. I would appreciate your comments on this as well. I'm sure you've got your own questions, but there are three basic questions for the standing committee if it chooses to deal with them.

(1) Are there realistic limits on the amount of expenditure reduction that can be accomplished? What are these limits and, in particular, what services or groups in society should receive special attention as spending plans are reviewed? You can interpret that to mean special attention in reducing the expenditures that are spent now or in terms of maintaining expenditures in particular groups or sectors.

(2) While tax increases are always difficult and of special concern in these difficult times, are there tax actions the government should be considering that are fairer or better for the economy than some of the spending reductions that may be required? In other words, where is that mix of tax increases and expenditure reductions, keeping in mind where the big expenditures are: in health care, education and social services?

(3) What about the deficit? Would letting the deficit go up be better than tax increases or some of the spending reductions that may be needed? Does letting the deficit go up buy needed time because of the cyclical nature of the recession or does it just postpone hard decisions because it's not just a cyclical recession that we're in, as we indicated earlier? How would it affect confidence in our economy if we do let the deficit go up?

Those are some of the questions I would put to you. We've got some tough choices to make. I'm not trying to pass off those choices to the committee. In the end, it's the responsibility of the government to make those choices, but believe me, your suggestions will be taken seriously as we start the pre-budget process.

I don't know how ambitious your plans are, Mr Chair, on the pre-budget consultations. Ours are very ambitious, as they were last year, where we bring different groups in at the same time. I'd be very interested in hearing any suggestions you as a committee might have, either now or later, and will try to respond to any questions any members of the committee might have, if of course they have any.

The Chair: Minister, how long do you have? Till 3 o'clock?

Hon Mr Laughren: Yes.

The Chair: And your staff will be here from 3 to 4?

Hon Mr Laughren: I don't think so.

The Chair: I thought we were from 2 to 4. That's why I questioned.

Hon Mr Laughren: It's my understanding that the agreement was that we'd all be here from 2 to 3 and then we'd get on with other business, running the Ontario economy.

The Chair: Okay. Let's not waste any more time. Mr Phillips has the first question.

Mr Phillips: Maybe the staff could spare another hour for us some time. I mean, if you want some considered advice from the committee, I would think, as a matter of courtesy, we might have, maybe some time, another hour from the staff. I thought we were having the staff here for the rest of the afternoon.

Hon Mr Laughren: Perhaps we could work that out with the Chair, who will consult with the members of the committee.

The Chair: Fine. Ten minutes for the Liberal caucus.

Mr Phillips: I'm sorry about that note, but if you want our considered advice, we've got far less information from Treasury this year than we did last year. I thought we would have more time to ask questions of Treasury, and I'm concerned about that.

The Chair: We'll arrange that, Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate that. To help the committee along a little bit, Treasurer, I think when you announced the possibility of more taxes is probably when I got the most number of calls. I'm trying to understand why the revenue dropped by $4 billion. I look at your forecasts and I see that revenue from personal income tax next year is going up by $1 billion, revenue from corporate tax is going up by $455 million and revenue from retail sales is going up $220 million. Those are the big three taxes, and they're going up almost $1.7 billion. That's 55% of your revenue. The other part of your revenue is dropping by about 9%. I guess before we understand why you need more taxes, we need to understand why it is that the big three taxes are generating revenue at three times the rate of inflation increases and you're seeing major decreases elsewhere.

My second part of the question is that I understand the expenditures right now are planned to go up by about 6% next year. That's your target plan, that you're going to increase your spending by about 6%. Why is it that you want to increase your spending at a rate three times inflation for next year, before we look at those two numbers?

Hon Mr Laughren: You're talking about 1993-94?

Mr Phillips: For 1993-94, spending is projected to go up at 6%, and the revenues I talked about, the three big tax revenues, are going up at a rate well in excess of three times inflation.

Hon Mr Laughren: I think this is the same kind of question you asked in the Legislature one day.

Mr Phillips: And I never got an answer there.

Hon Mr Laughren: Because I didn't understand it then and I'm not sure I'm in a much better situation today to understand what it is you're getting at, Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: You're saying your revenues have dropped by $4 billion.

Hon Mr Laughren: Projected revenues.

Mr Phillips: Your projected revenues. I look at the personal income tax and it's staying the same next year as this year, but personal income tax revenue is going up by $1 billion, corporate tax revenue is going up by $455 million and retail sales tax revenue is going up $220 million. If those are all going way up, what has contributed to this enormous decline in the other areas so that you have no revenue growth next year?

Hon Mr Laughren: First of all, the base of the increase of 1993-94 over 1992-93 is over a lower base, to start with. That is a factor. If you're talking about an increase over a base that's lower than you anticipated it would be, you're going to have lower revenues, right?

Mr Phillips: I'm assuming your revenue this year is $44 billion and you're saying your revenue next year is going to be—

Hon Mr Laughren: But we've already announced that our revenues this year—and we've taken some action in that regard—are off by $500 million; we announced that late in 1992. So the base is down, and we're not through the fiscal year yet.

First of all, you've got a lower base in 1992-93 than we had anticipated, so naturally any increase is going to give you a smaller amount of money because you're dealing with a percentage of a smaller base. Secondly, the recession is worse than anybody thought it was going to be. Not that I'm using the federal government as a benchmark for many things, but look at its problems with revenue projection as well. I mean, we're struggling with our revenues next year being off in the neighbourhood of $4 billion from what we thought they would be; the federal government's deficit next year is going to be up $10 billion over what it thought it was going to be. So I'm not surprised, as I sit here now, that we're not going to get the revenues.

Mr Phillips: I'm using your estimates from this document you put out about a month ago. You show in that document, a month old, personal income tax revenue going up $1 billion from your September 30 forecast, year over year. I'm trying to get at why those three revenues would go up dramatically—

Hon Mr Laughren: Could I ask Mr Kaufman to try to take a run at this, because I'm not following you very well.

Mr Jay Kaufman: Let me deal, first of all, before the revenue issue, with the expenditure issue you raised.

Mr Phillips: The 6%?

Mr Kaufman: The 6%. With the budget plan we had would have seen, if the expenditure numbers were coming in at the originally projected level of $54.4 billion this year—those are the original budget plan expenditure numbers—we would have seen just over a 4% increase. We aren't, at this juncture, in a position to be explicit as to what next year's expenditure numbers are going to be, but we have been taking those expenditure numbers down, as we indicated in the second-quarter Ontario Finances. We have targeted to reduce those expenditure numbers down below the budgeted plan expenditure numbers by about $500 million. So the 6% you're referring to is against a reduced expenditure number this year. We'll see, as the Treasurer has said, at the end of the estimates process, the decision process we're into now, what the expenditure levels for next year will be. That's the explanation of your 6%.

Mr Phillips: You're saying that you're going to spend $50.1 billion this year, you're going to spend $53 billion next year. Is the 6% spending increase what we should look for?

Hon Mr Laughren: Could I add that there were no tax increases built into the revenue number for 1993-94, which would cause it to be lower as well.

Mr Phillips: All I want to know is why those three tax revenues are going up $1.6 billion next year over this year and all your other revenues are dropping by $1.8 billion. It doesn't add up, to me.

Hon Mr Laughren: The only thing I can think of is that, first, it was assumed that the fiscal stabilization plan, one of your favourite topics, would be built into our revenues for 1992-93 as revenues for 1992-93. If we don't get those revenues, then of course, once again, you've got a $1.2-billion reduction in revenues for 1992-93. One can only assume that they would be made up in 1993-94, but we wouldn't have them in 1992-93, which would give you that much higher a base from which you'd be operating, because it's year over year.

Mr Phillips: I think we would benefit from Treasury staff giving us the same estimates on the revenue by tax that we had last year when we were working on the budget.

Hon Mr Laughren: You mean how much tax revenues it had collected per point?

Mr Phillips: No, how much you are expecting, where your revenue is coming from, how you're getting the $43.8 billion. I know what you're going to get in personal income tax, retail sales tax, corporate tax. Those three revenues are going up dramatically, but all the other revenues are dropping.

Hon Mr Laughren: Because we do expect some growth in the economy in 1993-94, you appreciate that, and that would give us increased revenues in those areas.

Hon Mr Laughren: If you want more detail, please let us know specifically what it is you're after and we'd be happy to—

Mr Phillips: Because I think the numbers are very inconsistent: major growth in the three big taxes and huge declines everywhere else. That's factual, correct.

Mr Kaufman: As the Treasurer pointed out, I think that in this fiscal year, the projections include the fiscal stabilization. That's a one-time payment and therefore, in the next fiscal year, that is no longer an additional revenue source for us. So there are some major one-time-only revenues that are projected this year.

Mr Phillips: That accounts for part of it.

Mr Kaufman: We could easily sit down with you and the committee and give you a more detailed breakdown of the revenue sources. The fact of the matter is, as well, that there's the annualized impact, as the Treasurer mentioned, of the base drop that we've already indicated in the second-quarter finances. But in terms of more detail, we'll get that for you.

Mr Sterling: I had a line of questioning which was not too different from Mr Phillips's. You have said that your revenue forecast is $43.8 billion, and there is suspicion that that is not true, and there was question brought forward by evidence in the committee by one of the economists who have met with us in the last day. I would like to approach it from the point of view of your nominal gross domestic product.

In your 1992 budget, on page 58, you estimate that your nominal gross domestic product is going to be 6.1% in 1993. I believe you have revised that today to 5.5%; that may take in effect either the year or the slopover of the year or it might be just a—and that goes back to a base before what has happened in 1992-93. In other words, that's a cumulative figure, the nominal gross domestic product increase, as I understand it.

Therefore, if in fact you're only going from 6.1% to 5.5% in your nominal gross domestic product and, as economists have given evidence in front of this committee, the ratio is usually in terms of government revenue to a drop or an increase in your nominal gross domestic product of .9 to 1, it seems that if you says it's going down by .6, you can therefore justify probably $500 million of lost revenue in terms of what you expected, and you expected $48 billion originally. Therefore, we have a great deal of difficulty in believing you in saying that your revenue will drop $4.2 billion in 1993-94 if in fact you are continuing to support the nominal gross domestic product increase of 5.5.

Hon Mr Laughren: Well, I hope you're right and that our revenues don't drop by what was in the fiscal plan.

Mr Sterling: But how do you justify it? Your nominal gross domestic product figure does not drop by five points. It doesn't go from 6.1 to 1.1 or less; it goes from 6.1 to 5.5.

Hon Mr Laughren: Right.

Mr Sterling: Therefore, you're justifying a drop of $500 million from the $48 billion. You see, the $4.2 billion which you're setting us up to believe is not going to be there in 1993-94—we don't believe you, because you're not justifying it in terms of your other revenue projections and the growth figure. How do you marry those two?

Hon Mr Laughren: I don't know how to express it other than that's our forecast. I don't want to retell the ground we went over with Mr Phillips, but if the fiscal stabilization plan was to come in this year, it would boost our revenues by $1.2 billion, but next year we wouldn't be getting that money—that's a one-time hit this year—plus the growth rate has been lower than anybody thought it would be. Secondly, you're talking about nominal numbers, which means inflation is built into them, and inflation has been lower than anybody thought it was going to be as well. So those lower the nominal growth rate—well, it's true.

Mr Sterling: But it's built into the nominal 5.5; you've taken into account the lower inflation. You're asking for it both ways. Even if we give you the 1.2, you're still out by about $3 billion.

Hon Mr Laughren: Okay, but also in 1993-94 there were no tax numbers built into that and no asset sale numbers whatsoever built into that. We think we will achieve what we know inside government as non-taxed revenue measures, built into that as well. There are a number of components that lead us to think the revenues will be off by that amount in 1993-94. If they're not, I'll be the first to rejoice with you.

Mr Sterling: But you're not justifying the figures within your budget, which normally marry with each other. Economists have given evidence in front of this committee that they marry together. How will we believe the $4.2 billion? I think you picked it out of the air.

Hon Mr Laughren: I hear you saying that you think our revenues will be higher than we think they'll be in 1994. What would be the purpose of our deliberately low-balling revenue numbers for 1994? Why would we do that?

Mr Sterling: Perhaps you're laying the groundwork for bad news on May 1 or whatever it is and then you're not going to come in with such bad news. I don't know. It's been tried before, I hear.

Hon Mr Laughren: Not by this government. Would you stop hearkening back to previous governments, Mr Sterling.

Mr Sterling: If your Treasury officials could justify for me the 5.5 with the $4.2 billion, I would appreciate that in detail, because I would like to see where the $4.2 billion revenue loss really is.

Hon Mr Laughren: Perhaps we can take another run at that along with Mr Phillips's request, because I think they're serious requests. If we can't satisfy you with answers here today, we will see what we can do, because it's not something we're trying to disguise. There would be no purpose to that. We don't need to construct a bad-news scenario, with the state of the economy in the last few years.

Mr Sterling: Can I ask one other question?

The Chair: Mr Carr is looking at asking a question, but you have three minutes left.

Mr Sterling: I have one other question. I've heard for a long time the complaint by this government about transfers under the EPF and the other. According to your own document, over the last decade the province is owed some $15.5 billion. The document also says that all provinces are owed $41 billion.

According to your statement in November, the province provides 43% of all federal taxes. If we take 43% of the $41 billion to pay out EPF and everything else, that means Ontario taxpayers would be responsible for paying $17.6 billion. Therefore, you're requesting the federal government to give us $15.5 billion, but requesting the Ontario taxpayers to pay out $17.6 billion. Why do you want to do this when we've cost $2.1 billion to the Ontario taxpayers now?

Hon Mr Laughren: Wait a minute. That is strange arithmetic.

Mr Conway: It should appeal to you guys.

Hon Mr Laughren: If of all tax revenues that the federal government collects, 43% come from Ontario anyway—

Mr Sterling: That's what you said.

Hon Mr Laughren: —then it seems to me we should be getting back our fair share of that. If we're not getting our fair share—

Mr Sterling: You mean they've got extra money, have they?

Hon Mr Laughren: Well, wait a minute, Mr Sterling. Transferring their deficit to the province of Ontario and other provinces is surely not playing fair ball.

Mr Sterling: It doesn't matter. It's where they get the money to repay.

Hon Mr Laughren: I get a little upset when I hear Mr Mazankowski stand up on a soap box and point his finger at the provinces and say they're not controlling their deficits adequately. I want to tell you that if we could transfer our deficit to the municipalities and then wag our finger at the municipalities and say, "You've got to control your deficits," I suppose we could try to look like heroes, too, but that's not the way we're doing business.

Mr Sterling: Some would argue.

Hon Mr Laughren: That's the way the federal government is doing business.

Mr Sterling: But the fact of the matter is, Mr Laughren, that if you get $15.5 billion and the other provinces get their fair share under the programs, as it would be fully funded, the Ontario taxpayers would have to come up and pay $17.6 billion to get $15.5 billion.

Hon Mr Laughren: We don't pay 100% of the transfer payments to other provinces. We don't pay 100%.

Mr Sterling: I'm not saying you pay 100%.

Hon Mr Laughren: You're making it sound as though we're giving up more than we'd be getting back in transfers.

Mr Sterling: You would. The Ontario taxpayers would have to give up more, and that's what we find strange in your arguments in terms of complaining about the federal government not having more largess.

Hon Mr Laughren: The province has always been a strong supporter of equalization payments. We believe in the equalization principle. What we don't believe in is using other programs that are set up for other reasons, such as funding of health care and social services and post-secondary education, as equalization payments as well. We have equalization formulas out there for what are known as—I don't like the term—the have-not provinces. Then let's deal with equalization as an issue. Let's see if that's adequate. But don't use the other programs, everything from health care to the national highways program, as back-door equalization, because that's not the way it should be done. That's not negotiated; it's unilateral, and that's not the way we'll build a country where people feel good about sharing what we have in this province with other provinces.

The Chair: Okay, Minister, we're going to take a little different direction here. We've got Mr Ward with a question.

Hon Mr Laughren: How do you know if it's a different direction?

Mr Ward: Thank you, Treasurer, for coming before this committee to give your presentation on the present state of the economy as well as where we're heading in the future. We've heard from various representatives of banks and some economists earlier this morning and yesterday. They all seem to be in agreement that there is some semblance of a recovery, as shaky as it is, occurring within the province, if not throughout Canada.

I think there's a consensus that the recession we've experienced, starting in late 1989 or early 1990 really was twofold, that one was the normal business cycle downturn, but that it was also structural in the sense of something happening to our economy that hasn't happened before. I was wondering if you could expand on the structural changes the province is undergoing from an economic standpoint, as well as on page 5 where you outline some of our government's long-term objectives in dealing with that structural change. How do you feel these policies, such as the Ontario Training and Adjustment Board, the Ontario investment fund and the assistance for research and development can provide incentive or deal with the change in a positive fashion for the people of Ontario?

Hon Mr Laughren: To start at the beginning of your question, we know there are structural changes taking place. I'll give you one number that always sticks in my mind. In the recession of 10 years ago, about 25% of all the layoffs or closures were deemed to be permanent layoffs and closures. In this recession, two thirds of all the layoffs or closures were deemed to be permanent, so from 25% to two thirds were deemed to be permanent. To me, that's an indication of how much more profound this recession is than the one 10 years ago. That's why it's going to stay with us and why unemployment is going to remain high for the next three or four years. It's one of the reasons.

Secondly, there is the decline in manufacturing. That's a pretty good barometer of whether or not there's structural change going on, the state of manufacturing.

Third—I always get in trouble when I say this, but I think I must—is the whole question of resource values. The traded value of resources in a relative sense is declining, and a lot of the strength of this province has been in manufacturing and resources. If that's the case, we've got to work very hard at increasing the value, or the processing that's involved, for example, in resources. We've got to do what we can to encourage the private sector to add value to the resources it takes out before it takes it out of the province; in other words, make manufacturing out of it and so forth. That is really critical.

For those reasons, to go to the second part of your question—don't let me get off track here, Mr Ward.

Mr Ward: Don't worry; I won't.

Hon Mr Laughren: The second part of your question had to do with how we support that, how we help make it happen. If you look at the bottom part of page 5, we talk about support for research and development and capital investment. That's exactly what the changes in the budget were supposed to do. In itself, it won't do it, but we like to think it was a signal that by increasing capital cost allowances, which are like depreciation allowances, it would encourage investment. We broadened what's called the superallowance for research and development so that there's a bigger deduction for research and development expenditures. We also gave a tax break for small business by lowering the rate of tax it pays by half of 1%—I think it was from 10% to 9.5%, as I recall the rates—and for resources and manufacturing. We really tried to do it on the tax side to encourage them.

On the other side, we said that if we are going through a profound restructuring out there, we had better try and respond in a public sector kind of way as well through training and apprenticeship programs. That's where we spent a lot of money this year. I mentioned earlier over $900 million on training and apprenticeship this year. That's a huge amount of money, and we are setting up the Ontario Training and Adjustment Board which also will help with training.

There's been some criticism: "What are you training people for? What's the sense of training people if there are no jobs out there?" But it seems to me that now's the time to get people trained, to get them thinking about their future, get them into college programs so that as the recovery occurs, we're not scrambling. I think now is the time to do that. Also, quite frankly, it is a stimulus to the economy to be spending that money.

I could go through the whole list, but I think that's an indication of why we think it's a structural problem and not simply a cyclical one that will be over in a year.

Secondly, the long-term solution is going to be supporting infrastructures, supporting education, supporting training. That's all expensive, but I think not to do it would have us paying a larger price in the years to come.

Ms Harrington: We've heard some very interesting things in the last couple of days from economists, generally positive, but we do have difficulties, as you know.

I have two questions. First of all, yesterday we heard from an economist who said that this is a policy-induced recession, namely, the policies of the federal Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada. We heard again this morning in a list here about government structural changes contributing to it, such as deregulation, privatization, the FTA, the GST and the deficit reduction policies. Then he made a comment, in his words, something about, "Fire that government."

My question to you is, if there is a change at the federal level, how would that impact your projections for the next year or your budget this year? Secondly, I just want to bring forward that we have a lot of problems in the Hamilton-Niagara area, problems with steel and the auto industry. We have a lot of good workers, skilled workers, good access to the US. What do you see for our future in Niagara? Our workers really want to pay you some taxes.

Hon Mr Laughren: Pass on my thanks to your workers. I know they have to be working to do that. I appreciate that.

In terms of a change of the federal government, that's a hard one for me to answer because I really don't, at this point, know, although I find it hard to believe that any of the other challenging parties that would possibly be governing next year, aside from the Reform Party, would be as singleminded about monetary policy, the high dollar and the high interest rate as the present government.

I think it would be more stimulative. I don't want to be simplistic about it, but I would draw a parallel between the Republicans in the United States and the Conservatives in Canada. You saw with the election of the Democrats in the States at least a stronger sense of hope for recovery, probably more stimulation on the part of the federal government in the United States. Certainly, Clinton's been talking that way. The numbers I've seen him talk about haven't been that impressive if you take it down to Ontario or Canadian dollars, but at least he's expressing more stimulative thoughts than the previous administration in the States did. I think it would be stimulative, a change in the government at the federal level. I think that would help.

On the Niagara Peninsula question, I was looking at the unemployment rates by regions in the province and I know your area is quite hard hit, and it's been raised in the Legislature by you and others on several occasions.

I hope the automobile industry is able to put more money into Ontario. Actually, they have made some major investments in the province, as you know, in the last couple of years. That's been very encouraging. We hope they continue to do it. We have some major advantages in Ontario for investment, particularly by the automobile industry. They will tell you directly themselves, for example, that since they very often have to pay the health care premiums for the workers in the US because of contracts they have with their employees, that costs over $4,000 an employee in the States. In Canada it's around $650 per employee to pay their health care premiums; in other words, the employer health tax here. That's an enormous competitive advantage, and we need to keep saying that again and again.

Also, I believe that most of the automobile manufacturers would talk in pretty glowing terms about the skills of the Ontario workforce.

Thirdly, we do have an infrastructure here and a lifestyle that is, I think, considerably better than south of the border. They've got their own problems. I appreciate that, but I feel very strongly that we've got a place, in Ontario, to invest that's second to none.

They're having their problems. I looked at the General Motors announcement. There are major problems here, but look at the layoffs in the US that General Motors has announced as well. They're not simply picking on Ontario. They've got their own corporate problems.

The Chair: Minister, it's 3 o'clock and each of the caucuses has had 10 minutes.

Mr Conway: Surely you're not serious about that.

The Chair: Unless the Treasurer has any more time here to split up five minutes each, but I'm just following your directions at 3 o'clock.

Mr Phillips: I want to express my concern, because I think it was a year ago almost exactly that the Premier went on television and talked about opening the process up and making the numbers available. The material we've got so far from Treasury on the numbers is a fraction of what we got last year. The Treasurer shakes his head no, but we don't have revenue outlook by revenue point. We don't have any expenditure estimates that we had last year. There's far less information available to this committee.

We heard today that the staff was available only until 3 o'clock. I know we may change that, but I would hope the Treasurer would appreciate that for us to play our role, I think we should have more access to the Treasurer, more access to Treasury staff so we can get at some—we have a whole list of questions that we thought we would be discussing this afternoon.

Mr Sterling: I want to add to the concerns. Not only was I able to ask only two questions and didn't receive any kind of detailed response to either one, but I was not able to ask a whole series of other questions along with my counterpart. If in fact the Treasurer does want some advice, I think it's only fair that we be able to have some questions as to what in fact his figures do mean.

The Chair: As the Treasurer asked some questions of the committee, maybe we could answer those next time the Treasurer comes back. And maybe make the questions a little bit easier next time; then you would wind up being able to ask a whole bunch of short ones.

Mr Phillips: Why doesn't he write the questions?

Mr Conway: Do I take it this is the Treasurer's only appearance before this committee before the budget? I've got a great deal of respect for this Treasurer, but he knows that coming to this committee for 58 minutes and ending an interesting submission with three very useful questions and suggesting that he and his retinue must repair to other important executive business is something between farce and fraud. I've got too much respect for my friend from Nickel Belt to honestly believe that as a very good parliamentarian, he honestly expects particularly my friends who ordinarily sit on this committee to treat this process seriously if he and his senior officials are not themselves prepared to make themselves available, to a legislative committee charged with advising on matters of finance and economic policy, for more than 58 minutes on a January afternoon.

Hon Mr Laughren: Mr Conway, I know that I could spend a great deal of time here and learn a great deal from what you would have to say, but—

Mr Conway: I want to talk about judges' salaries, for example. Do I get a chance to ask you that question?

Hon Mr Laughren: Let me finish my sentence. I was here last year for I think about the same period of time. There's been no attempt by Treasury not to provide you with all the information that we can. I think some of the questions have been put in a way that's been difficult for us to understand where you're coming from, but not because we don't want to share information. We're not in that business.

We are shortly going to be launching a major consultation, because I think it's our obligation to consult not just with members of the Legislature, with whom we spend a great deal of time for many months of the year, but with folks out there from across the province. So we're going to be spending most of our efforts in consulting with other people out there across the province, not just the people who sit in this chamber.

Mr Conway: Darcy McKeough and Larry Grossman couldn't have said it more contemptuously.

Hon Mr Laughren: I don't think that's contemptuous.

Mr Conway: Surely this committee and this Legislature count for something.

Hon Mr Laughren: That's why I'm here.

The Chair: Mr Conway—

Mr Conway: I have some questions and I want to know—

The Chair: Yes, but it's gone past 3 o'clock. The Treasurer said he will come back.

Mr Conway: I'm asking him to stay.

The Chair: This is the second day of hearings.

Mr Conway: I want to ask this man some questions about issues that concern my constituents. I'll come back if he'll come back.

The Chair: I guarantee you that he'll be coming back.

Hon Mr Laughren: Mr Chairman, we made an arrangement, both in my schedule and others' schedules, to be here from 2 to 3. If that was not acceptable to the committee I wish you had said so. I thought that was agreeable to the committee and that's why we're here from 2 to 3.

The Chair: I knew you would be here for only one hour but I didn't know if the staff did. That's why I asked the question at the very beginning, because it wasn't clear on the document.

Hon Mr Laughren: But the committee can't make an agreement one minute and say, "Yes, come for an hour," and then say, "No, no, we don't want you for an hour; we wanted you for all day."

The Chair: I would say you've been here longer than 58 minutes. I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee, Treasurer. Some of the questions of Mr Phillips and Mr Sterling your ministry will get back to, and we'll see you back at this committee in a couple of weeks.

Mr Phillips: Mr Chairman, you told me that the staff was staying beyond 3 o'clock today.

The Chair: Treasurer, can any of the staff stay?

Mr Conway: I'm sure they can't; they're busy people.

Hon Mr Laughren: They are.

Mr Conway: I know they are. This committee is something more than a joke too.

Hon Mr Laughren: But they will come back.

Mr Carr: Mr Chairman, may I make one suggestion? I know the Treasurer wants to be helpful. We wasted a little bit of time arguing there.

The Chair: That was after 3 o'clock.

Mr Carr: Maybe if we had one more quick question each so I could get one question. I promise I'll keep it under 30 seconds. Would it be possible, since the staff isn't staying, that each of us get one more quick one if we promise to make it short? Can that happen?

Mr Ward: Just a point of order, Mr Chair: We had a designated time. It seems to me that the minister has other scheduled appointments to attend to, as well as his staff. But I think we should be able to work in another appearance by the Treasurer, if not his staff as well, at a later date.

The Chair: All right. Following the direction and being the Chair, I say no more questions.

Mr Phillips: Didn't the original schedule show the staff here longer?

The Chair: That's why I just asked the question.

Mr Phillips: The schedule I was given—this is the first time I'd seen that schedule.

Mr Carr: Since we're into this now, my office was called, asking if it would be acceptable for the Treasurer to come for an hour but for the staff to also leave with the Treasurer. My reply to them was: "Thank you very much. The Treasurer is very busy but I would like the staff to stay."

Just so it's clear, I was under the impression, having been phoned in my office, because they then phoned me and said, "What about the staff?"—I think the Treasury department will confirm this—and my office said: "No, we would like to have the staff there. We don't get much chance to deal with them." So I came with the understanding that there would be at least another hour with the staff. That's why I thought that if there's a bit of compromise, if they can't stay and if the Treasurer would be willing, out of the goodness of his heart, because I know he's trying hard, to answer maybe one more question for each, we could do it. I want to tell you, my understanding was that the staff was going to be here for an extra hour. Anyway, that's for the record, so people know what happened.

Mr Phillips: I did exactly the same thing. The schedule that was handed out yesterday, Treasurer, as you know, has Ministry of Treasury and Economics officials from 3 o'clock on. I told people I would be late tonight.

Hon Mr Laughren: I wasn't aware of that. We'll make sure they come back.

The Chair: Mr Phillips, I was just talking to the clerk here. There was a little line at the bottom, "subject to change," and she did change it.

Clerk of the Committee: We handed it out Monday morning.

The Chair: So yesterday morning it was handed out.

Clerk of the Committee: The new one.

The Chair: The new one. Thanks, Minister, for appearing before the committee. We'll welcome you back again next time and we'll get shorter questions for you.

Hon Mr Laughren: Okay, thank you, Mr Chair.

The Chair: This committee's adjourned until tomorrow at 10 am.

The committee adjourned at 1511.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Wednesday 13 January 1993

The committee met at 1006 in committee room 1.

PRE-BUDGET CONSULTATIONS

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): It being 10 o'clock, the standing committee on finance and economic affairs will resume the pre-budget consultations.

ONTARIO TEACHERS' FEDERATION AND AFFILIATE GROUPS

The Chair: I'd like to welcome the Ontario Teachers' Federation and affiliate groups. We have one hour between 10 and 11. Can you leave some time for questions near the end for all three parties? If you don't mind, identify yourselves and your positions for the purposes of Hansard. You may begin.

Ms Ruth Baumann: I am Ruth Baumann of the staff of the Ontario Teachers' Federation.

Mr Gene Lewis: I am Gene Lewis, president, Ontario Public School Teachers' Federation.

Mr Horst Schweinbenz: I am Horst Schweinbenz, president of the Ontario Teachers' Federation.

Ms Helen Biales: I am Helen Biales, president of the Ontario English Catholic Teachers' Association.

Ms Margaret Dempsey: I am Margaret Dempsey, president of the Federation of Women Teachers' Associations of Ontario.

Ms Margaret Wilson: I am Margaret Wilson, secretary-treasurer, OTF.

The Chair: Okay, I'm going to be a good Chairman. I'm going to allow you to start off and designate who is next. You don't have to go through the Chair for each presenter.

Mr Schweinbenz: Thank you. I will be presenting at the beginning and we will all share in the presentation.

The Ontario Teachers' Federation is pleased to have this opportunity to present its views and concerns to the government during this pre-budget consultation. The federation represents 130,000 teachers, both elementary and secondary, public and separate, in the publicly funded schools of Ontario. We see ourselves as part of the broader public sector attempting to work in partnership with the government to provide Ontario's children and adult learners with the best possible education, particularly in these times of economic difficulty.

During the time available, we'd like to address several issues: the impact of the current government economic restraints on the education system, the central role of education in Ontario's economic future, the responsibilities and options for change in provincial government support for education, and the necessary conditions for effective partnerships to provide quality education programs for all Ontarians in difficult economic times, with an eye to our collective future.

The impact of the transfer payments in the last two rounds cannot be minimized. We have a chart attached in appendix A of this submission that shows the impact that occurred with the 1% increase in transfer payments late in 1992. The summary also talks about how this impact has gone on to salary settlements, the numbers of positions eliminated and the areas of program and operations that were affected by the budget restraints and staff cuts.

Appendix B is a document entitled "Ontario Teacher/School Board Settlement Rates, Pre and Post 1992 Announcement of 1992-93 Transfer Payments," which will give you a clear indication that the education sector is responding quite rapidly to the changes that have taken place with regard to transfer payments. I would ask Gene Lewis to go through some of those changes, particularly in salary settlements.

Mr Lewis: I think it's safe to say that it's been a bit of a rocky ride for education in the last 12 months as school boards have scrambled to restructure. Unfortunately, under the banner of fiscal accountability, many boards have abandoned programs and services which were once the mainstay of North America's finest education system. Programs that have historically been associated with a child's education in this province have been decimated.

Collective bargaining, in many instances, was labelled as the culprit, but in reality it's been through the collective bargaining process that a number of programs and services for children have been salvaged. It's irresponsible, in my opinion, to suggest that the teachers' collective bargaining process has contributed to the current recession, although in the media, particularly, there's been an attempt to draw that conclusion.

I'd like to refer you to the document, on page 2—the title is "Salary Settlements"—and just briefly take you through it. Excuse me; the version you have begins at the bottom of page 1. The first paragraph that begins with, "During the weeks following the January 21," outlines the fallout from the Premier's January 21 announcement of funding cutbacks, and they've been significant. In the second to last line you see the term "a bitter pill," and indeed that's what it has been for many of our collective bargaining units across the province and for many of our parents and students across the province.

The second paragraph outlines the impact of the Premier's announcement on salary settlements, and I think you'll see that they're not dissimilar from the kinds of agreements that were reached in other sectors.

The last two paragraphs demonstrate that collective bargaining is indeed responsive to the economic climate of the province. One of the greatest criticisms that was put forth was that teacher bargaining demands were unrealistic. The reality is, of course, that teacher bargaining, like much of the bargaining in all sectors, has been responsive to the economic climate of the times, and the current settlements that are being reached demonstrate that fact.

One of the biggest concerns, of course, with school boards at this point is that when the 2% promise was made, school boards developed their budgets on that commitment from the provincial government, and the fact that the government has reneged on that is creating a great deal of instability in the education system.

One of our current concerns is the manner in which the $99 million will be allocated. I believe it's safe to say that the ill-fated transition assistance fund from last year should not be used as an example of how to disburse this $99 million. The federations have put forward some suggestions to the minister and we hope the minister has been listening. Horst perhaps will comment on that further later on.

To go back purely to collective bargaining, bargaining with fewer resources is difficult at the very best and it's vitally important that the parties to the bargaining process be left alone to resolve their differences themselves. It's important that the government make it absolutely clear it will not become involved in the collective bargaining process. For the government to become involved would create a triangulation of process that will only aggravate circumstances that are currently not the best.

The involvement of the government in a change of the ground rules, such as a redefinition of "full-time equivalency" or the number of years of schooling that our students must participate in, would only make a difficult situation a disaster.

In summary, I guess I'm saying that both boards and teachers do not need another series of hoops to jump through. We are quite capable of resolving, through the collective bargaining process, the challenges that confront us and we recognize that these will be difficult times.

Mr Schweinbenz: In regard to other things that have happened in the last year, collective bargaining has been affected, as Gene has said, but we've actually had individuals and programs affected, and I'd ask Margaret Dempsey to continue on that.

Ms Dempsey: With children and youth and their education being the focus for Ontario's teachers, we wish to paint a picture today of the seriousness of the landscape out there for the children in terms of staff and program cuts, because we must always keep in mind the human face of the children who are right here within our schools as we speak, and the fact that without the resources for the classroom teacher to benefit the learning and learning styles of those children, we are negating the fact for childhood and youth that I believe we all want as citizens of Ontario.

As referred to in appendix A, it will list a total of 2,427.8 positions eliminated in Ontario schools between the 1991 and 1993 school years. This is a number that we as teachers in Ontario believe is high relative to other, broader public sector employees.

But let's look at the real landscape too beyond the people and look at the program cuts. The cuts are in the junior kindergarten, family studies, technological studies and special education areas. A number of school boards have delayed the implementation of new junior kindergarten programs or have had to cut existing programs because they are not yet mandatory.

Then, taking it down to the school and the classroom level, professional development budgets have been cut. Support staff working hours, supplies, furniture and equipment, all of this has been affected and all of this will directly impact on the children. In many boards, class sizes have increased, and I've particularly noted that at the elementary school level in my travels.

Of our professional staff in many boards who are the coordinators and curriculum consultants, who help us to implement programs with children and who help us to look at the special-needs children so that we are making a program suit their particular needs, many of these professionals have been cut or redeployed back to classrooms.

In terms of maintenance and renovations in many boards, there have been cuts there as well.

All the actions that I've described in this landscape, taken to achieve budget estimates, are actions which I believe can be taken once only. A curriculum department in a school board cannot be eliminated twice, and the savings achieved by reduced maintenance and repairs may produce additional costs later on for that particular school system.

I believe that in this era, when we're all under public scrutiny for providing the very best quality education we possibly can for our children and youth, we have to look at the short term and the long term.

In the words of Michael Fullan writing about educational change, he says that change is resource-hungry. We as teachers know that we are living through one of the most significant change periods within educational history in Ontario in terms of program reform, and I speak in terms of the development of new curricula and the program for the transition years. Resources that have accompanied major changes in the past no longer exist. Let me give you some examples.

Over the past four and a half years, the curriculum policy section of the Ministry of Education has been devastated. In 1988, for example, the combined complements of the centre for early childhood and elementary education totalled 53, including two directors and 43 education officers. In the spring of 1992, the curriculum policy development branch of the ministry had one director and 21 education officers for the entire JK-OAC graduation continuum.

A second example which shows you the marked change: In 1988 the central Ontario regional office of the ministry had 48 staff listed in the government directory, including 28 education officers, but as of February 1, 1993, that office will have 14.5 English and 1 French education officers to serve the schools from Waterloo to Hastings and from the Niagara border to the north end of Simcoe county.

This concern that we as teachers raise with you today about the level of professional support which the ministry offers to school boards and to us as teachers is of grave concern to us. At the same time, we have school boards supporting change with local resources and the capacity then of the ministry to provide the leadership, and that support is very quickly disappearing. We as teachers in the schools are faced with significant changes to educational programming and delivery, and we need that linkage of support from the ministry as well as supports within our school systems for the children we teach.

Mr Schweinbenz: What is the future role of education in Ontario? I would ask Helen to expand on that.

Ms Biales: Continuing on with the concerns expressed by my colleague Margaret here about the children in our society in general, I'd like to make it abundantly clear that if Ontarians are to maintain their standard of living collectively and individually, the nature of our economy has to change significantly.

The high-wage, semi-skilled manufacturing jobs which drove Ontario's economy for decades are fast disappearing. Our children and the students in the schools, if they are to maintain the quality of life most Ontarians have enjoyed so far, must be skilled and knowledgeable, adaptable, mobile and ready to continue learning throughout their adult lives, and we as a school system definitely support lifelong learning. The high value added jobs that will produce the high wages require more children and adults to become more successful at learning than we have expected in the past.

I think we're all familiar with the recent report of the Conference Board of Canada, Dropping Out: The Cost to Canada, and some of the observations are found on page 4. Let me go over them briefly. The first observation made by the report is that:

"Canada will lose more than $4 billion in present-value terms over the working lifetimes of the nearly 137,000 youths who dropped out of secondary school instead of graduating with the class of 1989.

"Each individual male dropout will lose nearly $129,000 in today's dollars over his working lifetime, while the female dropout forfeits $107,000.

"As an investment vehicle, education has a higher rate of return than almost any alternative investment project. The rate of return to society of investing in secondary school education is 19% for males and 17.8% for females.

"Canada could save $26 billion if the dropout rate were reduced from 34% to 10% by the year 2000."

We as a federation may argue with some of the Conference Board figures regarding the current dropout rates and how it arrived at those figures, but the arguments it put forward are sound and the questions it raised are very provocative and something we should consider.

I think the point that has to be emphasized in this pre-budget process is this: As an investment vehicle, education has a higher rate of return than almost any alternative investment project. I think if the schools can find ways to enable greater numbers of students to achieve greater success, if we can entice the dropouts back and increase the number of young children who read successfully, we will achieve significant economic and social benefits for society as well as for individuals. Of course these changes cannot be made in a resource vacuum.

I would like to quote what the Premier was quoted as saying in the paper yesterday. I think this is very appropriate and I hope the government will follow through on this. The quote is, "I want you all to know this is one Premier who very much wants to fight on behalf of the people of this province." The children we teach are the people of this province.

Mr Schweinbenz: What role does the provincial government have in this entire process? I would ask Gene to continue.

Mr Lewis: I'm referring to the section at the bottom of page 4. I think it's safe to say that Ontario's education system has been highly regarded around the world, let alone North America. We've been the envy of many communities, and as teachers and as parents we appreciate that and we yearn for that to continue.

One of the strengths of our system has been its consistency and its dependability. Our system has been perceived as one in which parents can find services and programs for their children year after year and the system is perceived as dependable. Parents can depend on it; educators can depend on it. That's been a major strength.

Yesterday I was talking to a director of education in this province about the current process of reform that's taking place and he provided a little analogy which I found interesting. He said, as a director, it feels like he has been asked to build a house and he's supposed to start with it tomorrow but he'll be given the plans a couple of weeks from now. That's the situation educators find themselves in.

We need leadership from the provincial government. It's fine to decentralize, and within reason decentralization accommodates the needs of local communities, but taken to the extreme it simply leads to chaos in the system.

The parents of Ontario must be able to depend on the education their children are receiving. I think the leadership coming from the provincial government, first of all, has to be available, then it has to be rational and it has to be coherent. The role of this government is extremely important in ensuring that the quality of the education system in this province is maintained.

Mr Schweinbenz: The resources and priorities that the government places on its own spending are important to us. The chart on page 6 will illustrate how we see the government has placed its priorities for spending. We see a ministry that's moving away from educational resource to school boards to more of administrative and technical. If you take a look at the growth in the administrative line on table I on page 6 over the five years from 1988 to 1992, the administration section has gone up considerably. When you look at the learning programs you will see that the numbers there have declined significantly.

The resources that the government puts, are they displacing jobs in the school boards or are they adding to more jobs in the school boards? In the past six years, there's also been a move to a generic nature of people working within the ministry—not professional educators but just people who can work in the ministry. In those six years, the previous government and this government have initiated major restructuring initiatives within the educational system, curriculum change that deals with all aspects: teacher education, junior kindergarten, the transition years, the formative years, OAC, technology, and all of these at the time when the government is moving away from professional educators in their department to more generic people. We wonder why.

The purpose of this budget and the pre-budget process is to examine not only how to fund but what to fund. True priorities of this government are revealed in the details of its budget and its operation. We ask that you come back to looking at the curriculum and some of those areas that we really need for the schools and away from the administrative presently being handled by the school boards themselves.

I will ask Ruth Baumann to sort of walk you through the chart or table I and she can explain the numbers.

Ms Baumann: Let me explain first that the data on table I, with the exception of some data I will be giving you so you can fill in the missing information, comes from what I would describe as a pretty simple methodology. We simply took six years of Ministry of Government Services telephone directories and counted bodies. We tried to make sure we didn't count anyone twice. Where there was a clear vacancy, we did not count that as somebody being there. There were places where you had a phone number and it was clear there was a position waiting to be filled. There were enough of those scattered all over that we figured in the end they probably cancelled each other out.

We bring to your attention what has happened in the major areas of Ministry of Education activity, because we think it tells a tale that people may not have noticed. Their corporate policy and planning division has grown over the last four years. It was first begun in 1987. The administration division has grown enormously.

There are two things, one in each of those ministries, that we were able to identify as a one-time move, and they've been noted in the notes that are attached to the chart. There were branches that moved from one division to another division, and that's a justifiable increase when one deals in those numbers.

We did not, in either of those cases, try to get into a detailed analysis of who was there. We did note that the largest single area of growth in the administration division was in the school board information technology services, which is the provision by the ministry to a number of school boards, we understand, of computer programs and support for that, but that wasn't an area of enormous growth at a time when other departments of the ministry were, at best, holding their own or being cut.

We've not done totals on the learning programs division because in fact there are a number of activities contained within that division and we wanted to focus on those that support the kind of program policy change that we're in the midst of right now. If you look at the three lines that are listed under "Learning Programs," you will see a steady erosion in what we've termed curriculum policy development—it's what was in 1988 the curriculum branch of the ministry—in terms of the number of staff available.

In conversation on the telephone yesterday with people from that department, it is my understanding that since June 1992, when the last column was in the directory that we had, the curriculum policy development branch and the Centre for Curriculum Resources Technologies have been merged. While I don't have total figures, the number of education officers left in the combined branch is down to 18. Those are professional educators with experience in the field.

Whereas in June you had the directory listing 21 education officers in curriculum policy development and, I believe, at least 10 of the people in the Centre for Curriculum Resources Technologies, that's now down to a total of 18, 13 of whom were in curriculum policy development and five who are dealing with the computers in education aspect, the actual development of computer curricula and software for teachers to use.

The other area I would draw your attention to is the learning services division, which is the regional offices of the ministry. These are the offices of the ministry that provide direct and ongoing support to school boards. I would like to, first of all, say that the number of footnotes that deal with those offices, we believe, reflect a move away from permanent staff and towards short-term secondments.

It's difficult to ascertain from the directory, but in conversations with people in those offices, it would appear that over the period from 1988 to 1992 and the present, there has been a growth in the number of people brought into the ministry for very short periods of time to do specific tasks and a decrease in the number of persons employed on a permanent basis.

That's not always a bad thing. Unfortunately, with the kinds of budget restraints that are occurring right now, what is happening in a number of offices, and the central Ontario regional office would be a good example of this, is that all of those secondments simply get cut. Where the permanent complement may not be cut, secondments are, so that you end up with disproportionate hits in the cutting back.

As of September 1992—and again I don't have total figures here; I have education officer figures, which would correspond to the second number under "1992"—the central Ontario regional office was down to 16.5 permanent education officers, eastern was down to 14, midnorthern was down to 13, northeastern was down to 14, northwestern was down to 10 and western was down to 16.

We believe in fact that we've demonstrated to you today that the level of support at the policy level—how to do things, what to do, advice to school boards—has been eroding steadily and has taken a really sharp plummet downward within the last year, at the very time when we're being asked, as teachers and school boards, to make significant changes.

Mr Schweinbenz: Do you want to go to the question, or would you like me to continue?

The Chair: He's got his hand up for as soon as you're done.

Mr Schweinbenz: The other thing that has happened in the last few years is the shift into the schools of services from other agencies that are now being delivered through the school system.

Table II, on page 9, talks about transfers to Education, Community and Social Services and Health. However, it doesn't necessarily indicate those areas which now overlap and which are being delivered by the schools. There are many discussions about disentanglement. One of the things we find of great concern is that we believe the students in our schools need these services, but they should not necessarily all be paid for out of the education budget. There should be some way of paying for the services that are being delivered by the schools in combination from the other budget areas that formerly paid for them.

I would ask Ruth to take you through table II.

Ms Baumann: There are two comments I'd make. I apologize: There are some things we did not catch in our proofreading. We were revising these about 20 minutes before we left this morning.

The education transfer to school boards is the general legislative grants only; it does not include capital. The figures are all in millions of dollars for all three ministries. We'd simply draw to your attention that the rate of increase of transfers to school boards versus the increases in Health and Community and Social Services has been much slower.

The observation we would like to make today is that as the restraint and the current fiscal difficulties have hit all of government, locally and provincially, as ministries and delivery agencies have withdrawn services, schools, as the universal hub in the community, have found it very difficult to withdraw services and in many cases end up picking up the delivery of services that used to be available elsewhere. Or in some cases—and I would use specifically some health services, including speech and language services and provision of support for physically handicapped children in schools, including things like catheterization—there are services to students which were intended by all ministries to be funded by Health, which at the local level, depending on the ability of hospitals and local health units to provide those, in many cases are not occurring and school boards are left having to provide those services regardless, because the kids are there.

It's one of the things that we believe has contributed to the emergence of education as the primary claim on the property tax. The rate of increase of transfers to municipalities for social assistance and general welfare has been at a much higher rate than the rate of increase of transfers for education, so the amount that's left to be picked up on the local property tax has increasingly shifted from general municipal services to education.

When we get into our closing section on the financing of education and education and taxation policy, we think that disparity, the disparity in the treatment of Community and Social Services, Health and Education over the last five years—and I think it's important to emphasize that this is not something that has suddenly happened; it's a pattern that's been there—is one of the things that is bringing us the crisis we see right now with property tax and education.

Mr Schweinbenz: I would ask Helen to continue with the financing of education and taxation policy.

Ms Biales: Many of our concerns come from the government mandating services that schools should provide. We don't disagree with the mandated services, but we are quite perturbed that full funding is not provided for these services. We can't continue to add on and not provide the funding. There's also an increase in the fixed costs such as utilities, hydro being one example. That has to be taken into account.

As mentioned by Ruth, there are services that are crucial to our students that don't appear in the curriculum but must be provided for these students. She mentioned speech services, catheterization, these kinds of things, and we need to continue to provide them.

As previously stated, the financing of education relative to health and social services has resulted in services being financed directly from the local property tax, because education has to pick up this cost. If we're not getting any more money from the government, where's it going to come from? The local taxpayer.

The payments to municipalities for welfare and other social assistance have escalated, but the transfers to school boards have not. This is why this particular thing occurs, where you have the taxpayer having to pay more. In fact, the education increase in property tax we figure has come up to approximately 55%.

The decision of this government to undertake a comprehensive examination of the tax system in this province and to include the community in that examination we felt showed real leadership. The results are back now, and the Treasurer needs to show continued leadership in this aspect.

The property tax working group of the Fair Tax Commission identified education as one of a group of government services that should be financed on the basis of ability to pay. This can be achieved in part by moving some education expenditure away from the local property tax and back to provincial revenues.

Rethinking our present system of equalization provides the opportunity to create greater equity. I think that's something the government does espouse all the time, that equity is very important. The education community has known for at least a decade of the disparity between school boards in their ability to raise revenue locally. The part that was not known until recently is how flawed the assessment is as the basis on which to calculate equalization payments for education.

Table III in appendix C, from the property tax work group report, indicates how much a number of community assessment practices vary from the assumptions built into the present education finance system. The serious differences in the way commercial and industrial assessment is handled relative to residential assessment between communities have effects which are greater than all the equalization payments in education.

We know the assessment system itself cannot be fixed quickly. It would create utter chaos if we tried to do that. Some of the effects of a flawed system can be mitigated, though, if it is no longer used as the foundation for equalization among and between communities. An equalization system reflective of a community's ability to pay would be a significant step towards increased fairness and it would be much fairer to those school boards we classify as poor school boards, which happen to be the bulk of the school boards in this province.

Mr Schweinbenz: We apologize. Appendix C apparently has been left off, but if you have any questions on it, we have one of the co-chairpersons of the property tax group with us in Margaret Wilson, and we will get you appendix C later this morning.

In conclusion, we can face this challenge together. I would ask Margaret Dempsey to continue.

Ms Dempsey: As the Ontario Teachers' Federation, we ask you today to consider four key points: that the ultimate test of success of any government is not whether it has good ideas but whether it can make those ideas work; that priorities and commitments are ultimately identified by the human and the financial resources allocated and not strictly by words; that successful change requires detailed attention to transitions, whether the change is in the area of taxation policy or in education reform. Education, we believe very strongly, is the key to our collective future as a province, and real educational reform requires working and workable partnerships between stakeholders and government and sufficient resources to make real change.

Mr Schweinbenz: Teachers are not asking for money so that we can get more salaries. We're asking that you consider in your priorities that the programs you're asking the school boards to implement can be financed so they can be implemented successfully.

As a member of the Canadian Teachers' Federation, I have one last chart to give you. It compares Ontario's spending on education and health and social services with all the other provinces. You will notice that the largest decrease in education is in Ontario. We ask that in your deliberations you look at restoring education to the funding levels it had in comparison to health and social services for the benefit of students in the schools. Thank you very much.

The Chair: Thank you. We'll start with Monte Kwinter.

Mr Monte Kwinter (Wilson Heights): I'm going to direct this question to the panel in general, not to anyone specifically, and you can decide who wants to answer it.

One of my concerns is that there's a feeling I get from my constituents, feelings I hear about, that there's a general dissatisfaction with the level of education we are providing to our students. The Economist of London—I'm sure you're familiar with this publication—had a major report on education in the world and came to the conclusion that Canada—I'm not saying specifically Ontario, but certainly Ontario included—allocates one of the largest per capita proportions of any country in the world to education, yet the level of education is considered relatively poor.

I bring to your attention a photograph in the papers this morning, both in the Globe and the Star, of parents in Scarborough lining up overnight to get students into R.H. King Academy. The headline is that they're there to get their children a better education, because they're unhappy with the education that is being provided to them in the regular programs.

I have a vested interest; I'm very familiar with it because my wife happens to teach at R.H. King. That's why I happen to be aware of it: I saw the article, and it wasn't just a passing thing, because I noticed it.

How do you reconcile the fact that we devote that substantial proportion of our provincial budget to education, yet the results that are coming out don't seem to meet the expectations of the population?

Mr Schweinbenz: Perhaps I could start before anyone else jumps in. We believe education in Ontario is good. We believe we're delivering a very good product to the students. But I also think there are some expectations of teachers and of the school system that are not found elsewhere. In Metropolitan Toronto, there are 54 different nationality groups, and the 54 groups bring ethnic and cultural differences to the classroom. Teachers have to cope with that and at the same time deliver a balanced program. If you get into an elitist situation, perhaps in one of the schools you've mentioned, that's one of the things they can perhaps iron out, because only the rich can afford to go there.

The other thing being required of teachers and of the school system is not just to deliver basic education but also to deliver values, to deliver some of the programs that are being asked of us on a constant basis, and it comes from all different points of view. We have people asking us to look at not only education but the social and welfare aspects of children and the surroundings they're in.

When you look at international tests, they talk about averages. Well, our top students will compete with the top students anywhere in this world, and I would put any of them to task in any country to say that their top students are better than our top students, because I think our top students are the top.

Would anyone else like to add to that?

Ms Wilson: I want to start by saying that I think all of us believe we can also do better in terms of our students. If you take an article such as The Economist's, one of the things it does not do is make comparisons based on the jurisdictional modes of various countries. One of the things we have to expect in Canada is that a substantial amount of the spending on education will be spent on governing education, because we don't have a unitary mode of government for education, so each province will have its own ministry. It would be fair to say that in Canada increasing amounts have been spent in every province over the last 10 years in local governance of education to meet what are priorities or constitutional rights, whether you're talking about French language rights or the rights of Catholic parents to govern their own schools.

I have never seen an adequate sort-out of the jurisdictional costs as opposed to the classroom costs. It would be an interesting exercise, because I think we might be surprised at the proportion of the education spending that actually went on what you might call governance and administration as opposed to the classroom. I know that in Ontario, if you go back to some of the comments that were made about health and social services, we have a number of boards that have more non-teachers than teachers on their staffs, large boards. If you look at what the non-teachers do, to a huge degree they're delivering health and social services, or assisting with health and social issues, as opposed to the delivery of the classroom curriculum.

We as teachers think that one of the things that has to be examined is where the priorities are. The other problem we have is finding a real consensus on what the schools should be doing. There is no question but that the activities of the classroom teacher have increasingly been taken up with health and social issues over the last 10 years. If we want to get back to—I won't say back to basics; I don't think that's what Monte's driving at either—the curriculum questions and to increasing the performance of all of our students, knowing that the best students on any international tests really do very well—the big American math competition won't let Canadians in any more; we've won too often. Seriously. Last year they decided no more Canadian entrants. If we want to get back to improving performance of all the students, we have to decide where the resources will go. I invite you to go back again to those charts and what's happened to the Ministry of Education in terms of where its money goes; to what's happened to ministry regional offices in terms of where they're putting staffing money; and to what's happening in school boards in terms of where they're able to put staffing money if we have to subsidize, which is what we're doing, Comsoc and Health.

Let's have a real discussion about education spending and education priorities. Let's staff the system so that if we want radical overhaul—and the previous government had ambitions similar to this government in terms of curriculum change—we've got the resources to make curriculum change and are not just wandering around in the dark, school by school, which seems to be the present invitation.

The Chair: I've got to go on to Mr Sterling.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, could I just correct a statement Horst made, just for the record? R.H. King is a high school in the Scarborough system; it's not an elitist kind of thing where people who can afford—anyone can go to R.H. King on a first-come, first-served basis, but it is a regular high school in the sense that it is funded the same way as every other high school and the students who go there go there on the same basis. It's limited enrolment because they only have so much capacity and it's on a first-come, first-served basis, and that's why people were lining up to get in.

Mr Schweinbenz: I apologize.

Mr Norman W. Sterling (Carleton): Yesterday and the day before, we had several economists in front of us. They said this recession was different, and one of the reasons it's going to be difficult to get out of—and that was confirmed in terms of employment figures as predicted by our Treasurer yesterday—was that during this recession there has been an income distribution problem. Those who are doing well have done well during the recession; those who have not been doing well are not going to be hired next year, because those who are doing well have taken a bigger bite of the pie than perhaps they should have. Some might argue that the teaching profession, which is very strong in this province, has taken too big a bite during the recessionary period. Would you care to comment on that?

Ms Baumann: Mr Sterling, I would direct your attention to the material in appendix B. I think it's important that one first of all recognize, and we would argue, that collective bargaining is a process that has worked well for education in general in Ontario over the last 17 years, since legislation was first introduced.

The brutal fact is that as we get to a recession, school boards, like government, feel the effects of the recession later than the community at large. We feel it when tax revenues are down, for instance. Indeed, what we had happening in school boards with collective bargaining was that salary settlements were running in the 5% range prior to the Treasurer's January 1992 announcement about the transfer payments. That's not surprising when the transfer payments the year before had been increased by almost 8%. I think that's the kind of pattern one would normally expect.

It was when the sudden damper came that—if you look at the average figures, they look high, but they look high because a number of those agreements were settled long before the 1%, 2% and 2% announcement was made. When you actually, as we asked the Education Relations Commission to do, break out the settlements that were made before and after that January announcement, you discover that very quickly those settlements began to fall and that the notable exceptions, those still in the 3% or 3.5% range, are ones where traditional comparators, neighbouring boards and other groups of teachers within the same board, had settled before January.

The experience of teacher bargainers both in the 1970s and in the early 1980s, when the Progressive Conservative government imposed wage restraints, has been that bargaining has come into line, that it takes longer for all of the system to come into line, so that on the recovery end we're slower coming out. I think you'll find that's supported if we look back either at the mid-1970s or at the early 1980s. So we're slower getting into it and we're slower getting out of it, but the adjustment occurs none the less, and I think is a reasonable adjustment.

Mr Sterling: I'd just like to say, having come through a fairly bitter strike in the area I represent, that none of my constituents supported the teachers with regard to the Carleton Board of Education strike. Unfortunately, the teaching profession lost unbelievable amounts of credibility in terms of the strike action. I did not receive one call from one non-teacher supporting the teachers, and I received hundreds of calls on the other side. They thought the teachers, quite frankly, were being greedy at a time when lots of people in my area were losing jobs. I just put that to you.

The Chair: Mr Carr, you have two minutes.

Mr Gary Carr (Oakville South): Along the same lines, yesterday the NDP members talked about transfer payments from the federal government and the Treasurer came in yesterday and complained about the federal government. I want to put you in the position of my board. They will next year receive 0% from this government. I look down the list, and already negotiated is a 2% increase of teachers' salaries. You don't need to be very good to realize that property taxes are going to go up because of that.

Would you care to comment on that and tell the taxpayers in Halton how, when the provincial government has limited transfers at the same time they're complaining about the federal government, my board will get zip, zero? They've already negotiated 2%, and I think probably 80% of the board's expenditure is salaries. What do you say to the property taxpayers in Halton who are going to get big property tax increases because of two groups of people: one, the provincial government, and, two, the salaries of teachers?

Mr Schweinbenz: Could I just say we don't believe it's all going to be the salaries of teachers? If you take a look at the Halton board and the percentage of the board budget that is teachers'—

Mr Carr: Which would be what?

Mr Schweinbenz: It would probably be in the 50% to 55% range of the total budget.

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): My experience was always that the teachers are about two thirds, but that's 10 years ago.

Ms Dempsey: Not any more.

Mr Phillips: Those are the good old days?

Mr Carr: Regardless of what it is, it's a big enough share that when you get 2% of 50%, 60%, 70%, 80%, whatever it is—let's say it's 50%. If you get 2% of 50% of your costs going up when you're getting zero from the provincial government, which makes up a big bulk of the transfers, mathematically the numbers will change. The fact is that property taxpayers in Halton will get an increase. What do you say to them?

Mr Schweinbenz: What do you want me to say to them other than that the contracts were signed with a clear understanding, and the clear understanding was that the transfer payments—at least, that's what we felt—

Mr Carr: Yes, but the board did that thinking they were going to get 2%, based on what the Premier said, so the fault isn't really even the teachers'. It's the provincial government's, wouldn't you say?

Mr Schweinbenz: We believe the change in the percentage back to the boards has caused considerable problems and will cause tax increases, yes. We believe that's part of the provincial government's—

The Chair: Mr Carr, I don't want to cut you off. I know you've got some really good questions. I've got to go to Mr Johnson, as the next group is here to go on at 11.

Mr Paul R. Johnson (Prince Edward-Lennox-South Hastings): Thank you for your presentation, a very lengthy presentation, and a good one, but unfortunately we don't have a lot of time to ask questions, so I'll get right to it.

You would agree, I guess, that there's a great diversity among school boards, depending on whether the school board happens to be an urban centre or a rural centre, and the percentage of teachers' salaries certainly varies from school board to school board; what school boards may be involved in with regard to extra-curricular activities varies from school board to school board. So it's very difficult to sit here and talk about school boards in general, because of that diversity. In some of the rural school boards we know that teachers' salaries can take up as much as 75% to 80% of the school board's total budget.

Mr Schweinbenz: We don't believe they're that high anywhere in the province. If you look at even the rural school boards, the old percentages, where people used to say 75% of the budget was teachers' salaries, are just not true any more.

Mr Johnson: I don't want to belabour that. I know we all want to be as efficient as we can and do as much as we can with as little as we get. I know that when it comes to negotiations, the teachers will be very prudent. They understand that, given the very difficult times we're in, they will negotiate accordingly.

It doesn't matter who answers this: Given the fact that the provincial government has considerable revenue shortfalls and we're trying to share the difficulties with all ministries—I know it was noted that Comsoc has increased its welfare payouts considerably. Well, that's because there's an incredible number of people on welfare. I think where there are young people involved, that certainly would reflect on their ability to go to school and what kind of lifestyle they might lead. So it's very complex. But given that you know it's a very difficult time, what would you suggest the province do with regard to the deficit? If we're looking for more money, certainly we can expect that the deficit may have to be increased, taxes may have to be increased and then we come to program, something you're very concerned about. Where do we deal with program?

Mr Schweinbenz: I would have two answers. The first answer is that we'd ask the government to be consistent. If you're going to announce that you're going to do this, let's do that. The 1, 2 and 2 put into the framework the negotiations that took place all of last year and through the fall of this year. Mr Sterling pointed out that people have settled contracts in the 2% range, and Mr Carr has said that also. Are the teachers greedy? That's what we had expected and that's what the boards expected. The 0% and 0% increase has thrown that whole set of negotiations for a loop. That's the first thing. So we'd ask the government to be consistent.

The second thing is that we'd asked the government to look at the mandatory program changes it is putting into place. We have coming into place major changes, in The Transition Years, that are mandated starting this September. We have school boards scrambling to keep their heads above water, yet they have mandated changes. These changes will take vast amounts of money just in retraining and retooling the schools, retraining the teachers and bringing in new resources for the classrooms, in the grade 9 level particularly, but also in the grades 7 and 8 level.

We would ask that the government consider taking those mandatory aspects off. We don't want them stopped; we don't want it to be said that we're asking that destreaming and those things be stopped. We're just saying, "Let the school boards implement them as they had planned, on a gradual basis and as the money is there." We have to go through about 10,000 teachers to get them up to scratch for this thing coming in this September. We don't even have the core curriculum documents in the schools yet, and it's only five months away on a school year basis. So that's one of the things we would ask.

The Chair: Mr Johnson, I'm sorry; time has run out. The other group is here. I'd like to thank the presenters for coming before this committee, and a safe trip home, if you look out the window behind me.

Mr Schweinbenz: On behalf of the Ontario Teachers' Federation, we'd like to thank you for your questions and your attention.

The Chair: Okay; thank you.

ONTARIO CONFEDERATION OF UNIVERSITY FACULTY ASSOCIATIONS

The Chair: The next group coming forward is the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations. I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. We have until 11:30. In your presentation, perhaps you can leave some time for the members of the committee to ask questions on your presentation. If you don't mind identifying yourselves for the purposes of Hansard, you may begin right away. Pour your water. Get all set up there.

All the members have your briefs. Where did you drive in from, sir?

Dr Saul Ross: I flew in from Ottawa this morning; a pleasant flight.

The Chair: We were looking for you about 10 or 15 minutes ago. With the weather outside, I think we can expect that some of our presenters could be a little bit late, and we'll have to reschedule at different times. Go ahead.

Dr Ross: I want to introduce Marion Perrin, who is our executive director. I'm Dr Saul Ross, president of the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations.

OCUFA, the organization representing some 12,000 academic staff in Ontario's universities, is pleased to appear before you again as you prepare your advice to the Legislature on the funding of universities in Ontario. We are less pleased, however, that we must once again report to you about the ravages of underfunding on post-secondary education and on the future of this province.

A Legacy of Underfunding: It is perhaps unrealistic to expect universities to be exempt from the restraint facing all sectors during this recession, but universities have already borne the burden of 15 years of government restraint policy. Universities in Ontario have been restrained in good times and in bad by governments of all political parties.

Consider the following grim facts as published in the Council of Ontario Universities' report, the Financial Position of Universities in Ontario 1992:

Ontario's level of funding per student is ninth among the 10 provinces.

Ontario's level of funding per student was below average in 1980 and declined further and faster than most provinces over the past 12 years.

University funding has declined as a percentage of provincial expenditures from almost 6% in 1977-78 to just over 4% this year.

It should be noted that according to the April 1992 report on university financing by the tripartite committee on inter-provincial comparisons, during the same 15-year period, enrolment in Ontario universities increased by almost 35% while the population of Ontario increased by slightly more than 15%. We have been educating many more students with less resources.

If the universities' share of the provincial budget had remained what it was in 1990-91, 4.33%, they would have received $133.6 million more in 1992-93.

Damage to quality, access and equity: There is no need to document here what every study of university funding in Ontario has already shown and what the government's own advisory body, OCUA, has been telling it for years: Underfunding leads to a decline in the quality of education. Laboratory equipment needs to be repaired and renewed, and there are insufficient funds to keep equipment current. Libraries need to be well stocked with up-to-date journals and books, but continual cuts are being made in subscriptions to scholarly journals.

As faculty and staff complements are cut, student's learning experiences are placed further and further in jeopardy. Higher student-faculty ratios result in large, often overcrowded classes, less personal contact between teacher and student and less time to devote to individual students' questions and work.

Underfunding also threatens access and equity in a whole range of ways. As our underfunded universities are less able to deal with the number of people who want a university education, they are required to set limits on first-year admissions and limits to enrolment in a variety of understaffed and underserved programs. That makes them less accessible in general, and such lack of accessibility almost invariably affects those who have traditionally had less access to begin with: those with less experience in dealing with educational bureaucracies and forms; those who have less access to the networks that provide information about educational opportunities.

For those traditionally disadvantaged students who do manage to get into university, underfunding means a lack of services to support them. This makes even more difficult their attempts to both survive and excel in an environment that often appears more comfortable to those who are used to having access to privilege.

Underfunding threatens access and equity in other ways as well. Most of the modest advances that have been made in equity policies and practices in recent years—that is, equity hiring and the correction of salary anomalies attributable to gender—are being threatened by underfunding. The last-hired, first-fired syndrome threatens those who have only recently been hired as a result of attempts on the part of universities to make their workforce more representative of the population.

One hears more and more frequently that bad economic periods are "not the right time" to accomplish equity goals. Unfortunately, good economic times were also not seen as opportunities for so doing.

We agree with this committee's recommendation in its Interim Report: Pre-Budget Consultation 1992: "The government should reaffirm its commitment to a high quality, fully accessible post-secondary education system. This goal has been difficult to attain as operating grants for post-secondary education have continued to decline relative to gross domestic product growth."

Critical role of post-secondary education: Underfunding education of all kinds is a shortsighted and foolhardy policy. In the language of the economists, education is a durable rather than a consumable. The logic used by Premier Bob Rae when contrasting the kind of debt incurred by investing in a mortgage with the kind of debt incurred by overspending one's pocket money can be extended to the funding of education. Such funding should more accurately be viewed as an investment than as an expenditure. It is invested to preserve our heritage and to ensure a future society informed by cumulative knowledge and wisdom.

The government seems to have no problem viewing capital spending on universities as investment. In a recent news release, January 6, 1993, announcing Jobs Ontario Capital funding for post-secondary education, the Minister of Colleges and Universities, Richard Allen, said: "Through Jobs Ontario Capital we are investing in the future of the province by renewing the infrastructure of our colleges and universities today.... This type of public investment in post-secondary education will help people get the skills and knowledge they need to sustain Ontario's future prosperity and quality of life."

Why is it so difficult to understand that spending for operating costs for post-secondary education is also investment? Although buildings are important, they are not directly responsible for helping people get the skills and knowledge they need. People who work for universities—teachers, researchers, librarians, technicians, support staff and others—equipped with adequate and up-to-date resources are the primary providers of such help.

The critical role of higher education and economic and social recovery has been recognized by a range of analysts. In his first throne speech on behalf of the NDP government on November 20, 1990, Ontario Lieutenant Governor Lincoln Alexander said: "Our human resources will be key to our economic future. To face the challenges of the 1990s effectively, we must become a learning society, where education and training are seen as fundamental to individual growth, where investment in people is understood to be as important as investment in capital or in research and development.... Strong, publicly funded institutions are crucial to lifelong education."

The federal government, in spite of its abdication of responsibility for post-secondary education in Canada, through cuts to the established programs financing, observed in its 1991 discussion paper Learning Well, Living Well:

"More and better learning means more and better jobs. Countless studies have confirmed this connection between a highly skilled workforce and a high-wage economy. How well people live, be they Germans, Australians, Koreans or Canadians, depends on how well they learn.

"Although we are still successful exporters of energy and raw materials, Canada is losing ground to industrial competitors who are simply better than we are at inventing, designing, manufacturing and marketing. Our competitors will gain not by undercutting us—but by outsmarting us."

Nor is the relationship between higher education and employment liable to change in the coming years; on the contrary. A recent article in the Globe and Mail by economics reporter Bruce Little entitled "Workers in 1990s must 'learn a living,'" January 12, 1993, cites figures supplied by the Canadian occupational projection system of Employment and Immigration Canada: "In 1986, only 23% of Canada's workers were in jobs requiring more than 16 years of education and training.... In the 1990s, 44% of the new jobs created will require at least that level of training."

The provocative title of the article contains the phrase attributed to Wayne Roth, director of the labour market outlook section of Employment and Immigration Canada: "You're not going to graduate once and that's it.... You're going to have to learn a living, not earn a living."

Higher education is vital to people's chances for future employment. According to the Council of Ontario Universities report, university graduates are consistently less likely to be unemployed than groups with any other level of educational attainment: "Even in the middle of a recession, graduates of a university are less than half as likely to be unemployed as the rest of the workforce. Compared to people with eight or less years of education, university graduates are less than one third as likely to be unemployed."

Higher education is vital to the health of local economies. The Alliance for Ontario Universities conducted an economic impact study in 1991 which demonstrated the vital contribution of universities to economic stability. The study showed that while Ontario universities received $1.9 billion from the government, they generated nearly $1.25 billion in tax revenue and resulted in $6.2 billion in economic activity and 138,000 jobs. The study noted that the impact was particularly critical in smaller communities, where universities played a stabilizing role.

Higher education is vital to research and development. Industrial and technological innovation is primarily rooted in universities or in partnerships with universities.

Social improvements often emanate from higher education. Breakthroughs in scientific research, new knowledge about the environment, social, political and economic analyses, anti-racist education are but a few of the examples of the sorts of things universities contribute to our social fabric.

Equity and access: It is very important that the benefits that accrue to individuals from a university education not be restricted to the white, male and wealthy. The 1990s should be a period when the doors of universities are flung open to all those who have traditionally been excluded. That means more than rhetorical flourishes; it means a commitment to directing resources towards equity and access.

The government's own statements seem to affirm this commitment to equity and access. In his July 1992 Statement on Post-secondary Education, Ontario Colleges and Universities Minister Richard Allen described his views on this:

"No longer the finishing schools of the professions, the cocoons of highly educated élites, or the isolated institutes of the pure researcher, our post-secondary institutions are undergoing transformation into vehicles for an education-saturated society in which, for individuals, learning never ends, and for an economy where it will be increasingly difficult to detect where workplace ends and academy begins."

Yet the government's policies of late have reflected fiscal goals incompatible with equity and access. Do we listen to the rhetoric or watch the policies? We have to believe that actions speak louder than words.

In November last year, the Ontario government announced that tuition fees will be increased by 7% in the coming academic year. That 7% increase will bring fees for an average undergraduate arts and science student to $2,026, not including ancillary fees, in 1993-94. Relative to the 1992 Canadian cost of living, the hike constitutes a 5.1% real increase in tuition fees, the largest in at least 15 years.

Changes this year to the Ontario student assistance plan, OSAP, are even more extreme. Grants have been virtually eliminated. More loan money will be available and student debt is expected to increase substantially.

This is the worst possible time, with high student unemployment and more people needing post-secondary education than ever before, to erect new barriers to access. The need for student assistance can be demonstrated by the growth and demand for OSAP; 137,500 students, about one in four, received OSAP assistance in 1992. Student aid assistance has grown by 66% in the previous two years alone.

OCUFA strongly opposes any shift in student assistance from grants to loans. High student debt expectations deter all students, but especially women and those from traditionally underrepresented groups.

Current funding: In January last year, Ontario Treasurer Floyd Laughren promised transfer agencies funding increases of 1%, 2% and 2% over three years. Laughren said the long-term announcement would "help plan the reform and restructuring that must take place."

The universities, although shocked at how low the increases would be, were grateful that for the first time they knew what they would be getting for three years and could therefore engage in somewhat longer-term planning. On the basis of the figures in that announcement, institutions planned programs, negotiated contracts and developed budgets.

This committee realizes how important it is to know ahead of time what funding levels will be in order to engage in fiscally responsible planning. In your Interim Report: Pre-Budget Consultation 1992, you recommended that the government should pursue a multi-year financial plan for Ontario universities.

On November 26, 1992, the government retracted its promise. Laughren announced that the government was freezing base funding for universities and colleges for the next year. The same day, Richard Allen, Minister of Colleges and Universities, met with representatives of the post-secondary education community. He told them that post-secondary education would be getting a 1% increase for 1994-95. He stated that this was the only part of the MUSH sector to get an increase in 1994-95 and was in recognition of the capacity of post-secondary institutions as engines of economic renewal.

The government also announced that it will reallocate $10.5 million from operating funds to the faculty renewal program and the special purpose grants envelope to cover targeted funds such as the aboriginal education strategy, the French language program and the midwifery program. Base funding for universities then will actually decrease next year by approximately 0.5%.

While OCUFA supports these equity programs, shaving money from the base budget is the wrong way to finance them. Equity should be a driving force throughout the system and funded accordingly rather than being marginalized and placed in competing envelopes.

Alternatives: OCUFA recognizes that the province is faced with tough decisions in managing provincial resources. We firmly believe, however, that the provincial deficit should not be used as an excuse to further erode education. To do so is to increase the education deficit, and the social and cultural damage from that will be far more drastic. The economic damage created by the education deficit will in turn contribute further to the province's fiscal problems.

We believe it is time to challenge the neo-conservative myth that social spending is a drain on economies. This economic analysis, popular especially in the US culture of rugged individualism, is constructed on very shaky arguments, as was made clear in an excellent series of articles last year in the Toronto Star written by Linda McQuaig, November 8 to 12, with a copy attached. There are by now many examples of governments that have restrained or slashed social spending in response to economic downturn. How many examples are there where this strategy has revived an economy? How many examples are there where this strategy has improved the quality of life for its citizens? This argument for spending restraint is especially faulty in the university sector where the benefits for local economies, short-term and long-term direct employment, industrial strategies and economic recovery are well documented.

This committee, following its deliberation last year wrote in its Interim Report: Pre-Budget Consultation 1992 about the importance of providing adequate funding to universities. Recommendation 8 stated:

"It is essential that Ontario fund its universities adequately. It cannot afford the economic and social costs associated with an inadequately educated population. Economists write that that high level of education and skills is vital for economic growth and prosperity; education may be the single most important determinant of economic growth in the developed world."

We must also express our disappointment in this government's timidity to date in confronting tax reform. It would appear that the government has chosen to avoid any controversial move to shift the burden in tax revenues to those most able to pay, this in spite of this committee's recommendation that "The government should pursue fair share taxation and measures such as a minimum corporate tax and a speculation tax as ways of addressing underfunding." That was from the Interim Report: Pre-Budget Consultation 1992, page 8.

In post-secondary education policy, however, this government has shown no reluctance to shift the revenue burden to those least able to pay, through increased user fees.

The government's timidity with respect to reform of the tax system is paralleled by its seeming reluctance and/or inability to stand up to the federal government's shameless abrogation of its responsibilities with respect to post-secondary education, to name but one area. The largest, richest and strongest province in the country should be ingenious enough to find ways to mount an effective campaign against the repeated blows to its economy, infrastructure and social net.

It is with the same sorrow that we are led to the observation that this government seems to be convinced that the universities of Ontario are elitist institutions and that they are unlikely to change to become more accessible, to become more equitable. It is behaving as though universities should be written off as vehicles that can play a part in redressing the inequities that exist in our society.

The problem with such a stance is that it has the potential to become a self-fulfilling prophecy: Universities become less accessible to less advantaged members of the population. Those denied a university education remain less advantaged, those who can afford one remain advantaged and the universities end up being elitist institutions.

We do not share this view. Universities, like many other institutions in our society, have historically served relatively homogeneous populations. To change this requires the provision of resources, incentives, encouragement and assistance. We believe that universities can change to become more representative and inclusive institutions, but this is very difficult to accomplish when they are continually starved for funds.

Next year: The recommendations made by this committee last year were very encouraging. We can only concur with those recommendations and assure you that their wisdom has become even more apparent in the year since.

What will happen next year? Certainly 1% is not enough. We must ensure not only that this figure is increased but that the increased funds go to the base budgets of the universities. There must be some attempt to ameliorate the damage done this year by reneging on a commitment already made. We trust that this committee will once again show its support for a level of university funding in Ontario to ensure the continued existence of high-quality, accessible and equitable universities in this province. We hope that the Treasurer will listen.

Mr Carr: I was reviewing the budgets in the pie charts comparing education during 1984, and 20% of the spending went to colleges and universities and education, 10% to social services. It now has shifted: 17% goes to colleges and universities and education and 21% to social services.

But I was interested in your comments regarding the transfers. I've listened while the Premier, the Treasurer and members of this committee complained about the federal government and its transfer. What they have done to municipalities, universities, school boards and hospitals has been worse, but let's say as bad, and I find it rather ironic they complain about one level of government for transfers while for municipalities, universities and school boards what they've done to their transfer partners has been as bad.

You said, and I think the words you used were, "retracted their promise." I think it was broke the promise, and it was a promise that was made January 21 by the Premier, not the Treasurer. The Premier made that promise.

But my concern is with the fact that now that has been done, economists have come in here and said employment is going to be at 11%. We are now borrowing at higher spreads, because international investors do not want to lend Ontario money. What do you say to the unemployed who say that your faculty, that professors and teachers, people in the public sector, should at least accept a 0% increase at a time when most people are losing their jobs? Today, for example, General Motors will have 1,000 people laid off. What do you say to them when they say, "You're going to have a job, but you shouldn't accept any increase during this economic time"?

Dr Ross: I want to come back to your first comment. I think it's important that we direct attention there. Then I'll try and answer your second question. We view what the provincial government has done to universities as the exact action that it deplored having been foisted on it by the federal government.

Mr Carr: Are you listening, Anne?

Ms Anne Swarbrick (Scarborough West): Oh, very much so.

Dr Ross: There is one major difference between the position of the universities and the position of the provincial government. When the federal government reneges or offloads its debt on to the provincial government, the provincial government has the capacity, although the political choices may be unpalatable, to find alternative sources of funding. Universities do not have that ability, do not have that choice.

That leads to the second comment. What you have just said about pointing the finger at university faculty members accepting no increase needs to be put in historic context. If you look at what has happened in the last 15 to 18 years, due to the continued underfunding, the salary of university professors, whose income is, by and large, dependent on transfer payments from the provincial government, has eroded by over 25% in comparison to all other similar professions. If you compare university salaries to physicians, accountants, lawyers, school teachers, engineers, a whole range of people in that category, it is well documented that we are now more than 25% below.

How much more does this government or do the politicians want the university faculty members to subsidize university education? That's our question.

Mr Carr: Is there still some time?

The Chair: No. I'm sorry, Mr Carr. I was just reading a note that came in. I've got to go to Ms Swarbrick for one question.

Ms Swarbrick: It is one question, but it does have a preamble. I want to start by thanking you for the series of Linda McQuaig articles. I had missed two of them, so I'm thrilled that I now have a complete set.

I want to also start by very much expressing total agreement with the philosophy you presented in terms of the importance of education and the university system. I know that my government agrees with me still on all of that. I want to say that I appreciate also the problems all of us go through when we end up suddenly finding we've got less money than what we had been expecting.

But I want to place a context here, and the context I want to place is the situation that has presented itself to the province. Readily available is the government's Ontario Fiscal Outlook. If you refer to that, on page 2 you'll see that, first, in terms of tax revenues for the year 1991-92 they dropped by $3 billion from the year before.

In the year 1992-93, tax revenues will be $530 million less than we had projected last spring—we weren't alone in being overly hopeful in the projections; that was common in people's expectations—and the same in terms of the projections for 1993-94, which now look as though they're going to be $4.2 billion lower than what we had been building on this year towards next year.

I want to point out that I think the situation that you're facing from us is in fact very different than what we faced from the federal government. The federal government has dug very deeply into the pockets of Ontario's government and taxpayers by removing $4.5 billion last year alone and $4.4 billion the year before. There's no way that we've reached into your pockets and taken back or cut back that incredible amount of money.

I want to point out that the kind of situation that we're in in trying to make the plans for the province I think is far worse than what you're dealing with. If you exclude the cost of the debt interest and the cost of social assistance from this year's operating budget, there has been virtually no growth in our operating expenditures this year. We've increased them by only 0.3%.

That includes the money that we've transferred to the MUSH sector, the municipalities, universities, schools and hospitals, which means that in terms of within our own pockets in the ministries, we've gone far deeper than what we're asking you to cut by the transfer payments of the 1% and 2%, by creative means for this year and trying to hold your line the following year.

The Chair: Ms Swarbrick, can you get to the question? Mr Phillips is on the edge of his seat over here waiting to ask his question.

Ms Swarbrick: Good timing. I'm right at the question. My question then is that you believe there's alternative sources of funding open to us, and of course we've tried to be as creative as we can in finding what they are, other than tax increases people just can't afford. Do you not think, given what I've outlined to you as being the situation the province faces, that in fact we've been as protective as we can of the education sector, or can you be more specific, then, in terms of what the specific things are that you'd like to see us do differently? And I mean specific, because the generalities don't help us.

Dr Ross: What you're really saying is that you're asking me to do the job of the government, and I refuse to do that, in one sense. But I will give you the following answer.

Part of it comes from what I read this morning in the Ottawa Citizen on the plane down here, an action taken by the Bank of Montreal which has shocked the banking community. They are going into ancillary financing for small businesses to an extent of allowing them up to $50,000 of additional credit. They have recognized that in difficult times, when you cut back and don't borrow to invest where money really should be put, you are only exacerbating the situation. While I appreciate the effort made on the part of the government in cutting its expenditure as much as possible, I think there needs to be some prudence and wisdom in terms of borrowing and investing in appropriate places. Since we have at least a 15-year history of severe underfunding in universities, to cut back or even to say, "We're giving you zero," is a further erosion in the area where there is common agreement that it is the number one place to invest.

Ms Swarbrick: You're saying raise the deficit further, are you?

The Chair: I'm sorry. Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: Just an observation, if I might: It really is time that the government members realize that you can't blame the federal government. The federal government increased its grants to the provincial government last year, the year we're just ending, by 20%.

Ms Swarbrick: Where?

Mr Phillips: Well, you look at the budget. You've got to get into those numbers and understand them. It went up 20%. The previous year it went up 10%.

Interjections.

The Chair: Mr Phillips, the question.

Mr Phillips: My point is this: If you actually believe those numbers, you'll never deal with the budget, and it is time you stopped blaming the federal government for the problems. The provincial government faces the same problem the federal government does. It's the same income. Half of the income federally comes from personal income tax. You say, "The reason the universities aren't getting the money is because our personal income tax revenue is down, so we're really sorry." Then you turn to the federal government and say, "Give us, give us, give us," and it says, "We're facing the same problem."

The money from the federal government last year went up well over a billion dollars to the provincial government, 20%. Those are the facts. I'm not necessarily saying the federal government's treating the provincial government all finely, but let's start to deal with the real issues.

That gets to my point. One is an observation. I appreciate the fact that the minister committed to a 1% increase for colleges and universities in 1994-95. I had not heard that before and that's new information for me.

But when you say the largest, richest province "should be ingenious enough to find ways to mount an effective campaign against such repeated blows to its economy, infrastructure and social net," I think Mr Carr makes a good point that one could argue that the province has done the same thing to you that you are accusing the federal government of. Is it the intention of the faculty to launch a similar ingenious campaign to point out these problems?

Dr Ross: We're trying our best. We're trying to make as many people as possible aware of the actual situation. The fact is that you walk into a number of universities and you walk into laboratories where students—those who have access to these laboratories; not all students who enrol in courses do—are working with equipment that is now 20 years old and vastly outdated. There's just no money to buy new equipment. You walk into classes where at one time there were 40 or 50 students and there was the opportunity for exchange and serious one-to-one engagement in education. Those classes are now 200 and 300. Students are sitting in the aisles. Students are sitting on broken chairs. We don't have the ability to raise money.

The Chair: Dr Ross, I appreciate your attendance at these meetings this morning, especially with the weather you came through. I know we've run over a little, but a trip from Ottawa should give you a couple of extra minutes. Thank you for coming before the committee and a safe trip home.

Dr Ross: Thank you for listening to us.

ONTARIO PUBLIC SCHOOL BOARDS' ASSOCIATION

The Chair: The next group to come forward is the Ontario Public School Boards' Association. Would you mind identifying yourselves for Hansard? If there are more than three of you, four can come up here and take a seat; there are enough mikes. I'd like to welcome you to the committee. As we're cutting into Gerry Phillips's lunch, we're going to go until about 10 after 12, so you're not going to be short-changed; you've got a few extra minutes. You may begin. You don't have to go through the Chair: "Mr Chair, I want to say this." Carry on and you save a lot of time, okay? Go ahead.

Mrs Paula Dunning: Okay, thank you very much. I want to begin by introducing those of us who are at the table at the front. Mr Joe Gunn is the executive vice-president of the Ontario Public School Boards' Association and a trustee on the Stormont Dundas and Glengarry County Board of Education. Linda Hamill is a regional vice-president of our association for the western region and she's a trustee on the Grey County Board of Education. Also with us are our executive director, Mike Benson, and director of policy Beverley Allen. My name's Paula Dunning. I'm the president of the association and I'm a trustee on the Central Algoma Board of Education.

I want to begin by saying that we're pleased to have this opportunity to appear before the standing committee on finance and economic affairs to share our concerns and recommendations with you with respect to the 1993-94 provincial budget.

A little about our association at the outset: We represent the more than 90 public school boards from across the province, serving over 1.4 million students. Our goal as an association is to promote public education to ensure that locally elected school boards are responsive to both the educational needs and the resource capabilities or, as is more appropriate these days, limitations of their communities.

Those limitations have recently been highlighted by the report of the property tax working group of the Fair Tax Commission, reminding all of us—and I'd like to pass that reminder on to you—of the need to move the burden of the funding of education away from the regressive property tax back on to the general revenues, which are generated from the more progressive income tax base of the province.

Like you, we are also facing the difficult task of balancing growing public needs and expectations with limited resources. We're faced with decreasing revenues from both of our revenue sources, the provincial grants and the property tax base, despite the fact that real costs and expectations, many of them imposed by the government itself, continue to rise even during this period of economic recession.

In other words, public school boards are very aware that for the education community it is not business as usual. We have therefore given serious thought to the government's November announcement of a 0% increase in transfer payments and to the political statements about public service restructuring.

We're here to recommend a three-part joint provincial government/school board strategy to address the challenges we face, and we are convinced that solutions will only be found by a cooperative local/provincial approach to those challenges.

The three strategies are briefly:

- A provincial and local commitment to education as the necessary foundation to this province's strategy for economic recovery. I couldn't help noticing that the speakers preceding us made reference to a number of the concerns that we share at a different level of educational delivery.

- A reassessment of programs and legislation to establish priorities to match available resources.

- To address some long-needed legislative changes and program streamlining to eliminate duplication and achieve cost-effectiveness.

I'll speak briefly to the first strategy and ask my colleagues to address the second two.

Education is the key to the future social and economic wellbeing of our society. In every sense it is an essential public service. A good-quality, adequately supported public education system is the cornerstone of a well-trained labour force and reduces reliance on the social welfare system. It is indeed an investment.

The provincial report Ontario Economic Outlook refers throughout to the importance of education as a prerequisite to skills development and training, and in the brief which we've provided for you, you'll see a number of quotes lifted from that report which make reference to the importance of education.

The government's inability to honour its commitment to increase its support to school boards by at least 2% for 1993 and 1994 has not altered the importance of education as a strategy for economic renewal. It has certainly made our jobs more difficult. School boards have already undergone significant cost-cutting exercises, using last year's three-year commitment to rationalize their operations to meet the historically low 1%, 2% and 2% targets which are now in fact not in place.

Although we recognize the financial realities that have resulted in the 0% increase, it has interfered with our existing plans for a planned and orderly restructuring at the local level. We're concerned that the lack of basic operating support to the educational system will jeopardize the quality of education in our communities, which is already under considerable stress.

To assist boards in protecting the quality of their programs as they adjust to the loss of an anticipated 4% increase in revenues over the next two years, it is absolutely essential that the one-time $99 million available to education in the coming fiscal year be available for stabilization and rational adjustment to that loss.

Therefore, our first recommendation is that the Ministry of Education allocate the $99 million in education restructuring support through the general legislative grant programs, a portion to be used for school board stabilization—in other words, to allow school boards to adjust gradually to the new reality, which is that they will not in fact be receiving the funds they banked on following the three-year commitment—and that a portion also be allocated for operations in preparation for restructuring. Boards would be happy to work with, and have indeed volunteered to work with, the government to develop joint criteria for restructuring education.

I'm going to ask vice-president Joe Gunn to speak to the second strategy.

Mr Joe Gunn: "A reassessment of legislation and programs, with the intent of setting priorities." These words are not new from the Ontario Public School Boards' Association. We have many times sat here and suggested setting priorities in conjunction with our legislative friends.

Capping the operating support to school boards for 1993 and 1994 at 1992 levels could severely affect the quality of education in the classroom. Unlike other public services such as hospitals in municipalities, school boards have less room to manoeuvre. Education is already community-based, so, unlike the hospitals, the answer is not to close beds and move to an outpatient, community-based delivery system. Education is an essential service.

Also, education is a growth service. The essential growth to the system for 1993, when one makes a rough assessment of such factors as inflation, collective bargaining, enrolment growth, the costs of new programs, educational reforms and the changing mandate, is approximately 9%.

Last year, school boards, with a 2% increase in provincial support, revised programs and services to ensure moderate property tax increases to the public. Still, the province-wide education property tax increase was 4.35%. This is based on our own survey of 60 public school boards in the province.

Teachers' salaries are the largest component of a school board budget. The 2% promise from the government was a guideline for collective bargaining, and agreements for 1992-93 are at approximately 3.5% at this point. The Ontario Public School Boards' Association supports the collective bargaining process. However, the new fiscal situation does require some flexibility.

Our recommendation is that the capping of operating support to education must be accompanied by flexible collective bargaining processes to allow school boards to adjust negotiated contracts.

There must be the ability for school boards, in consultation with their employees, to reassess priorities and make decisions for cost-effective delivery, such as adjustments to staffing, pupil-teacher ratios, teacher prep time, benefits etc. I think we're all aware of the alternative. It will be employee layoffs and the elimination of some programs and services to our young students.

There has been much said lately about education reform, a new common curriculum, a draft education policy statement, destreaming, integration of special education, mandatory junior kindergarten and also educational technological upgrading. As well, occupational health and safety regulations and environmental regulations have all added to the cost of doing business. The Ontario Public School Boards' Association has estimated that these reforms will add 3.5% more to total education expenditures.

OPSBA does not dispute the need for change, but financial realities and the public's willingness to pay more must be a consideration. We make recommendations 3 and 4:

There must be a reassessment of all mandatory and discretionary education programs with the intent of setting government priorities to match the available resources.

As sufficient operating support to education has not been provided to implement program reform and new mandatory programs, school boards must be allowed to phase in these new policies and programs in accordance with the local needs and the ability to pay.

Mrs Linda Hamill: The recommendations in this section on legislative changes and streamlining have been presented on previous occasions, but it is still our belief that much could be achieved if the province streamlined many of the Ministry of Education's program and reporting requirements. The elimination of duplication of effort and administrative overlap between the province and school boards would free up both provincial and local staff time and resources. A key example is the school capital grant program, a highly over-regulated and overadministered program. That's our recommendation 5:

OPSBA recommends that the capital grant programs be revised this year to (1) achieve administrative cost-efficiencies and cost savings, (2) provide a clear and acceptable provincial allocation process of funding school boards, not individual school sites, and (3) provide for local flexibility and innovation.

For example, presently the Education Act and the capital program prohibit flexibility in private sector-school board partnerships. There is overlap and duplication in the interrelationship between the capital grant plan, the building code, fire code and environmental requirements. There are onerous reporting and approval requirements. We need improvements to cash flow to avoid interim borrowing.

Property Taxes: School boards have for many years been requesting improved access to their local revenue base; that is, improved cash flow from municipalities and sharing of payments in lieu of taxes. Currently, dollars collected for education purposes are making interest that municipalities use for their own needs. The province could greatly assist many school boards by acting on past commission and task force recommendations, and now on the recommendations of the Fair Tax Commission and property tax report. That's recommendations 6 and 7:

OPSBA recommends that the Education Act and the Municipal Act be amended in this upcoming session of the Legislature to review the payment schedule to ensure a more realistic transfer of education property tax dollars from municipalities to school boards.

OPSBA recommends that the legislation be amended to provide for an equitable sharing of provincial payments in lieu of taxes among municipalities and school boards.

Mrs Dunning: Mr Phillips may get to his lunch on time after all.

In summary, the Treasurer of Ontario, in the Ontario Fiscal Outlook, has stated that we must restructure our government services and revenues. OPSBA supports that objective; indeed, we recognize that it is essential. We are also committed to ensuring that education remains responsive to provincial and community needs and local resource capabilities.

The Treasurer has also stated that we must focus on the essentials. In our view, there is no more essential service than education. Upcoming provincial budget discussions must recognize education as a priority, as an essential public service necessary to our economic and social wellbeing.

We urge you, in making recommendations, to ensure that provincial fiscal priorities reflect the stated recognition of the social and economic importance of education and that the public education sector is protected from even further encroachments by the budget process. Investing in human resources continues to be the key to our quality of life and standard of living.

Thank you very much. We will be pleased to answer questions.

The Chair: Thank you. We've got about six minutes per caucus.

Mr Johnson: Thank you very much for your presentation today. I said it earlier in another presentation, but I'll say it again: There's a great diversity between school boards in rural Ontario and school boards in urban Ontario, and indeed school boards in the north would have different ways and means and they'd have different rates of funding from the province. I guess that because collective bargaining takes place at the board level, it would vary from place to place, although marginally. Enrolment growth would change, and new obligations and programs, so the percentage that every board needs wouldn't be exactly the same. But some boards are very efficient and some boards are somewhat less efficient. I won't say they're not efficient, but they're less efficient.

Do you see any merit in amalgamating school boards especially in areas where—let's not be too specific, but do you see merit in amalgamating school boards?

Mrs Dunning: We see merit in an examination of the whole issue of governance. We know that the Ministry of Education has undertaken that and is committed to a public examination of the whole question of governance of school boards. We think there may be situations in which coterminous boards or boards in the same general area might want to enter into discussions that would result in a sharing of facilities and increased cooperation and perhaps even amalgamation.

We are also committed to community decision-making and we believe that if those kinds of changes are to be made, they should be made by the people involved, by the communities and the school boards that exist as a result of mutual discussion and trying to meet community needs. The purpose of local school boards is to bring education decision-making into the community, and we would certainly be hesitant to recommend that this change.

Mr Johnson: The autonomy of local boards is something that I certainly think becomes a political issue, because locally people like to think they have some input into how their children are educated. I guess it's clear too that when school boards amalgamate, there may be an area where a particular school board—again, the cost per pupil or the mill rate, let's say, for a particular school board next to another area, another county; we're talking rural now. In areas where there are county school boards, the mill rate in one particular area may be significantly different than in another, although they're very close in relationship geographically, and so there could be some negative political ramifications as a result of that.

Do you think there could be cost savings in amalgamation for the province or do you think a larger board would be more efficient?

Mrs Dunning: I don't think that necessarily follows. I think we should all be flexible in terms of looking at the options that are available to us, but I don't think it necessarily follows that bigger is more efficient.

The Chair: Mrs Harrington is a born teacher.

Ms Margaret H. Harrington (Niagara Falls): I want to comment briefly, and I think you've stressed it also, that we have to find new ways of doing things and that you are open to that cooperation and streamlining. I want to comment briefly about the capital expenditure program you mentioned. I believe that with your help and the ministry looking at this—it's a cumbersome kind of process just from the little bit I know about it and I think that's one area we can look at together and see if there's a better, more efficient way of doing things.

The Chair: I'd like to welcome Mike Cooper to the committee today. He has a new face on there. I'm glad you drilled through that snowstorm to get here.

Mr Johnson: He does have a new face.

The Chair: It is a new face. I did not recognize that unshaven man over there. We'll go to Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: One of your recommendations is moving the burden off the property tax and on to—I think, speaking personally, the one thing that the NDP government, in my area at least, really trumpeted was that, moving it off the property tax and on to general revenues.

I don't know whether any of you participate in the Fair Tax Commission, but can you give us any thoughts in terms of how much is reasonable to move off the property tax and when we should expect that to happen, based on the property tax commission's report, any thoughts on perhaps where we might raise the money?

Mrs Dunning: We have a staff person who spent some time liaising with the Fair Tax Commission people.

Mr Sterling: She doesn't want to be asked.

Ms Beverley Allen: I actually was a committee member of the property tax working group and there was a fair bit of discussion about education equity and taxation and the adequacy of the property tax in funding education. The conclusions and consensus out of that group were that there should be an increase in provincial support from provincial revenue bases for education, which you're aware of, but the committee stopped short of saying where the province should get its money from, for many reasons.

If one looks at property tax, and this was one of the first studies that tied property tax data to income data and looked at the property tax and ability to pay, I think they came to some interesting conclusions in terms of shifts one could then translate, once the size of the pot is determined, in terms of equalization and formulas in terms of—the suggestion is that equalization should be done, not necessarily on assessment but on income within the jurisdiction.

Mr Phillips: I'm sure the government has a plan, because that's the basis it ran on. I guess you don't know when that plan will be announced, then. Monte, did you have—

Mr Kwinter: One of your concerns is the program funding for destreaming from grades 7 to 9. It's evident with the statements made by the government that the transfer of payments is set, certainly through 1994, and yet it is mandating that this destreaming take place in the coming year. Given the fact that you're not going to get the money—it doesn't seem like you're going to get the money—how are your member boards going to deal with this particular situation?

Mr Phillips: Over to you, Paula.

Mrs Dunning: It's over to me. I think they're going to deal with that situation in the way they're going to be dealing with a lot of situations. Destreaming is one new initiative. It's been getting a lot of public attention of late, but it's only one. There are a number of new expectations that have been placed on school boards in the last couple of years, new programs that are being implemented.

The school boards have, as I mentioned initially, two sources of revenue. One of them has been held absolutely fixed and the other one I think is not much more flexible. I don't think we have very much more room, if any room at all, to move into the property tax base.

There are some school boards that are saying they simply will not be able to implement new programs. There are others that are looking for ways to implement new programs by eliminating existing programs that may not be mandated. I know that when they do that they question seriously whether it's the right way to go, because at this point in time there's not a lot of fat left in terms of the programs and courses that are being offered by boards.

Boards are continuing to look actively for ways to be more efficient and they're finding them. I wouldn't want to suggest that there are no new efficiencies that boards can find. I think they keep looking and keep finding them, and that will continue. But the reality is that 80% of school board expenditures go to staff salaries for teaching staff and support staff. If boards are looking for ways to save significant sums of money, that's the only place they have to turn to to make significant, substantial savings in their operating costs.

Boards will try to implement these new programs, including destreaming, with as little disruption to their ongoing programs as possible. But if they go ahead and implement them, I think you can be assured that you're going to see repercussions elsewhere in the programs.

Mr Sterling: I represent part of the area of Carleton and went through a rather bitter strike, particularly in the secondary people. There was very little support for the teachers in my constituency, none that I could find outside of the teachers themselves.

Is the bargaining system, in terms of individual—I mean, the ploy of the union was to play their particular pact against another one. That's been sort of the whole idea of collective bargaining in Ontario and bargaining across our province for the last, I guess, 10 years, as they go out and get a good settlement from some board because of some reason and then everybody compares themselves with that particular board. There's been this tendency to go to the highest denominator across the province.

I've sat on another committee, agencies, boards and commissions, dealing with the community colleges where the bargaining, as you know, is province-wide. My feeling at the time was that there wasn't enough local pressure on the teachers in our colleges to settle and that there were sometimes—there was some argument that it should be piecemeal, as was the case in terms of the—but I'm not so sure I'm right any more.

Have you got any comments with regard to bargaining? Should it be done province-wide or is it still best on a piecemeal basis? It seems that the teaching union has used it to its greatest advantage at a cost to the taxpayer.

Mr Gunn: You bring up a topic that we as an association have been discussing ourselves, that is, provincial bargaining—regional bargaining perhaps, because of the differences in the various regions—or leave bargaining at the basis at the school board. I think the association feels that you have to have the local people involved in the process. They have to feel they have some sort of ownership. I think that's very important.

What we're suggesting is that we be given the opportunity not to open up the contracts because we could be accused of contract stripping or anything, but there are some areas in there which we and our teaching staff I think could work on, the grid for instance. Let's say a board gives an increase of 2% to its teachers in line with the guidelines as laid down by the minister last year, and there's another 1.5% in expenses. Basically we have a 3.5% increase. That puts us 3.5% in the hole because we're not getting that 2%.

It was rough enough at one time to try and negotiate the 2%, but when you try and negotiate the additional compensation, it just puts it into a situation where we get tremendous hostile feedback from the community and it's very difficult when you represent 90-odd school boards across the province from Thunder Bay to Renfrew where they have little, in a lot of instances, in common. I don't know if I'm answering your question or not.

Mr Sterling: I guess you're telling me that the present system would be better than going to a regional or a provincial system.

Mr Gunn: I think as far as we're concerned the jury's still out on that; we're still looking at that. There is a lot of pressure from various sections to look at some regional bargaining, but there's also pressure to leave it the way it is. We're not prepared at this time to take a stand on that as an association.

Mrs Dunning: Could I elaborate on that just to provide one little piece of information? I've been involved in collection bargaining at the local level for quite a long time and one of the things that's really changed—I don't know if this directly answers your question or not—but the spread is just not nearly as great as it used to be.

It used to be that to be high-balled/low-balled across the province meant spreads of thousands of dollars on individual grid positions. Well, that's no longer true. You can be in the top 2% of settlements in the province and your grid isn't that much higher than the bottom 10% of grids in the province.

The spread has narrowed enormously in the last I would say 10 years. I don't know what that says, whether it says the system's working or it isn't working. If it means that everybody's moved up closer to the top, then I suppose it isn't working from our point of view. If it means it's become a rationalization process, then perhaps it is. I guess the jury is still out, but that change has taken place. The difference across the province in terms of salaries is not nearly as great as it was a number of years ago.

Mr Sterling: In looking at your appendix A, the per cent average increase is quite in excess of inflation. Teachers in general have a very protected position and it's very, very difficult for my constituents to understand why people who have a very protected job should benefit to this amount. I'm saying the system in some way has got out of whack. From what you've told me, I draw the assumption that the unions have driven the base up to the highest and have been successful in that at the expense of the taxpayer.

Mrs Dunning: On appendix A, above the horizontal line, you're looking at figures that essentially reflect the transfer payment that was provided for boards during the year in which those contracts were negotiated. When you look below the line, you're looking at what's taken place as a result of the current fiscal situation. We have some updates on those figures which are incrementally lower.

As contracts continue to come in, those numbers keep dropping, as you can understand. But I think the numbers above, the 5, 12, 4, 9, 7, those numbers in fact are not inconsistent with the transfer payment amounts that were passed on to school boards in the year and they're not inconsistent with the provincial government's own settlements with its employees during the fiscal year for which those contracts were negotiated.

Mr Sterling: The argument you make with regard to there not being much difference now across the province leads me to the conclusion, why bother with whatever number of negotiations there are? Is everybody spinning their wheels for naught? You enter into negotiation for teachers, and if there isn't any difference between what's happening in Stormont, Dundas and Glengarry versus Huron county, why is all this energy being expended if nothing is different?

Mr Gunn: I think we've been caught in a catch-22 situation. The union for the teachers is bargaining based, I think we could say, on a provincial basis. They interface one county with another county on this 72-numbered structure they've got. They'll say one board is 1.7% less or a matter of $500 or $600 less than another board, and they'll use that, not taking into consideration the economic impact on that community itself. This in itself is unfair.

Basically, if you were to ask me do we have provincial bargaining, I would say to you that as far as the teachers are concerned, yes, in everything but name. I think that's highly unfair to the local communities.

The Chair: I'm going to have to say that time has expired. This committee will be recessed until 1:30 this afternoon. I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee with your presentation.

Also, I have a letter here from the Treasurer which is dated December 16. I think all members of the committee should have received a copy. I sent it to the subcommittee. We have some here to distribute. I think it would be important that some of the presenters have a copy also of the letter the Treasurer sent out to us, to get an idea where this committee is taking a look at the different groups coming in.

Mr Phillips: Are we having treasury staff in soon?

The Chair: We've got a letter out. It's in the mail. As soon as it's delivered back to us, we'll have them here.

Mr Phillips: I found that very offensive yesterday.

The Chair: I was a little confused on the agenda for the afternoon. I thought it was 2 to 4. I asked the question ahead of time there, but as soon as possible, Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: I'm led to believe that may not be until the end of February.

The Chair: February 22.

I want to cut in. Another thing I just want to bring up, it's been brought to my attention that any pagers members have in committee, they'll have to turn them off while they're sitting in committee here.

Mr Brad Ward (Brantford): Why?

Clerk Pro Tem (Ms Lisa Freedman): Speaker's ruling.

The Chair: We're adjourned until 1:30.

The committee recessed at 1215.

The committee resumed at 1336.

The Chair: We'll resume the budget consultations of the standing committee on finance and economic affairs.

COUNCIL OF ONTARIO UNIVERSITIES

The Chair: The first presenter this afternoon, from the Council of Ontario Universities, is Dr Peter George, president, and your associates. I don't have them marked down, Dr George, if you don't mind introducing them to the committee. You may begin. You have until 2 o'clock.

Dr Peter George: We're delighted to be here. Norm Shulman is associate director of policy of our research division. Jim McAllister is a senior research associate in that division. Sitting behind and over my right shoulder is Pat Adams, the director of communications and public affairs.

The Chair: Dr George, I invite her to come forward and take the other seat. A wealth of knowledge shouldn't be sitting in the back row.

Dr George: Thank you, Mr Chairman. She's by nature very shy, and it was difficult to persuade her to come to the front.

We welcome this opportunity to meet with the committee and to participate in your pre-budget consultations. We have prepared a brief, which has been distributed to members of the committee. I don't propose to read the brief, but I would like to speak to it and then to field questions from committee members. We believe we have a very straightforward but vital message to leave you with today.

My brief begins with a review of the current economic situation. The basic point we make is that restructuring is a reality brought upon us in Ontario by the weakening competitive position of the Ontario economy and in particular the weakening position of natural-resource-based manufacturing as a key component of industrial strength in Ontario, a traditional one but one whose future is somewhat limited.

We point out, as others have done, that Ontario must now compete in the global economy. This means many things for Ontario, but in our view it means in particular, whether one is dealing with a large multinational corporation or a smaller local business, that we have to have the appropriate skills available in our workforce to ensure our future competitive position.

I then go on to talk about a prescription for change in the economy. Much of this discussion is related to our particular brief for producing highly skilled technical expertise in the form of university graduates. I think it's quite clear to all of us that Ontario will not be able to attract new economic opportunities on the basis of cheap labour. In this regard, we are significantly behind, if I can use that term, many other countries and the Third World particularly, including Mexico. So our comparative advantage in the development of new capacity will be our highly skilled workforce.

We've been told by many experts that more and more advanced skills will be required in the workplace tomorrow, that most jobs will require 17 or more years of education, that knowledge will become the very basis of our economy. It is no accident that we've had an enormous increase in the interest in continuous or lifelong learning. Education is no longer viewed as a one-stop process in one's lifetime, but we expect more and more that people will have to revisit educational facilities for upgrading and upskilling.

We know too that the public attaches great priority to this issue, and I report some of the recent results of the Maclean's-CTV survey that showed that many Canadians polled accorded great significance to education and training, rather more than to controlling deficits and government spending, I might add. There are other studies which corroborate this finding, including one by the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

We admit that a qualified workforce is not the only solution to our economic problems, that it's not sufficient, but it certainly contributes in a number of ways. It would help us fill existing vacancies for high-tech positions that are currently going unfilled and it would help us attract new investment. Developing our workforce is not sufficient, but it is an important and necessary component of the solution.

What I do in the next section is identify four ways in which the university contributes to provincial economic renewal. The first way is the university as an employer. Here we present some data that were contained in the economic impact study of Ontario's universities that was the subject of a very successful press conference and subsequent media coverage a year ago November in this very building. The salient points of this are that the sector is large, has a significant employment and income multiplier, so it has a substantial influence on the Ontario economy. The employment in our sector is larger than that in the pulp and paper industry, the chemical products industry, the primary metals industry or the textiles industry.

These are the kinds of orders of magnitude that many people are unfamiliar with, that the universities are such a significant employer and contributor to economic activity. If you look at the communities in which the universities are domiciled, they are important employers because of the scale of employment they offer but also because of the employment stability. They become, then, one of the anchors of the local and regional economy.

Second, we identify the university as producer of human capital. Universities certainly produce highly skilled people such as engineers and scientists. These people contribute to the economy by spending the incomes they earn and by paying taxes on those earnings. Moreover, they are a primary source of innovative thinking and innovation, and that innovation becomes encapsulated in new economic opportunities and generates economic growth both in income and employment.

The employability that arises for university graduates is one the features of which I think we've made you aware on many occasions in the past, but I'll repeat them very briefly. The unemployment rate for university graduates is far lower than it is for the average, less than half of the average at the end of 1991, for example. University graduates earn more than others in the labour force, significantly more. This is one reason we have put forward a proposal for income-contingent repayment plans as a means of funding student assistance programs. I'll return to that later on.

One of the things that was picked up in the press earlier this session was the OECD data that show that Canada is near the top of the list of member countries in spending on education. But I would point out that when you break the data down, we are big spenders mainly because of our expenditure levels on primary and secondary education, and not because of our expenditure on the university level of education.

Ms Swarbrick: We should have heard from you before we heard from OCUFA this morning.

Dr George: Yes, well, timing is one of those accidents of scheduling.

We do boast a very high rate of accessibility internationally. We do less well in comparisons of some of the kinds of graduates we produce, scientists and engineers, for example. In our production of engineers we rank 16th of the 20 countries; in science degrees, we are significantly lower than many of our chief international economic competitors. We have to improve on the number of scientists and engineers we produce, but we also have to ensure that we offer them the quality of education that allows them and us to compete internationally.

Many other countries have the jump on us in terms of committing additional resources to higher education. It's interesting for many to see that a state like Arkansas spends significantly more on higher education per student than does Ontario.

Even those people who already possess considerable skills will need to update those skills. I think that point is sometimes lost sight of as well. Professional associations, for example, will increasingly want their members to become familiar with new technology and new techniques; they require this to be successful in global competition. All of these realities require sophisticated education, the availability of courses tailored to skilled people who hold jobs and must work while they learn, who must learn quickly in order to resume their jobs. We will need teachers to teach those who continue to learn in a variety of ways, and these are contributions best made in many areas by universities.

The frustrating, even frightening, aspect is that many in government have not recognized the integral role of the university in providing this type of education. Many of the other educational contributions of the university are not widely known. So I turn in point 3 to the university as a trainer and retrainer. We are no longer limited to providing post-secondary education to young people drawn immediately out of secondary school prior to their entry into the labour force. Increasingly, the campuses of our universities are populated by older students, people with previous work experience, part-time students and people seeking retraining or more training. It's vital that we make you aware of this role. It is what is often viewed as a non-traditional role for universities, but it is one that has been developing for many years, one that we foresee will continue to expand in the future.

I present a number of examples of university involvement in this kind of training and retraining. The first is a joint program between Ryerson's continuing education division and IBM for training and updating of up to 350 IBM employees. The second is a customized training operation provided by the University of Guelph to the food industry, with a view to developing a globally competitive food industry in Ontario. The third is an example drawn from the University of Western Ontario, which is working with the London Unemployment Help Centre to provide computer training and upgrading for people who have recently become unemployed.

These examples, I think, provide you with some idea of the way in which universities are currently offering non-traditional forms of training to a wide range of people who are seeking to upgrade and update their skills. In fact, there are as many registrations in continuing and part-time education in Ontario as there are full-time undergraduate students, close to 200,000 of each, and this does not include persons who benefit from customized courses which universities provide for particular companies or labour groups.

The fourth, and one that I think has been extremely important to us, is the university as a research partner. We contribute to renewal through research that leads to innovations and frequently to the formation of new companies. I think the four-part series by David Crane in the Toronto Star recently on the University of Waterloo's success in generating about 100 companies as a result of innovations in the university's labs makes the point in a way that I can't. Enough said.

A lot of these projects, of course, are university-industry joint projects. There have been a couple of programs that have been quite important in this area. The seven centres of excellence funded by the provincial government: I've seen a significant increase in graduates who are employed in Canadian industry and increased numbers of patents associated with those centres. The university research incentive fund, or URIF, has been extremely important, with over 600 projects, with funding directly from the government as well as funding from industry and other sources.

These contributions in the four areas I've mentioned are but some examples of the way in which our universities promote provincial renewal. We are quite concerned, however, by several indications that government is failing to recognize and support the full extent of the university role in renewal. This is not simply a concern for the university; it's above all a concern for the impact this failure can have on Ontario's society. If we need more mechanical engineers or microbiologists, we either attract them from other countries or we produce them here.

The former method exposes us directly to intense competition with other jurisdictions, not only in Canada but across the world. The latter method, producing them ourselves, is certainly more reliable but it requires time. You cannot turn on the tap and produce an engineer in a few months; it takes years. What we do now and in the next year or two will affect our ability to compete for many years to come.

We then move to a section called "Action Plan—Some Specific Proposals." We aren't trying today to add to your level of alarm. I know on Monday, when you heard from professional economists, you heard many tales of doom and gloom. We don't want to add to that alarm. What we want is to point to an avenue of solution to the problem. It begins with your recognition that we are already playing a major role in training and retraining and basic and applied research, and we are doing so without sufficient support from government and industry.

We urge you to recommend to the Treasurer some bold steps to ensure that a greater contribution can be made by your universities through advanced training and through research. Here in Ontario, for example, the URIF program has been a real success, according to the recent assessments. We urge that this program not only be continued but that it be enhanced.

Similarly, the centres of excellence have produced important advances. We need to foster more of this kind of innovative action. We must ensure that our universities can produce and retain highly skilled scientists and professionals with advanced technical skills. We are suffering from years of financial constraints and in many cases we lack up-to-date facilities and equipment, but the thrust of my message today is not that we have suffered historically from underfunding and continue to do so. I do worry that many of our most promising students will accept opportunities in the United States or abroad where they can find the latest and the best facilities. I am concerned that we are devoting a great deal of time, effort and resources to meeting a growing burden of regulatory requirements placed on us by government.

There is little to suggest that the resources consumed in addressing these regulatory requirements contribute positively to the teaching and research activities of our institutions. We need to examine carefully the intent and impact of these imposed restraints and roll back and limit the unproductive ones that impede progress with the teaching and research agenda.

We urge the committee to recommend programs to facilitate the reduction of barriers to mobility in the educational system in order to allow people in the province to enter or re-enter the system at different points, consistent with their needs, with a maximum of efficiency. Programs to facilitate cooperation and appropriate disciplinary and professional training fields between universities and colleges are one type of improvement that we are advancing and that you can promote. We understand that the task force on advanced training will make recommendations in its report to be released next month to further joint efforts of the CAATs and the universities, particularly with respect to post-diploma training. Government support for this type of institutional cooperation can assist in building a more efficient and effective post-secondary system.

I have talked about the need for high quality education, the need for our graduates to be able to compete with graduates from other jurisdictions. We urge you to promote incentives for high quality education in crucial fields like science, engineering and advanced technology and to reduce the sometimes stifling levels of regulation being applied to the universities. One example would be reducing some of the regulations that impede universities in developing a broader capacity to find alternative sources of revenue than reliance primarily on government transfer payments. We urge you to recommend to the Treasurer a more vigorous pursuit of income-contingent repayment as a means of flowing more resources to the universities in a manner that will allow us to maintain our already demonstrably admirable levels of accessibility.

If we are serious about lifelong learning, we must facilitate ways to make the education system a more seamless one; that is, to allow people to enter at various points and to move through the interrelated elements of the system without hindrance. The universities have already made great progress in this area and we are working to enhance mobility within the university system and, together with the CAATs, to further cooperation and coordination between the two systems. Your support for these initiatives will be crucial to their success.

The universities are making a significant contribution to economic and social renewal now. The intensity of global competition that Ontario faces requires that we work together to maximize our universities' contributions to revitalizing the provincial economy. Support for higher education is a critical component of the future economic viability of Ontario. We cannot shortchange the people of this province by ignoring the vital importance of our richest resource: our human capital.

The Chair: I thought you were going to miss that last paragraph, which I thought was the best part of the whole report. I think you're talking to converted members already of this committee, everything you've said. I know Dr Terry White of Brock University has sold the Niagara Peninsula on Brock University and it's a very important component of the Niagara area, with business and industry and training. So I'll go on to Mr Kwinter.

Mr Kwinter: Dr George, I read with interest your report and I agree with a great deal of it. I just want to explore one of the areas that you talked about on page 4, when you compared the production of engineers and scientists in Canada with that of Japan and Germany.

When I was the Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology and we had the Premier's Council, we tried to address this particular concern and we found—and this is the question I want to ask. The implication in your report is that if the government would provide more funding we'd be able to redress that imbalance, when in fact we found that it wasn't really a matter of funding; it was a matter that students don't want to go into those particular courses. The reason they don't want to go into those courses is they see a career path as far as success and getting their BMWs and living in a condo as going into medicine, dentistry, law.

The figures for law degrees in Canada, with all due respect to the lawyer sitting on this committee, are just the reverse of what the engineers are in Japan and Germany, in that we have an inordinate number of lawyers compared to the population. It isn't the problem of funding; it's a problem of attracting both females and male students into engineering faculties. Do you have any comments on that?

Dr George: Yes, I do, because you point up an issue that I think is extremely important, one which I talked to at a meeting of the Premier's Council and the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology just slightly over a month ago. One of the major problems in this area is the particular nature of the labour market in Canada. In my view, the Canadian labour market and Canadian employers produce much stronger signals about economic opportunity for the graduates of arts programs and professional programs than for science and engineering programs. This is in part due to the nature of the structure of Canadian industry and some of the things we've associated, in the past at least, with truncated structures because of multinational corporations, branchplantism and so forth. Not true of all those industries, but for many of them the research and development is done in the United States or elsewhere and not in Canada. So our labour market signals are very strong for people who graduate with generic skills—the ability to write, to do informal analysis, to speak foreign languages and so forth—and less strong in terms of signals for science and engineering graduates.

My point here, though, is that there's partly a supply-side issue as well, that in many cases our students have to be trained with equipment that is either relatively scarce, so the student-to-equipment ratio is very high and makes access difficult, or in many cases is outdated and outmoded, which means that the students are getting an education that I think is not at the cutting edge of competition in all cases.

I think we can address this in a couple of different ways. We know that a university like Waterloo, for example, in its computer science program sends its graduates all over the world to companies like Microsoft, for example, which comes to Waterloo first to hire its students, so there are cases of great success.

But I think we need to restore the infrastructure of many of those departments in many of our institutions. We need to open up the horizons for employment within Ontario as well as beyond. This may call for changes in other forms of the industrial infrastructure, including government policies, the availability and packaging of government support programs to increase the demand for such graduates. It also may require our taking active efforts to provide incentives for students to enter those areas. You mention female students, for example, in science and engineering, special bursary programs aimed at redressing that imbalance, special bursaries—which I've advocated for a number of years—to attract women into science teaching careers, where there's a conspicuous shortage and an absence of role models for young women students as they choose their career paths. So there's a broad response to your question, Mr Kwinter.

The Chair: I've got to go on to Mr Sterling, there.

Mr Sterling: I'm interested in your brief in terms of, you seem to be stressing the science and the engineering end. Being the only engineer in the Legislature and—

Mr Sean G. Conway (Renfrew North): Not so.

Mr Sterling: Yes, so.

Mr Conway: Is that possible? That's inconceivable.

Mr Sterling: Inconceivable; yes, it is, but that's the way it is.

Mr Kwinter: For the information of this body, he plays the cards—you know, he's also a lawyer, so it all depends on which way—

Mr Sterling: Well, it's one of the advantages of having two cards, but at any rate—

Mr Conway: What are you doing here?

Mr Sterling: I know. That's an even better question. You play very heavily on that end of it, but what percentage of the total university budget, globally in Ontario, will go towards engineering and science faculties versus arts, social sciences etc?

Dr George: That is a figure I don't carry on the tip of my tongue, but I can get you the answer to that if you would like to have it.

Mr Sterling: I think it's relevant in that universities want autonomy and continue to demand autonomy. Yet, if your brief is laced with the rationale that you need more money to train engineers and scientists and only 16% or 20% is going towards engineers and scientists, then there's an obligation on you to change that ratio from whatever it is to 25%.

Dr George: Let me comment on one aspect of that. Training science and engineering students is more expensive per student than is the training of arts students, and in a time of budgetary restraint it makes sense, at a certain level of economic rationality, to substitute arts students for science and engineering students or to increase arts enrolment in order to subsidize the more expensive education in science and engineering.

There's no doubt that the infrastructure costs of science and engineering education are very significant and significant barriers to expanding enrolment. So if there were a major increase in the demand for scientists and engineers on the part of Canadian industry, the response from Canadian schools would be made more difficult by the nature of the expenditure requirements to bring up to speed, if you like, an expanded capacity.

Mr Sterling: Does an engineering—

The Chair: Mr Sterling, I'm going to have to go on because we're just past 2 o'clock now. Ms Harrington.

Ms Harrington: I think you'll agree, from some of the statements you've probably heard from the Premier—

The Chair: Just one question.

Ms Harrington: —that our government does agree with you that certainly education and training are a very key part of renewal and key to our economic strength in the future as part of the global economy.

But this investing in education is on a balance with the deficit. I think you can appreciate that. It's set in the context of our increased welfare rolls and also of the question of increased taxes, and I'm sure you can appreciate that those are the decisions we are being asked to make. But besides us making that decision, whatever decision is made I believe needs a public commitment to make a really important step forward. Do you see that the public does have a commitment to the type of views that you've been telling us?

Dr George: I think that in important sectors of the economy there is certainly a realization and a commitment. If you looked at the community of Kitchener-Waterloo, as Crane's series showed, there is a significant recognition of the importance of those two universities to the local economy. Many universities have completed economic impact studies that show this in varying degrees in various communities.

Second, we report some of the findings of the Maclean's-CTV poll, and of those polled, large percentages report that they believe education and training is the crucial investment of government, more important than—

Ms Harrington: The question is, are they willing to pay more taxes or see a higher deficit?

Dr George: What you've seen and what's very interesting in Ontario is that in the last year there has emerged a student group, in competition with the Ontario Federation of Students, called the Ontario Undergraduate Student Alliance, which is proposing tuition fee increases matched, in absolute dollar amount but not percentage-wise, by government transfer payments and improvements in the quality of education with those funds and due attention to accessibility.

So there is, remarkably, a group of students which is saying, "We need to have a more rational basis of funding university education, and we, as students, see a more important role for fee revenue as a contributor to the universities' funding situation." Part of our message is that we need to have greater degrees of freedom to examine and exploit alternative sources of revenue than continued significant reliance on government transfer payments. Government transfers will always be important, but they needn't comprise 80% of our operating revenues.

The Chair: Dr George, I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee. I know there's one alternative source of revenue. Xerox Canada, I believe, is helping out universities today, is that correct? I don't know how much. It's a pleasure having you and your colleagues here, and we'll be submitting this to the Treasurer for him to read over and comment also. Thank you.

Dr George: Thank you, Mr Chairman.

ONTARIO NURSES' ASSOCIATION

The Chair: The next group is the Ontario Nurses' Association. Would you mind coming forward and taking a seat. I only have one question to ask you today, as you're all from the nurses' association: How do you get rid of a cold?

Ms Lesley Bell: Wait for a week.

The Chair: We have a half-hour; we will run over till 25 to 2, as we were a little late getting started and we had a couple of extra questions. Would you introduce yourselves for the purposes of Hansard, and when you start talking again, maybe give your name in case we have a replacement from Hansard. You may begin. Leave some time for questions from the members of the committee also.

Ms Ina Caissey: My name is Ina Caissey. I'm the president of the Ontario Nurses' Association. With me are Seppo Nousiainen, a research officer; Lesley Bell, associate director of government relations; and Carol Helmstadter, government relations officer.

As the president of Ontario Nurses' Association, I'm here today to represent the views of over 50,000 staff nurses in this province. The Ontario Nurses' Association, as the voice of these registered nurses who work in hospitals, community health, industry, nursing homes and the homes for the aged, brings a unique perspective to these consultation hearings.

As registered nurses, we constantly see the impact of the province's grappling with the unavoidable adjustments to the current difficult fiscal realities. For us, the impact is evident, not just in the dry facts and figures of economists but in the faces of our patients and clients and our fellow nurses.

As accurately anticipated by Health minister Frances Lankin, the accelerated restructuring of the health care system has had an enormous impact in the hospital sector. Although public statements by the minister have praised the hospital community and the district health councils for their outstanding job in maintaining service and reducing budgets, these efforts at restructuring have not been achieved without some very painful costs.

It is fair to say that the true picture of job losses has not been accurately portrayed. While our submission notes 1,000 layoffs in the hospital sector, the most recent figures, received on January 12, 1993, from HTAP, the Hospital Training and Adjustment Panel, report 2,715 layoffs to date—not a small number. Yet this number doesn't capture the thousands of registered nurses who are affected in other ways.

For example, many employers are using attrition and early retirement as a way to reduce staff. Of course, these numbers do not show up as layoffs. Also, numerous part-time nurses who were working on a casual basis or who worked for agencies are simply not being called in. Again, these numbers are not being counted as layoffs.

One of the most important ways in which the true nature of the unemployment or underemployment situation has been hidden is through the cutback in the hours of work of part-time nurses. About 50% of our members are part-time workers. However, many of them have worked the equivalent of full-time hours for years. Now these hours have been reduced by more than half. Indeed, some nurses may not be working more than one shift per week.

The minister's announcement of the one-time increase of $149 million this year for the hospital sector will do nothing to significantly change this situation. What is even more disturbing is that in 1994-95 there will be an actual cut to the budgets of hospitals. This will mean, no doubt, that the institutional sector will receive an even smaller proportion of total expenditure than it does now. This can only mean more job losses to come, and there is certainly no reason to believe that any significant portion of these moneys will find their way to the community and public health sector.

While the Minister of Health promises that more jobs will be created in the community over the next few years, there is no indication that the negative effects of downsizing in hospitals will be minimized in the short term by the growth of jobs in the community-based delivery of health care. Obviously, because of the interconnected nature of this problem, it is crucial that the timing of changes in the hospital sector and in community health must be coordinated.

This situation is now becoming serious enough that we are concerned about the effects these reductions in staff complements are having on patient care. The Ontario Nurses' Association certainly has no quarrel with the Treasurer's goal of the creation of a fairer and more open and democratic workplace. However, we believe it is necessary to pause and give consideration to the trend in the hospital sector to a very literal application of old-fashioned bottom line business methods without an equal consideration of the value of staff resources.

We have seen too many hospital operating plans drawn up by consultants which restructure and balance the budget by deleting direct-service-provider jobs, often to the detriment of patient care. These consultants' reports are generally taking the standard approach to corporate performance. The focus is on the old-fashioned goals of planning, organizing, staffing, directing and controlling, not on a democratic workplace where staff work together as a team to ensure good health care.

Nursing is a highly labour-intensive business which does not lend itself to stepped-up productivity rates or a decrease in the volume of work with the introduction of modern technology. Rather, nursing requires a certain body of knowledge, clinical experience and a huge degree of flexibility and skill to be able to handle all kinds of conflicting and unexpected demands.

Ironically, while registered nurses are now dealing with a wide range of new drugs and technologies, the basic nature of nursing care remains essentially unchanged. Nursing care requires the talent to balance the many conflicting demands of various patients, to recognize clinical symptoms, to encourage and work with people suffering with these problems and the ability to involve patients in actively working at the improvement of their own health. To illustrate our point, we quote from a highly experienced neurosurgical nurse describing her evening's work last month in a hospital which has dramatically downsized its nursing staff in order to balance its budget.

"Last night I had two fresh post-operative craniotomies with intracranial pressure monitors and hourly Glasgow coma scale testing, a third agitated and confused craniotomy who had pulled out his intracranial pressure monitor...on hourly Glasgow coma scale testing, and a post-op day 1 pituitary tumour who was in diabetes insipidus. Luckily all four were in the same room. The other nurses were too busy to help me or to relieve me for supper. The charge nurse," who used to have no patients and was therefore able to do this, "has almost as many patients as the rest of us. The desk clerks are now supposed to transcribe doctors' orders," formerly the charge nurse's job, "but we have so many off-service patients that the nurses aren't always sure of the orders. On some floors the individual floor nurses do all their own orders but often they don't have time to even do all the bedside care, let alone the orders and charting."

This nurse is a highly skilled and competent professional with almost 20 years of experience who was undoubtedly working at the fastest and most productive level that was humanly possible. However, patients who are as unstable as her patients were on this particular night require a great deal of hands-on care and time, which has little to do with innovation, using new techniques or working smarter. On the other hand, it has everything to do with what Mr Laughren calls "taking a hard look at priorities." This nurse's top priority of safe, effective and humane patient care was seriously at risk.

It is important to be clear that we are in no way devaluing the importance of management practices or balanced budgets, but we submit that the measure of a hospital's success must be based primarily on how well it delivers patient care. One of the most striking omissions in most of these consultants' reports is that nowhere is any mention made of the nature and calibre of the health care that the hospital is providing. What is the point of balancing the budget if the hospital cannot carry out its basic function of delivering good health care to its community? It is worth noting that in the few hospitals where the Minister of Health's operating guidelines have been implemented in good faith and with a sense of accountability to the public interest there have been minimal job losses and a far better morale among registered nurses and other workers.

Now I would like to turn to the community health sector and discuss the effects of the economic restructuring on this sector. As registered nurses in hospitals are laid off and the long-term care initiative becomes a reality, the government has said that it hopes to have these registered nurses move into the new and enlarged community health sector. The reality, however, is far less hopeful. Our association is seeing numerous layoffs in the community health sector, as local governments, which are having difficulty in funding community health services and organizations like the Victorian Order of Nurses, are replacing registered nurses with lower-paid registered nursing assistants.

The situation in the regional municipality of Kitchener-Waterloo illustrates our point. While the Ministry of Health is planning to expand the community health sector, this regional municipality is laying off 25 community health nurses. The municipality has asked the province for additional funding and this request has been refused. The regional municipality says that it cannot afford to pay these nurses. However, when we look at the municipality's 1993 budget we note that while community health funds have been cut by 14%, every other area has received increased funding ranging in size from 3% to 14%.

As the registered nurses in Kitchener-Waterloo have pointed out, these kinds of cutbacks will only result in higher costs in other areas, with more and longer hospitalizations and an increased need for social services. It is no surprise that they have publicly asked, does it make sense to be retraining hospital nurses for community work when local governments are not prepared to keep the trained and experienced nurses they already have?

The strategy of the Victorian Order of Nurses to hire less-expensive personnel may be an appealing short-term way to balance the budget, but in the long term, the replacement of a registered nurse with a less skilled worker is retrogressive. As the level of care required in the community becomes more complex, and with the increasing emphasis on health promotion and disease prevention, nursing personnel in the community will require a high level of expertise and experience. This is not the time to be making false economies by laying off highly qualified registered nurses.

In conclusion, we urge the government to persist with its support of a more democratic workplace where staff nurses have a voice. Let us hope that these same initiatives will soon be seen in the other areas of health care.

Also, we would again, as this association has done in the past, strongly urge changes in the Audit Act to make the health care system accountable for the enormous amount of public money it receives. This accountability must extend beyond hospitals to include community health and long-term care.

Finally, we certainly appreciate that government revenues are not available to fund public services as generously as has been done in the past. We agree that the delivery of health care services must be made more efficient and must focus on essentials. However, we cannot emphasize strongly enough that the contribution of staff nurses is not a frill. The work which these men and women do is one of the most essential components of the health care system. Without registered nurses, the health care system as we know it just simply could not exist.

On behalf of the staff nurses in this province, I would like to thank the committee for this opportunity to present our concerns with the Treasurer's fiscal and economic priorities. We would be pleased to take your questions.

Mr Sterling: Thank you very much for coming to us. I have met with the various nurses in my own area and have heard much the same story.

I represent the riding of Carleton in eastern Ontario, and in fact made a statement in the House with regard to the Victorian Order of Nurses and the conflict, which they brought to my attention, I guess more pointedly than I had thought about it myself; that is, if the government is in fact encouraging people to be taken care of outside of institutions, it hardly makes sense to decrease the quality of care outside of the institutions when a higher quality of care will be required in the home. The Victorian Order of Nurses, probably, in my area that I represent, has the highest regard in the community of perhaps most of the professions.

It's a bit of a touchy issue, because I felt that in the past nurses were not properly compensated for the work they have done, and I want to put it in that context. It seems, though, that because there have been perhaps deserved compensation increases over the recent past history for the nursing profession, that has hurt you in a way. When priority decisions are being made, be it by hospitals or by any other group, somehow the nurses seem to be attacked as the area where these institutions, these fund receivers from government, can cut back as best they—by reducing the quality of care to the patient.

Two of the economists who met with us talked about that very issue; that is, income distribution, where professions or groups had asked for and attained a higher income as a result of negotiation or whatever it is, and as a result, caused within their own profession or workplace a problem for some of their members. Is there any thought on your part on that issue? I know it would be almost impossible for a profession to say, "We have to rethink that issue in a downward way." It's pretty hard to sell to your membership. I thought of you immediately when these economists were talking.

Ms Carol Helmstadter: These issues came up, certainly, and that was something the previous presenters were talking about. We certainly have thought about it, because we have been asked if we wouldn't roll back our contract.

We believe this is a short-term problem. Our much greater problem is just what the previous presenters were talking about. To attract able and competent young people into nursing, we have to be able to compete. There are so many more options. A generation ago when I went into nursing, the options were relatively limited for women. Now there are many other choices for able people. If we want to continue to have able and talented people in the profession, we have to be able to compete salary-wise. Although it's tempting to say, "We'll just roll back the salaries and there'll be less job loss," in the long run it would be self-defeating.

Ms Bell: If I can follow up on that, you're correct. We've had some problems with getting to the $52,000 level for our experienced nurses, but this is for a career. But we're still looking at where the increases in health spending are going and that's to OHIP and drug benefits. It's not to the nurses.

I understand the hospitals' approach at cutting nurses, because that happens to be one of the largest portions, salaries in hospitals. If you're going to cut your budget, you hit the big point, take 10%, and it's an easy solution. We're suggesting that the easy solution isn't the right solution. You need to get the voices of the staff nurses, talk to the staff who work in the hospitals, all service providers, and look where you can start cutting and not just look at your top item.

The dealing with the fee for service is a problem and it's an area that can't go along unchecked.

One of the other areas where we suggest you're not utilizing nurses appropriately is in expanding the role of the nurse. We don't have to be used just in the area we are.

In answer to Mr Hansen, I can give him all kinds of advice on how to treat his cold. He doesn't have to go to his physician. He doesn't have to go to an emergency department to do that.

I'm limited in the legislation that governs us. I think we need to look at other ways for people to provide services, not the same old model of health care or sickness care that has historically gone on. But I will not take blame for finally getting nurses the adequate salary they deserve. Sure, our nurses are suffering because of it. That doesn't make what happened wrong.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you for that answer. I would love to go home and stay on liquids, but the chief government whip says I have to be here today.

Ms Swarbrick: First, I just want to say with regard to that issue that I do consider the nurses' situation different than others, given that your large pay awards were because of pay equity, if I recall correctly.

Ms Bell: We haven't got pay equity yet.

Ms Swarbrick: I mean because of the move towards pay equity.

Ms Bell: You may want to say historically.

Mr Seppo Nousiainen: Historically. It tends to be records kind of stuff. Actually, I think it was through direct negotiations as opposed to arbitrated awards.

Ms Swarbrick: It's a move towards it and I appreciate the need for it in your case.

First, I want to say thank you. I think you've been one of the most effective groups presenting to us in terms of being very clear about painting a picture of what's happening out there and being very specific in a number of areas with regard to recommendations. I'm really happy to hear that the involvement of nurses in corporate decision-making within the hospitals is happening to reasonable satisfaction with you. You're feeling it's working the way we want it to, so I'm really happy with that.

Along that line, I wanted to ask you, are there things you can be specific about that you think can be done within the health care system to help make things more cost-efficient, given the economics and the fiscal situation hospitals are in, besides the things you are doing? I'm thinking of things like the use of nurse practitioners or those kinds of areas, if you could be specific about them.

Ms Caissey: I think first I have to pick up on something you said, that we were being more involved in the corporate process and having input. That is not happening effectively in very many places that we're aware of.

Ms Swarbrick: I'm interested, because it sounded from here as though you were saying it is.

Ms Helmstadter: It has happened in a few places, and in those places it has been terrific. Things have been cut and everybody's tightened their belts, but it has been equitable, everyone has taken part and there's been a much better team spirit and much better morale. We look forward to seeing that extended and we are very appreciative of the support we've gotten from the minister in our efforts to see it extended. I think that's what we were trying to say. But as Ina says, we could name the hospitals on our fingers that have actually done it.

Ms Swarbrick: Have you got some specific recommendations you could make to us, nurse practitioners or other things?

Ms Caissey: I think, as Lesley said, part of it is looking at the role of the nurse and looking at an expanded role, because there are many things that a registered nurse can do, rather than having people go and see their family practitioners, at a much more reasonable cost to the system. But I think, before we even get into all of that, we have to get our people at the grass-roots level really involved on their fiscal advisory committees so that they are having input into what is going on in their particular institution. If you can't get to the table to have a voice and if you don't get the information you need in order to know what is actually going on within the institution, it is very difficult to have any impact.

Ms Bell: If I could just add, as far as the nurse practitioner model is concerned, we fully support some move to using that kind of care provider. One of the problems historically, of course, has been who pays for it, the fee-for-service argument. You can't just continue to allow people to tap into fee for service, because it goes along and just continues to escalate.

That area of how these people are going to be remunerated has to be addressed. I think that was one of the problems historically with the nurse practitioners in the past. When they were teamed up with a physician it was a sharing of the physician's income. They had no way of being remunerated directly or through a community health centre or some kind of organization where there's money per capita, per patient and it's spread among the staff who are employed there. That kind of change from the old fee-for-service model has to happen.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the presentation too. The message I kind of got out of it was that there's enough money in the health system but it needs to be better managed.

Ms Bell: Correct.

Mr Phillips: The two things that are of interest to me are, what's happened to jobs for nurses? My memory is of four years ago: shortage. It would be helpful for me to get some idea of how many of your members are working today versus a couple of years ago perhaps, and whether you know what happens to nursing graduates, how many of them are getting jobs.

The second thing I think we need help on is that I think all of us salute community-based health care. The challenge for us I think will be: As hospital beds close, when are we at the right number? There's the risk that hospital bed closings are being driven partially by health care needs and partially by budget needs. I think we could use your advice on how far we are from the right number. Those two things for us: Nursing jobs, how many are working? I guess maybe you'd know the hospital sector now versus two or three years ago, and what's the future for that? The graduate nurses, how are they doing? Are we approaching the right number of hospital beds now or not?

Ms Bell: Starting with the layoff issue, I think you have to look at it. Our association is looking at—somewhere our membership has decreased by about 2,800 members over the last two years, so that gives you some indication of how many fewer registered nurses we represent.

Mr Phillips: From what to what?

Ms Caissey: From about 46,000 and some down to 43,000-something.

Ms Bell: Yes, those are dues-paying. We've dropped from about 54,000-plus to about 52,000 people we represent. One of the problems that doesn't pick up, though, is that as you indicated, there was a nursing shortage, so the first layoffs didn't happen because they filled those vacancies, and you had the attrition and early retirement issue and the hospitals were still getting more money. We're looking next year at no extra moneys going to the hospitals and so we're looking at a major reduction and layoffs of our members.

Mr Nousiainen: The numbers that have been mentioned are 5,000 or perhaps 6,000 nurses to go this coming year or perhaps the next year. They're very large numbers.

Mr Phillips: That's 5,000 to 6,000, coming up in the next few months?

Mr Nousiainen: Next fiscal year.

Ms Bell: Starting April 1.

Mr Phillips: So in the next few months, 5,000 fewer nurses.

Mr Nousiainen: Yes, we've heard numbers of that magnitude.

Mr Phillips: Do you have any indication of jobs that the graduates are getting?

Ms Bell: I think you have to realize that in some instances grads are getting hired because they're cheaper than experienced nurses. And the hospital, of course, is looking to a more flexible workforce; you may want to raise this issue with the OHA as well. The problem with some of this is that nursing has always gone through this cyclical thing of no jobs—when I graduated in 1977, three of us got jobs in the province of Ontario—so it's difficult to track this kind of thing.

I was interested to listen to the gentleman before about putting people into certain areas or streams of education. If there are no jobs at the end, are we doing these people a service? I'm not so sure that the grads in nursing aren't facing that same idea, unless we pick up on an expanded role for these people.

Regarding hospital bed closures, you're going to get a different answer from us than you are from other people, because we're concerned with the level of care we can provide.

One of the problems we face is, what's safe, what's competent care? You're going to get different variations. In some instances, we already feel that patient care is jeopardized, and we do things like professional responsibility complaints, where we look at workload and indicate problems where we feel that patients are in jeopardy. We circulate those to the MPPs when they're completed. The latest one that has gone to the media was Ajax-Pickering; I think that example is illustrated in our submission.

So we already think that is happening. The number, of course, depends on the area. We've had a problem historically, where district health councils haven't had enough say in the overall decision of the community, and you've had hospital A wanting to be bigger than hospital B. We understand and recognize that downsizing was required. To a large extent, we may have already surpassed the number of beds that are reasonably safe.

Mr Phillips: I realize geographics. I think it would be helpful to all of us to get an ongoing assessment of that from the nurses.

Mr Nousiainen: In terms of bed closures, I think it's also important to realize that this is something that didn't start happening in the last 12 months. It has been going on since about 1986. The Minister of Health is fully aware of these numbers, and you can actually get these numbers.

Mr Phillips: Well, you see, I submitted a request to the ministry. I said, "I'd like to know how many hospital beds there are and how many are closed." The written response I got back was, "We do not keep those records."

Mr Nousiainen: They do, in a publication called Hospital Statistics.

Mr Phillips: I can show you the letter. That was the answer I got back from the Ministry of Health: "We do not keep those records." I'm of the opinion that we'll have to watch that carefully, because at some stage we will have gone too far. I don't know when. It will vary geographically.

Ms Bell: One of the problems with the document that Seppo mentioned is that it's at least a year, if not two years, behind. So more current and accurate figures are difficult. We can provide you with whatever we have as far as our tracking of it is concerned. We try to do that within our association.

Mr Nousiainen: There is also a monthly reporting of bed closures, so you don't really have to wait a year to get the figures.

Mr Phillips: I'll show you the letter.

The Chair: Thank you for coming before the committee.

We'll recess for 20 minutes—no, 15 minutes. That's what the clerk tells me; I just do what she tells me. There's a cancellation of the next group, the Ontario Pharmacists' Association. They're coming in February.

The committee recessed at 1439 and resumed at 1458.

ASSOCIATION OF MUNICIPALITIES OF ONTARIO

The Chair: The group we have now is the Association of Municipalities of Ontario. We have three gentlemen before us. If you wouldn't mind identifying themselves for the purposes of Hansard, you may carry on with your brief. Leave some time at the end for members of the committee to ask you questions.

Mr Joe Mavrinac: I am Joe Mavrinac, president of the Association of Municipalities of Ontario. The two gentlemen with me are Bill Mickle, vice-president of AMO and chairman of AMO's fiscal policy and labour committee; and Mr Grant Hopcroft, the immediate past-chair of the fiscal policy and labour committee and a past-president of AMO. Grant will make the presentation.

Mr Grant Hopcroft: Mr Chairman and committee members, it's always a pleasure to be here as part of the province's pre-budget consultation. AMO values this opportunity to give you our input into some of the issues that we see facing both our respective levels of government in the coming year.

The depth and duration of the recent recession have profoundly affected all of us, both at the provincial and the municipal levels of government. Periods of economic hardship force everyone to review the way in which they operate, to separate the essential from the desirable, and identify ways and means of doing more with less. People's expectations of government are that it will provide assistance in weathering these tough times and to help generate growth that will stimulate the ultimate economic recovery that we all hope will soon be upon us.

Far too often governments are perceived by the public as not providing that kind of leadership. Instead, many times we've found ourselves expending our energy arguing with one another over scarce resources or passing responsibilities from one to the other to evade political pressure, with no real benefit to our common constituents.

We've noted that in fact the Treasurer, in his opening remarks to this committee yesterday, made reference to the downloading the provincial government is suffering at the hands of the federal government. If we leave you with one message here today, it's that we hope you don't practise what the federal government's preaching in terms of your relationship with municipal governments in the coming fiscal year.

We've broken our presentation down into several headings. Unfortunately, we feel we need to start on a rather negative note. The first deals with last year's decision, which initially was a very positive one, to announce a three-year transfer payment schedule to municipal governments. Although at the time we weren't overjoyed with the level of assistance, we were somewhat comforted by the fact that at least we knew what kind of medicine we would be taking for last year, this coming year and the following year.

We remain concerned about the recent announcement, late last year, that in fact the increase for this year would be a one-time-only payment and that for 1994 we could expect to return to the 1992 levels of unconditional transfers, which represents a substantial $38.6-million reduction in next year's budget from what we can expect for this year. We would urge the provincial government to reconsider that decision. The reduction in unconditional transfer payments can only ultimately result in either municipal tax increases or future incurrence of debt, which of course only helps out those who are in the financial institutions and doesn't help us provide additional services to our taxpayers.

Under this section, we are recommending three things: that the government continue with its three-year announcement of unconditional transfers on an ongoing basis; that the earlier commitment of 2% for 1993-94 be honoured; and that unconditional transfers in subsequent years be increased at a rate sufficient to meet increases in provincially mandated and municipally administered programs.

I've already touched on the issue of conditional transfer payments in terms of the concerns over reductions that result in downloading to the municipal sector. One example I'd like to emphasize is the fact that many of these have a detrimental impact on our ability as a province to deal with growth opportunities and investment opportunities. For example, transfer payments to conservation authorities were reduced 13% last year. That's reduced the ability of conservation authorities to deliver services related to development in our communities and proper protection of environmentally sensitive areas in our communities. It's a reduction that's had to be met by increased levies to municipal members, and that of course has an impact on our municipal tax rates.

In the area of housing, we're concerned about provincial funding for the housing renewal programs—the low-rise rehab program, the home renewal program and so on—for the next fiscal year. There were no budgetary allocations made in 1992-93 and there is considerable pent-up demand in the community. I don't have to tell the committee members here how expensive it is to provide new housing for those in need. It's much cheaper and it's a much better investment, both at the local and provincial levels, to rehabilitate and maintain our existing housing stock so that it provides decent, affordable housing for our citizens, not to mention the labour-intensive renovation and construction activity that results from this type of activity.

We've heard rumours that the province is considering recall of municipal trust funds used to finance the Ontario home renewal program, estimated to be about $60 million. We have as a municipal sector been concerned about, I guess, the lack of appreciation of current circumstances in that the income and other eligibility criteria haven't been amended to reflect current realities. Income guidelines have not been indexed to recognize current income levels, interest payments and so on. We would urge this committee to recommend freeing up those funds so that they can be put to work stimulating economic activity and job creation in our communities, not to mention maintaining our existing housing stock.

We're also concerned about capping provincial expenditures in certain cost-shared programs with municipal governments. One area of particular concern is long-term care. We are in the midst of our municipal budget processes. As you know, upper-tier municipalities and particularly counties that deal with homes for the aged have to set their levies by March 31. We're currently required to cost-share a certain percentage of operating deficits, yet we're unsure at this point what, if any, provincial capping there might be. We urge you, first of all, not to cap, but if capping is a necessity, we need to know as soon as possible so we can properly budget for those realities.

In summary, our recommendations under this section of our presentation are that the government continue to fund housing programs and work with municipalities to revise program guidelines in order that existing trust funds can be spent on meeting the demand for financial assistance for housing rehabilitation; that the cap on funding for homes for the aged be removed and the province make a commitment to the new level of care funding formula, once implemented, and that it not result in additional cost to municipalities over and above our traditional cost-sharing portions.

We're concerned as well that to the extent there are changes in program funding—we realize nothing can remain static in this type of climate—municipal governments be consulted on those changes so we can work in partnership to minimize the impact on our citizens.

Infrastructure funding is something we have recently discussed with the provincial Treasurer and the Minister of Municipal Affairs. We would urge this committee, in terms of program spending for next year, to consider emphasis in those areas where spending will result in an investment in our future in terms of opportunities for economic growth and stimulating economic recovery.

Infrastructure funding in many areas of the province has been reduced or in fact held back because of changes to provincial funding programs. In my own municipality, for example, the upfront sewer funding has been reduced, in fact eliminated. That's costing us about $3 million in this coming fiscal year and is resulting in both reduced expenditures and increased borrowing to deal with the program we need in view of the new Ministry of the Environment guidelines that have been released in terms of capacity before development can be approved.

I don't think I've been before any committees recently where I haven't made at least passing reference to disentanglement, and I won't disappoint you. For almost four years, AMO and the provincial government have been discussing disentanglement and working to disentangle our funding management and delivery of services. Program decisions after disentanglement should be much easier in terms of setting our priorities both at the provincial and the local levels.

We would urge the provincial government to commit to the continuation of disentanglement or a similar process until we've dealt with the relevant issues that are before us. We have heard disquieting rumours that the province may not wish to continue past the existing phase 1 activities dealing predominantly with police funding and welfare. We feel there's a lot more work to be done to the mutual advantage of both our governments.

Community economic development is something both the Ministry of Municipal Affairs and Treasury have been spending a great deal of time promoting. As a local government sector, we feel that type of activity is most important in terms of future economic recovery and growth in our province and we urge the province to continue to work with the local government sector in this area to facilitate the type of planning at the local level that's required to stimulate true economic growth and opportunities for both the unemployed and the disadvantaged in our communities.

The issue of municipal revenue sources is something the Fair Tax Commission property tax working group has recently made recommendations on to the Treasurer. A number of those recommendations are quite strongly supported by our association. We urge the province to expedite implementation of measures under consideration which would improve the fairness of municipal revenue generation.

In that area, abolition of the commercial concentration tax, which has been viewed by our sector as an incursion by the province into municipal revenues, is one issue. The elimination of payments in lieu of property taxes by federal and provincial governments in lieu of paying based on a fair market value assessment basis is another. The whole issue of innovative methods of funding new infrastructure is an area where we would urge the province to commit the necessary resources to implement recommendations in the near future.

In conclusion, we would like to urge this committee to continue to foster what we feel has been an excellent relationship with municipal governments for the most part.

We are concerned that there appear to be signs of a growing tendency by your government to download on municipal governments. Recent examples are increases in laboratory fees, which are having an impact on municipal programs in the area of sewage treatment and environmental controls. There have been continuing indications that police funding is another issue that may be placed on the table outside of the disentanglement process.

To the extent that it is necessary to reallocate those funds, we would urge you to do that within the disentanglement process where proper tradeoffs and checks and balances can be put in place to allow us to work in partnership in these very difficult and trying economic times.

Thank you for the opportunity to make a presentation. I think I've stuck within my originally set 15 minutes, so we could allow an opportunity for questions.

The Chair: It seems all of you sing the same tune in the same choir on disentanglement. I'll go to Monte Kwinter and Mr Phillips after.

Mr Kwinter: How much time do we have?

The Chair: We've got 20 minutes, six minutes each. You can figure that one out.

Mr Kwinter: I just want to pose a problem and ask the same kind of question the Treasurer asked of us. In the Treasurer's projections yesterday, he was showing an additional shortfall of $4.2 billion in revenue. That was based on a projected growth of the economy in the next fiscal year, 1993-94, of 3.8%.

Most of the analysts who have appeared before us have been saying the growth is going to be from a low of 2.2% to about 3%, so the feeling is that even that particular projection of 3.8% growth is optimistic and is not going to be achieved. This means the $4.2-billion shortfall is going to be increased even more, which is going to impact on the debt.

The question is—as I say, the Treasurer has posed this exact same question to us—would letting the deficit go up be better than tax increases or some of the spending reductions that may be needed? What is your recommendation to the Treasurer? What would you advise him to do?

Mr Hopcroft: We anticipated we'd probably be asked something similar to that question. I think we have always, as a level of government, been very careful in advising the provincial government about interference in municipal affairs. As an association, when we've made presentations on budgetary issues, we have endeavoured to deal with those that have an impact on the municipal level.

Obviously, the provincial deficit has an impact on all of us, whether we be governments or individual taxpayers. We're obviously concerned about the level of that deficit, as I believe every right-thinking citizen and government leader in this province is. However, we feel it's important for the government to maintain spending in those areas where there are investments in our future economic prosperity.

In our view, the priorities of the government have to be maintaining existing commitments to its funding partners and maintaining our infrastructure in a way that's safe for our citizens and that it's not falling into a state of disrepair where future costs are going to be that much higher because it's disintegrated rather than simply in need of repair.

To the extent we deal with new programs, those new programs are investments in our future in terms of economic opportunities to our citizens and job prospects for our citizens. We are concerned about new programs that wouldn't fall within those parameters because we feel those have to be the priorities if we are to pull this province, our municipal sector and our citizens out of this recession. I'm just trying to answer in as direct a way as I can.

Mr Kwinter: If I could just have a supplementary, one of the problems I have with representations made to this committee is a perception—I don't think it's a reality—that the federal government has responsibilities and it should be doing things, the province has responsibilities and it should be doing things and the municipalities have them, and none of these separate entities should be offloading on the other on the assumption that our municipal taxpayers have got enough load or our provincial taxpayers have got enough load or our federal taxpayers have got enough load.

There isn't a realization that we're talking about the same taxpayer. It doesn't really make any difference at what level they get taxed. There's only one taxpayer. There are four levels of government: federal, municipal, regional and provincial, but only one taxpayer. So just by saying, "Look, don't put the load on us. You take the load or pass it on to somewhere else," it's still the poor taxpayer who's being burdened by all of these additional expenditures because, as I've just pointed out, the revenue has got to come from somewhere. It either comes from borrowing or it comes from taxation.

Most people will tell you there is a saturation level right now as far as the taxpayer is concerned. The question is, is there also a saturation point at the level of borrowing? Have we really reached the point where we have reached that level? Do you have any comments on that?

Mr Hopcroft: My own philosophy has been that probably government borrowed too much money. However, in my own municipality—and I believe this is an experience shared by both of my colleagues here as municipalities this year—we face the prospect of having to borrow more money, increasing our debt loads, increasing our debt ratios to maintain what we feel are very important priorities in terms of our future economic opportunities.

We don't like to be placed in that position, but many of us have already dipped into our reserve funds in previous years that have been built up in the expectation that we would not always be in the same prosperous circumstance we were a few years ago. A lot of the money that was placed away for a rainy day has already been spent.

We remain concerned, as governments, that there's a perception that because our debt loads aren't as high in some circumstances as the provincial and federal governments, somehow we have extra room within which to borrow. In fact the government recently changed our debt guidelines to allow higher borrowing by municipalities which, in some cases, is appropriate where there are high-growth areas and where there's a desire not to rely entirely on development charges to fund that growth.

But coming from a municipality where we were quite pleased to be recognized in the Financial Times as the most efficient municipal government of a large urban centre in the country, we are faced this year with the combined mill rate increased prospect of double digits when you look at municipal and board of education costs. That's in a municipality we consider to have been well run for many years.

Those pressures are there, some of them brought on by the economy, some of them brought on by changes to provincial government policies, new regulatory regimes that we've had to deal with, social assistance costs, which I'm sure we all recognize as something we need to deal with. We have an obligation to those less fortunate in these economic times, but all of these are having a terrible impact on our ability to deal with our programs at the local level and our services are suffering.

Many of us have frozen wages of our employees. At our local conservation authority, our employees took a wage freeze to maintain programs as best they could. In other places that hasn't been possible. Collective agreements or arbitration settlements have imposed wage settlements on us. We have to raise that money somewhere. In many cases we've already laid people off and we've already reduced workforces to the point where services are stretched to the breaking limit.

Mr Carr: I apologize for missing your presentation, although I must confess I was pleased: I took a call from the Premier, who was thanking me for help. It seems that in Oakville we've just got 350 new jobs from an automotive company in the United States—brand-new jobs. I hated to miss it, but I was very pleased with the reason I wasn't here.

Initially, I had planned to come in and slam the government on transfers, but after speaking with the Premier and thanking him for his help, I'll skip this presentation and start with the next people because I don't feel I could do that. I'll save it for next time. I usually do that, but I won't. But I do have a question regarding the municipalities.

The problem we've got is that with the transfers being what they were, so many of the municipalities—I talked to the town of Oakville and the region of Halton. They say that as a result of what's happening, we're negotiating with our employees where wage increases—even if they negotiate, it goes to arbitration and they're going to get above and beyond what you're getting for transfer.

One of the suggestions that has been out there is that the provincial government should introduce legislation not only for municipal employees but for teachers and nurses and so on to cap their wages at the same rate as the transfers. So if you've got 0%, you get 0%; 1% and so on. That would help municipalities because they would then control a big part of their costs.

Would you be in favour of the province introducing legislation? Personally, while I would like to agree with you in thinking that you should get more, looking at the provincial finances, if I was the Treasurer I would do exactly what the province did and limit it, but I would also limit the increase to the employees. Would you be in favour of the province doing that so that the costs you're facing—a big part of that is employees—don't go up and beyond what the provincial transfers are?

Mr Hopcroft: We would welcome provincial government action that had the effect of reducing some of the demands in personnel-related costs. I'm not sure whether you're suggesting wage controls in the strict sense or whether you're suggesting that the existing arbitration process be capped.

We found, generally speaking, that negotiated settlements outside of an arbitration-influenced regime have been fair. Some have been at the rate of transfer, some have been below and some have been slightly in excess of it because of recognition of other competitive factors in the job market.

Our biggest concern has been with what we view as exorbitant awards by arbitrators that bear no recognition of the current economic realities that we're all facing in this province. So if we ask for one action in the area of wage settlements, it would be to do something about the arbitrated settlements that we're facing.

Mr Carr: I think you're right. GO Transit was another example of that the other day. I know our politicians at all levels take a great deal of heat for the tax increases, but when I look at what's going to happen municipally in my area, it's not going to be the politicians who have made the decisions for the tax increases; it will be the arbitrated settlements with the firefighters and so on. I think you're right. The difficult part is that the politicians get blamed for it. So I appreciate that.

Looking at your circumstances right now and knowing the financial situation, and this may be a difficult question because you may only know your own area, what would you say is a result of the transfer payments? Would you be able to give us some indication of what this will mean in terms of the property tax owners in the province now who will have to fund a lot of the programs?

Mr Hopcroft: I think many of us had tried to work up towards our 1993 current budgets in the expectation that there would be a 2% increase, which was announced about a year ago now. We're still going to get that, but we are now concerned about the impact next year, where the indication is that levels of funding are going to be reduced by the $38 million that I referred to earlier.

In terms of my own municipality, and I'd welcome Reeve Mickle or Mayor Mavrinac to jump in with their own experiences, a reduction in our municipality would translate into approximately 1.5% on our mill rate, which is a significant impact when you consider the other pressures we're facing.

The other thing that has a dramatic impact on us, and again the example I referred to earlier, is the elimination of the upfront sewer subsidy. In my municipality, this has a direct impact on our capital budget this year of $3 million that we have to raise elsewhere or reduce expenditures which need to be made if we are to provide opportunities for approvals for housing and other commercial and industrial growth in our community.

Mr Carr: On that same point, what will that mean? The concern I've got is that if it could be passed along to the property taxpayers, that would be fine, but the problem I've got is that I'm running into a lot of people, particularly seniors, who say they will be forced out if they have any more property tax increases. Speaking from a taxpayer's standpoint, because you hear from the taxpayers all the time, is there any room to increase the property taxes in your area to make up the difference or are you going to have to scrape somewhere else?

Mr Hopcroft: I agree with the comment that was made earlier. I think our taxpayers generally are saying, "Look, we are taxed to the hilt now," be it municipal, provincial or federal. Municipal property taxes obviously hit those on lowest incomes the hardest. In our community we have faced situations where seniors have been on the brink of being forced out of their homes because of tax increases. From discussions I've had with Mayor Cooper, I know that's the situation Kingston has been facing. I'm sure the situation with Mayor Mulvale in Oakville would be much the same in terms of her personal experiences. Mayor Mavrinac, do you want to add anything?

Mr Mavrinac: Yes. Any freezing, transfer or downloading by the government would have very critical impacts on northern communities, Kirkland Lake being a prime example. You have to appreciate that there hasn't been an appreciable increase in assessment over the last 25 or 30 years. In some cases, in a lot of the communities the assessment has gone down. So we don't have that cushion.

The other fact is that 65% of our revenue comes from the residential taxpayer. We have twice the average number of senior citizens in Kirkland Lake as the rest of the province does. These are the people who are being hit the hardest. With the savings they have put together over many years, they thought 25 years ago they could live comfortably for ever. It's not happening. They're starting to take mortgages out on their homes to retain them. It's a prized possession. It's the last asset they have that they want to keep. So it is critical.

We don't know where to turn. We had a financial study done, and we've reached the point where we can't borrow any more. We just haven't got the repayment capability. I don't know what's going to happen. We were counting on that 2% for next year. It was bad enough that the unconditional grant was frozen in, what, 1989 and 1990? We didn't get increases those two years.

Mr Hopcroft: It was 1988 and 1989.

Mr Mavrinac: In 1988 and 1989; that had a serious impact on our budgets. So it's not getting any easier.

Mr Johnson: I want to thank the presenters from AMO who are here today. I think the title says it all, really: Partners in Our Fiscal Future. I think that's a pretty complete statement. I just want to say that as recently as the late 1980s, the economy was growing, maybe artificially, but it was growing. Governments, provincial, federal and municipal, had opportunities to tighten their belts and probably didn't when they should have. Because of the very difficult, dramatic economic downturn and the restructuring of the economy now, the need is there and we have to do it. I think that's very clear. So we're proceeding with that.

I know the topic of downloading is one that we speak of from time to time, and certainly the province says that the federal government is downloading on the province, and the municipalities say that the provincial government is downloading on the municipalities.

As I look through your summary of recommendations, I see that you make many recommendations that request funding. As Mr Kwinter said, the taxpayer has been taxed almost to the limit and the taxpayer, whether that individual is paying taxes to the federal government, the provincial government or the municipalities, is one and the same person.

I would just like to know if you have any specific recommendations with regard to how the province should deal with the deficit. Should it allow the deficit to rise or fall? Should taxes be increased or should they be reduced in certain areas, and which ones in particular? More importantly, and I guess this is where it would affect you, how should the province manage its programs, because these are very costly in many instances and maybe reduction in some programs would be advisable.

I know that one we both share and is of great concern certainly is social assistance. It is one that municipalities and the province share and have very similar concerns about, a very important program and one that we know has a lot of merit and is certainly important for those people who receive it, but it is an expensive one none the less.

Mr Hopcroft: You can accuse me of ducking the question if you like, but I'm not going to make a comment on whether the budget deficit should increase or not. If I can re-emphasize the points I made earlier, to the extent that you have to review spending, I believe and AMO believes that the government should honour existing commitments, and to the extent that spending is reviewed, that the last spending to be reduced or eliminated is that spending which is an investment in our future, an investment in our infrastructure, an investment in our people in this province.

Unfortunately, what we fear may happen is that those program reductions that may occur or may be considered by the government will be those that will have a negative impact on our ability, as a province and as local municipalities and local governments and local industries and local citizens, to recover from this recession.

Investments in our sewage treatment plants, investments in our transportation infrastructure—our buses, our roadways, our transportation corridors in this province—are of the utmost importance, and if we neglect those kinds of expenditures, we're neglecting our future. To the extent that the government must reduce expenditures, we would urge you to do that in areas where those sorts of impacts won't arise.

The Chair: Gentlemen, I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee, and a familiar face, Grant, again within just a month I believe.

Mr Hopcroft: Just over a month.

The Chair: We'll pass on your message to the Treasurer of Ontario in our brief. Thank you for appearing.

Mr Hopcroft: Mr Chairman, members of the committee, thank you very much for the opportunity to discuss this with you.

ONTARIO HOSPITAL ASSOCIATION

The Chair: The next group we have is the Ontario Hospital Association. Would they come forward, please?

I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on the pre-budget consultations. We have half an hour. We have until 4 o'clock. In that half-hour, perhaps you can leave some time at the end for the committee members to ask questions on your submission. If you don't mind identifying yourselves for the purposes of Hansard, then you may begin.

Mr Brian McFarlane: My name is Brian McFarlane and I'm here as the chairman of the Ontario Hospital Association.

Mr Dennis Timbrell: My name is Dennis Timbrell. I'm president of the Ontario Hospital Association. Mr McFarlane will present on our behalf at this time.

Mr McFarlane: On behalf of the Ontario Hospital Association, thank you for the opportunity to share information and exchange ideas with you today.

It's no news that health care in Ontario is going through a period of tremendous change. The OHA is concerned with what is at stake: not just hospital beds, but rather medicare itself.

Hospitals have demonstrated their commitment to working together in partnership and collaboration to preserve our health care system. Our written brief goes into more detail on the challenges Ontario hospitals are facing.

No one has to tell this committee that we face difficult and uncertain times. As the Premier, the Treasurer and the Minister of Health have noted, the core economy of our province is restructuring to reflect new world realities.

The new reality for both the public and private sectors involves buzzwords like "competitiveness," "productivity" and "restructuring." The management challenge for all sectors is to create leaner operations. We have to find creative ways to meet new challenges—to do more with less money. I believe hospitals have successfully taken up this challenge. Across the board, there are exciting new initiatives to find better ways of delivering services.

The total volume of patients treated in Ontario's public hospitals has grown 1.2 million since 1987-88. Day surgery is expected to reach 70% of total surgery this year, up from 53% just five years ago. In the same period, inpatient admissions have actually dropped and lengths of stay have declined.

Ontario's hospitals have demonstrated their ability to lead, to innovate and, above all, to change. Hospitals have far exceeded the government's expectations when the planning target of 850 patient-days per 1,000 Ontarians was announced a year ago. The concern is, however, that this success may lead to further unrealistic targets.

In past years, our association has provided the Treasurer annual estimates of the hospital funding requirements. For the coming fiscal year, however, and the one after that, hospital base operating budgets have been flat-lined.

About this time last year, the government announced it would hold increases in hospital transfer payments to 1% for 1992-93. A promise of 2% increases for 1993-94 and 1994-95 was also made. Hospitals felt that at least they could engage in realistic multi-year planning because for the first time we knew the extent of funding increases well in advance. OHA regrets that even this certainty has been shattered. In November, as your committee knows, the Ontario government announced a freeze on hospital base operating budgets until March 1995. For hospitals, operating plans, which for many were almost a year in the making, had to be scrapped, and there is even less funding than had been anticipated.

I must note that the Health minister, Frances Lankin, did go to bat for Ontario hospitals. As a result, the government announced a one-time grant of $149 million for 1993-94. That represents 2% of the total base operating budgets for Ontario hospitals.

OHA is working with the Ministry of Health through the joint policy and planning committee, and consulting with hospitals to identify the best possible use of this limited amount of money, which is seen to us as a new kind of R&D fund, restructuring and downsizing the health care system and the hospital sector in particular.

The freeze on funding will continue to pose a greater challenge to hospitals, but there are other pressures on our vital sector of health care. Those pressures eat into hospital budgets, making them actually shrink. These costs include pay equity, new regulations in occupational health and safety, labour negotiations and collective agreements, and binding arbitration awards.

The purpose of our meeting today and our brief is to offer this committee, and the government of Ontario, reassurances that hospitals have shown and will continue to show leadership in adjusting to change. We also want to highlight the hurdles and the opportunities which we face together as stakeholders in medicare.

Clarification of the government's promise to fund the cost of implementing pay equity is certainly needed. At the best of times, hospitals would be hard pressed to absorb the retroactive cost of pay equity. There are also proposed regulations under the Occupational Health and Safety Act. These will have a one-time cost, we estimate, of $88 million for Ontario hospitals. We simply don't have that kind of money. Health minister Lankin has indicated she is supportive of having the cost funded by government separately from normal budget allocations to hospitals. Our association strongly hopes that these extraordinary costs will be funded by government.

Imposed costs do not go well with capped budgets. That's one reason the new WCB policy for employers involved in training programs is such a hardship. Put in place without any consultation or notification, it imposes a new financial obligation on hospitals in the form of additional WCB assessments.

This decision affects thousands of nursing students and trainees for other health professions. Many hospitals are taking a hard look at whether they can afford to offer training. The dependable supply of a variety of trained professionals for the health system is threatened.

Ontario's hospitals employ 160,000 full-time and part-time workers. Seventy-one cents of every hospital dollar goes to labour costs. Clearly, that is the most significant single budgetary factor for hospitals.

Last November, an arbitration gave people in the Service Employees International Union retroactive across-the-board pay increases. These increases were modest—1% effective October 1991 and 2% effective October 1992. That is consistent with the landmark agreement between the government and the public service. However, hospital budgets are frozen and every 1% increase in wages will cost hospitals about $53 million.

There are arbitration awards pending for both the Ontario Public Service Employees Union and the Canadian Union of Public Employees. What's more, we are about to begin negotiations with the Ontario Nurses' Association and OPSEU for other collective agreements that will be in force during the two-year freeze. Where will this extra money come from to meet these costs? Hospitals do not have the ability to increase revenues.

This question affects the ability of hospitals to make creative, new, innovative plans. That flexibility is crucial to the reform of the health care system. Hospitals must continue to improve the way we do things, but hospitals have already demonstrated their willingness and ability to adapt to change.

One of the most exciting developments in health care involves new commitments to quality. I'm referring to the principles of total quality management or continuous quality improvement. Quality has been applied in other sectors of the economy with a lot of success. We need to invest in total quality management in health care.

We see this as an exciting and necessary development, but we need to continue to implement management information systems. Those will eventually allow us to quantify what we do to manage more effectively. It is difficult to improve what can't be measured, so this is a vital investment.

We are pleased at the recent commitment obtained through the joint policy and planning committee of the ministry and the OHA that the government will make funds available for this purpose. If experience in the business sector is any indicator, these investments represent money planted, not money buried. The investment grows.

So far, hospitals have responded to the challenge with greater partnerships between hospitals and other providers and a shift from inpatient care to outpatient care and ambulatory services. They've done this with minimal disruption of services and minimal disruption to the labour force.

Despite the success of hospitals to date, the government has increasingly presumed that it should try to manage the system, and we need a new understanding. The government is the insurer of services. The government's true role is to decide what services it wants and which it can afford. Hospitals must manage the delivery of many of those services. In other words, government should provide the framework for hospital services. Hospital trustees, managers and employees are the ones who should actually manage the system. Together, we are the best judges of value for money, not government. We should clarify our respective roles. Are decisions to be made locally or at Queen's Park?

In many cases, however, there's no clear definition of what constitutes appropriate care. Certainly, we know there is waste in the system. There's waste in any system. That's why the creation of the Institute for Clinical Evaluative Sciences last year was such a milestone. It will help identify waste in the system. A new working group has just been formed through the leadership of OHA to support the work of the group by ensuring hospital input into this research and the changes that will result.

Hospitals are also responding to social changes. As a result of resolutions passed at our last annual meeting, OHA is developing guidelines to increase openness and accountability in hospital decision-making.

One resolution is particularly important. It calls on hospitals, under the leadership of OHA, to create a vision of their future role within the restructured health care system, embracing a new emphasis on community and home-based care. We are dealing with that challenge enthusiastically through our Hospitals of the Future project.

There is a sense of urgency about this. There is growing concern about Canada's ability to sustain medicare as we know it today. The provinces have always determined what services they would insure within the framework of medicare. This will be more and more important as the federal government changes the way it funds medicare. The province faces a mounting responsibility to define what medicare means in the province of Ontario as a result of Ottawa's shifting priorities.

We must consider affordability. Government, hospitals, health care professionals and consumers, as custodians of medicare, must collaborate in developing a new approach to medicare focused on quality.

We appreciate that the cupboard is bare, at least for the moment. We trust that, if economic conditions improve, the Treasurer will reconsider his flat-line approach to hospital funding. OHA hopes the committee will support, when the time comes, a re-evaluation of the flat-lining of hospital funding.

We'd like to thank you. I hope this presentation has been helpful. Mr Timbrell and I would be delighted to answer any questions you may have.

The Chair: We'll start with a government member, Ms Harrington. Five minutes for each caucus.

Ms Harrington: Thank you very much for your presentation. I note on page 4 you have a word that is emphasized there. It says, "We are the best judges of value for money." I would think the "we" really refers to the citizens of that community who use that health service. Would you agree with me?

Mr McFarlane: Yes. We believe all the stakeholders have that role.

Mr Timbrell: It speaks to the issue of who's managing the system. A couple of days after the announcements in November, the Treasurer was on Mr Fisher's program and made a point of saying what a wonderful job the government had done in the last year to manage the health care system, an attitude to which we take great exception. The government doesn't manage the health care system. The people who are in the hospitals, the public health units and other elements of the system manage the health care system. The government has a responsibility to define what it can or cannot afford.

Ms Harrington: May I continue from there? I think you've made that point fairly clear in your statement here.

The best judges are the people of the community who partake of that service. If people are not happy with some of the conditions they find locally, they direct their concerns sometimes to their provincial member or to the provincial government. They write letters or whatever. I would tell them to go to their local board. Hopefully, that is an open-door process, so they can actually go to a board meeting if they so desire. I believe across the province there is not an open-door policy by some of the hospital boards.

I'd just like to go on to one other question, and you can comment on this as well. It says in here, "Hospital trustees, managers and employees are the ones who should actually manage the system." We heard from ONA this afternoon and they would very much like to be involved in that exact sentence you have written here. They certainly have much expertise. I would like to see what you have written that those employees are very much involved in having a say as to where the cuts are and how it should be managed most efficiently. The representatives of ONA said they could count on their fingers the number of hospital boards across this province where they were actually being involved in an effective way. I'd like to leave that with you and hope that from your point of view of this system you would see what you can do to change that. I would certainly appreciate it.

Mr McFarlane: I'll just make two comments about it. First of all, the OHA is issuing guidelines to the membership in open board meetings, as I mentioned in my remarks, and a number of hospitals do have open board meetings. As to the second point about the staff and nursing involvement, the operating planning guidelines from the Ministry of Health this year really supplemented what a number of hospitals were already doing through their fiscal advisory committees, making those what you might call operating committees, to include not only ONA staff but other union and non-union employees. So I think it is fairly broad-based.

Ms Harrington: But it has to be in a very effective way. They have to get the information ahead of time, and they have to be able to digest it and fully participate in the decision-making process.

Mr McFarlane: We will encourage further involvement, but I think it has been fairly extensive to date.

Mr Timbrell: The OHA is on record, and has been for over a year, as supporting the expansion of fiscal advisory committees to include representatives of all employee groups. The OHA does support the sharing of the same information that goes to the ministry. Having said that, you heard one side. There are a lot of very difficult decisions to be made now and much more difficult decisions to be made in the next couple of years as a result of the flat-lining of funding for hospitals. So it's going to be a test of everybody's commitment to the system when employee and employer reps have to sit down and start talking about which programs have to be cut, scaled back, changed, which staff have to be reassigned, let go, and so forth. It's one thing to say, "We want to be part of the development of the decisions"; it's quite another to participate in decisions that sometimes say some of your members go.

The Chair: Mr Johnson, a short one.

Mr Johnson: On page 1, you mention, "The total volume of patients treated in Ontario's public hospitals has grown by 1.2 million since 1987-88." I was wondering if you had the statistics to elaborate on exactly what percentage that increase is. The volume of patients treated in public hospitals has grown by 1.2 million: I don't know how to compare that. Were there 50 million in 1987-88? Were there 250 million?

Mr Timbrell: I don't recall the exact numbers, but it's roughly reflective of the growth in the population but also with an additional factor in there for the growth in the number of elderly. There is a chart—we didn't include it; we will send it along to the members—two pages of data that compare 1987-88 to 1992-93. As you go through it, you see that there are 5,000 fewer active treatment beds in the province—we've closed the equivalent of five Toronto Generals in the last five years—but the number of people actually treated in hospitals has gone up by 1.2 million cases this year as compared to five years ago. Lengths of stay are down, admission rates are down, the incidence of day surgery is up to 70% from a little over 50%, as Mr McFarlane said.

Mr Johnson: What's 1.2 million as a percentage? Do you happen to know?

Mr Timbrell: I'll get you that number. I don't recall it.

The Chair: Mr Phillips, five minutes.

Mr Phillips: If I can paraphrase what I think I'm hearing from you, the hospitals feel you can live with the money next year. What I'd like from the hospital association is, what is likely to unfold over the next 12 to 24 months as a result of that? My impression right now is that in the last two to three years we have dealt with fewer funds by closing beds. Frankly, from a health point of view, that is probably right in many cases, and probably we have fewer staff right now. But I would like to know from you how many beds we have closed in the province.

By the way, I said to the ONA earlier that I submitted that as an order paper question to the Minister of Health, and the Minister of Health said, "We don't keep those records." So I would like to know from the OHA how many beds have closed over the last two years and what has happened to staff over the last two years, and what you expect over the next couple of years. From the OHA's perspective, is that fine from a health point of view, or are we starting to bump into numbers where we should, as a Legislature, begin to worry? Also, part of that is that I think we're all committed to community-based health care. In the OHA's opinion, are we providing adequate services in the community for you to accomplish the community-based care?

I guess there's three major questions: How have you got to where we are, and what should we expect over the next couple of years? Are there any risks we should be thinking about? Have we got the right community-based care activity?

Mr McFarlane: I'll start, and Dennis is better with the statistics.

Hospitals dug deep into their operations last year in order to balance their budgets for the year ending March 1993. I think it's because of the restructuring the hospitals have done and the good management of the institutions, which is contributed to by the nursing professions and other employees, that we've been able to achieve that and which has helped position us for 1993-94.

As we look to 1994-95 and down the road, the OHA has engaged in a number of regional consultations to determine specifically from individual regions across the province what the impact is likely to be in their regions and their communities with this kind of flat-line budgeting. Dennis has been meeting those regional conferences and I think he can elaborate on that. But we have dug deep into our organizations; we've managed. I'm not clear exactly what the implications are going to be.

Mr Timbrell: The figures we've received from the hospitals suggest that by the end of this current fiscal year, as compared to the 1991-92 fiscal year, it will be a reduction of something approaching 3% of paid hours. The total payroll of Ontario hospitals is approximately $5 billion, so that's close to a $150-million reduction in the hospital payroll in this current fiscal year as compared to last. Most of that has come through changes in shifts, changes in the amount of part-time work, changes in call-back, provisions for evenings and weekends and so forth. Actual layoffs in this current fiscal year have totalled approximately 2,000, of which about 750 are what we refer to as hard layoffs; that is to say, about 1,250 people have been hired back or have moved somewhere else in the province, somewhere else in the system. Hard layoffs are about 750.

Mr Phillips: Is that positions or layoffs?

Mr Timbrell: Those are actual layoffs, 2,000.

Mr Phillips: So how many positions have you eliminated?

Mr Timbrell: Full-time equivalents? If we're looking at 3%, full-time equivalents were somewhere around 3,000 in this last year.

Mr Phillips: And beds?

Mr Timbrell: In the last five years, it's 5,000. In the last two years, it's somewhere around 2,500 to 3,000, if my memory serves me correctly.

Mr Timbrell: Out of the total of about 45,000.

One thing I did want to say in response to your question about community-based: Yes, we're supportive of the full spectrum, and we are highly critical when we come across people in the ministry or elsewhere who think in terms that it's community-based or hospital. You need both.

One concern I want to underscore, and I think it bears some thought on your part, is that hospitals are regulated, inspected, scrutinized to the hilt. We have the Canadian Council on Health Facilities Accreditation reviewing this year something like 90 hospitals in Ontario. Every hospital has accreditation. There are no standards for community-based programs. There are no ways of rationalizing and ensuring that there are not either overlaps or gaps in community-based programs.

Mr Phillips: The nurses made the same point.

Mr Timbrell: If we are to have an effective continuum, then we have to establish the standards for community-based programs, a means of accrediting them, a means of ensuring that they, as much as the institutional sector, eliminate to the extent possible duplication of effort.

Mr Phillips: The 1993-94 number. What should we expect over the next year with the 2% and then the 0% the following year?

Mr Timbrell: I would be reluctant, as I did a year ago, to give a hard number; only to say that hospitals were counting on a 2% overall increase, and we were flat-lined and we've been flat-lined for 1994-95. We know officials of the treasury board wanted to do worse than that, so we're leery about next year. Anecdotally, what we're hearing from the hospitals is that the fine-tuning option has pretty well run its course.

Mr Jim Wilson (Simcoe West): Thank you, Mr Timbrell and Mr McFarlane, for your helpful presentation. Following up on what Mr Phillips was driving at, and I think the nurses made the same point, when it comes to apparent lack of standards for community-based care across the board in the province, do you think the government might have the cart before the horse? In my opinion, your sector has suffered the most in terms of taking the brunt of cutbacks in the Ministry of Health. That's supposed to generate a deinstitutionalization dividend which is to be transferred to community-based care, as the theorists will tell us. In your opinion, though, are we moving fast enough in community-based care to pick up the slack, or are we going to have seniors and the frail elderly on the streets of Ontario with no place to go?

Mr McFarlane: As representatives of the hospital sector, we're interested not just in hospitals but in that whole continuum of care. It's our view that there is a lack of availability of that continuum in the community.

Mr Timbrell: I would add to that and repeat something we've said to the ministry on several occasions: that in the absence of any well-thought-out planning guidelines for the health care system, specifically for the hospital sector of the health care system, the hospital sector is presently in free fall. A year ago, the ministry announced a planning guideline of 850 patient-days per 1,000 population. That target was to be realized by March 31, 1995. We estimate that by March 31, 1993, the acute care portion of the hospital sector will have reduced to 840 patient-days per thousand. That's a measurement of the capacity of the system. We will have exceeded their target two years ahead of time.

When we have asked the ministry if it would provide funding for hospitals or whole regions that are already at or below the standard until the rest of the province comes down to that level, the answer has been a very firm no. It's our belief that in fact the ministry has another target it will soon announce of somewhere around 700 patient-days per 1,000, which, compared to two or three years ago, would represent a one-third reduction in the acute care capacity of the hospital sector. Yes, we are concerned.

Mr Jim Wilson: Do you get a sense that there isn't sufficient coordination or a plan in place by the government or the Ministry of Health in terms of your doing your part to pare down your budgets and meet the new standards that are thrown at you and yet the money doesn't seem to be transferred into community-based care? In fact, the government seems to be obtaining overall savings on the back of hospitals in terms of reducing beds and staff.

Mr Timbrell: The great risk that's been spoken of repeatedly—and this is true as much of education and other public services as it is for health care, but I will speak just for health care—is that when the sole agenda item becomes restraint, that's what leads to conditions like where we are now, where we're in free fall. The one thing from which we take some comfort in the last year is that we have established the joint policy and planning committee with the ministry that puts us in a position to more effectively highlight these concerns or issues and try to be part of turning it around, to give the system some kind of purpose or direction it doesn't have now.

Mr Jim Wilson: As you mention on page 2, you've got binding arbitration awards pending, you've got new collective bargaining agreements to reach with both the nurses and OPSEU, new regulations in occupational health and safety and pay equity. Without putting prejudice to your negotiations, have you got a ballpark figure as to what the overall figure would be in terms of additional fiscal pressures on the hospital sector for this year and what the shortfall might be between those pressures and what the government has committed to date in terms of funding?

Mr McFarlane: Clearly, we are getting a zero-based budget increase, so that's what we know about our income side. On our expense side, we know that each 1% represents some $53 million, so whatever the settlements or awards come in at, for each 1% we have a $53-million cost problem.

The Chair: Time has expired.

Mr Jim Wilson: Mr Carr has a quick question that follows from that.

The Chair: We gave you two minutes over, Mr Wilson. Gentlemen, I'd like to thank you for appearing before the committee. Safe trip home.

ONTARIO FEDERATION OF STUDENTS

The Chair: The next group we're going to hear from is the Ontario Federation of Students, Mr Ken Craft, chairman. I see we have a new member sitting in on our committee right now, Mr Kimble Sutherland. An acquaintance?

Mr Ken Craft: A former colleague from Western.

The Chair: Okay, that's why he's here. He's going to go to the Treasurer himself, I can tell you.

Mr Craft: Hopefully the Minister of Colleges and Universities too.

The Chair: I'd like to welcome you to the committee here. We have until 4:30, and if you can leave some time for questions. As you can see, the members of the committee just love to get questions out there. Okay, you may begin.

Mr Craft: Thank you very much for making time to hear my presentation this afternoon. I'm Ken Craft, chairperson of the Ontario Federation of Students. For those members who aren't aware of the Ontario Federation of Students, it's a referendum-based organization which represents over 200,000 post-secondary education students in the province of Ontario.

This afternoon I essentially want to share with the committee our vision of post-secondary education in the province of Ontario and the advice we believe that the committee should be giving to the Treasurer and the government concerning post-secondary education funding. I was quite pleased to see that the legislative assistant to the Minister of Colleges and Universities is sitting around the table, as I'd like this advice to get back to the minister as quickly as possible.

In January 1992 the Minister of Colleges and Universities and the Premier announced historically the lowest transfer payments to the post-secondary education sector in the province of Ontario: a 1% increase in 1992-93 and a 2% increase for each of the subsequent years.

Since 1977-78 the governments of the province of Ontario have refused to accept the advice of their independent advisory committee, the Ontario Council of University Affairs, on how post-secondary education should be funded. Despite the refusal to deal with that advice, it had never been as low as a 1%, 2% and 2% increase. The lowest it had ever been was 5.1% in 1979-80 and a high of 12.1% in 1982-83.

To say the least, we were shocked, dismayed and a little disgusted when in November the Minister of Colleges and Universities and the Treasurer announced that instead of our historically low 1%, 2% and 2% increase, what we were going to get was 1%, 0% and 1%.

The decisions of this government on post-secondary education in this province, as far as we're concerned, are nothing more than shortsighted and wrongheaded. The only way to get out of the recession in the province of Ontario is going to be to invest in post-secondary education. The current government seems to be accepting the neo-conservative agenda that a reduction or elimination of the deficit is the panacea for all of our economic ills.

This is at the same time that the Premier's Council has told us in 1990 that we're living in a generation of lifelong learning. Let me quote from the Premier's report:

"A critical determinant of whether we can make the transition to a higher value-added economy will be the education skills, ingenuity and adaptability of our workers. They must be prepared for work which will demand the sophisticated knowledge and talents that are the trademarks of a truly developed nation. Our raw materials, our infrastructure and our capital will not be utilized to their fullest without the enhancements that a competent, innovative and adaptable workforce can bring to such advantages."

In the same report it was forecasted that over 70% of jobs created between now and the year 2000 will require 17 years of education. In the province of Ontario, which still has a bit of a grade 13 system, that means that 70% of all jobs would essentially require a post-secondary university degree.

The standing committee on finance and economic affairs echoed this opinion last year. They said to the minister, "We think that you should be investing in post-secondary education." Let me quote from your report from last year: "It is essential that Ontario fund its universities adequately." I'm sure that the committee didn't have in mind "adequately" as being freezing fees. "It cannot afford the economic and social costs associated with an inadequately educated population. Education may be the single most important determinant of economic growth in a developed world."

I'm hoping that the committee will be echoing these remarks this year in suggesting to the minister that, at the very least, the 2% that was promised this year be placed in the base funding and that the 2% that was promised for the third year be placed in. We know that's inadequate, but at least when it was announced last year it gave universities and colleges a chance to do some long-term planning.

Now what universities and colleges are being forced to do is cut more jobs and allow fewer students into the system than what had already been planned. In the college system it's going to lead to severe reductions in teachers. They already signed a contract that essentially calls for a 4.5% increase next year to teachers' salaries based on the 2% funding. With 0% funding, it's inevitably going to lead to cutbacks.

The government has been talking a lot about equity and access to the post-secondary education system. With the 1% addition last year, over 2,000 positions from universities' first-year enrolments had to be cut. Over 20,000 students were turned away from Humber College this year. Obviously, at the moment the government's agenda is not providing access and it's not providing equity to the post-secondary system. This year they've implemented a 7% tuition hike, when all reports show that tuition hikes lead to a decrease in accessibility. Leslie and Brinkman in 1990 did a study that showed that for every $100 increase, with all other things being equal, three quarters of 1% of students will drop out of post-secondary education.

This year, in November, the government announced massive changes to the OSAP system. Instead of going with what the New Democratic Party of the province of Ontario policy is, which is to move towards an all-grant system, the Minister of Colleges and Universities—

Mr Conway: No.

Mr Craft: Pardon me?

Mr Conway: Say that again, just a little more slowly.

The Chair: Gerry's looking for his Agenda for People, or is it worn out?

Mr Phillips: I've got it right here.

The Chair: Okay, carry on. That's an inside joke with Gerry.

Mr Craft: Oh, I'm sure it is.

Instead of moving towards an all-grant system of funding post-secondary education student aid, they moved towards an all-loan system. What they've attempted to do during that is also bring in what's called an income-contingent loan repayment plan. I hope I'm asked questions about that. On the surface, it sounds like a very progressive form of student aid, but it's actually a very regressive form of student aid. Instead of moving towards lifetime learning, which is what the present government tells us it wants to move towards, it's moving towards a form of student aid that's going to guarantee nothing except lifelong debt.

I'm not going to just sit here and essentially say that the villains are the provincial government. Since 1986, the federal government has been freezing the established programs financing transfer escalator, and I think the NDP government would do much better if it was spending its time lobbying the federal government to restore EPF to its former levels rather than entering into negotiations with the federal government to move to a complete income-contingent loan repayment plan.

I think I'll just stop my remarks there. I'm more than happy to answer any questions. I hope my comments were provocative enough to get some discussion.

The Chair: It's either Mr Carr or Mr Sterling. Who's up first to bat?

Mr Sterling: Well, I just wanted to say it's pretty hard for me as a Conservative, after hearing all of this claptrap over the last five elections which I have run in in this province from the NDP candidate about all of these wonderful things that they were going to do for the students, to have this government come in and do such a complete turnabout. I think the students have probably the most reason of all to be cynical about the political process. That's my statement.

There is one part of your brief that I'd like a little bit of expansion on. I have two children who are presently in university and they're not receiving student assistance. I'm assisting them personally. I guess the part I am concerned about is your statement that the government should increase its deficit or it should not be concerned about that, because their colleagues, the young people, are saying to me, "Look, why should we pay for your generation's excessive living into the future?"

I think you should be demanding, quite frankly, that we pay our own way. You're not representing what I'm hearing through my son and my daughter. They are quite angry with politicians and governments that are overspending on this, because they're going to have to pick up the tab. They're going to have to pay for our excesses during this period of time.

Now, when you say the government should go into deficit in order to do this, how do you justify that in terms of the students I'm hearing from who are saying, "I don't want the government to go into deficit because then you're going to have to pick up the tab"?

Mr Craft: The policy of our organization at the moment is that the way to fund post-secondary education is actually through a 3% corporate tax, a more graduated income tax system. In the short term, that's not what's happening at the moment. We're in the middle of a recession. The way to get out of a recession is to spend money. If the government doesn't feel, at the moment, that it can raise that money through tax revenues, I believe it may be more long sighted to go further into debt and invest the money in post-secondary education which would bring us out of the recession and out of the deficit quicker and provide for more employment.

Mr Carr: I have a question along the same lines. I was fortunate—I guess even more fortunate when I look back on it now. I was able to get a scholarship to an American university—not because of grades, but because of hockey. I was very fortunate when you look at the costs. But having spent some time in the United States—and then eventually I guess the Boston Bruins ended up being my organization so I was very fortunate as I look back. Right now in the United States, a bigger portion is loans and, as you saw here today, whether it's NDP, Liberals or Conservatives, there isn't going to be that much more money in the system to allow a reduction in tuition fees. You asked about the student loan. In the States, what happens is that you pay for your education and then pay it back later on.

The alternative is going to be a deterioration in the university system. It would be great to say: "The government's going to pick it up. We pay a higher percentage than the Americans. Why shouldn't we have more of a loan program?"

Mr Craft: Sorry, I didn't catch the last couple of words.

Mr Carr: Why shouldn't we have more of a loan program similar to the United States?

Mr Craft: Why shouldn't we?

Mr Carr: Yes, and why shouldn't it be like a higher percentage of the costs paid back by the students when they become engineers, politicians, premiers, member for Oxford, or whatever?

Mr Craft: I guess there will be a lot to this answer. To begin with, there seems to be an acceptance in this province that there should be a completely publicly funded education system up to the end of secondary education and then not for the post-secondary education system.

At one time in this province we used to pay tuition fees to go to high school, and the reason those fees were eliminated was that, for the majority of jobs in this province, it required a high school education to be a "productive member of society." We have now seen through the Premier's report that, in order to fill most jobs in this province, you're going to require some form of post-secondary education.

Through an educated workforce, both society and corporations benefit from it. That's why we recommended a 3% corporate tax and that we have a progressive tax system so that, let's say I truly do benefit from my education by getting a higher-income job, I would pay back a higher proportion of my income in the society to pay for the essential services such as health and post-secondary education.

What happens with a loan system and with the contingent repayment plan being recommended by Minister Allen is that it's the exact opposite. Let's say that you, Mr Carr, and myself both borrowed $16,000 for our education. I came out making $35,000 a year; you came out making $50,000 a year and let's just assume our incomes stay constant over that time period. The person who makes $35,000 year in income actually ends up paying more money because I'll end up paying back more in accumulated interest.

So the loans systems out there are actually regressive as opposed to being progressive. We recommend a progressive form of taxation in which, if you truly benefit, you pay back more of your debt to society.

Mr Kimble Sutherland (Oxford): It's good to see you here. While your comments seemed a bit critical of this government, you've certainly heard from the Progressive Conservative Party that, if it were the government at this time, things would be significantly different in how it would approach the issue of post-secondary education.

My question to you, though, is that we just had the hospital association and many other groups in here today facing dramatic change in how they deliver public services. I think we all know that change is going on in the private sector. I guess I'd like to know from you and your organization how you see change occurring in the post-secondary education system to meet the realities. Everyone understands that corporate tax is down, personal income tax is down, sales tax has been down over the last few years. The government has made a commitment to maintain public services and is running a significant deficit at this time. Given all those realities, what advice would you give to the government to manage some of the change in the system?

Mr Craft: I'm not going to comment on any system other than the post-secondary sector, Kimble. The only reality I see out there at the moment is a lack of will by the current government to invest in post-secondary education. What I see taking place at the moment on the university restructuring committee that the minister has just launched, which I'm familiar with, is a movement towards gutting the quality of post-secondary education in the province of Ontario. The minister's response in the briefing before the announcement in the House to how we solve the access problem in post-secondary education was to stuff a few more students, like sardines, into already overcrowded classes.

What needs to be done by this government is there needs to be a will to move to a more progressive tax system, a fairer tax system, and to invest the money in post-secondary education, because you're not going to get the sort of educated workforce you need in order to drive the wheels of this economy to get out of the recession without doing that.

Cutbacks are not going to solve the problem. It's just going to mean fewer people going to post-secondary education and the only people getting access to the education being the traditional elite. That's not what I've been hearing from the current government as being what it wants to do, but that's the signal I'm getting from the sort of things the minister has been asking his restructuring committee to look at. I don't see any movement on the access question or on the quality question. I see the exact contrary.

Ms Swarbrick: Mr Craft, I'm one of those people who, like my party, came into government with wonderful plans of what we'd like to do to improve the education system and the situation for students. On the other hand, I'm also somebody who, like my party, came into government not expecting to govern in the worst depression since the 1930s. I end up wincing of course when you call us, and therefore me, neo-conservative, because I don't feel very comfortable with that at all. I think in fact the reality shows that we're ending up being a government that unfortunately is very much having to work on very high levels of deficit financing.

I'd like to just put a context on my question to you, pointing out that the reality we're dealing with is one where government revenues fell very dramatically in 1991-92 by $3 billion. This year it looks like they've fallen by over $500 million again and then for 1993-94 we're looking at another $4.2 billion gone before we get a chance to deal with it, not to mention what the federal government is taking out in billions of dollars.

To me, what we've done with the situation, at least, for instance, in terms of tuitions and the loans and grants situation for students, is the same kind of thing we've been trying to do in a number of other areas, which is to look at the reality of what unfortunately we're having to deal with and how can we make the dollars stretch as far as possible and therefore, in terms of the situation for the loans and grants, to say, "Okay, we're going to take what last year was $630 million that went to help students through financial assistance in attending schools and stretch that an extra 20% to get it up to $800 million." We can do that and be able to get away with it, if in fact we make the system one more of loans.

You've referred to how now the system will leave people with a lifelong debt situation. I'd really argue with that, because what we've done is, I think, a creative switch-around. Although people won't get grants up front without getting a loan, there clearly is a cap. You can't go in debt by more than $5,570 per year on a loan. After that, you do get grants. After that, for instance, if you've got a single parent with two children and they end up needing $17,510 in a year, they will not go in debt by this government by more than that $5,570; the rest is purely grant.

So I guess I'd like to put to you the question of, don't you really in your heart of hearts think that in fact this government is treating students far differently than either of the other parties would and that in fact it's not too unrealistic, given the situation, and certainly not warranting of being called neo-conservative?

I'm sorry. I guess the one last point I wanted to throw in there is that this is one of the—

The Chair: Is this a question?

Ms Swarbrick: Yes. Just within that is one of the very sobering things to me in changing my mind from the kind of position that you're taking, that when you are in a deficit financing situation, you end up that with every dollar in revenue we're taking in right now, even keeping the deficit to where it is now in spite of the threats that I mentioned, 12 cents of every one of those dollars has to go to pay for nothing but servicing the debt. It means that we're crippling ourselves from being able to pay for the services. I guess when I look at what that would be, if we let the debt go higher, it means we end up losing that money that we need for those services.

The Chair: Anne, come on.

Ms Swarbrick: Yes, sorry.

Mr Craft: As I understand your question, it was, do I not believe in my heart of hearts that this government is operating different than the other two if they were in government? The other two aren't in government. It's completely hypothetical. I can only speak about how this government has been operating.

Whether or not I think the moniker "neo-conservative" actually fits in there, I think that in the 1980s and 1990s there has been a neo-conservative agenda in North America that essentially says you must reduce and not borrow money, and I believe personally that's the way the government's behaving.

Ms Swarbrick: Would you say we're not borrowing money?

Mr Craft: If you want me to deal with the substance that was in there, not exactly the question, the part about the $5,570 and the lifelong debt, the lifelong debt part, I was referring to the income-contingent repayment plan process that the minister has not announced the details for yet. I was making some assumptions over what possibly will be. The minister has looked at a number of models. They are all regressive and they all require borrowing money, paying off money for 15 to 20 years.

If the current debt load is $5,570 per year, if one had to borrow that amount of money over a four-year degree, essentially an undergraduate degree, that would be over $20,000. If somebody had to borrow it throughout doing a PhD—the average time to completion to do a PhD from start to finish in the social sciences or humanities in this province is about 10 years—you're talking about a debt of $55,000 just for your post-secondary education. I think that's outrageous.

Ms Swarbrick: What difference does it make to earning capacity?

The Chair: I'm sorry. I'll go on to Mr Kwinter, and since we don't have television in here, Mr Phillips is holding up the Agenda for People.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Craft, if I could just lay the groundwork for the question I want to ask you, when the Treasurer of Ontario brought out his very first budget, he sort of touted the fact that he was doing something unique in that he was projecting what the cash requirements are going to be for the term of their mandate.

It showed fairly substantial deficits right through till 1995, somewhere in the neighbourhood of $7 billion to $8 billion even in 1995. On the basis of that, he felt that he was going to fight the recession not on the backs of the workers but that he would do it by running up greater deficits.

The Treasurer has admitted and even now members of the government side have said no one anticipated how bad the situation was going to be, which means that in fact those projections were quite modest compared to what is actually going to happen. What we have found—and there was a story about it; my colleague brought attention to it, as did our leader—is that this government has been offloading a lot of the things by user-pay.

They've been increasing fees all around, throughout the government and throughout the services that they provide to the citizens of Ontario. We've seen it in the educational field where tuition fees for post-secondary education have gone up 7%. They've virtually eliminated the grant program.

My question to you is this. This is a government that historically has promised that if it came to power, not only would it not increase education but it would eliminate the cost for education for university students. They've now made the decision where they've increased it and once they look at their problems, the chances are that they're going to increase it even more, because once you get on that slippery slope, it's very easy to say, "7% this year, 10% next year, and let's keep cutting back."

What is your reaction from the students out there and what do you feel the practical—I know the theoretical—result of that is going to be for the post-secondary student body of Ontario?

Mr Craft: Of tuition increases?

Mr Kwinter: Further tuition increases and greater constraints on the availability of funding for post-secondary education.

Mr Craft: We've already seen some of the practical aspects of it. Two thousand positions in first-year university were cut in this province this year. Twenty thousand students were turned away from Humber College. You had a 20% student unemployment rate this summer at the same time the students were expected to save more money in calculating their OSAP entitlements. You're going to see students unable to go to post-secondary education.

Fewer will go and those who are there will end up dropping out. We are already seeing more and more food banks springing up on our campuses. It's essentially going to lead to a point where only the wealthy in this province will have access to the post-secondary education system. That is what the reality of tuition increases and low funding will be.

To be fair to the current government, since 1978-79, every year whoever has been in power has increased tuition fees. There hasn't been movement by any party in this province to eliminate user fees for post-secondary education nor has there been a movement at the federal level. The federal government is a signatory to a 1976 United Nations convention to remove all impediments to post-secondary education including tuition fees. Instead, they're moving in exactly the opposite direction by freezing the escalator on EPF and not providing the provinces with the money they need in order for them to freeze tuition fees. I'm not going to blame it completely on any provincial government. The federal government has had its part in this too.

The Chair: It being 4:30, I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee. Safe travel home.

ONTARIO SCHOOL TRUSTEES' COUNCIL

The Chair: The next group we've got is the Ontario School Trustees' Council. Would you come forward, please. Do you have some other colleagues there? There are enough chairs there if you have someone else. Don't be shy. We're recording all this. Would you mind identifying yourselves for the purpose of Hansard? We have until 5 o'clock. Could you leave some time after your brief for questions from the committee.

Mrs Betty Moseley-Williams: My name is Betty Moseley-Williams. I'm the president of the Ontario School Trustees' Council and I'm the trustee in Nipissing. Patrick Meany is with me. He is a delegate or a member of the Ontario School Trustees' Council and he is a trustee with the Dufferin-Peel Roman Catholic Separate School Board.

The Ontario School Trustees' Council is an umbrella organization of school boards and their trustees which was established in 1953 by an act of the Ontario Legislature. Currently, the OSTC is composed of the French-language trustees and the Ontario Separate School Trustees' Association, which together represent more than 600,000 elementary and secondary school students within the province of Ontario. Almost 100,000 of these young people are French-language students.

The brief was prepared in two languages because we expected to have Lorraine Gandolfo speak for the French-language trustees. Lorraine was ill and unable to come.

We appreciate the invitation to appear before the committee at its annual pre-budget consultation hearings to bring recommendations on economic and fiscal policies and priorities. While we recognize that the amount of additional funding for education is not subject to negotiation, we would strongly recommend that steps be taken immediately to address the major areas of inequity within the present education funding model.

The Ontario School Trustees' Council appreciates that there are two major roles for the provincial government with respect to elementary and secondary education. First, the provincial government must ensure that there are the necessary mandatory programs provided by local education authorities which meet provincially established standards and guidelines to ensure an appropriate educational experience for every student in Ontario.

Second, the provincial government must ensure equity of educational opportunity, that every school board has an equal financial ability to adequately fund these mandated programs to meet provincial standards so that all students are provided with equivalent services regardless of their language, race, religion, socioeconomic situation, geographic location or type of school board.

For the Franco-Ontarian community, equity is incomplete without its constitutional right to governance, which includes services equivalent to those offered the majority-language students and the appropriate financing to provide it.

Unfortunately, the provincial government is not fulfilling its second major role: the assurance of equity. This is apparent in the great differences in per-pupil spending by similar school boards in different geographic areas and by coterminous school boards in the same geographic area.

For example, in 1990 the Ottawa Board of Education, which is a public school board, was able to spend $8,784 per secondary school pupil, while the Bruce County Board of Education, which is also a public school board, was only able to spend $5,970 per secondary school pupil. Similar differences are found at the elementary school level.

The reason for this disparity is the differences in total per-pupil equalized assessment between the two public school boards, especially with respect to their commercial and industrial assessments. For instance, while the Ottawa Board of Education enjoys $191,881 of commercial-industrial assessment per pupil, the Bruce County Board of Education has only $18,987 of commercial-industrial assessment per pupil, less than one tenth as much. This is common across the province, and as the share of education costs falls, it is a situation which is becoming increasingly unfair.

Correspondingly, within the same geographic area, two boards can exhibit a similar divergence in spending. In Metropolitan Toronto, the public school board in 1990 was able to spend $7,986 per secondary school pupil, while the coterminous separate school board was able to afford a per-pupil expenditure of $5,947. At the elementary school level, the figures were $6,108 and $4,628 respectively.

Again, this immense disparity arose mainly from the great difference in commercial and industrial assessments of the two boards. The public school board enjoys $238,269 of equalized commercial-industrial assessment per pupil, while the separate school board has only $37,041 per pupil, less than one seventh as much as its coterminous board.

It is to be noted that some boards have to educate one third of the total student population on one seventh of the corporate-commercial assessment base. Since it is not politically feasible for coterminous boards to have significantly different mill rates, the separate school board is literally forced to spend less on its students. This is a recurring pattern across the province of Ontario and one that is contrary to the principle of educational equity.

These problems will not be solved by the provincial government increasing the total amount spent on elementary and secondary education by local or provincial taxpayers. However, they can be rectified if the provincial government ensures a more equitable distribution of tax revenues to school boards across the province. Since the major problems tend to arise from the imbalance in access to commercial and industrial assessment, the only practical solution is to redistribute the tax revenue generated by this commercial and industrial assessment.

While regional pooling of commercial and industrial assessments would resolve most of the disparities between coterminous boards, only a system of provincial pooling would address both of the problems identified above. Thus, the Ontario School Trustees' Council makes the following recommendation:

Recommendation 1: that the Ontario government establish a province-wide mill rate for commercial and industrial assessment for educational purposes; that the resulting commercial and industrial tax revenue be pooled; and that realistic grant ceilings, the levels of expenditure approved for provincial support, be established and supported by the pooled funds, provincial grants and residential tax revenues.

Mr Patrick Meany: I'll be continuing from here. Had Lorraine Gandolfo been able to come, parts of this brief would have been in the French language, but my accent is not the best, and in any case, Betty says she has trouble enough with one of my accents, so I'll continue in English.

A fairer tax system: Currently, more than 60% of the total per-pupil expenditures for elementary and secondary education in the province of Ontario is funded by local property taxes. While commitments have been made to reduce the percentage of education costs borne by the local property tax base by increasing the provincial contributions, the increase in provincial grants has not been sufficient to compensate for an average 2% increase in enrolments along with increased costs of employee-related benefits and equity plans, without even considering the additional costs of new provincially mandated programs.

The Ontario School Trustees' Council recognizes that in these recessionary times it is difficult to find the necessary funds to honour such a commitment. However, recent economic indicators have signalled a beginning of slow growth and a climb out of the recession. With an improved economy and increased tax revenues, it will be possible for the provincial government to return to funding a greater share of educational expenditures at the elementary and secondary school levels. Therefore, the Ontario School Trustees' Council makes the following recommendation:

Recommendation 2: That the provincial government increase its share of education funding as its revenues increase in order to reduce pressure on the local property tax base.

Another inequity arises from the finding that there is no consistent relationship between the property taxes paid and ability to pay. In some areas in 1990, residential taxpayers paid out less than one seventh of one per cent of their household income for school taxes, while in other areas residential taxpayers paid out more than 1.5% of their household income for school taxes. In 1990, the average across the province was

1%. There's certainly a need for the introduction of a factor applied to residential assessment to recognize the ability to pay of the households being taxed. Thus the Ontario School Trustees' Council makes the following recommendation:

Recommendation 3: That the average household income for residential taxpayers be factored into an equalization formula for educational grant purposes.

Rebuilding our schools: The Ontario School Trustees' Council has been appreciative of the provincial government's five-year commitment to a $300-million-per-year capital grant program. School boards have used the limited funds in the best possible way so that students can have access to healthy learning environments.

However, we have not been able to make significant inroads into renovating and replacing an aging infrastructure, much of which was built of inferior materials during the Second World War, or those buildings constructed to house the baby boom which occurred about 40 years ago, let alone address the replacement needs of schools built more than 50 years ago. Recognizing that the construction of public facilities has a very positive impact on economic growth, the Ontario School Trustees' Council makes the following recommendation:

Recommendation 4: That the provincial government continue its multi-year commitment of $300 million per year in capital funding for school boards for new pupil places and school renovations, and that additional funds for school replacements be allocated from the provincial capital works programs as such programs are developed.

Mrs Moseley-Williams: The Ontario School Trustees' Council is very aware of the fiscal difficulties facing the provincial government, and thus has suggested methods of addressing significant inequities in the area of educational finance which recognize the limited resources available. However, the move to equity of educational opportunity for the students of this province will not require the expenditure of additional provincial funds, but could significantly decrease the pressure on the provincial purse by removing most of the financial inequities among school boards.

For the Franco-Ontarian community, equity of educational opportunity for francophone students can only be achieved through complete governance.

We would challenge this committee to make the case for equity on behalf of the elementary and secondary school students of the province of Ontario. In this regard, the Ontario School Trustees' Council offers its full cooperation and its entire support.

We would be pleased to discuss our recommendations, which are listed in the back, and we distributed to you the figures we were using, which are from the report of the Fair Tax Commission from December. I think each of the members received a copy of those also.

The Chair: Mr Phillips to start it off.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the brief. The issue of capital: I'm sceptical, or cynical perhaps, about some of the government's plans for setting up capital corporations. I have my own view of them, but be that as it may, one of the things that I think the government's planning to do is a fairly different approach to capital expenditures for schools. I think they've asked for feedback from the school boards on that.

I'm not exactly sure how it's planned to work, but I gather the plan would be to allow a school board to build a school they authorize, but the board would be allowed to issue a debenture and the province would then reimburse the board on an annual basis for the debenture costs it would have paid for. So it may be a way of getting debt on your books and off the provincial books. Has the school trustees' group looked at that and have you a view on whether you support the idea of the capital funding that way or not?

Mrs Moseley-Williams: Because we represent boards that are very diverse, some of the boards that can afford to do the debenturing favour that method of funding, but we couldn't put in a solid position because the boards are split in the province. I think I speak for most of the trustees' associations. There is not an agreement that this method would work, and for my own board, I know it said no and it was just very clear. They did not think that would work for us.

Mr Phillips: I would appreciate, for the committee, some of the responses you may have provided on that, because I think this is going to be a huge issue in this upcoming budget, the way capital is funded.

Mr Meany: If I may, I've noticed varying degrees of nervousness among individual trustees based on a fear that they might get tied into something and then left with it at a later period.

In my own board, as distinct from Betty's, there was much of that kind of question, but I think the ending consensus in the discussion was that we have the kids pouring in; we don't have the schools; we will take whatever comes and deal with it the best we can. We must get the kids into buildings.

Mr Phillips: As I say, it would be useful for the committee if the association might forward its comments.

The Chair: If you wouldn't mind forwarding them to the clerk, we can distribute them to all the members.

Mr Phillips: I think it will be one of the big issues we'll want to debate here at the committee, these capital corporations.

Mr Meany: If I might add a word on that, from our own board the thought was that anything like this perhaps might come in legislation; that is, the guarantee of payment reimbursement. As you said, Mr Phillips, it would be legislative rather than regulatory, so it would be built in. There will be no fear that, say, changes in minister or whatever could result in an adjustment, leaving it back on a board which was unable to pay.

Mr Phillips: Yes. All those are useful comments, I think, for our committee.

The Chair: You have a bit more time, Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: That was my major question. The rest of the brief I think is—

Mrs Moseley-Williams: We will send them.

Mr Phillips: Thank you.

The Chair: If you think of some more, I'll come back to you.

Mr Carr: Thank you very much for your presentation. One of the questions I had was regarding the funding issue. I mentioned this morning, with the trustees who were in, that the problem we've got is that looking down at—I used

Halton's public board as an example, because we got the figures today where the teachers got a 2% increase and the year they got that, when it was negotiated, they thought they were going to have an equivalent increase from the government and they now get zero.

The problem is that in the Halton area now the school boards are having an open budget process and they're getting a tremendous amount of heat from people, because people know where most of their property tax dollars are going and I think that's something new.

Could you tell me what your perception is from the public regarding the cost on the property taxpayers? What are they saying to the trustees of this province about what's happening to them as taxpayers from a property standpoint?

Mrs Moseley-Williams: I suspect the answer is the same throughout the province, but in some areas it's very specific that an increase in the local tax rate will not be tolerated. I think boards are committed to keep the tax rate as close to the last year's level as they can. However, realistically there are costs that—some of them are contract demands and some of them are just the costs that you can't control. But I think the general feeling that is coming to boards in the province is that they are to hold the line on their property tax. People feel they cannot afford to pay any more. Many of us are in areas, and I know some of you are, where the unemployment—you know you cannot ask for more tax money.

Boards have looked at their staffing. They have redistributed to try and get a better use for their dollar, but this year's budgeting process, be it open or closed—and I think most boards are involving their community and their staff—is a tough process.

Mr Carr: One of the problems is that with a 0% increase—we talked today about what percentage is employee salary. I think the mistake I made in speaking with the teachers is that the overall total board salary is 80%. Not all are teachers, and they were arguing that bigger and bigger percentages are not teachers, but the fact remains, using the Halton board, that 80% of the costs are salaries. The problem is that arbitrators are giving them increases and you're getting zero from the province.

One of the things that has been suggested is that the province can step in, whether it be municipal workers, teachers or any of the employees, and say, "I'm sorry, with the tough economic times, we couldn't give the school boards, the municipalities or the universities as much as we wanted, but we are going to introduce legislation that is now going to tie your salaries to the transfer percentage," which would be zero.

That would take the onus off school boards, because the provincial government would do it. I know politically it's very difficult to do, because when you do that every teacher in the province says, "Cut somebody else but not me," and the same with municipal workers. Are you in favour of the province doing that so that for the costs that do go up, and if the property tax owners do come to you, it will be in effect you that has increased the costs rather than the province? Would you like to see the province do that?

Mrs Moseley-Williams: To go to a wage control?

Mr Carr: So they cap it. Since they're giving you zero, they would cap it at zero for teachers and employees and staff.

Mrs Moseley-Williams: I think we're going to give our opinions from our areas, because it's not a provincial statement. At the conferences where salaries have been discussed, certainly the reference is generally made to when the Anti-Inflation Board was in place. I'm not going to say it's easier, because all it does is change the directions negotiations go: If you're not talking money, you're talking everything. It still is complex, but I would support it until the time this recession turns.

Mr Carr: A lot of trustees will tell me that privately; I'll let you answer too. For example, my board won't come out and say that. They say, "We really don't want to antagonize the provincial government, because we need capital funding." Individually they say that's great, that that's what should be done, but nobody comes out with a clear statement. It's almost as if they're afraid of saying that to the provincial government or to upset the teachers. You basically just told me you had to tell me individually, because I gather you can't get a consensus from your organization. I'm just wondering why people are fearful of saying this. Is it that they fear it will ruin their relationship with teachers? Or why the reluctance on the part of trustees and so on not to come forward with this idea?

Mr Meany: It is seen as interfering with a system of negotiation put together with great difficulty; of course, those with interest in maintaining the present system would say that with more fervour. I think we would all agree that Bill 100, as it is called, has been of great benefit. Mind you, we've lived with it mostly in good times. I do think there's some looking at that bill within the ministry at least, but it's very difficult, because you have differing interests.

I would agree with Betty, again speaking for myself, that some short-term control on the public service is feasible. Introducing cost controls in the form of wage control across the economy I think is a dangerous and difficult thing, and it leads to under-the-table payments and various ways of getting around it in the private sector. But if it's among those who are paid by government funds, it's easier to control but politically difficult. On that last point, however, I think we may have reached a stage where the majority of the population would agree that public servants ought to come under constraints such as the majority have been forced to bear under supply and demand and the unbridled effects of a bad economy. If you happen to be a public servant, there's protection that ordinary people don't have, so they are looking askance at even small raises given to public servants. I'm not sure if I've answered everything.

Ms Harrington: I think you've made some very clear points here, even dramatic points, about the problem of inequality in funding and the whole question of funding. As you were saying, the Fair Tax Commission is looking at it, and I gather that you agree with some of the things it has come out with.

Regarding the other organizations that are also involved in changing the structure of the funding of education, have you reached some kind of agreement with the recommendations you propose here, for instance, the first recommendation to pool the commercial and industrial tax revenue and these types of things? Is there broad agreement to the direction you are taking here?

As you've already said, this is politically difficult, and it's much easier to make any real substantial change in anything in this province if there is a broad consensus and if people out there in the public understand why it's being done and that it will be of benefit to them. I agree with your point that the municipal tax base on your property assessment is certainly not a fair way to go. This party, as Mr Phillips will tell you, historically has said that many times: that education should be much more evenly and equitably paid for. Can you answer some of my questions?

Mrs Moseley-Williams: First, you asked if we agreed with the Fair Tax Commission report. We took the figures for our brief because they very clearly demonstrate inequities that are there. There are inequities between all parts within the whole province. It doesn't matter which school system you're talking about, be it public or separate or within the French-language schools. I'm not saying we have looked at the Fair Tax Commission report and agreed with it. We took the figures because those are the figures that we have stated are there, and now they have affirmed that.

Whether all the associations of trustees and all the education associations would agree with what we are saying with respect to commercial and industrial tax revenue, I don't think you're going to have a common agreement across the province. If you were in a situation where you had the availability of $2,000 or $3,000 per pupil, "We'll find equity in a different way," might be what somebody would say. What we're saying is that there isn't another way.

You have small boards outside of these large areas of the province—I told Patrick today that one of the differences was that up north we have snowplows when this kind of day happens. Anyway, what you have are schools—you just know that two boards came together because they were going bankrupt. That's a terrible statement. That's not equity for anybody. You have school boards where children do not have full sets of textbooks because they don't have the money, yet you have others where they have not only lovely libraries but full centres of everything. So they won't agree. There's not going to be total agreement on that, no.

Ms Harrington: My point is that your solutions sound good, but there's no way we can implement them unless we form alliances, work together, build together and other people come to these conclusions as well. I'm asking, how close are we to that? Are you working together?

Mrs Moseley-Williams: I'm going to answer part of that and then Patrick. In the Fair Tax Commission report, as you know, there is a minority report in from part of that committee that said the matter of equity is not coming out of it. I don't know how you're going to form those alliances, if you're speaking about you as the government. Our challenge is that you have to find a way to do it, because it's not good to say, "If you can't form an alliance, we can't have this kind of equity." To us, equity should be for the students and the taxpayers and it shouldn't be for the rest of us to be comfortable with it.

Mr Meany: Really an expansion of the same thing: In all cases of institutionalized inequality, it's unreasonable to expect that those who benefit are going to agree. If one went to a grandee of France in 1785 and said, "We'd like you to redistribute some of your revenues," you would get unwillingness, but come back five or six years later and the situation would have softened a little. I'm giving an extreme case. In fairness, to my personal knowledge there are those among those who benefit who recognize the situation. The bottom line is that whether students are from east or west of Ontario, north or south, French-speaking or English-speaking, there should be equality between these students. There is recognition among some people on the other side of that spectrum, but on the whole, it's not reasonable to expect that people will agree to take away a piece of their land and divide it up among the others.

The Chair: Mr Phillips, do you have a short one? We have about one minute left.

Mr Phillips: You have given us four recommendations. One is to take the existing property tax that's raised and redistribute it around the province. The second one is to have other revenue sources pick up an increasing share of education costs, and property tax would decrease, I'm sure. Right? Take the property tax share down and find other revenue. Do you have any suggestions for us on where that increased revenue might come from?

Mr Meany: I think Betty's probably going to say. We do build it in here, recognizing that we're in bad times now, but we already know our foot is on the ladder on the way out and now would be the time to start working on it.

Mr Phillips: Not much change now, but a plan to do it over time, is that it?

Mr Meany: To be realistic.

Mrs Moseley-Williams: When you're asking for a dramatic change in anything, there is some sense of realism; you know it's not going to happen. But for where I live in the province, we feel that when the government subsidizes any kind of corporation or commercial entity or direction, it probably affects every taxpayer in Ontario, so we feel that the positive effect should be felt by every taxpayer in Ontario. It takes a hard look at it to say that we're going to say that a kid in Kapuskasing has the same rights and privileges and right to equity as a child in Metropolitan Toronto, the Ottawa boards or London, and it doesn't happen. We're asking you to address that.

The Chair: I'd like to make a comment. We have Earle McCabe from the Ontario Separate School Trustees' Association sitting in the audience; I just want to recognize him. I was a little leery because Mary Hendriks from down in my area usually comes before this committee. I just checked, and you were taking your turn this year and that's why Mary's not here. I just wanted to check. I said, "We forgot somebody."

Ms Harrington: You just wanted to get her name on the record.

The Chair: It's a pleasure to have you here today. Have a safe trip home.

Mrs Moseley-Williams: Thank you very much for having us.

The Chair: To the committee, we'll adjourn until 9:30 am tomorrow, when the first group we'll have up is the Federation of Women Teachers' Associations of Ontario. See you then. This committee is adjourned until 9:30.

The committee adjourned at 1706.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Monday 11 January 1993

The committee met in closed session in room 151.

WORKERS' COMPENSATION BOARD

The Vice-Chair (Mr Joseph Cordiano): Ladies and gentlemen, I'd like to call the meeting of the public accounts committee to order. We have before us representatives from the Workers' Compensation Board to help us with our discussions today. I would like to welcome you all to our committee and I ask that each of you identify yourselves for the record.

Mr Brian King: My name is Brian King. I am vice-chair of administration of the Workers' Compensation Board. With me is Linda Angove, secretary to the board and the project manager for the facility strategy; Glenn Cooper, the chief financial officer of the Ontario Workers' Compensation Board; and Vivian Varnam, the project controller of the facility strategy.

The Vice-Chair: Welcome. I think it's best if we proceed with any briefing material you may have for us and then allow a period of time for questions after that briefing session. If you'd like to start, I give you the floor.

Mr King: Ms Angove has a brief presentation on the background to the facility strategy.

Ms Linda Angove: This afternoon we'd like to talk about some of the key issues that have been of interest to various groups regarding the head office relocation for Workers' Compensation. Specifically, we're going to deal with our rationale for relocation from 2 Bloor Street East.

Mr Noel Duignan (Halton North): Point of order: Sorry to interrupt; I just can't see the screen because the projector is right in the middle.

The Vice-Chair: Is there any way that we can amplify visibility here?

Ms Angove: I have copies of the overheads. I have additional copies now, if you'd like.

The Vice-Chair: Yes, would you please circulate those, Tannis? Just hand those around.

Ms Angove: We're going to talk about the process for the various aspects of the project to obtain approval from our board of directors: why no existing facility can accommodate the Workers' Compensation Board, the cost implications of this transaction for both the tenant and the investment fund, the benefits of a design-build facility, the service delivery impacts and the potential for efficiency gains. In addition, of course, we'll answer any questions you may have regarding the project throughout.

In early 1990 we took a look at some of the problems we were experiencing at 2 Bloor Street East, because we recognized the fact that our lease there was coming due in mid-1990 and we appreciated the fact that if we were going to relocate, it would take some time to plan that relocation, particularly if it involved a relocation to a facility that required a design-build approach.

Some of the factors that contributed to the decision to relocate included the identification of a number of deficiencies, and some of the key deficiencies are listed here for you. They include inadequate elevator capacity that results in very expensive delays for us; inadequate cabling systems, resulting in excessive downtime for our workstation technological equipment and unnecessary cost with internal staff moves with the relocation of these workstations; inadequate floor-plate size, preventing work groups that need to work together from locating on the same floor; inefficient mechanical and electrical systems; lack of emergency power and, actually, the inability of that building to accommodate emergency power, which results in the loss of data and expensive downtime with power interruptions; inappropriate lighting system, which contributes to a high incidence of headaches and eyestrain for our VDT users; and inadequate shipping and receiving facilities.

Mr David Tilson (Dufferin-Peel): Excuse me, Mr Chairman. Speaking of inappropriate lighting, now that we have this material before us, I wonder if we could have the lights back on.

The Vice-Chair: I'll refer that difficult question to the clerk.

Mr Tilson: There we are. Thank you.

Ms Angove: In addition to those deficiencies, we have major problems in accessibility for people with disabilities that include inadequate proximity to parking for mobility-impaired clients that requires them to walk quite a lengthy distance from the closest parking spot to the WCB premises and unacceptable access for persons with disabilities, particularly people who use wheelchairs. Today, someone who parks at 2 Bloor Street East or in the closest parking-lot to 2 Bloor, which is the hotel next door or the Hudson's Bay, is required to take three elevators, one of which is the freight elevator, and he or she must go through the garbage area to get to our premises. We feel that is unacceptable.

With that, we presented to the board of directors in July 1990 a presentation that recommended that we relocate the WCB head office, and it authorized us to conduct an investigation of alternative sites. In the fall of 1990 we tendered and we advertised in the Globe and Mail and the Financial Post. We received 75 inquiries from interested parties and 34 submissions for both existing and new facilities.

Those submissions were subsequently evaluated through extensive criteria for the user, the tenant and the investment sides of the transaction, and we shortlisted down to 13 sites, of which nine were design-build and four were existing facilities. We then went to the board of directors in December 1990 with a short list of four. All of those included design-build options, because we determined that no existing facility can accommodate our requirements. I'll speak about that in a little more detail later.

In February 1991 the board of directors authorized the administration to negotiate an agreement with the proponents of Simcoe Place. Simcoe Place was determined to be the most appropriate site to meet all of our technical requirements, all of our user requirements, our investment criteria, and it was the most advanced project submitted in terms of municipal approvals.

In April 1991 the board ratified the lease letter agreement and authorized the administration to negotiate all related documentation related to that agreement. In April 1992 the board of directors authorized the WCB administrators to execute the documentation to finalize the transaction with the proponents of Simcoe Place.

I want to talk a little bit about why existing facilities cannot accommodate the WCB. You will note that many of them are the same reasons why 2 Bloor Street East cannot accommodate WCB. Specifically, existing facilities are not designed to accommodate a high-density user of space like the WCB; they're designed for speculative office tenants who use much more space than we do per person. We basically put twice as many people on a floor as a typical office tenant. So consequently, as a result, existing facilities do not have sufficient elevator capacity to accommodate not only our staff but over 100,000 visitors to WCB's offices every year. In fact, in 1991 we had 153,000 injured workers visit our premises, and that contributes to tremendous delays for us.

There are inadequate cabling systems in typical office buildings to accommodate our technical requirements. We have the largest imaging installation in North America. As a result, it puts a tremendous strain on the cabling system in any facility, and typical office buildings are just not designed to accommodate that.

Mr Gregory S. Sorbara (York Centre): I'm sorry, what did you say? The largest what?

Ms Angove: Imaging. Much of our claims adjudication work is now done through imaging, so we don't use a paper file. All of the information is on the technological system, on the screen, basically. So when that screen goes down, it means the adjudicators cannot perform their jobs. Delays of any kind are very costly to us, not only financially but in terms of service delivery impacts.

The other problems with existing office facilities is that they have inadequate mechanical and electrical systems. Again, related to the number of staff and the kind of technology we use at WCB, they have inadequate structural loading. Because of the types of functions we have on certain floors, we have to add structural loading. For instance, our mass mailing area requires extra loading on the floor.

The other big problem with existing facilities is that they lack sufficient contiguous space for the operations, so that staff cannot work in close proximity. You will have heard that there are over 20 million square feet of vacant office space in downtown Toronto today and why can't WCB utilize that space. It's quite simple: There is no contiguous space that can accommodate the WCB's requirement.

Today, one would be lucky to find 100,000 square feet of contiguous space. We're looking for 500,000 square feet of contiguous space, and it's simply not available. The space you hear about today is quite suitable for a small tenant—20,000, 30,000, 40,000 square feet—but you need to appreciate that it's spread all over the place; it is not contiguous. As soon as we lose contiguous space, it costs us money.

The Vice-Chair: Just on a point of clarification, if I may: By "contiguous space" you mean space that is adjacent to each other?

Ms Angove: That's right.

Mrs Margaret Marland (Mississauga South): Adjacent floors.

Ms Angove: Adjacent floors, right.

Mr Sorbara: All in one building.

Ms Angove: All in one building, adjacent floors all in one building.

The other problem we have in most facilities is inadequate floorplate size. There are some downtown office towers that do have floorplates of about 25,000 square feet, which is the minimum we're looking for, but most of them don't. That is a problem with many existing facilities, and it's certainly a problem for us here at 2 Bloor.

The Vice-Chair: Floorplate?

Ms Angove: The size of the floor, the perimeter of the floor.

The Vice-Chair: On a single floor.

Ms Angove: That's right. The reason we need large floorplates is to allow staff who need to work together on the same floor to be located on the same floor. As it is today, staff must run between floors, because we can't put everyone who needs to work together on the same floor. Of course, that aggravates the elevator problem and it means people are away from their workstations and are not doing the work. They're running between floors.

Mrs Marland: Excuse me. I would like some clarification for the same reason you did, Mr Chair.

You talked about the use of the electronics. Is it not with the electronic communications plus telephones? I guess I'm a bit confused about why you need all this space on one floor. I mean, are they really getting up and running from their VDTs to talk to each other on other floors?

Mr King: For some time the Workers' Compensation Board of Ontario has had complaints about service delivery: delays, inability to respond to the needs of the customers. In an attempt to respond to those demands for service, the board has broken itself down into 20 smaller compensation boards. About half of those compensation boards are in regional offices. If you go to Thunder Bay, Windsor, Sudbury, Hamilton or Ottawa you will find a compensation board complete unto itself except for some of the central support services that are required to do business.

The need for a large floorplate is so we can have one of our business operations in one cohesive area for all the efficiencies that creates, the rather unmeasurable one being morale, which is very difficult to maintain in an operation of 5,000. Morale affects service delivery, the communication that has to exist so that files don't end up being lost. That causes problems for ourselves and for yourselves as MPPs, who are often the first in line for complaints, so it's really business need requirements.

Mrs Marland: You did say the files are all done on computers.

Mr King: The majority of our files are now on what is called imaging technology, which is electronic files. They can be reproduced on electronic screens.

The Vice-Chair: Might I suggest we just carry on with the briefing session, and apart from points of clarification, we'll ask questions after the entire briefing is over. I think that's probably the most efficient way to proceed.

Ms Angove: If I could just add, the other point is that not all of our business is handled through technology. Certainly all of the claims files are on technological systems, but much of the business is also not on technology and is handled through staff meeting together and working through issues. For instance, policy development would be an area.

Some of the additional costs for WCB in relation to occupying space that cannot support the operation: These are costs that we incur currently at 2 Bloor Street East and we would incur if we were relocated to a facility that could not support the operation, a typical office tower downtown.

Elevator waiting time as a system was not designed to accommodate staff and visitor demand. We have determined through traffic consultants that the time spent waiting for elevators at 2 Bloor Street East is about one hour per employee per week longer than it will be at Simcoe Place. That equates to approximately $6 million and the equivalent of about 100 staff. I will talk a little bit later about what that impact is on service delivery.

The other major cost to us is equipment downtime due to power interruptions and problems with the cabling system. There's also a cost associated with downtime because it damages the equipment as well, so there's a need to replace equipment more when it has been down several times.

Workstation relocation is common at WCB because of the size of the organization. Currently, it costs us either to have the equipment down during the day while we are relocating the workstation, or we pay overtime to have it done at night. It takes us a couple of hours to poke cables through the ceiling. That is something we wanted to rectify at the new facility and we did that through something called access flooring, which I will be talking about later, which basically eliminates those costs.

Other costs include additional equipment and resources as a result of the limited floorplate size. Brian mentioned the loss of economies of scale when you have to have people separated and working on different floors. The more floors you occupy, obviously the more support staff you need and the more equipment you need in the way of faxes, printers, photocopiers etc. Larger floorplates allow us to economize on equipment, staff and resources basically.

In addition, because of the lighting problems that we have at 2 Bloor Street East, we have a major problem with glare on our video display terminal screens that contributes to absenteeism. Research has shown that the glare resulting from lighting on VDT screens contributes highly to absenteeism for VDT users. It's a major problem for us that we again want to rectify in the relocation.

I'd like to talk a little bit about the cost implications of the relocation. From an investment standpoint, the transaction does meet our investment criteria for the investment fund and will provide a favourable return.

From the tenant perspective, basically there's a redistribution of the administrative budget. The net rent per square foot at Simcoe Place will be comparable to the net rent per square foot with our lease commitments at 2 Bloor Street East. In our last year at 2 Bloor, we will be paying $26 per square foot. At Simcoe Place, the current rate based on our latest estimates in the latest financing proposal is approximately $26.90 per square foot. With the parking revenue offset, that is reduced to $25.22 per square foot. So in fact in our first year in Simcoe Place, our effective net rent will be less than our last year at 2 Bloor Street East.

Mrs Marland: Could you just give us those figures?

Ms Angove: Certainly. We will be paying $26 per square foot in our last year at 2 Bloor Street East. The net rent at Simcoe Place, which will be fixed for 20 years, will be $26.90, and that will be offset by our pro rata share of parking revenues, bringing the effective net rent down to $25.22 in the year 1995. By the year 2015, because those parking revenues will increase, the effective net rent will be reduced to $23.67, so in fact our net rent goes down over the 20-year term as a result of the revenues from the parking.

Mr Sorbara: You mentioned the last year of renting 2 Bloor Street East, which is when?

Ms Angove: In 1995, the year that we're moving.

Mr Sorbara: Who's the owner of the building?

Ms Angove: Bramalea and Canaplan.

I mentioned that the net rent is fixed for 20 years and offset by parking revenues. The other point to make is that the operating costs at Simcoe Place will be comparable to the operating costs we are incurring at 2 Bloor. In fact they may be slightly less because of the energy-efficient systems that we will have at Simcoe Place. There will be an increase in overall space leased at Simcoe Place, and that is offset by the reduction in costs associated with the building systems.

I would like to point out that the board of directors requested that we increase average workspace per person because they recognize the problems we are having at 2 Bloor with the cramming of people in the current space. So we have increased the space per person for non-management staff only. I do have a slide on that which we can talk about later if you like. That increase puts us at the very low end of average workspace per person compared to other government organizations and other industries.

Mrs Marland: What is low?

Ms Angove: It's an average workspace per person. The individual workspace is 35 to 55 square feet per person; that's the individual workspace. The average workspace per person, which means the overall workspace divided by the number of staff, is 150 square feet per person. The average for most government institutions is about 220 square feet per person. That does not mean that each person gets 220 square feet or 150 square feet. It means your workstation plus your share of common areas, meeting rooms, aisle space etc. It means that your allocation is approximately 150.

The Vice-Chair: Mr Callahan had a point.

Mr Robert V. Callahan (Brampton South): No, I'm prepared to wait. I was just putting up my hand.

Ms Angove: The overall impact of the cost implications as a result of this transaction is that there will be no impact on employer assessment rates and no impact on the unfunded liability. In fact there is a potential for net savings for the WCB over time. You can see that with the net rent alone. Our net rent goes down over time to quite a bit less than what it is at 2 Bloor.

Mr Sorbara: Just a point of clarification on this page. You mentioned, if I could look at Margaret's notes, the first year of rent in Simcoe Place, which is what?

Ms Angove: The net rent before the parking offset is $26.90. With the parking offset—

Mr Sorbara: That's a little bit more than your last year of rent with Bramalea.

Ms Angove: Not with the parking offset. With the parking offset, it comes down to $25.22.

Mr Sorbara: Could you tell the committee what offer you have had, what you would be able to renew your lease at 2 Bloor Street East for?

The Vice-Chair: The questions, I think, we can leave till after the briefing.

Mr Sorbara: Mr Chairman, with respect, this is an important comparison because the suggestion was made on this page that the rent in the last year of the current lease would be about the same as the first year in the new lease, but the reality of the marketplace in the greater Toronto area is that the first year of a new lease at 2 Bloor Street East would probably be a net rent of zero dollars per square foot. I think that should be included on this page with those figures that were submitted to the committee.

Ms Angove: We have not had—

Mr Sorbara: If I may ask—

The Vice-Chair: Order, please. That, I think, would flow as a discussion that can be following up on the briefing session, so I think I would allow that question to be asked once the briefing is over. Otherwise, we're going to get all kinds of questions. Unless the committee wishes me to proceed in that fashion, I think we'll go forward.

Mrs Marland: No, we'll do the briefing first.

The Vice-Chair: Okay, fine. We'll hold the question that Mr Sorbara asked on reserve and you can answer that following the briefing.

Ms Angove: We'd be happy to address that.

By participating in a design-build option, we've been able to ensure that all the deficiencies that we incur at 2 Bloor Street East and all the costs associated with those deficiencies that contribute to occupancy costs are eliminated. So what we've done in the design-build for Simcoe Place is to add a bank of elevators. There are three podium floors at Simcoe Place. These are large double floors and they have their own separate bank of elevators. They will have three additional elevators, which, as I mentioned earlier, will obviously reduce the waiting time for elevators significantly.

I mentioned that we've added a third podium floor. That allows us to put two integrated service units on the same floor, allowing us to share interview, reception and waiting space as well as to economize with the sharing of support staff, equipment etc.

We've added access floors to house our voice and data cabling. I mentioned earlier the problems we have with pulling cables through the ceiling. With access floor—this is a six-inch subfloor—all the cables are housed below the floor. If you relocate a work station, it's like unplugging a lamp and plugging back in. There's no downtime at all associated with it.

The other aspect of access floor is that we currently have a safety problem at 2 Bloor with the number of cables on the floor. Particularly when you jam a lot of people close together, there's a lot of cabling that creates unsafe work conditions. With access floor, all the cabling is housed below the floor, so that eliminates that problem.

Mr Sorbara: Couldn't be worse than it is in this building.

Ms Angove: I haven't been through this building.

Mr Sorbara: Just have a look. All the walls are alive with cables everywhere, some new, some old, some active, some inactive.

Mr Callahan: Maybe we should build a new building.

Mr King: Perhaps the Workplace Health and Safety Agency should come in and check it out.

Ms Angove: Perhaps we could lease you some space.

The other thing we've been able to do is change the base building lighting system that was originally incorporated in the design of this facility. We have found a lighting system that not only eliminates glare on the VDT screen but is quite energy-efficient, to the point where we need half the number of light fixtures that you would in the original base building system. So that will contribute to a reduction in our operating cost.

We've been able to add structural loading where required. We've been able to add washrooms in the high-client-use areas, which is a problem at 2 Bloor as well that I didn't mention earlier.

We've been able to add specific services in the lobby so that if an injured worker comes in and doesn't have a claim number, doesn't know where to go, he can get immediate service in the lobby. That's part of our commitment to improving service delivery for injured workers and employers, and employers will be able to obtain basic services in the lobby as well.

The other thing we've been able to do is add our own diesel generator at Simcoe Place to give us the emergency power that we need to eliminate the problems that are caused as a result of power interruptions and also to extend the life of our equipment.

A final benefit that we have with relocating to a facility that has been designed to accommodate our requirements is the potential for additional efficiency gains. We've been working with a productivity consultant, an individual who has done work in productivity for the past 20 years. He specializes in productivity in the workplace. He is helping us now look at the more basic areas of design of the workplace to ensure that all the decisions we make about designing the workplace for WCB will be made with the productivity factor in mind.

He says that if you did everything right, if you provided a very supportive work environment, the dollar value of the benefits could be up to 5% of annual salary for workers in all job categories. For us, that equates to $3.2 million to $7.9 million annually that one can appreciate the benefits of if the workplace is designed properly to support productivity and to support the operation.

That ends the briefing. I do have additional information on various subjects, but perhaps you'd like to go to questions.

The Vice-Chair: Okay, we'll open it up to questions.

Mr Tilson: Mr Chairman, on a point of order—

The Vice-Chair: I'm sorry. We're going to go to questions. Mr Tilson, do you have a point of clarification?

Mr Tilson: I'm just concerned about the procedure that you're going to follow. Are you going to allow a time limit for each of the three parties or are you going to just let someone start and spend the rest of the—

The Vice-Chair: Well, we can proceed in that fashion, if you like. I think we have ample time left to us to just allow each of the parties on a rotating basis a question each. We can see how far we go with that and then I'll try to divide the time as we see fit. There's at least an hour and a half left to us, so I think—

Interjection: And tomorrow morning.

The Vice-Chair: —and tomorrow morning, so I think we can proceed on that basis. Mr Duignan.

Mr Duignan: On the same point, I think it may be fair at this point just to allocate a half-hour to each party on a rotating basis, and if there's any extra time after that, then take it on an individual question basis.

The Vice-Chair: Does everyone agree to that? Okay, then we can proceed with the Liberals first, then the Conservatives and then the government. We will have approximately a half-hour, which will bring us to 5 past 3 for the Liberals, and then the Conservatives can take over from there; following that, the government will have its turn. Is that okay? I'll allow Mr Callahan to go first.

Mr Callahan: I'd like to get a handle on a few details. What's the total square footage of this proposed building?

Mr King: The total square footage of Simcoe Place is 700,000 square feet.

Ms Angove: It's 755,000.

Mr Callahan: And you're going to occupy how much of it?

Ms Angove: Seventy per cent of it, 525,000.

Mr Callahan: I noticed that TVO had plans to build and a couple of others in the private sector: Blue Cross, the Ontario Hospital Association and Revenue Canada. Were there any discussions with any of these people about joining in this endeavour?

Ms Angove: No, there were not, but I do understand that the developer responded to a proposal call from TVO—I don't know about the others, whether they responded to those or not—where they would put forth a submission to sublease remaining space, but the WCB did not enter into any discussions with any of those organizations.

Mr Callahan: This is a done deal, I gather.

Ms Angove: Yes, it is.

Mr Callahan: When was the contract signed?

Ms Angove: It depends what aspect of the contract you're talking about.

Mr Callahan: We know the board of directors decided on this in March 1991. When was the actual contract—

Ms Angove: All the transaction was executed in June 1992.

Mr Callahan: You've indicated that before doing that you put out for proposals and received 75 proposals from various owners of premises.

Ms Angove: I'm sorry; it was 75 inquiries, 34 submissions.

Mr Callahan: You were looking for a specific type of accommodation. Do you not think it would have been wiser to have had a real estate agent or agents go out and try to locate these for you specifically?

Ms Angove: We felt it was important to follow a public tender to be able to ensure that everyone had an opportunity to submit his proposal rather than approaching specific developers regarding specific sites. We were committed to following a public tender process. We did have the assistance of Royal LePage Real Estate consulting services during that tender process to help us evaluate the submissions.

Mr Callahan: You're saying that out of 34 proposals you weren't able to find one that fit the criteria?

Ms Angove: That's right.

Mr Callahan: I see. Now, how is this going to be funded?

Ms Angove: The financing proposal is currently under discussion.

Mr King: The funding for the building is presently being worked on. It is too early at the present time to give the final indication of how the funding will break down in detail. We have received a proposal, we have responded to the proposal and we haven't received a counter-response at the present time. Let me indicate that it will involve some equity from the WCB's investment fund and it will involve some mortgage.

Ms Angove: If I could just add to that, there's one point I did not mention when I was talking about our rent as tenant. The rent really does two things for us at Simcoe Place: It not only covers our occupancy cost as a tenant, but it also subsidizes the investment side of the transaction. It does double duty, if you will, unlike our current situation, where we pay rent to a third-party owner, Bramalea and Canapen, and we don't see that money again. In this transaction, the rent not only covers our tenancy, but it also subsidizes the investment for the investment fund. I think that's an important difference between any lease situation and the current transaction we've negotiated.

Mr Callahan: I think the Chairman wants a point of clarification.

The Vice-Chair: Just a very brief question on a point of clarification: You said you would have some equity position and then there would be a mortgage flowing from that equity position. Can you clarify what exactly the details of that are?

Mr King: The details aren't yet finally known. I believe it's April 1 when the financial arrangements have to be finalized, and we only received the proposal on financing about 10 days ago, responded to it, and haven't received the counter-response.

The Vice-Chair: Just to get the position clear as to what the WCB will own in terms of its position in this—

Ms Angove: It will own 75% of the office tower and a prorated share of parking related to that.

The Vice-Chair: So that's your equity position in the corporation that's been established?

Ms Angove: That's right.

Mr Callahan: You've indicated in your brief to us that there would be no impact on employer assessment rates and on the unfunded liability of, what, $11 billion, I think it is now? Is that an ironclad guarantee so that employers out there can rest easy that there won't be any increase in their rates?

Mr King: The Ontario Workers' Compensation Board has a pension fund or an investment fund of some $6.5 billion. We have to have real estate as part of that total investment portfolio. Under rules of the Pension Benefits Act, 82% of the total investments have to remain within Canada. Most investment funds of this size have their portfolio broken down between bonds, equities and real estate. The real estate part of our investment branch has many real estate ownership positions. This would be one of the real estate ownership positions they would take, and it would form part of the portfolio of the WCB.

There was an article in today's Financial Post by one of the commercial real estate experts, who indicated that real estate is still a very valuable investment as a hedge against inflation. So what we're doing is similar to what OMERS, the teachers' fund and a lot of the other funds are doing. We're involving ourselves in real estate as part of the $6-billion investment.

Ms Angove: The other thing I wanted to point out, following up Brian's point, is that most workers' compensation boards across Canada own their head office facilities in whole or in part, and some of them have entered into a very similar transaction to this, where the investment part of WCB invests in the office tower that the operations occupy. For instance, Saskatchewan has just entered into that kind of transaction. They have just relocated into a building where they occupy a significant portion of it and their investment fund owns a piece of it. So this is not that unusual.

Mr Callahan: It seems to me that I recall reading somewhere in this material or in the newspapers that the Treasurer was not terribly happy with this whole arrangement and he said he was going to—I don't know whether he used the word "stop," but certainly look into it. Is the Treasurer any happier now, do you know?

Mr King: I haven't spoken to the Treasurer myself. I can't comment, other than what the media might have reported the Treasurer having said. I believe the chairman, Mr

Di Santo, may have spoken to him. I believe it was speculated, however, that the board is a corporate body and that it would probably require the removal of Mr Di Santo and myself as the appointed members of the board if the government wanted to force the issue. The board of directors has been supporting this all along.

Let me just stop for a moment. A very strategic decision was taken in 1990.

Mr King: July 1990.

Mrs Marland: When the Liberals were the government.

Mr Callahan: Is that a partisan comment?

The Vice-Chair: It is a comment out of turn, I might add.

Mrs Marland: I want to be clear about when that decision was made.

Mr Sorbara: The Liberals were in government and things were much better then.

Mr King: A strategic decision was taken as to what to do for future facilities for the Ontario WCB. Contracts were entered into, contracts that probably could have been broken at some point in time without as much downside risk for being sued. None the less, contractual arrangements had been made and the board would have been put into a difficult position.

Entering into a strategic situation like that, do you expose the board to short-term expense of unknown amount by breaking a deal, when in fact what you're really saying is, "We don't vote for the future of Ontario because we think it's not going to recover etc," by breaking this deal? If you look upon this as a very strategic deal that was a good decision in the first place, then does a temporary downturn in the economy make it a bad decision?

Mr Callahan: I want to address that, if I could. I think the biggest problem here is the appearance. When you've got something like $42 billion worth of commercial real estate out there on the verge of being decimated or taken up by the banks under power of sale and you're building a new building, people look askance at that.

I also want to go to the question—one of the reasons was that you would be closer to transportation. Are you closer to the subway or to transportation than you are now?

Ms Angove: We are more accessible to different types of transportation modes at Simcoe Place than we are at 2 Bloor.

Mr Callahan: What's the closest subway stop?

Ms Angove: St Andrew and Union Station. We will be accessible to both.

Mr Callahan: How far is that from the building?

Ms Angove: Walking? I believe it's about 1,200 feet. It's the same distance to walk from St Andrew subway station to the lobby of Simcoe Place, if you walk outside, as it is to walk from the closest parking space at 2 Bloor to our lobby at 2 Bloor.

Mr Callahan: The subway runs right into the building at 2 Bloor, doesn't it?

Ms Angove: Yes. There is no question that the location at Yonge and Bloor is excellent. We're very happy with the location. That is not why we're relocating.

Mr Callahan: I want to give some time to my colleagues. I've seen Revenue Canada's building on Adelaide Street. It's very much akin to the needs you have. It services in a similar fashion, albeit a different type of activity, but it's small working stations for individuals, a large, full-floor surface. Is that not right?

Ms Angove: I'm not familiar with the facility. They did not respond to the proposal call. I can tell you they likely do not have the elevator capacity, because it would not have been designed to accommodate the traffic flow we bring into a building or the number of staff we have. They would not have access to accommodate our cable requirements, they would not have the lighting system required for our technology and they would not have the emergency power.

Mr Callahan: How can you say that if they didn't respond?

Ms Angove: Because it was not designed to accommodate an organization like the WCB.

Mr Callahan: Then you must have investigated that building, did you, in order to be able to make those comments?

Ms Angove: No. I'm saying that typical office towers like that one are not designed to accommodate the requirements of an organization like WCB. I don't know that Revenue Canada gets 152,000 visitors per year or has the amount of technology that we do or has the emergency power required.

Mr Callahan: They certainly seem to be able to keep track of everybody, so I would imagine they've got all sorts of technology. As far as visitors, I would think they probably receive as many visitors as you people do.

Mr King: I don't know the question—

Mr Callahan: I wanted to know why the Adelaide building wasn't looked at. It seems to me it would be a good swap. You could probably swap it with the feds and get a very much more accommodating arrangement than what you've got now. At least that's my impression. I'm going to yield to the member for York Centre.

Mr Sorbara: How would you describe the real estate market in the greater Toronto area?

Mr King: Awful.

Mr Sorbara: Are you aware that there is more vacant commercial space in Metropolitan Toronto than there is in the city of London, including Canary Wharf? Are you aware that it's that bad? There's more vacant space in Metropolitan Toronto. Do you think it's socially responsible for the WCB, given the current economic crisis, particularly the deflation in value of commercial office space in Metropolitan Toronto, for the board to be encouraging the addition of 725,000 square feet of office space in the Toronto core at this time?

Mr King: Was that a question?

Mr Sorbara: Do you consider it socially responsible?

Mr King: The board made its strategic decision in 1990 to build an office building which would be both an investment for the investment fund plus suit the board's business needs.

Mr Sorbara: Yes, I appreciate that. There are other people who actually started office buildings at that time and capped them because they realized the market had changed dramatically.

How many integrated service units are there at 2 Bloor Street East now?

Mr King: There are 9 or 10.

Mr Sorbara: Isn't it true that each of those integrated service units, like other regional offices, could, as you say, operate independently and needn't be one next to another in one head office building?

Mr King: Yes. We could have a decentralized situation with integrated service units. Our findings are that decentralizing an integrated service unit is far more expensive than having a central location.

Ms Angove: If I may also add, the board of directors felt it was important for us to provide better services for employers as well as injured workers. A number of those units cover a large area, for instance, the construction unit, complex case units for injuries and diseases. If an employer comes in and has a case in Toronto west, but also has a case in the complex case unit, it can come to one location to have those cases dealt with, as opposed to travelling to various offices. So it was important for us to service not only the employers but the workers as well.

The Vice-Chair: Perhaps I could interrupt for just a second. There's been some discussion with respect to the kinds of consultation papers you've had conducted for yourselves in order to make this decision. It would be of great service to us and a great deal of assistance—I'm speaking on behalf of the whole committee in taking this prerogative—to be provided with some of those background papers. Having had an earlier discussion with our researcher, we found that there's a lack of information available to us with respect to the kinds of decisions you have made. So if you have any background documentation or papers that you can make available to us, we would request that. It would be very helpful if we could have that.

Mr King: Certainly, we can comply with anything other than what might have come in as a privileged private tender document.

The Vice-Chair: Yes. I'm talking about feasibility studies or consultation papers that were conducted on your behalf. I understand there were three consulting firms that made studies available to you. If you could make those available, we would appreciate it.

Mr Duignan: I'll add time to this if it's a point of clarification on this point.

Mr Duignan: If we going that route, we could have some of the documentation that led to the decision of the board of July 1990 as well.

The Vice-Chair: Back to Mr Sorbara and others. We're out a couple of minutes.

Mr Sorbara: I want to get back to the question I asked in the middle of the presentation, and that is to find out from you what quote you received from your current landlords, at what rate you could renew your lease at 2 Bloor Street East.

Mr King: Obviously, when you're entering into a strategic project like the Simcoe Place project you must provide certain guarantees, as a developer, a banker and a tenant. One of the things that was done at the time the decision was made to proceed was that the WCB would look into no other options while the detailed planning was going into Simcoe Place. It is quite likely, given what's going on elsewhere around Toronto, though, that we could get a very favourable deal on the rental space.

I'm not too sure you have given full account of the previous description of why 2 Bloor is so unacceptable from a business point of view. All one has to do is come to 2 Bloor at 8 o'clock in the morning to see hundreds of people trying to get up in the elevators in the building to see that it is an unacceptable facility for our business. There may be other empty spaces we could get at less cost. I don't believe myself that we could get 20 years or guaranteed business space that will suit our business and provide us with the ability to provide this sort of quality service that Ontario, on the one hand, demands of its WCB.

I sat before another committee of this Legislature explaining why service delivery is not as good as it should be at the WCB and spent a lot of time being criticized because we weren't providing a good enough service. I think what we're tried to show through the brief presentation is that our physical layout does not allow for the kind of service that Ontario demands.

Mr Sorbara: I'll just tell the Vice-Chairman that for two years I was the minister responsible for the WCB in Ontario. On a number of occasions I had meetings in the corporate boardrooms of 2 Bloor Street East at 8 o'clock and I am familiar with the delay. My own assessment of the market is that you could abandon this deal and renew your current lease for zero rent per square foot for the first four years and thereafter perhaps $5 or $6 per square foot for the balance of a 10-year lease.

On that basis, you could move three or four integrated service units out of 2 Bloor Street East and locate them elsewhere at similar rents in the greater Toronto area; that is, at zero dollars per square foot for the first four years and $5 or $6 for the balance of that time. Having done that, you would reduce the pressure on the elevating system and you would reduce the general pressure within the building, even leaving those floors vacant. We have seen no cost figures that the board has generated to solve the problems it has at 2 Bloor Street East other than by building a new palace, which will not help the clients of the WCB but provide optimum conditions for the workers at the WCB.

I want to say to the Chair that I have nothing against improving the working conditions of the workers at the WCB, but this is an extravagant proposal. Renting office space, adding to the glut of office space in the greater Toronto area at this time in this market is socially irresponsible and is not something an agency of the government of Ontario should be undertaking.

All of these problems could be solved and can be solved in a far cheaper way even if you vacated half of your current building and renewed the lease and placed those integrated service units elsewhere. It's just inappropriate for you to be doing what you're proposing to do at this time.

I plead with you to come before this committee and tell us the cost of getting out of this contract, which is not a completed contract, because you've already testified that the financing arrangements have not been finalized. If the financing arrangements are not finalized, there is not a binding contract which, if you breach, will give rise to liability on the part of the WCB.

Mr King: There are three law firms in Ontario that might disagree with you, because that's how many firms are involved from the WCB's side. I myself asked for a third firm to become involved in addition to the firm that was looking at the facility from the point of view of the investor and from the point of view of the tenant. I don't think anyone can tell you with any certainty what the unknown of breaching a contract such as this would be. My own consideration would be that it would be very expensive.

Mr Sorbara: We would like to see evidence as to what the potential liabilities are and the advice of your lawyers, if that could be provided.

Am I to take it then that there was no inquiry made at any time as to what offer would be made by your current landlord, should you determine—

Mr King: Our current landlord made several approaches wishing to enter into that kind of a discussion. They were prevented from doing so by the terms of the agreement. As I indicated, when you enter into an agreement on a development like Simcoe Place, you agree to be somewhat of a constant companion rather than a fickle-hearted person who is going to run and look at other space.

Mr Sorbara: I'm asking you what inquiries were made before you entered into that agreement with Simcoe Place.

Ms Angove: Can I just answer that?

Mr King: I wasn't there yet at that time.

Ms Angove: Bramalea did not respond to the tender call with 2 Bloor Street East as a potential site for WCB, so it was not part of the tender to even consider in the beginning.

Mr Sorbara: Surely, in comparing whether or not you will enter into an agreement with the people at Simcoe Place or renew your current lease, you would make inquiries of your landlord as to what it might cost in a renewed lease on a per-square-foot basis.

Ms Angove: It was our understanding that Bramalea wanted the WCB to vacate that building because it needed to retrofit it. The costs to retrofit that building are approximately $60 per square foot or approximately $35 million to $40 million. That retrofit will not give us additional elevator capacity, it will not give us access floor and it will not give us emergency power backup because They cannot put that in the building.

Why would we have discussions with Bramalea to stay in a building that simply costs us too much money to occupy? It costs us much more than net rent, even if it was zero net rent. There are many costs that we incur with downtime. It's not only loss of service delivery. We're paying people to sit there while their equipment doesn't work. There's a cost associated with that, and it's millions of dollars every year. You may be paying zero net rent, but you're paying a lot of money out of the other pocket for people to sit and do nothing while their equipment is down.

There is nothing you can do to improve that building. We relocated our data centre offsite to try to help improve it. We relocated our microfilm functions offsite. We relocated the print shop and we relocated final files. To the extent we could make that building better for us, we have done everything we can do.

Ms Angove: Because it costs more money to decentralize and duplicates service that you can offer in a centralized facility. Plus, if you want to give those people the kind of work environment that we require—I'm talking about an emergency backup system, appropriate lighting, appropriate access flooring etc—you would pay to retrofit any existing facility in the suburbs, if that's what you're talking about relocating to, and that is very costly to do.

Mr Sorbara: I'm sorry; I've visited many of the board's sites around the province and they do not have the kind of flooring, the kind of lighting you're demanding in the head office. What you say about relocating an integrated service unit is thoroughly inconsistent with the very philosophy of integrated service units, and that is their ability to stand alone and serve comprehensively the needs of the clients, the workers and employers of the board.

I could be satisfied on this whole thing if you could bring us the documentation, the analysis and the costing that you did to solve the myriad of problems that seem to exist at 2 Bloor Street East and the alternative methods of solving those, including staying in the building. We haven't seen anything about that. You made no inquiries with Bramalea as to how much it would cost to stay there.

Ms Angove: We worked with Royal LePage real estate consulting services on that. The individual consultant we worked with is an architect. He worked with us, not only on evaluating the problems at 2 Bloor, but evaluating the potential retrofit cost of the existing site that's submitted in the proposal call. It was very clear that the cost to retrofit far exceeded the cost to relocate to Simcoe Place.

Mr Sorbara: What about moving out some of the integrated service units to a new location?

Ms Angove: We discussed that with the board of directors in July 1990, the pros and cons of remaining centralized versus decentralizing. There was an agreement at that time that it made much more sense to remain centralized. One of the problems in decentralizing the integrated service units in this geographic area is that it's just too small. It's not like the London regional office, where someone can move from one area to another and is still serviced by the London regional office. In this geographic area, you can work in Etobicoke and live in Scarborough, so where do you locate the integrated service unit? Is it located close to the injured worker or close to the employer? What happens when that worker moves? Do you relocate that person to another integrated service unit? It becomes very complicated and an administrative nightmare to try to do it, because the geographic area is just too small.

Mr Sorbara: I'm just suggesting to you—

The Vice-Chair: Mr Tilson has a clarification, if I may interrupt.

Mr Tilson: I just wondered if my name was on the list.

The Vice-Chair: Oh, I'm sorry. Carry on, please.

Mr Sorbara: I'm suggesting to you that the problems of overcrowding and pressure on buildings is because there hasn't been any attempt to decentralize the main office functions from the integrated service unit functions of the WCB, so that within the facility that accommodates a head office you have the very heavy traffic patterns of an integrated service unit. An analysis should have been done and considered for decentralizing those areas, particularly given the terrible glut of office space right through the greater Toronto area.

I appreciate that in July 1990 the board perhaps wasn't aware of the impending crisis in commercial real estate in the greater Toronto area, but that reality having developed, surely to God the Workers' Compensation Board ought to have re-evaluated whether it was doing the appropriate thing, in the best interests of the board, firstly, and in the best interests of the economy of the greater Toronto area and the province of Ontario.

I'll tell you that there are buildings in Toronto of 400,000 or 500,000 square feet that have a current market value of zero. They are worthless. No one will buy them. No one will take over or put their name on the title or take over the management cost of those buildings. If that's the case, the board is investing in a building which, in the absence of the board's tenancy in that building, could not be built and would have very little value given the current and future market, say the next five or six years, in the greater Toronto area. I just want to say to you that I think it's socially and economically and commercially irresponsible of the board to do that.

Mr King: There are private partnerships here who were involved in 25% of the total cost of this project. Presumably if the market feels that this is not a proper project to go ahead, then neither will the financing come forward nor would the private partners be prepared to come forward.

I don't doubt your words that this is a bad time to be going ahead and proceeding with this. I again move it back and tell you that a project that had to come into place in 1995 was begun in 1990. Do you blink at this point in time, as you're suggesting we blink at this point in time, and say that because of the empty space, because there are landlords out there that want us as a tenant, we should proceed to go off our strategic plan, which is minimally a 20-year plan?

Mr Sorbara: What I'm suggesting to you is that the decision of the board of directors of the Workers' Compensation Board was made at a strategically important time for the board of directors, knowing that the province was going into an election and that their decision would not be highlighted or reviewed. In July of 1990 it was apparent to everyone that there would be an election.

The election having taken place and a new chair having been appointed and a new vice-chair having been appointed, the whole question of whether or not to relocate and reorganize the board on a different basis so as not to create an overburdened head office should have been examined on the basis of real, hard evidence and data. That hasn't been done yet, or at least we haven't seen copies of it. Given that that hasn't been done, it should be done and this deal should be put into abeyance or put on hold until that work is done.

I have no further questions or comments, Mr Chair.

The Vice-Chair: Well, I don't know if there's—

Mr King: I don't think there was a question, myself.

The Vice-Chair: You don't have to answer or you don't have to comment. I think there are actually a couple of minutes left for the Liberals, but we'll move on. You can take that later if you like. Mr Tilson is next, and we'll move to the Conservatives' half-hour.

Mr Tilson: As I understand it, you indicated the contract was signed in June of 1992. Is that what you're saying?

Ms Angove: The full transaction was executed in June of 1992. That's right.

Mr Tilson: That's the contract between the Toronto-Dominion Bank and the developer, which is—

Ms Angove: Cadillac Fairview.

Mr Tilson: —Cadillac Fairview—and WCB?

Ms Angove: That's right.

Mr Tilson: Was there a series of contracts, or was that the contract?

Ms Angove: No. There are a series of contracts for the investment fund. There's a series of contracts, then, for the tenant, our series of contracts.

Mr Tilson: Are you able to make copies of all of those contracts available to the committee?

Mr King: I will have to take that under advisement pending discussion with the legal people. I simply don't know whether there are some confidential aspects of it, but certainly, if there are not, I'm perfectly willing to share those.

Mr Tilson: What could be confidential? It's a $200-million venture that is quite controversial.

Mr King: Well, $200 million is the figure that was quoted as the high end to the project. It has come in at lower than $200 million once the tenders were let.

Mr Tilson: But we won't know that unless we see the contracts.

The Vice-Chair: Might I suggest, if possible, that if there's some sort of confidentiality requirement, either the auditor look at those contracts in confidence or we can go in camera to look at whatever documents cannot be made public, for that purpose.

Mr Tilson: Well, Mr Chairman, I would propose that whatever contracts they feel can be made available—I think we're entitled to know what contracts you're not going to make available to us, if there are any, and we could discuss why. Hopefully you would make them all available to us.

Mr King: Hopefully.

Mr Tilson: Now, you indicate that that is when the series of contracts ended, in June of 1992?

Ms Angove: Yes.

Mr Tilson: And the first one was when?

Ms Angove: The first commitment by WCB was in March 1991.

Mr Tilson: All right. And when was the commitment to purchase these lands made?

Mr Callahan: They don't own them. They're leased.

Mr King: They're leased lands.

Mr Callahan: The CBC owns them.

Mr Tilson: So the WCB will not own the lands on Simcoe Place?

Mr King: That's correct.

Mr Tilson: Strictly, all you're going to be doing is leasing those lands?

Mr King: That's correct.

Mr Tilson: And you'll make available to us the copies of all of those leases?

Mr King: With the aforementioned caveat, yes. I don't believe there is any problem with releasing them, but I would like to just make absolutely certain so that I don't mislead the committee.

Mr Tilson: Have those leases been signed?

Mr King: I'm not too sure which leases you're referring to.

Mr Tilson: Any of them.

Ms Angove: The ground lease certainly has been signed, and our commitment—

Mr Tilson: You're going to be leasing, you said, 70% of the building. Is that not correct? Is that what you're saying?

Ms Angove: Yes. Our commitment to lease has been signed.

Mrs Marland: Excuse me. A commitment to lease has been signed?

Ms Angove: That's right.

Mrs Marland: Does that mean the lease has not been signed?

Ms Angove: The actual lease, you're right, has not been signed. The agreement to lease has been signed.

Mrs Marland: That's important to know.

Ms Angove: It binds us in the same way the lease does.

Mrs Marland: Thank you.

Mr Tilson: So the building will be owned by a numbered company? Who's going to own the building?

Mr King: The building will be owned jointly by the WCB of Ontario and by a partnership of Cadillac Fairview and the Toronto-Dominion Bank. They're roughly 12.5% owners each and we're 75% owners.

Mr Tilson: So WCB will own 70% of this building.

Mr King: The WCB investment fund will be 75% owner.

Mr Tilson: Did you obtain the order in council pursuant to section 64 of the legislation?

Mr King: No, the Workers' Compensation Board received at least two and probably three legal opinions that it did not have to seek the approval of the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

Mr Tilson: So you don't feel there's any accountability necessary with respect to this venture to the government?

Mr King: Several days before I started as the vice-chair of administration of the Ontario WCB, the board of directors voted on that stage of the project. Included in that were the legal opinions that they did not have to seek the approval of the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

Mr Tilson: Have you or anyone on the board had any discussions with the current Treasurer or any other Treasurer with respect to this venture?

Mr King: I have had no discussions with the Treasurer. I can't know whether anyone else at the board has had any discussions with the Treasurer. I believe the chairman of the board, Mr Odoardo Di Santo, perhaps had some discussion with the Treasurer.

The Vice-Chair: Mr Tilson, I've just had a request for a point of clarification.

Mrs Marland: Can I just say, if we keep interrupting each other, we don't end up with equal time, and I'm very anxious to ask questions too.

The Vice-Chair: I'm trying to be consistent, Mrs Marland. I interrupted Mr Sorbara on a couple of occasions, and I will add some time to Mr Tilson in order to accommodate reasonable requests.

Mr Callahan: I don't mean to interrupt you, Mr Tilson, but I wanted a clarification on that. I thought you said along those lines that you consider yourself an independent body. If the Treasurer interfered, it would require your resignation and that of Mr Di Santo.

Mr King: No, I believe that was speculation, perhaps by either the media or some third party, not myself.

Mr Callahan: I thought you said that. That was why I wanted clarification.

Mr King: I said it had been speculated that the government would remove Mr Di Santo and myself.

Mr Callahan: Okay. Thank you, Mr Tilson.

Mr Tilson: Has the deed been signed? Has the deed passed between the three groups?

Ms Angove: Yes, it has been executed.

Mr Tilson: Executed and registered on title?

Ms Angove: Yes.

Mr Tilson: When did that take place?

Ms Vivian Varnam: June 1992.

Ms Angove: It was registered June 1992.

Mr Tilson: Okay. Getting back to when all of this started, somewhere there is a reference to 34 proposals.

Ms Angove: Right.

Mr Tilson: Can we have copies of all of those proposals?

Mr King: Those were the proposals given to us in good faith by private developers, and I'm not too sure it would be fair at this point to have their private strategies made public. But perhaps by whiting out who the developer was, if we could make them anonymous, certainly that would be a possibility.

Mr Tilson: I can tell you, sir, that this venture that you have got into is an amazingly controversial issue. I think we're entitled to know whether any of these proposals would have put forward facilities that could mollify your needs. You've explained all the problems that you have on Bloor Street. There may be other alternatives, and I think we would like to know what those other alternatives are that have come to your attention.

Mr King: Those were alternatives that were looked at in 1990. There could in fact be more, given the increased empty space in the greater Metro area.

Mr Tilson: Dealing specifically with the 34 proposals, you will make those available to us?

Mr King: I have indicated that, provided it breaches no legal confidence, I see no difficulty with that.

Mr Tilson: When will you tell us whether or not you'll be able to give us any of the information you are seeking opinion on?

Mr King: Any holding back of information would be very limited and would be related to private contractual agreements of confidentiality, but I believe those to be very limited. I can let you know tomorrow on that.

Mr Tilson: All right. I suppose that would include any impact studies which you make available to us, copies of impact studies, feasibility studies that you may have undertaken.

Mr King: Yes.

Mr Tilson: Did you undertake any impact studies?

Ms Angove: On the 34 submissions?

Mr Tilson: Yes.

Ms Angove: Yes.

Mr Tilson: And you'll make those available to us?

Mr King: Again, there's no wish to withhold anything from the committee. You'll be informed tomorrow.

Mr Tilson: And with respect to reports from independent consultants which you've referred to, would they be included as well?

Mr King: Yes.

Mr Tilson: I guess one of the concerns we have—it may well have been that, because of the great availability of space, many of these owners of these buildings may have refitted many of these buildings to meet your needs for free or for substantially less than what you're suggesting. Was that pursued?

Mr King: Not since June of 1992.

Mr Tilson: Well, prior to June of 1992?

Mr King: Prior to June of 1992, the crisis in the real estate market was not apparent. It had been looked at in 1990, however, at the time of the original proposals being reviewed.

Mr Tilson: I find it difficult to understand what you're saying. However, I think Mrs Marland will have some questions in a moment. I just have a couple of other questions.

You stated that there will be no impact on the employer assessment rates and the unfunded liability.

Mr King: That's correct.

Mr Tilson: Do you have anything in writing that supports this conclusion?

Mr King: I don't know just what you mean by "anything in writing"—an actuarial projection, an accounting projection?

Mr Tilson: Absolutely anything, Mr King.

Ms Angove: The consultants' reports will confirm the return on investment.

Mr Tilson: You've made a statement. The employers are concerned that their rates are going to go up because of this tremendous structure that you're putting up.

Mr King: As I had indicated in an earlier answer, the Workers' Compensation Board of Ontario has a $6.5-billion investment fund. About 7% of that fund is to be allocated to real estate under the board's investment strategy. In putting down some money in equity and borrowing the rest, it will not impact the unfunded liability. The amount put down for equity purposes would be money that would be put down on other real estate ventures, because it's part of the board's roughly 7% that's invested in real estate.

Mr Tilson: Someone has told you that there would be no impact on the employer assessment rates. Can you provide us with the written statement or report that made you come to that conclusion?

Mr King: I'm the one who is involved, along with the other board members, in setting the assessment rates. The position of the investment fund making a real estate investment will not impact the assessment rates of Ontario employers.

Mr Tilson: You made a submission, presumably, to the board to advise it that there would be no impact on the employer assessment rates. Can we have a copy of that report?

Mr King: Again, you can have copies of all the reports, and if that is among the reports, you can have it.

Mr Tilson: Was the Downsview site examined as a possible site?

Mr King: We have looked at the Downsview site for some years now in terms of alternatives. The Downsview site simply has not the access. There is no way to get to the Downsview site except with a map. No public transit goes to the Downsview site.

Mr Tilson: We're talking about an amazing cost to put up this building at Simcoe Place. Did you consider a shuttle bus?

Mr King: You mean 150,000 people a year using a shuttle bus, from where? From Union station, from—

Mr Tilson: I don't know, sir. You're the one who's creating this thing. I guess I'm just looking for how you came to your conclusions. So far nothing has been made available to us, and I trust you'll have—

Mr King: Can I make a point here? I don't know of any requests for information that came to us that we didn't respond to.

Mr Tilson: Okay. Well, you've got quite a list this afternoon.

Mr King: Yes, but we have nothing before us. We haven't got anything. I know of no requests, other than that we were to appear. We sent some material over ahead of time, which were the board minutes and the board orders.

Mr Tilson: Mrs Marland has some questions. Could you inform us tomorrow morning what information, hopefully all of it, you could make available to us on this project?

The Vice-Chair: On a point of clarification with respect to the last statement regarding information that was requested, our researcher informs me that we did ask for a copy of the agreement, and that agreement was not made available.

Ms Angove: Who did you request that from?

Mr Ray McLellan: I'd have to go back to get the lady's name. I corresponded with your office just prior to Christmas, the week before Christmas.

Ms Angove: Yes. I spoke with you.

Mr McLellan: I did ask for a copy of the agreement.

Ms Angove: I'm sorry, I don't recall that request. I think we talked about what would be sent over and I did send you the package we talked about. Which agreement are you referring to? There are four leather-bound books of documents.

Mr McLellan: The 1992 signed agreement.

Ms Angove: There are four leather-bound books of documents that were signed in June 1992. Are you asking for all of those?

The Vice-Chair: Does that make up the whole agreement?

Mr King: It would make up the whole agreement to this stage. It wouldn't contain all the necessary consulting reports and background reports that have been requested.

The Vice-Chair: None the less, I think it's been established that we want all and any relevant information made available to us, so I think that would be forthcoming from you, and that request has already been made.

We'll move on to Mrs Marland. She has the floor.

Mrs Marland: It's really difficult to know where to begin. On the surface, from the information this committee has today, I think this is probably the most outrageous example of empire-building I have seen in my 20 years in politics, and I think there have to be a lot of answers given. It's probably unfortunate, Mr Chairman, that we're not dealing, in fairness, with the chairman of the board. Mr King, I gather that you're vice-chairman of the Workers' Compensation Board.

Mr King: That is correct.

Mrs Marland: Does that mean you're paid a salary as vice-chairman? On our agenda you're listed as vice-chair of administration. Does that mean as vice-chairman you're responsible for the areas involving administration?

Mr King: Generally speaking. It's somewhat more complex than that, but I work under the general direction of the chairman in law.

Mrs Marland: Who appointed you to the WCB?

Mr King: The Lieutenant Governor in Council.

Mrs Marland: When?

Mr King: April 1992—no, 1991; it just seems like it.

Mrs Marland: So you've been serving on the board for a year and a half at this point, then.

Mr King: Yes.

Mrs Marland: First of all, I want to ask you—you told Mr Tilson, in answer to one of his questions, about why the board had decided to waive a requirement for an order in council to go ahead with this gigantic investment. You said the board made the decision to waive that requirement based on three legal opinions. Am I correct?

Mr King: Yes. I said two and possibly three.

Mrs Marland: It's interesting to me to read the minutes of the meeting of the board of February 1, 1991, where there in fact is one legal opinion in those minutes, a legal opinion by Mr Atkinson of Aird and Berlis, who said that in his opinion an order in council was not required. Are you suggesting there are two other legal opinions, other than Mr Atkinson's?

Mr King: The previous chairman of the board, Dr Elgie, was acutely aware of that particular question, and I believe he himself sought legal opinion on whether an order in council was necessary and received the legal advice that it was not necessary. Under the terms of the Pension Benefits Act—we are required to manage our investments according to the rules of the Pension Benefits Act—we're allowed to invest in real estate, and it was considered that this was to be an investment in real estate.

Mrs Marland: A $200-million investment in real estate at a time when industry and commerce and the employers of this province can hardly afford the workers' compensation rates and payments that they have to make today is a little difficult to appreciate, I guess.

Mr King: Can I respond? I've already indicated that $200 million was the high estimate at the time, and it has come in significantly lower than that.

Mrs Marland: How much lower?

Mr King: Around $180 million, less than $180 million. Secondly, if the board is going to wisely invest its investment portfolio, it's got to utilize different investments, including equities, bonds and real estate. From the investment side, this is not anything other than an investment in real estate.

Mrs Marland: Mr King, I'm not in real estate and I have never been in real estate—I'm not a realtor—but it's pretty difficult from a commonsense point of view to appreciate how it's a good investment to spend even $180 million building new office space, as my colleagues have been pointing out, in a city with the kind of surplus in office space that the city of Toronto and the greater Toronto area has today. Obviously, we don't share the same opinion on this $180-million investment.

The thing that really bothers me is when I read in your comments that there would be no impact on employer assessment rates or on the unfunded liability. That may sound good to you. What I would like to see is a decision by the Workers' Compensation Board that in fact does make an impact, to reduce these assessment rates; never mind saying there's no impact to increase them. I would like to see a situation where the board makes a decision on an investment where the unfunded liability situation is addressed. Sure, there's no impact on employer assessment rates. My response to that is that I think it's too bad there isn't.

This answer you gave that when you went shopping for new office space you couldn't talk to your present landlord—I heard Ms Angove say she wouldn't consider talking to your present landlord because of the type of building, that it just couldn't be—

Ms Angove: And because they did not respond to the proposal call.

Mrs Marland: Excuse me. I understand that they didn't respond. But the point is that we know there are large organizations moving around this city today from one office building to another. For what reason? Again, common sense would tell you that for the most part they move out of one office building into another because they can get, in today's market, four, five or 10 years with nominal rents if they sign a 20-year lease. Essentially, what you've done is to sign a 20-year lease, as far as we can see from the information you've given us, with no "free" rent or accommodation up front.

Ms Angove: Can I comment on that?

Mrs Marland: Excuse me. Just wait till I've finished, because the question really was to Mr King. Apparently, you went to a lot of trouble to get an opinion from Mr Brill. I gather Mr Brill is a professor, author and leading consultant in productivity. If you went to such a lot of trouble to get an opinion from him about the potential for efficiency gains at Simcoe Place, I have to wonder why you couldn't have sought similar counsel about other alternatives.

You mentioned that you can't go shopping. I think your words were that you have to be a constant companion with Simcoe Place rather than appearing to be fickle-minded. Well, when you're shopping with the dollars that are earned by the people in business in this province who in turn create jobs in this province, I'm sorry, you have to go shopping very hard. I'm not convinced by what I've heard today that you actually have done that kind of shopping. You mentioned that you had a consultant, I think, from Royal LePage. Did you pay this person from Royal LePage for consulting services?

Ms Angove: Yes.

Mrs Marland: And you had the opinion of one person.

Ms Angove: No. We also had the opinion of Drivers Jonas as well. They've been involved in providing advice on the transaction since the beginning.

Mrs Marland: Who are they?

Ms Angove: They are real estate consultants as well.

Mrs Marland: You didn't mention them; you mentioned Royal LePage.

Ms Angove: I'm sorry. They have provided basically the same advice. As recently as Thursday of last week, I did a presentation with a representative of Drivers Jonas who confirmed that there are no existing facilities that can accommodate the WCB. That is as recent as last Thursday.

Mrs Marland: No existing facilities that can accommodate your needs in this—I hate to make the pun, because you're now building with Cadillac Fairview, but I would suggest that maybe there is no existing space available in this Cadillac model.

Ms Angove: No. There is no existing facility that can accommodate this amount of space and meet our locational requirements.

Mrs Marland: Exactly, but you're saying two things here. That's the point I'm trying to make. You have a very demanding list. You are building an empire in terms of a building. You have to admit, when you describe all the facilities that are going to be in this brand-new building you're building, that there isn't anything you've missed in terms of the design. When you talk about—

Mr King: Can I just respond to that?

Mrs Marland: No, I'm sorry. I haven't—

Mr King: You don't want to ask questions?

The Chair (Mr Remo Mancini): Order, please.

Mrs Marland: Thank you, Mr Chairman. When you describe the trouble you've taken to make sure that all these needs are met in this new building, I'm sure there isn't an organization in this province that wouldn't like to have the same option. I'm sure there are ministries within our government that would like to have the same option the Workers' Compensation Board has had.

My understanding of the Workers' Compensation Board is that it is an arm's-length agency of the government. I recall that the last time I was in a position of learning something about the WCB was when the Workers' Compensation Board came before this Legislature's standing committee on agencies, boards and commissions. As an arm's-length government agency, I don't think your board should have had the choice or the option of going ahead and spending $180 million building a brand-new building for its palace when we have other agencies of this government, including ministries as well, I might add, that work, I'm sure, in far less than an average of 150 square feet per worker, that do not have the conveniences of all the equipment.

You talked about the special flooring and all these other options. I'm sure those options are the ideal choice, but in this province in the kind of situation we've been in—we certainly were in a recession when you made the final decision a year ago, if you said you made it in July 1991. I just don't understand how the board could have been so irresponsible as to make this decision at that time, knowing what the costs were. You said you haven't even finalized how it's going to be paid for. I think that's particularly interesting.

If you have other answers that you haven't been able to give so far to the questions that have been asked this afternoon, maybe you can give them, but if you can tell us—

Mr King: I don't hear a question.

Mrs Marland: Well, you have been asked about the cost, Mr King. If you think this is amusing, I don't. You have been asked about the cost of this building and I'm simply saying that in your presentation you talked about $25 a square foot for 20 years. Then when I read the minutes of your meeting, in fact those are not the words in the minutes of your meeting of February 1, 1991. It says, "From a tenant perspective, the WCB will be assured the security of a long-term fixed lease over 20 years at average occupancy costs comparable to market rental rates."

Does that mean the market rental rates of 10 years from now, if they are more, on average, than $25 or $23, $22, whatever your base rent was, will be what you will be paying?

Mr King: No.

Ms Angove: That's exactly right. I mean, that stays fixed. The $25 stays fixed.

Mrs Marland: Well, one of you said no and one of you said yes.

Ms Angove: If your question is, "Does the $25 stay fixed for 20 years?" the answer is yes, it does. So when other rents are escalating—for instance, someone who's paying zero net rent for three years, his rent will escalate in the later stages of his lease. That's how developers get back the money they lose in the upfront part of the rent when it's zero net rent. They just get it back later in the rent. If you don't pay it up front, you pay it later. When they are paying it later, our rent will be fixed at $25 a square foot.

Mr King: Could I answer one question you had?

Mrs Marland: Yes, please.

Mr King: You had referred to the building as a palace and you said it has all these options which are presumably unnecessary. Is it the ramps and parking for injured workers that you object to, and the accessibility? Is it the efficiencies that will be provided by access flooring which will allow the equipment to be moved at no cost versus having to go up through the roof at the present time? These so-called options are not things that will lead to workers working in luxury. It is minimal working conditions, business cases which will make us more efficient, and our customers will be able to access us.

Mrs Marland: Mr Chairman, I don't think Mr King needs to insult me by suggesting that I would—

Mr Pat Hayes (Essex-Kent): What have you been doing?

The Chair: Order, please. You'll have your turn.

Mrs Marland: It's very interesting, since people with disabilities happens to be one of my shadow cabinet portfolios, and I really take exception to the fact that you're suggesting I would be opposed—

Mr King: I asked you a question.

Mrs Marland: Excuse me. You're not even letting me answer.

The Chair: Order, please.

Mr Mike Farnan (Cambridge): Oh, my God. Do we have to put up with this, Mr Chair?

The Chair: Every member will have a chance to put forward his or her ideas and ask questions.

Mrs Marland: For you to suggest that I'm opposed to this new building because I might be opposed to—

Mr Farnan: You don't treat the—

The Chair: I'm going to have to add more time to Ms Marland's time if you keep interrupting her.

Mrs Marland: —ramps for injured workers is a little bit beneath you. That's all I'm going to say. I think the rest stands for itself.

If the government of this province thinks it's okay for the Workers' Compensation Board to spend $180 million to build its own palace on the most expensive real estate in this city, then that's on its back; it's certainly not on ours.

The Chair: Mr Tilson, you have about 30 seconds.

Mr Tilson: There's been much time spent on the tremendous savings there are going to be. Can you give us a financial framework of what this whole venture is going to cost, the revenue which you expect, whether it be for rental or otherwise? There must be a complete breakdown. I appreciate your issue with respect to how it's going to cost less than it is at Bloor Street and that sort of thing.

Mr King: We have reports which give the return to the fund, for instance, under various different scenarios, and our background papers will be distributed to you as per your earlier request.

Mr Tilson: I had one other question. Do I have time?

The Chair: Quickly.

Mr Tilson: The question that many of us who sit in the Legislature have, because of the questions that are given to us by constituents, is on the service delivery with respect to workers' compensation. I, as a sitting member, can tell you that you, not you personally but the Workers' Compensation Board, are described as a monster out of control, that the service delivery, to be polite, is absolutely appalling. There's been a legislative committee that has recently reported on this matter and there has been an internal task force of the board that's reported on this matter, all of which have said the same thing. Virtually every aspect of the service delivery of the Workers' Compensation Board needs revamping. Can you tell me how this venture will solve that?

Mr King: The earlier presentation on the efficiencies to our business, I believe, did cover that. It talked about the fact that when people come to visit us they can get there more easily, which is of itself a service delivery issue, which is accessibility.

I apologize to the member if she felt I was being insulting, and please, I withdraw any comment that you may have found insulting.

Mr Tilson: You can apologize to her later. Meanwhile, you're dealing with my question.

The Chair: The time has expired. We have Mr Duignan, Mr Hayes and then Mr Fletcher. You'll have to divide the time among yourselves in order to properly share it.

Mr Duignan: First, on behalf of the government side, thank you for coming along and making a presentation here today and tomorrow. I just have a couple of questions and then I will turn it over to my colleagues.

When the initial discussions started to take place of exploring the possibility of relocation of the WCB headquarters from Bloor Street to elsewhere—I understand that took place in the late 1980s some time—was the government of the day made aware of the thinking of the WCB at that time?

Mr King: I was not present at the time, but I understand there to have been monthly meetings held between board officials and the minister in order to brief the minister on all and sundry matters that were taking place at the Workers' Compensation Board.

Mr Duignan: There have been numerous requests for various pieces of information from you here today. Could that information also be made available to this committee?

Mr King: I'm not too sure that meetings between the board and the ministry in 1989 or 1990 are either available to me or, if they are, whether that has some sort of privilege. I would have to check, in addition to the check I have to do on some of the information Mr Tilson wanted.

Mr Duignan: Thank you. When you and the Chair became appointed to the Workers' Compensation Board some time in April 1991, at that time you undertook an evaluation to see if this was a good decision for the Workers' Compensation Board, and you hired some three independent consultants at that time. Basically, their conclusion was that it was indeed a good investment for the Workers' Compensation Board. Could you maybe go over some of those reasons for the committee?

Mr King: Ms Angove earlier had gone over some of the reasons why this is a good investment. Number one, the investment is guaranteed by the tenancy of the WCB; therefore, we don't pay our rental fees to a third party and get no return. Part of the return on the WCB's investment fund is therefore guaranteed by our rent. It's anticipated that there will be a rate of return to the investment fund from the office tower of about 13%. That is a significant rate of return to our investment fund.

One of the other members who had asked the question talked about the unfunded liability. If we could have a guaranteed investment of all our funds of 13% for 20 years, I think perhaps that would go a long way towards dealing with the question of the unfunded liability. So from the point of view of the office tower as an investment, I don't think anyone could question that, and the documentation supporting that position will be made available to this committee.

Mr Duignan: In terms of dollar value, what would that return in the amount of dollars be every year, roughly?

Mr King: It's over $20 million a year.

Mr Duignan: For 20 years. So in fact, of the initial investment of—I don't think it's a full $180 million because Cadillac Fairview and the TD Bank are also putting up some 12.5% of the funds each.

Mr King: That's correct.

Mr Duignan: So you're talking about $140 million or $150 million. In fact, for an initial investment of $150 million, you will get some $400 million back over the 20-year span of this agreement?

Mr King: Understand that we're not putting up the entire $140 million or $150 million. We would be putting up only a portion of that. The rest of it would be borrowed money. So we would be making money by borrowing money.

Mr Duignan: No matter what way you look at it, it's still a good investment for the Workers' Compensation Board.

Mr King: It's a good investment for the Workers' Compensation Board. What I've heard by way of critique is that the timing is particularly bad.

Mr Duignan: I can see the mismatch between the board's needs and the capacity of the existing building. It results in a number of inefficiencies and imposes some economic costs on the board, as well as social costs on the injured workers. Could you give us some idea of what these costs are. To what extent would building modifications in an existing building be possible?

Mr King: Ms Angove had earlier pointed out that if you're in a wheelchair and want to come to 2 Bloor, you've got to ride three elevators, one of them being the elevator which takes you up the service area and through the garbage room. There is no modification to 2 Bloor that will deal with the basic structural function. It was never built to have access for injured workers.

In terms of the other areas, we spend an incredible amount of overtime payments in order to get people to come in on the weekend to run cables through our ceiling because we have no access flooring. The amount of time lost because of eye strain and bad morale because of the lighting conditions, the loss of an hour a week per employee who is in head office, all of these things add up to rather enormous business problems for the WCB in giving service to our customers and access to those with disabilities.

That's just a brief summary.

Ms Angove: If I can just show you this, it's part of your handout; it's near the end of your package. This will give you a sense of the service delivery impacts as a result of gaining one hour per employee per week with reduced elevator waiting time only. This does not speak to the efficiency gains as a result of reduced down time. This is just elevator waiting time.

The weekly service impact equivalent of one hour per employee per week translates into an additional 600 calls that our telephone inquiry clerks can make, an additional 780 claims that can be adjudicated by our claims adjudicators and an additional 800 workers who can be interviewed by our vocational counsellors. Our revenue staff can respond to 48 more letters, 40 more calls etc. That gives you some indication of the service delivery impact of working in a facility that has been designed to accommodate the operation.

Mr Duignan: Thank you. You indicated earlier that—

The Chair: I just want to remind you, Mr Duignan, that Mr Hayes and Mr Fletcher are waiting. They'll have to divide up whatever time is left.

Mr Duignan: Okay. Besides, as I indicated, being a good investment from the fact the WCB will make about $300 million over 20 years on the initial investment, it also means this new building is designed to meet the injured workers' needs, which the existing buildings do not right now, plus it's to be handicapped-accessible as well.

I notice that the land belongs to the CBC and that you will be leasing the land from the CBC and I was wondering what the land lease cost is per square foot.

Mr Glenn Cooper: It's approximately $5.25 a square foot.

Mr Duignan: Okay, and the $25 you're talking about includes that $5?

Mr King: That's correct.

Mr Duignan: I'll yield to my other colleagues.

Mr Hayes: The workers' comp board has been in the building on Bloor Street since what, 1972?

Ms Angove: Since 1974.

Mr Hayes: Okay, thank you. A lot of these deficiencies you pointed out—naturally times have changed, the workloads have increased, there's no question, with the new technology and things of that nature. But obviously someone just didn't come along even in 1989 or 1990 and say, "Hey, let's do something new and let's go to a new building." You must have had a lot of complaints from the clients and from the workers and from the management side of deficiencies. You've pointed many out here. This must have gone on for some time. Can anybody indicate to me how long ago this planning process was actually started as a result of finding all the deficiencies in the building?

Mr King: From the point of view of the corporate board, I believe it was indicated in earlier information that in late 1989 people started to look at it. But I think they started to look at it more because the lease in the existing facility was to be up in 1994, and what options were there? Was 2 Bloor an option?

I believe it's probably true, although I wasn't there, that the board itself did not look at 2 Bloor in terms of its impact on service delivery until after this detailed study of where the board could end up being in 1994 was done and an impact analysis had been done about the service delivery.

I want to respond just very briefly on service delivery. Service delivery has been a question at the Ontario WCB for as long as I have known the institution, which goes back into the 1970s. I don't believe it's something that was invented in recent years, the service delivery problem.

I would argue in fact that the steps that are being taken by the chair on appointing a task force and saying, "Help us with the service delivery problem," with the action plan that resulted from that task force report, which has got the place energized now, the stabilization I have been able to create over the past year and a half of the workforce, the attempt to maximize the use of the technology that was introduced, the correcting of errors which may have been made as the board moved from the old entrepreneurial model into modern managed business, all are having an impact on service delivery.

I sat in front of the other committee of this Legislature which was grilling us about service delivery in April 1991. I sat before the same committee some weeks ago, and it was a different point of view on the part of those people who had looked at the service delivery. They congratulated the board for the things we have done over the past year and a half to improve service delivery. It is my opinion that by giving us the tools of a different facility, we will make another huge increase in service delivery improvement.

Mr Hayes: I know you've touched on this but, in my opinion anyhow, we've heard a lot of simplistic or irresponsible estimates that have been thrown out into the public, and it's been in the media several times about the $380 per square foot that it's going to cost. I would really like any one of you here, for the record and to make it clear—we want to know exactly what it's going to cost and how this individual and others have come up with this $380 per square foot, which I think is really unfair to the board. It's irresponsible to give that kind of message out to the public.

Mr King: I was very disturbed to see people equate the highest possible estimate per square foot for building a building with what you can go out and rent a building for. That was the direct comparison that I saw in the media. I believe the comparison was that the board is picking up space at $380 a square foot when you can rent space for $20 a square foot. Equating the cost of building per square foot versus the cost of the rental is a rather unfair comparison.

The cost to rent a space for 20 years right now may be lower than originally predicted in 1990, but the cost of building would be $120 a square foot. I believe what someone had done was to take the highest estimate of cost of the building and divide it only by the 525,000 that the WCB are going to occupy, rather than the 755,000 that the total space of the building involves. That's where the mathematical error had arisen. Why the error in equating the cost of building versus the cost of rental occurred, I don't know.

The Chair: Excuse me. Did you say—how much?

Mr King: Some $120 a square foot construction.

The Chair: What figures did you use to come up with $120? What did you divide into?

Ms Varnam: That is based on the gross buildable area of the building, the parking and the shared common areas divided into the total project costs, the current estimate.

The Chair: The auditor has a question.

Mr Erik Peters: I just have a very quick question. You gave us the number of $180 million.

Mr King: It's $177 million, to be precise.

Mr Peters: Over 755,000 square feet, or is 755,000 square feet not the square footage you are talking about? Because on that basis, you're looking at $240 a foot.

Ms Varnam: That's if you're only looking at the cost of the building, but there is also a parking garage and shared common areas and facilities included in that, so the building cost on the gross buildable area is approximately $120 a square foot.

Mr Peters: But to be comparable, to just ask you the question, the $20 a foot you're dealing with is for office space. Therefore, are you now relating total footage to build garages and parking spots with square footage per office?

Ms Angove: That's included in your typical net rent anyway. That would be included in it. But the problem with this comparison is that net rent is paid yearly. You pay $20 per square foot per year. They were comparing that annual cost to the cost for investment over the life of the investment, and you can't compare an annual cost to a one-time cost. That was the problem.

Mr Peters: I totally accept your point. I was trying to reconcile the numbers you have given us to come to the $120. That's what I was trying to help the committee with. I still have trouble with that.

Ms Angove: The $120 was being compared to the $380.

The Chair: I think there's quite a discrepancy there. We've got 755,000 square feet divided into $180 million. That's almost $240 a square foot.

Mr King: That's the usable office space.

The Chair: Even if we include the garage, does that take it down $100 a square foot?

Ms Varnam: The garage is approximately 400,000 square feet and the shared common areas and facilities are about 45,000 square feet.

The Chair: But surely it doesn't cost as much to build a garage as it does the office.

Interjection: More.

The Chair: It costs more?

Ms Varnam: More, yes.

Mr Joseph Cordiano (Lawrence): Could I ask what the actual cost for the garage is?

The Chair: Excuse me. I promised Mr Hayes—
Interjection.

The Chair: I'm going to give Mr Hayes added time, but go ahead, Mr Cordiano, very quickly.

Mr Cordiano: Very quickly, what would be the costs of the garage and the common areas on a per-square-foot basis?

Ms Varnam: I don't have that information available, but I can get that answer for tomorrow. I don't have it off the top of my head.

Mr Cordiano: That would significantly increase the cost of the construction, to bring it up to $180 million, because that's the discrepancy we're talking about, right? Okay.

Mr Hayes: I think what I'll do, so we can allow these people to respond, is give them time and not run our time out; in all fairness let them respond. I will pass on to my colleague here to ask a question.

Mr Derek Fletcher (Guelph): Just a couple of questions. I need the information. How long have you been at the Bloor Street location?

Ms Angove: Since 1974.

Mr Fletcher: In that time have you done renovations to upgrade the facility?

Ms Angove: Yes, we have done some leasehold improvements. To the extent that we could improve the workspace we have. As I mentioned, some of the problems we were having with the electrical system—

Mr Fletcher: Who paid for that?

Ms Angove: The WCB, of course.

Mr Fletcher: Not the landlord?

Ms Angove: No. We relocated the computer centre and we relocated the print shop, the microfilm function. Now, some day-to-day work obviously Bramalea has done, as it does in any building just to maintain it. They have paid for some of that, but in terms of improving our own space, WCB obviously has paid for it.

Mr Fletcher: As far as the Bloor Street location is concerned, could you get a guarantee of a fixed rate over 20 years?

Ms Angove: Yes, we did when we moved in.

Mr Fletcher: When you first moved in?

Ms Angove: Yes, we did.

Mr Fletcher: And it was at $20, was it?

Ms Angove: No, it wasn't.

Mr Fletcher: What was it at?

Ms Angove: Do you know, Vivian? Is it $11?

Ms Varnam: On the initial lease, the initial space, just over 200,000 square feet, it was $7 a square foot.

Mr Fletcher: Okay, that was then.

Ms Varnam: Yes.

Mr Fletcher: As far as the investment you're making at Simcoe Place is concerned, the best time for building or to do something like this is during the time of low interest rates and competitive construction costs. Is that what you've found?

Ms Angove: Yes, the consultant firm Drivers Jonas has told us that construction costs are as low now today as they have been since 1982.

Mr Fletcher: Okay. So according to those rates, you could be saving a lot of money doing it at this time, rather than when the market starts to rebound.

Ms Angove: Yes, absolutely.

Mr Fletcher: Just on that alone, how many jobs are going to be created by building this facility? Do you have any idea? We're looking at construction jobs obviously. Hopefully it won't raise your clientele.

Ms Angove: About 300 to 400 construction jobs and obviously many, many related jobs in manufacturing etc.

Mr Fletcher: In the Toronto area. I've always been one of those people who have said, as far as renting is concerned, you're always throwing money away and you don't see anything at the end of it. At the end of the 20 years, what am I going to see as far as the WCB is concerned with this building? Am I going to see that you own a building or 75% of it?

Ms Angove: Yes.

Mr Fletcher: And that's going to be yours.

Mrs Marland: No, the people of Ontario's.

Mr Fletcher: So on the market that becomes an asset as far as everything else is concerned?

Ms Angove: An asset of the investment fund.

Mr Fletcher: Right. Okay, thank you.

The Chair: Any other questions. Mr Duignan, we have some time left, if you wish, or Ms Haeck.

Ms Christel Haeck (St Catharines-Brock): In the time that you have rented space at 2 Bloor, obviously your office staff increased, at least I would assume, somewhat substantially over the almost 20 years you've been there. Has it doubled? Does someone have a handle on that?

Ms Angove: In terms of number of staff we're at? Yes, it's close to double; not quite, but close. We now lease over 400,000 square feet at 2 Bloor and in some offices very close to that location.

Ms Haeck: With your long-term projections over the 20 years, are you seeing yourself—because obviously the range of technologies you're using—again having to increase staff at all? Obviously you will have to to some degree, but in the same magnitude?

Ms Angove: Did you want to answer that, Brian? No, we don't, but we have built a number of flexibilities into this lease so that if we need to lease additional space, we have the option to do that or if we decide it makes sense to decentralize some of the functions, we can sublet some of the space at an attractive rent. We've covered both sides of that.

Ms Haeck: I know there definitely is a concern among the business community. I've had a small employer come in and indicate his concern that he was seeing his rates go up and he felt he was providing you with the means by which you were going to build this—

Interjection: Ivory tower.

Ms Haeck: Ivory tower, yes. I was trying to avoid that, but I guess that's what the constituents are to some degree saying. The thing that really does concern me is that in looking at some of the briefing documents, you get a sense that you've tried to be responsible in the financing of the building, but that's not a message that really has gotten out. In fact, even the message about your moving has been relatively low-key until quite recently. Obviously some people in the ministry have known, but it has not been widely known and you haven't necessarily communicated that well. That would be one comment I would make to you. How would you see yourselves being able to communicate better with some of the employer groups, particularly to assure them that their rates are not going to skyrocket as a result of this building?

Ms Angove: I think it's a very good point. We have had very specific briefing presentations to the employer community over the past two months. They have been able to come in, they have received a very similar presentation, they've been able to ask their questions and we've addressed their issues and concerns personally.

Ms Haeck: You've had over two years to get to this point. How much more planning are you going to have to do? Is this basically done and the shovel is going to go in the ground? Obviously, there is still a certain anxiety about what all this is going to cost. Usually there's a question mark about cost overruns and all those kinds of things. Have you got a pretty firm price?

Ms Angove: Yes, we do.

Mr King: We have a person specifically monitoring all the costs of the project on a day-to-day basis, someone who's working for us in a dedicated way. We're very aware of all of the costs.

Ms Haeck: And it's on track or coming in even better?

Ms Angove: Yes. It has come in much lower than we originally anticipated.

Mr Callahan: You've indicated that the land is leased and you own the building, or this numbered company owns the building. What is the life expectancy of that building?

Ms Angove: I understand it'll be 50 years, something like that.

Mr Callahan: You understand? Is there anything written or is there any professional opinion given as to the life expectancy of that building?

Ms Angove: I should have someone qualified give you that answer, so let me ask Drivers Jonas exactly what they think the life expectancy is. I understand it is at least 50 years; it may be longer.

Mr Callahan: No, no. Has that question never been asked or considered before, what the life expectancy of the building is?

Ms Angove: The reason I say it's 50 years is because we have a 20-year fixed lease with three options to lease for 10 years beyond that, so I know it's at least 50 years. It may be well beyond that.

Mr Callahan: You're not answering my question. We've heard Mr King say this is part of your investment portfolio. Now, you don't own the land; you own the building. I would have thought that because it's part of your investment portfolio, that question would have been asked a long time ago as to what the life expectancy of that building would have been in terms of deciding whether or not it was a good investment for your real estate portfolio. Am I correct that it's never been asked?

Mr King: I cannot answer that question today. I don't have that information.

Ms Angove: It may have been asked by the investment fund and we just don't know the answer.

Mr Cooper: I'd like to add that the projections which have been done from an investment point of view are based on the first 20 years of holding that investment. If you look at today's value of money that you're going to receive 21 or 22 years from now, it really has no value. Therefore, we ignored any return on value after the 20th year. We've only looked at the first 20 years' return on value.

Mr Callahan: You're using the pension funds of the people today, tomorrow and in the future in terms of their benefits to be paid out to them. You're investing those in a commodity but, first, you don't even have any idea how long that building is scheduled to last and, two, it's a lease arrangement. I could maybe have seen this as a wise investment if you owned the land, but you don't own the land; CBC owns the land. Any potential increase in the value of this commodity, in terms of those pensioners, has been lost.

You've got a building that's going to depreciate over God knows how many years—you don't know how many years. I find it really incredible when you're making an investment like that, which is risking pension dollars. I'd hate to think what's going to happen down the line if this asset is depreciating. It seems to me that all that's been looked at by the Workers' Compensation Board is, first, "Let's have new accommodations, new digs, for ourselves that will meet our needs to the nth degree unlike any other department in the government, even though we're in an economic bad time." Second: "Let's not buy the land. Let's lease it and just make sure we can get $20 a square foot for 20 years, because that's a big investment."

I like to think that every member of this Legislature of whatever political stripe is more concerned about the question of protecting the pensions of those people who have been injured and the employers who paid for those pensions to ensure that their workers, who are denied the right to sue now and have been for a considerable period of time, are protected. I'm sorry; I don't mean to be pejorative, but I just get the feeling that Workers' Compensation has just decided, "Well, so what?" If I'm wrong, then I would have thought you would have looked at the question of what you're going to have at the end of 20 years in terms of an investment.

Ms Angove: We have looked at that.

Mr Callahan: No, you haven't. You told me you guessed it was 50 years. It tells me that you have no—

Ms Angove: I said it was at least 50 years.

Mr Callahan: It tells me that you have not done your homework, that you do not have, nor have you ever had, a professional, qualified statement of how long that building becomes an asset. If that's the case, then I feel you've done exactly what I've suggested to you.

I don't like to be critical of you people, because you're obviously working in a system where there are others responsible for it, but it seems to me that the pension rights and the pension protection of these people should be your primary concern, not the question of whether or not you can get digs that are better than anybody else's. At a time like this, I can't understand why you would even consider it.

I'd like to know what the cost of getting out of this thing is. I want those figures, and hopefully you can have them for us tomorrow, so we can look at them in terms of what the overall saving you say is in comparison to the overall cost of getting out. I don't think the taxpayers in Ontario can afford a Cadillac; I think we need a Volkswagen right now. We'll have to be satisfied with a Volkswagen.

Mr King: In brief response to a question about the future of the pensioners being in jeopardy because of this investment, might I suggest that I was the inheritor of a $10-billion unfunded liability. I didn't invent that, nor did the present Workers' Compensation administration. I believe if you look at the record and if you look at what puts in jeopardy the future payments to pensioners, you might look to the preceding 20 years and see where the unfunded liability arose.

Mr Callahan: Mr King, I'm perfectly aware of that, and what you say is quite true. But the fact is that because 20 years have gone by with an unfunded liability, it doesn't mean we have to add more to it, with greater uncertainty to the benefits those people are expecting to receive, having been denied their rights to sue in court and depending upon a system that—I don't think there's a member of the Legislature of any political stripe who would say it is one that works very well.

I know you people have worked hard at trying to bring it along, but the WCB was the first thing I heard about when I came down here. I think each and every one of us, as ombudsmen in our own offices, finds the difficulties we have and the frustrations we have in trying to get a file pulled so we can deal with it for these people. For God's sake, if they have to put up with that antiquated system, I don't want somebody to have to believe that their pension rights down the line may be denied them because of poor investments by the WCB.

I have to tell you, on everything you've told us today, you haven't given me one good reason why you should invest that kind of money in a building at a time when people in Ontario are losing their homes, they can't pay their taxes. And you people are prepared to spend $200 million on a palatial mansion to house WCB. Well, I'm sorry. This is one member who can't support that.

Mr King: I'm not too sure one should put any seed or germ in the mind of people receiving pensions from the WCB, as you seem to have done, that this particular investment puts their pensions at risk.

Mr Callahan: I'm not trying to do that, but there's the potentiality. You don't even know what that asset is worth, how long it's going to be worth something; it's going to be depreciated right off the books. If you wanted to go out and do something, why didn't you buy the land, invest in real estate, and maybe 20 years down the line or 50 years down the line you'd have something? That's a funding of a liability. You haven't funded it. You're building a building; the building depreciates. What's the value of it in 20 years? How long is it going to last? It's got a lot of elevators, I understand, but that's about all I can figure.

Ms Angove: I think you will find that the consultant's report will confirm that in 20 years the return on investment is very favourable for the WCB, and beyond that, that return improves over time. It does not depreciate.

Mr Callahan: Can you produce that consultant's report tomorrow. I was surprised that when I asked you the question of how long this building is going to last, you just gave us a figure, "Well, about 50 years." You didn't tell me you had a report.

Ms Angove: I said I can speak to 50 years because I know that's our option to renew the lease.

Mr Callahan: I'd like to see that consultant's report tomorrow as well.

Ms Angove: Fine.

The Chair: I think what I'm going to have to do to make sure everybody gets fair time is go around again. We're going to have Mr Cordiano conclude the Liberals' time, then we're going to go to the Progressive Conservatives, then I'm going to give the government members another block of time. I'm going to make sure that everybody gets their questions on. So with the assistance of the committee, Mr Cordiano.

Mr Cordiano: I will endeavour to be brief. I just want to recap what I think is the fundamental focus of the motion that was brought to this committee in order to investigate this question, and that is coming back to the basic concept of value for money and the decision that was taken largely being an economic one.

Can this decision be justified in today's economic environment, given that the decision was probably initiated in a period, 1989 and 1990, when the economic conditions were quite different from today, economic conditions that would have perhaps favoured this kind of decision back then, given the rental rates and given the kind of leasing arrangements that could have been made back in 1989? Looking forward, this kind of investment probably looked highly attractive at that time.

It's wise to say that given today's economic circumstances and the state of our economy locally, which is quite important not only to this province but perhaps to the whole country, we as concerned legislators would like to have, without any doubt, certainty that this decision is in fact a good economic decision based on some sound economic principles. We're not convinced of that. I don't think anyone is.

Ms Angove: Given today's economic climate, this is a better deal today than it was in 1989 or 1990 simply because construction costs have gone down so much in the last two years that it costs less to build a building.

Mr Cordiano: Well, that may be correct, but there are certain other factors to be taken into account which I think you've overlooked in making this decision. Construction costs may be lower, but the whole cost of a lease versus construction costs or versus whatever other decision you wanted to make—we're not comparing the cost of construction today to the cost of construction in 1989 and saying, "This is a good decision, given that narrow framework." We're comparing today building versus leasing an existing facility.

You have indicated that other conditions have impinged on your decision, and now we need to verify that. We also need to attach some dollar figures and perhaps something that cannot be equated with dollars: whether that's a priority in these difficult economic times. Because against the backdrop of fulfilling the requirements of your space needs, we want to ask ourselves, could you in fact lease the existing space with the variety of other variables attached brought into that equation? That is with the understanding that those priorities may not be met, but those priorities have to be set against the backdrop of economic conditions. How much does it cost to make those priorities become a reality?

We think it's a question of reordering priorities—at least, I'm speaking for myself—and making a decision based on value for money, if you can lease existing space that almost meets your needs or comes close to that. If you can't, then what we're really dealing with is a costly decision versus a non-costly decision with all those other conditions attached to it. That's really, in a nutshell, what I think is the fundamental focus of this question.

Mr King: I think if we start with one assumption, 2 Bloor was not considered by either the landlord or the tenant as being acceptable to our modern business needs. I think of the inability of that building to deal with the temperature, so that we have to move our computer out of it, and of the inability of that building to move people, to move our 150,000 customers. If we were to follow your scenario, I think that at minimum we would have to look whether there was another building in the Metro area which could serve our needs.

Mr Cordiano: Or several facilities. There are a lot of variables that can be entered into this equation. I think that it's always measured against priorities that you set for yourselves, which we may not even agree with you on. We don't have enough details. I'm glad you've agreed to bring forward all of those detailed studies that were done for you and the parameters that you set in place for making this decision and the kinds of priorities that you've listed, which we have some idea of, but what all of those things mean in terms of dollar figures and value for money is the way in which this committee operates. We're doing an audit of your decision on a value-for-money basis, which is entirely the way in which we operate on an ongoing basis on this committee. That's what we're looking for.

Ms Angove: Can I ask you that in looking at value for money you recognize that occupancy cost includes not only net rent but the cost associated with working out a facility that cannot support the operation, the cost associated with waiting for elevators and the cost associated with downtime of equipment? If you include those costs and compare—

Mr Cordiano: Let me just interrupt you. I agree, and it may be entirely appropriate that you need to move. No one is going to question that on this committee. That's not really the question here. The facilities you're at now are not adequate. We all recognize that. The way that your existing facilities present themselves is not adequate. I will speak for myself. The experiences of my constituents will indicate that, and what you're presenting as fact we'll take as fact in regard to that. But I think it's also important to understand that you could make repairs to the existing facilities. You're saying that that's not feasible.

Ms Angove: You can't add elevators.

Mr Cordiano: That's fine. I can understand that and you will bring forward studies that indicate that, or at least cost estimates to prove that fact and validate that. You will also bring forward other information which will validate what we're saying. To this point, we have none of that information and I don't think the public does either. You're simply saying, "Take it at face value that this decision makes economic sense." There are too many doubters out there, starting with this committee.

The Chair: Okay, we're going to continue with the rotation.

Mrs Marland: Ms Angove, who is the consultant to whom you're referring when you say you will bring that report tomorrow morning?

Ms Angove: I'm sorry; which report are you referring to?

Mrs Marland: In answer to Mr Callahan, you said you would bring the consultant's report with you tomorrow morning. I'm asking who that consultant is.

Ms Angove: Drivers Jonas.

Mrs Marland: Okay. Can I be clear? The total square footage of this building is 755,000 square feet.

Ms Angove: For the office space.

Mrs Marland: The gross leasable area is 755,000 square feet. How much of that is the WCB going to occupy?

Ms Angove: Seventy per cent; 525,000 square feet.

Mrs Marland: Okay. Today you do not have any leases in hand for the balance of that 30% of that building?

Ms Angove: That's being handled by the developer, so I really can't speak to potential tenants it may be negotiating leases with.

Mrs Marland: Okay. Are you telling this committee that you're not responsible for the balance of the leasable space in this building?

Ms Angove: Certainly we, as a tenant, are not.

Mrs Marland: How about you as owners? That's what we're interested in here, because you're spending this money buying this building.

Ms Angove: The investment fund is exposed to the spec space, 75% of it; you're right.

Mrs Marland: So are you saying, then, that the investment fund will be liable for the balance of the space that you're not using if it's not rented?

Mr King: We have done projections about the return to the investment fund under various scenarios regarding that speculative space.

Mrs Marland: Excuse me, Mr King. I only have a few opportunities here to ask questions, so I want to be very specific.

Mr Hayes: You should give him an opportunity to answer, Margaret.

Mrs Marland: You have a building that's 750,000 square feet, more or less, and your use of that is 70% of that space. You're one of three parties to building this building, I understand?

Mr King: Yes.

Mrs Marland: Your press release, by the way, says the Toronto-Dominion Centre. Did it mean the Toronto-Dominion Bank?

Ms Angove: Toronto-Dominion Place.

Mrs Marland: Is the Toronto-Dominion Place the Toronto-Dominion Bank?

Ms Angove: Yes.

Mrs Marland: Okay. So if the balance of this brand-new building—30% of this brand-new building—isn't leased, would I be correct in assuming that the liability for the cost of that unleased space will fall on all three parties?

Mr King: That's correct.

Mrs Marland: So you have a liability for 30% of this building at a time when there is a tremendous surplus of office space in downtown Toronto. Are you not concerned about the fact that you may have difficulty renting the balance of this building?

Ms Angove: Only if it's not rented for 20 years. Drivers Jonas has confirmed to us that when it is rented, the investment fund will gain the benefit of those healthy rents during the time that it is rented. They also don't think it will be problematic to rent that space simply because no new office space is being built in downtown Toronto. The trend is to move grades B and C buildings to grade A buildings, which is what this building is. So they are very optimistic about the leasing feasibility of the spec space.

Mrs Marland: You've talked today about the rent, the $25-per-square-foot rent. Is that dealing totally with the building cost or does that guarantee that rent will be applied to the land lease as well? I'm glad Mr Turnbull's arrived because he's the expert in commercial real estate in our caucus. But you don't own the land, so I assume you have a land lease.

Ms Varnam: That's correct.

Mrs Marland: Is this guaranteed rent on the land as well as on the building?

Ms Varnam: It includes the cost of the land lease.

Mrs Marland: So your land lease is locked in for 20 years?

Ms Varnam: Yes.

Mrs Marland: Go ahead, David.

Mr Cordiano: Let me—

Mrs Marland: I'm just yielding to Mr Turnbull.

Mr Cordiano: We're just having some trouble hearing.

Mrs Marland: I'm sorry. I yield to Mr Turnbull.

Mr David Turnbull (York Mills): Let me ask you, how much did you pay for this building?

Mrs Marland: They paid $180 million.

Mr Turnbull: You paid $180 million and it's 700,000 square feet?

Mr King: It is 755,000.

Mr Turnbull: So how much is it per square foot? Have you done the calculation on this?

Interjections.

Mr Turnbull: How much is it per square foot?

Ms Angove: It depends which part you're looking at. Vivian, why don't you explain it?

Mr Turnbull: Take the whole building, because you've bought it.

Ms Angove: The office tower, the parking and our share of common areas.

Mr Turnbull: I'm not talking about the parking; I'm talking about the office tower.

Ms Angove: We own part of the parking. We're paying for the construction of the parking.

Mr Turnbull: Give me a number. How much is this per square foot?

Ms Varnam: When you take the gross buildable area of the tower, the parking and the shared common areas and facilities, it's $120-per-square-foot construction cost.

Mr Turnbull: Is that finished? Is that with leasehold improvements or is that just the raw construction?

Ms Varnam: That's the shell.

Mr Turnbull: How much do you propose per square foot to finish it off?

Ms Varnam: I don't have that offhand. We do have that information. I can have it tomorrow.

Mr Turnbull: Is this a land lease?

Ms Varnam: It's a land lease.

Mr Tilson: Considering the amount of equipment that you're going to be putting into that building, that's a very relevant question.

The Chair: You can only have one member of the committee at a time holding the floor and you can only have one set of questions being asked at a time. I don't mind members helping each other out. Mr Tilson, if you—

Mr Tilson: Yes, Mr Chairman, I think the question that Mr Turnbull asked is quite relevant, because of your reason for moving there—you've talked about cables and cost of equipment. I think we need to know that. If you could have that available for us tomorrow, we'd appreciate it.

Ms Varnam: Yes, I've made note of that.

Mr Turnbull: What alternative buildings did you look at by way of leasing?

Mr King: There was a lengthy explanation before you arrived regarding a public tendering process that took place in 1990, some 34 different proposals being brought forward, it being short-listed down to four proposals and the present one being chosen. We had previously volunteered to bring information tomorrow on the nature of the proposals that were brought forward in 1990 for a new facility for the Workers' Compensation Board.

Mr Turnbull: I would suggest that at these sort of rates you could have bought outright, including the land and buildings, in other locations.

Mr King: What you might be able to negotiate today probably does differ from the 1990 negotiating situation.

Mr Turnbull: The year 1990 was already in the recession. Real estate was already in the dumper at that point. I'm a commercial real estate broker and believe me, I know.

Interjection: Trust me.

Mr Turnbull: It was very low. We'd certainly trust us a lot more than your government. How on earth could you pay that kind of money when there are all kinds of buildings available for less money and without land leases?

Mr King: The documentation supporting the proposals that were brought forward in 1990 has been promised to the committee.

Mr Turnbull: I intend to scrutinize that very carefully, because that's a ridiculous price.

Mr Tilson: Mr Chairman, I have a question. How much time do I have?

The Chair: There are approximately 28 minutes left and I've got to ensure that the government members get at least 20 minutes.

Mr Tilson: Mr Chairman, a question I have to the clerk or to yourself as Chair: There have been comments made by Mr King and others that their legal opinion felt it was unnecessary to obtain an order in council pursuant to section 64 of the Workers' Compensation Act.

The Chair: Yes, I was curious about that myself.

Mr Tilson: I've read that section and the section is quite clear, I believe, just looking at the wording of it, and I don't imagine that the board representatives, the way they've been reacting this afternoon, are going to provide us with their legal opinions. If they are that's fine, but—

Mr King: I've already volunteered that.

Mr Tilson: Okay, that's great. Then we'll have our legal opinions tomorrow. Mr Chairman, does this committee have access to legislative counsel, that we can receive an opinion on that issue from the committee's point of view?

The Chair: We'll have the clerk answer that question. The answer is yes, and we're going to get an explanation as to how it works.

Clerk of the Committee (Ms Tannis Manikel): There are various lawyers attached to the legislative research service, and in the past on other committees I've gone and asked them to provide legal opinions to the committee. If that's this committee's request, I can do that as well.

The Chair: Yes, I think we can start there if it's the wish of the committee.

Mr Tilson: Do you require a motion, Mr Chair?

The Chair: We usually work by consensus. Let me put it this way: The public accounts committee has asked the board representatives to bring forward their legal opinions which would indicate that they did not have to deal with section 64 or that they were somehow exempt from section 64 or that whatever they were doing did not fall under section 64, any one of those three. So they're going to bring forward their legal opinions.

Mr Tilson wanted to seek assistance and get outside legal opinions. We have lawyers in the legislative library research department we can call upon to get legal opinions and it doesn't cost us anything. They're already on the payroll.

Mr Hayes: I'm sorry, Mr Chair. Don't we already have three legal opinions? Did I hear that correctly?

Mr King: Two, and possibly three.

Mr Hayes: They could bring those opinions forward.

Mr Tilson: To be fair to my inquiry—

The Chair: Yes; please go ahead.

Mr Tilson: —I did not ask for outside legal opinion. I'm aware that there are legislative counsel available to committees. My question is, how does this committee have access to those? Do we simply ask them?

The Chair: We just ask them.

Mr Tilson: I assume there's no problem. It's not going to cost anything further to provide that opinion?

The Chair: I wouldn't think so.

Mr Tilson: Do I assume the consensus is that the clerk can request legislative counsel to provide that opinion?

The Chair: Unless I hear some objections.

Mr Duignan: Will legislative counsel be making the decision based on the same information that was available to the two, possibly three, other lawyers before?

The Chair: I don't know what information was available to the other lawyers. That's a question I'm not able to answer at the present time.

Interjections.

Mr Cordiano: Perhaps I could clarify since I was in the chair at the time. I think it was made clear that all the relevant information and any information leading up to those decisions would be made available to the committee. Therefore, unless we get something different, you would make available all relevant information for those kinds of opinions to be gathered at this point.

The Chair: Maybe your request is premature. Would you want to wait until you saw the other documentation before you—

Mr Tilson: Mr Chairman, all I can say is that I've read section 64, which I think is available at the front desk—

The Chair: Yes, we have copies.

Mr Tilson: You could read that and you will see how clear I think it is. I'm in doubt whether or not those opinions are correct.

The Chair: I appreciate that.

Mr Tilson: It may well be that they have their opinions based on a set of facts, but the question is, has section 64 been complied with? I believe we're entitled to receive our legal opinion, not necessarily the opinions from other outside sources.

The Chair: That's a fair request. Requests such as that have been made before. We'll try to get consensus.

Mr Farnan: I'm not disagreeing, but I'm just going to move deferral of the request until such time as we get the information that's brought forward by the delegation.

Mrs Marland: May I speak to that? Mr Chairman, am I correct that we only have tomorrow to deal with this matter?

The Chair: Let me put it this way: We have four weeks set aside for the work of this committee to do a number of things. Some of the items we have on our agenda may not take as long as we think at this stage. I believe we have flexibility in the four weeks that have been allotted to us to come back to this subject if we believe there's a need.

Mrs Marland: In fairness to the committee, in answer to our questions this afternoon, Mr King suggested there had been more than one opinion on this matter. He suggested that the former chairman had received an opinion. In the minutes of the board's own meetings on February 1, 1991, as I referred to earlier, Mr Atkinson from Aird and Berlis gave his opinion and gave the answer as it pertains to the provisions of the Pension Benefits Act.

I think what we're asking is simply that while we will have further information on Mr Atkinson's opinion from the WCB tomorrow, and perhaps another opinion it's going to bring, what we are requesting is that legislative counsel have the lawyers look at their interpretation of section 64 as it pertains to the argument that the WCB is bringing. Frankly, I would like to have the benefit of our own legislative counsel, who are independent of the WCB.

The Chair: I appreciate that request. I'm not even sure that if we make the request immediately, even today before 5 o'clock, we'll be able to get an answer by tomorrow morning. That may not be possible.

Mr King: Can I give you some assistance in answering that?

The Chair: Please.

Mr King: As Ms Angove has said, there are four volumes which go to make up this particular agreement and I don't believe it feasible to ask any lawyer to give you an opinion based upon the amount of documentation in a hurry. In other words, I'm trying to help you understand that even if you gave it to legislative counsel tonight, all they would do, at best, I think, would be to get a verbal explanation of what the arrangement is, because they simply couldn't read all the documentation in a hurry.

The Chair: Mr Farnan, did you want to conclude with something else, or is your point concluded?

Mr Farnan: I think the point is that I think all members of the committee would probably not have objection to the request. I think the timing, as you pointed out, Mr Chair, is appropriate, and I don't think a day's delay and we see what comes forward tomorrow—we can make a deliberation on this tomorrow.

The Chair: Are you in concurrence with that?

Mr Tilson: I have no problem. There may be some doubt as to what we're even going to receive tomorrow. The board representatives are going to seek counsel on what they will even produce.

The Chair: Okay, that's fine. That's a subject matter we'll come back to tomorrow. I think everyone understands what we're trying to get at. My question would be different in that regard, but I'm going to hold my question until the government members have concluded their questions. I'm assuming that, Mr Tilson, Mr Turnbull, Ms Marland, you're finished?

Mr Tilson: I have one further question, if I have time, Mr Chairman.

The Chair: Okay, one last question, very quickly.

Mr Tilson: Mr King has made some comments that one of the issues they're proud of on this is that it is a good investment. I have concern with that statement, particularly when just very recently the Workers' Compensation Board had a major loss of over $100 million when it transferred $400 million to the Euromart to be placed in foreign stocks and bonds. There was a loss on that. Had the fund kept the money in Canada and invested in low-risk Ontario or federal government bonds, it would have made at least $100 million in interest, but that wasn't the case. This is a report I have from the Globe and Mail of December, which I'm sure you're aware of.

Having said that, obviously, the investment abilities of the Workers' Compensation Board in the past have been questioned. I assume you have had someone advise you with respect to the investment potential of this area. You shake your head yes. When you're providing information to us tomorrow, can you provide us with a copy of that opinion?

Mr King: Yes.

Mr Farnan: I suppose the people of Cambridge would want me to be quite direct and quite simple in addressing this question to you. It's true that you're leading off this initiative at a time of recession, and you've stated that it will improve the board's efficiency. I'd like you to answer this question fully for my constituents. Is it possible that this new building will (a) save the board money and (b) improve efficiencies? I'm sure my constituents want to know the answers to those two questions.

Mr King: Number one, we need a new facility in 1995 when the present lease at 2 Bloor Street East ends up. We have to have a place to do our business. We may be able to get short-term rental of space broken up into smaller portions than the 525,000 square feet around the city of Toronto. That will decrease our efficiency. That will make our service delivery worse rather than better.

The investment, if it isn't made, simply means that we find a different place for certain investment dollars of the WCB. They would not get as great a return as they would in the Simcoe Place development.

From the tenant side, as I've already described, we may be able to get short-term rent at less cost than the approximate $25 a square foot guaranteed for 20 years that's in this deal. It would fractionalize our service and make our service worse. So in simple answer to your question, the present plan will improve service, it will not put the board at financial jeopardy and it will improve the board's investment performance.

Mr Farnan: Some of my friends in the construction industry are certainly interested in this particular project. Those whom I've talked to have talked in terms of the creation of potentially 300 to 400 construction jobs. Would you elaborate on the potential for job creation with this project, please?

Ms Angove: In speaking with the developers, they have confirmed that is the number of construction jobs that will be made available in constructing the base building. Certainly, there will be additional jobs that will be created as a result of finishing out the space. I'm sorry; I can't give you the numbers associated with that. There will also be a number of manufacturing jobs that will be supported by the fact that we are purchasing materials to construct the building. So there are many, many areas where jobs will be created as a result of the project.

Mr Farnan: Critics have slammed the WCB for building at a time of recession. I think I tend to agree somewhat that being a time of low interest rates and having competitive construction prices would appear to make it a good time to build in actual fact.

Ms Angove: Absolutely.

Mr Farnan: Would you consider that a lot of the questions being placed to you today and maybe throughout this whole dialogue is an attempt to compare apples and oranges? On the one hand, you want to talk about comparative costs, and while you're talking about comparative costs on the one hand, you're talking about a building with grave inefficiencies, and you want to compare that with a new site where you're going to have great efficiencies.

Ms Angove: That's right. You're absolutely correct. The whole premise of relocating to a facility that has been designed to support the operation is to improve efficiencies. People have implied that the various upgrades we are incorporating in the building are luxuries. They are not. They are all being implemented in the project to support the operation. They are requirements of the WCB that may not be requirements of other government agencies, but they are specific requirements of the WCB.

They have all been thoroughly researched by design consultants. We've worked with the architects and we've worked with the mechanical, electrical and structural engineers on the project to confirm our requirements and to determine the best course of action to follow in determining what it is we need in the new building. So whether it's lighting or access flooring or elevators, it's all been done through consultants who are experts in the field.

Mr Farnan: I have one final question. This concerns the clients of the WCB. I think all members of the House are working with individuals whose lives have been put into a certain sense of turmoil. Indeed, we would want an efficient operation to be serving them. I'm concerned about the workers' stress within the WCB, I'm concerned about the case load and I'm concerned about the turnover of staff. Often when I phone or my staff phone, we find the file has been transferred to a new worker. Is this related to the building you're currently in? Does the turnover of staff at the WCB have a direct relationship to the working conditions you're in at present?

Mr King: I looked over some figures on the number of injury claims that are being put in by Ontario Workers' Compensation Board employees. In fact, there is an increasing number of claims related directly to the facility we're in, the crowding we're in, the eye strain. As I recall, we project to the end of 1992, at the time I read the report in the fall, something like 80 claims for our own employees related to working conditions, so it is a very significant problem.

Mr Farnan: If there is one thing that would benefit me in my job, and I'm sure a client of the WCB, it would be that when you enter into a relationship with the board you would have a case worker who will be there three months from now after you initiate your case, and hopefully might be there six months and nine months later. My experience is that in reality the turnover of case workers is so great that this, in my view, is the greatest inefficiency of all, because people have then to get up to speed with the client and the case they have to take on.

I believe whatever can be done to reduce staff turnover and to create efficiencies is a positive thing. Even if that costs a few dollars, I would not object to a few dollars extra being spent so that the clients, the Cambridge men and women who have to deal with the board, can be dealt with effectively.

From what I'm hearing, the rent will be comparable with market rents, will be in the range of market rents.

Mr Sorbara: Market rent is $2 a square foot.

Mr Farnan: We're talking about a 20-year contract. So much that has been said on this issue is from outer space. We have a motion from Mr Cordiano which talks about a cost of $380 per square foot. Obviously, if you want to do this kind of irresponsible throwing out of figures, you can't have a serious debate.

The reality of the matter is that if you mortgage your home over one year, you'll find that the square footage costs are astronomical, but we mortgage our home over a lifetime.

Mr Callahan: The Treasurer must have changed his view, has he?

Mr Farnan: Indeed, the question I would put to the delegation is very simple: For the constituents of Cambridge, will the rent represent, roughly, comparable market value rents over a long-range period? We're talking 25 years, I believe. Is that a reasonable assumption to make?

Ms Angove: Absolutely. In fact, over the 25 years, our rent could well be less than market rent.

Mr Farnan: The people of Cambridge will be delighted to hear that. I hope you're right.

Mr Duignan: Following my colleague's line of questioning, we've had some wild accusations made, especially from the Liberal opposition, that this move would cost $380 per square foot. We know from our meeting here today that it's not going to cost anywhere remotely close to that. Strangely enough, I picked up a press release by the Tory opposition here today and there's some wild accusations in here too.

Maybe the vice-chair of the board could explain to Mr Tilson why the board can't stay in its present location and why the present building can't be brought up to the same standards as what the WCB wants or needs.

Mr King: I think one thing that has been missing from the discussion today is that this was not a move invented by the WCB bureaucrats or the board of directors. In fact, we went out to the customers of the WCB. We talked to the injured workers, we polled the injured workers and the employers with respect to the location, with respect to the use of the present facility, and the response we got is that they wanted to be in the downtown area and they wanted to be near transportation. It isn't just the WCB bureaucrats.

Interjections.

The Chair: Order, please. I can't hear the answer.

Mr King: Sorry. I'm told it was not a poll, it was a survey. I'm not too sure.

Mr Tilson: That's only 8% of clients.

Mr King: The fact of the matter is that our present facility is totally inadequate for our business needs. It isn't so that we can have bigger offices. In fact, all of the executive at the WCB will be getting smaller offices, including the vice-chair of administration and the chairman of the board. It is to make the working conditions of the employees of the WCB tolerable and healthy; it is to improve the service delivery to the employers and the workers of Ontario; it is to become the most efficient and effective compensation board that we can become, and we cannot do that in our present facility.

Even the landlords of our present facility didn't believe they could provide a proper building for us because they didn't even bother tendering or coming forward at the time we asked for tenders on alternatives or on our future as a tenant. So for all the reasons we've discussed today, it's vital that we be able to provide the service that Ontario wants, and we need a new facility in order to do that; we need an alternative facility in order to do that.

Mr Duignan: Thank you for the answers. As he indicated earlier to an earlier question, the fact is that the return to the pension fund on this investment will be close to $300 million over the 20-year span. Most important, it also improves the service to clients, which is badly needed. I have some other questions I want to ask; maybe I'll hold off till tomorrow. I will let my colleague ask his question.

Mrs Marland: Did you know the Treasurer tried to stop this?

Mr Hayes: He asked for a legal opinion. There's a difference.

Mrs Marland: He wanted to stop it, Pat. Maybe you didn't discuss it in your caucus.

Mr Hayes: Mr Chair, these seagulls over here just won't stop.

The Chair: Order, please. Ms Haeck.

Ms Haeck: There was a question raised earlier about the performance of your investment fund. All of us who have watched the business climate of late would say that probably there is a general downturn and not too many funds are doing well. What is the performance rating of your fund in relation to other funds out in the market?

Mr King: There had been an earlier reference to a presumed loss of money on the European market. In its last measured year, the Ontario Workers' Compensation Board investment fund measured in the top 7% to 8% of all investment funds of the same sort, so the return by the Ontario investment branch is to be commended. The return of the office tower down on Simcoe and Front is projected by independent evaluation to bring an anticipated average rate of return of 12.8%, which is a good rate of return today.

Ms Haeck: I have a question for the auditor, if I may ask him the following question: According to an auditing definition, what is an asset?

Mr Peters: It's any property, good or chattel that you own.

Ms Haeck: From one of the public accounts conferences I attended, I understand that assets get valued in different ways. Can you provide a valuation over a period of 20 or 50 years of the kind of building that the WCB is undertaking, as Mr Callahan had suggested earlier?

Mr Peters: Let me just answer, first, to the "you." As auditor I cannot, but there are appraisers who probably can provide such appraisals and can also provide projections, although the projections, as you would appreciate, are opinions.

Ms Haeck: Somewhat speculative, one might suggest.

Mr Peters: That's right. You might get a variety of opinions.

Ms Haeck: In fact, evaluating something in a consistent fashion as the market was suggesting—I think Mr Cooper was suggesting that 20 years was pretty much the norm for an evaluation and that to extrapolate it to 50 was somewhat unusual.

Mr Cooper: That's correct. My point was more that in evaluating the return Mr King spoke about at 12.8%, that's looking at what the value of the building may be after 20 years. The valuers tend to use something like 20 years. If I asked you how much a dollar is going to be worth 21 years from now, most people would say, "Nothing, because inflation will take it away in 21 years." It's normally 20 years as a maximum when we look at evaluating a building. If we get return beyond 21 years, it's a bonus; we do better than 12.8%.

Mr Fletcher: Just a couple of things. If this building is built and everything starts running, this is going to benefit people across Ontario, not just in Toronto. Someone in Thunder Bay or someone in Sudbury is going to see the benefits of this, is that correct?

Mr King: Yes. The head office of the Workers' Compensation Board is contained in the proposed new facility, including our information services, which goes out to all of the regions; including our personnel and human resources, which goes out to all of the regions; including our communications branch, which goes out to all of the regions; the many corporate parts of the WCB which will be improved through the move to this office building, and that will show improvements out in the regional areas.

Mr Fletcher: So it's an investment in Ontario, it's an investment that the Ontario taxpayers are going to see a benefit from.

Mr Callahan: Is this a commercial?

Mr Fletcher: It's a lot better than Suncor or the Sky-Dome. Let's look at fiascos and some dumb moves. Let's face it. The two over there made some goofy moves in the past. What we're talking about is investments, and we're seeing an investment that's going to benefit the people of Ontario, not an investment that's going to cost the people of Ontario.

The Chair: Any other questions from the government members? Mr Hayes, do you have any questions? You have time.

Mr Hayes: We're trying to avoid the mistakes that previous governments made in the past, to the benefit of representing—

Interjections.

The Chair: Thank you for your question. Mr Sorbara has a question.

Mr Sorbara: I have a couple of questions. The vice-chair and others have tried to make the case that this is a good investment for the investment portfolio of the Workers' Compensation Board. If the Workers' Compensation Board were not a guaranteed tenant of this building, if you were proposing to invest in the building without the security of a tenant paying, initially, $26 and change per square foot, would this be a reasonable investment for the Workers' Compensation Board investment fund? In other words, if you were not a tenant of the building, would you be investing in Simcoe Place were there no secure tenant of the type that is now securing the construction price?

Mr King: I don't think I would invest in an empty building going up right now.

Mr Sorbara: You wouldn't invest in commercial real estate in the greater Toronto area right now, is that right?

Mr King: I would receive the counsel of the professional real estate people in our investment division. If you want an answer, likely there wouldn't be investment in commercial real estate in Toronto right now.

Mr Sorbara: So the only basis upon which you can say this is a good investment for the board is that the board itself turns it into a good investment by becoming the principal tenant of the building, isn't that right?

Mr King: That's very true, and that's what makes it such an advantageous situation for the Workers' Compensation Board. We turn our need to have 525,000 square feet of building in order to do our business into a way to pump up the return to our investment fund.

Mr Sorbara: Unless there were alternatives to fulfilling your need for space.

Mr King: From an investment point of view, we would have to find an alternative to whatever amount of money we are going to be putting up by way of equity, the rest of which will be borrowed.

Mr Sorbara: Can I ask why the chairman of the board isn't here today and whether he's going to be appearing during these hearings?

Mr King: I can't speak for the chairman of the board for tomorrow, but he was quite ill for the last several days. Last week he missed three days; quite sick.

Mr Sorbara: During the period when I was Minister of Labour—that was 1987 to 1989—there were ongoing discussions about new facilities for the board upon the expiry, or even before the expiry, of the lease. Those discussions took place between me as Minister of Labour and the chairman of the board, at that time Robert Elgie, and the vice-chairman of the board, at that time Alan Wolfson. The understanding was that the board would not proceed until the government had considered and reviewed the matter of new space by way of a report of the then minister—that was me—speaking to his cabinet colleagues the Premier and the Treasurer, at that time Robert Nixon.

My impression from the way in which this matter has developed is that there was never any discussion between the chair, the vice-chair or the senior administration of the board and the current Minister of Labour and the government. That is to say, it appeared that the proposal to build the new building in downtown Toronto took the government by surprise.

Can you tell us what discussions you had with the Minister of Labour about this proposal, what discussions you had with the Treasurer about this proposal, and whether you ever sought the approval of the government, which after all is a major tenant in the downtown area of Metropolitan Toronto, what discussions you had with the government through the Minister of Labour, the Treasurer, the Premier or the cabinet about this proposal and whether you received the approval of the cabinet to proceed with this proposal?

Mr King: You know some history I'm certainly not aware of. It's my understanding, however, that the previous government was aware of the board's intention to move ahead into a build situation with a developer. You weren't minister for ever. I can only assume that the practice I inherited when I arrived in the spring of 1991, which was for a monthly meeting with the minister for briefing purposes, took place. In so far as seeking approval is concerned, to the best of my knowledge no approval was sought from the government by the Workers' Compensation Board. To the best of my knowledge, the Workers' Compensation Board did not seek the approval of the provincial Treasurer. That's based upon my knowledge of the situation.

Mr Sorbara: Prior to the signing of the contracts, did you advise the Minister of Labour of your intention to enter into a contract of this sort?

Mr King: I assume that the previous Minister of Labour, who would be your successor, was advised by Dr Elgie and Mr Wolfson of their intention to proceed to sign the agreement I inherited when I arrived at the Workers' Compensation Board. I have monthly meetings with the minister to tell him what the items are on the board agenda for board deliberation and he was aware that we were to proceed.

Mr Sorbara: Let's just get our history clear here. The board of directors considered investigating this move in July 1990, three months before the government changed. When I left office, there were ongoing discussions and periodic reports to me as minister as to what the executive of the board was considering or contemplating, or what avenues it was thinking of investigating. There was a clear understanding that the board would not proceed without the concurrence of the government, but the contract you signed was signed not during our term in office, but almost two years after our term in office ended.

What I'm asking is whether you or the chair ever advised any minister in government that you intended to enter into the agreement that you entered into in 1992. Did you ever advise the government you were going to do this?

Mr King: In terms of the final agreement in June 1992, our monthly briefings of the minister would have included that. You're going to have to speak to the previous chair and vice-chair, whom you probably appointed, as to what they told the government.

Mr King: These are verbal briefings of the minister. I don't know whether you received written briefings or not.

Mr Sorbara: Was any advice ever given to the Minister of Government Services, who is a major tenant on behalf of all government departments, ministries and agencies? Was there ever any advice given in writing from your office that the Workers' Compensation Board intended entering into a binding agreement requiring the board to participate in a $200-million building project in 1992? Was any advice ever given to the Minister of Government Services, to the Minister of Labour, to the Treasurer or to any other minister in the government of Ontario prior to entering into that agreement?

Mr King: To the best of my knowledge, the only one who would have been aware of it would have been the Minister of Labour through regular monthly briefings on what the board was doing.

Mr Sorbara: Was there ever any written advice from your office to any minister or from the chairman's office to any minister that the board intended entering into such an agreement?

Mr King: I would have to have the files checked, sir. I'm sorry, but I—

Mr Sorbara: Could you do that and advise us accordingly?

Mr King: I don't believe so, but I couldn't know for certain.

Mr Sorbara: Do you not think it would have been appropriate? Given that the government of Ontario is a major tenant in the greater Toronto area and certainly in the downtown area, do you not think it would be appropriate for you, as vice-chair of the board, to at least advise in writing, formally, the Minister of Government Services that you are contemplating entering into a binding agreement requiring you to participate in a $200-million office development in downtown Toronto?

Mr King: My personal view is no.

Mr Sorbara: Notwithstanding the fact that the Minister of Government Services and the government itself were re-examining the government's complete strategy in terms of the leasing of space in the Toronto area, and that it had a program of relocation of several ministries outside of the Metro Toronto area to other communities like St Catharines, Thunder Bay and Sault Ste Marie, you don't think it would have been appropriate for you to advise the government formally that you were contemplating such an agreement?

Mr King: The government was advised through the regular monthly meetings with the minister that the board was proceeding with the facility strategy which had started in 1989.

Mr Sorbara: Was there anything in writing from your office or from the office of the chair advising the government formally that you contemplated entering into this agreement?

Mr King: To the best of my knowledge, no.

Mr Sorbara: So you never advised the government formally that you were going to enter into an agreement requiring you to participate in a $200-million development in downtown Toronto at a time when the vacancy rate in downtown Toronto was bankrupting many, many land development firms, including your current landlord?

Mr King: To the best of my opinion, no.

Mr Cordiano: Could I ask, Mr Chairman, one brief supplementary?

The Chair: A brief supplementary.

Mr Cordiano: I would ask that if in fact there was any written agreement or written documentation informing the minister or informing anyone in the government, you make that available after you make all other documents available to this committee that we've already requested.

Mr King: I have indicated to you that to the best of my knowledge there was no written communication.

Mr Cordiano: I understand that. I just want to make sure that any written documentation is made available to this committee so that it would form part of the information package that we receive.

Mrs Marland: Certainly, we are aware that the Treasurer, Floyd Laughren, asked that the option of cancelling this palace construction for the Workers' Compensation Board be investigated. That was reported in all the Toronto newspapers, that Mr Laughren wanted to see if this project could be stopped, as of last November, two months ago. Obviously, at that time the Bob Rae socialist government was concerned enough about this project that the Treasurer asked to have the option of cancelling the contract investigated.

Mr King, would you like to tell this committee what your role was in investigating that option, and could you tell us what direction you received from Mr Laughren, the Treasurer, to see if you could get out of building this building?

Mr King: You, fortunately, know as much of the provincial Treasurer's opinion on the matter as I do, because I have never spoken to the provincial Treasurer. I merely read the same press reports that you read. No approach was made to me asking how we get out of the deal or can we get out of the deal.

Mrs Marland: Maybe not you personally, but obviously this is a question directed to you as a representative of the board. I think the newspaper account refers to the fact that the request was going to be made of the board, perhaps through Mr Di Santo. Although you may not have spoken with the Treasurer, have any of your board members or your staff spoken to the treasury staff or the Treasurer himself on this matter of cancelling the contract?

Mr King: At the bureaucratic level in the board, which we represent, I'm unaware of any discussions that may have taken place with the treasury officials. Please understand that I have been trying to determine whether the board has options. One does not have to be particularly acute to realize what the situation is in real estate at the present time.

Possibilities are being explored, but this is getting into a pretty arcane area, to ask what might the costs be to breach a duly signed contract. The best you could probably get is a range. It may cost X dollars if you come in breach of the contract, but anything I'm doing in that regard is in my capacity as vice-chair of administration, and at the time when it comes to advise the board, as I must advise it from time to time, if any of them start asking the same questions this committee is asking, I have the thing under consideration, but not in response to a question from the provincial Treasurer.

Mrs Marland: I'm encouraged to hear you say that you too have been looking at this option. If you have been looking at this option, then are you saying you don't think it's a good deal any more?

Mr King: No, that is not what I'm saying. I think that any good manager has a range of options laid out before him so that if asked certain questions you can give responses. I show no weakness in my support of the position, but I'm aware that others may question very strongly the board's decision to move ahead on Simcoe Place, and as a good manager, I feel I should have some intelligent response to those sorts of questions.

Mrs Marland: You're saying that to your knowledge no one, either a staff member of the board or a member of the actual board, had any conversation with the Treasurer, Floyd Laughren, or any of his staff on cancelling this contract.

Mr King: I believe that the chairman of the board probably was in touch with the Treasurer. What they spoke of I don't know.

Mrs Marland: So does the chairman of the board operate in an autocratic style where he would make decisions solely on his own without going to the rest of his board, or certainly to you as vice-chairman?

Mr King: I believe the present chairman of the board is probably the most democratic chairman there has been in many years and that he involves the board in almost everything we do.

Mr Sorbara: You didn't know Robert Elgie.

Mr King: I'm a good personal friend of Dr Elgie.

Mr Sorbara: Odoardo is more democratic than Bob Elgie? I don't believe it.

Mrs Marland: So what you're saying is that what we read about in the press, and two of the dates of the clippings I'm looking at—one was the Toronto Star, December 1, 1992. The headline says, "NDP Seeks Legal Call on Killing WCB Deal."

"Ontario Treasurer Floyd Laughren has asked for a legal opinion on scuttling the province's $150 million"—they're complimentary to you here on the amount—"commitment to build a Workers' Compensation Board headquarters that opposition members have branded a 'ridiculous venture.'"

"But Laughren yesterday cautioned 'there may be legal obligations that are very, very difficult to get out of.'"

The suggestion here is that Mr Laughren, the Treasurer, was looking at the option of getting out of this contract, and it would be difficult to imagine for a minute, knowing Mr Laughren as I do and having the respect for him that I do in terms of how he goes about doing his homework, that he would make this decision in isolation without speaking to anyone at your board.

Mr King: I indicated to you that I believe he and the chair of the board, Mr Di Santo, had some discussion. I, by the way, read very carefully the Hansard record of the Treasurer's comments, and I believe if you check, you will not find quotes from the Treasurer in the article you just read. I believe the media perhaps had put certain words into his mouth related to the Hansard proceedings, and if you go back and you review your Hansard, I think you'll see that.

Mr Sorbara: I just have a supplementary to Ms Marland's question, if I might, Mr Chair.

The Chair: I was going to wrap it up very shortly. It can be a very short supplementary.

Mr King: Yes, I was going to ask—

The Chair: Mr Fletcher has some questions, I have some questions, our Provincial Auditor has some questions, so one brief supplementary.

Mr Sorbara: You were saying to Ms Marland that you were looking at options. Just assuming for the moment that the agreement is tight and binding, notwithstanding that the financials haven't been worked out, but that there is legal liability, at least theoretical legal liability, do you honestly believe that those who would be suing the Workers' Compensation Board, namely, the Toronto-Dominion Bank and Cadillac Fairview, would be going after the Workers' Compensation Board, and by extension the government of Ontario, for the last drop of legally binding blood in the event that the board in its wisdom chose to not complete this deal? Do you realistically think Cadillac Fairview would undertake that sort of strategy, at a time when it is trying desperately to create a better business climate in the province of Ontario?

Mr King: Cadillac Fairview, as an example, maybe has some empty space and might be prepared to talk to us about getting out of this deal. I think the party that might be most aggrieved would be the CBC, because this may be the only game in town for it for the next 10 years. That's probably the group that would be most anxious to have their lawyers talk to our lawyers.

Mr Sorbara: Do you really think that the public of Ontario and Canada would tolerate the Canadian Broadcasting Corp trying to force the Workers' Compensation Board into building a building which currently is not advisable to be built in the province of Ontario? Do you think the public would tolerate that, the new Prime Minister of Canada, whoever she or he might be, that this would happen? Is it not more realistic to think that a proper decision could be made to simply bring this deal to an end now and work out the details about how the pieces would be picked up and put back together?

Mr King: One always hopes that people would sit down and rationally discuss issues. Having dealt with some of these parties in the past, I believe all of them have large law firms on retainer and I'm not too sure it would become such a rational discussion as you're suggesting.

Mr Sorbara: My suggestion to you is that it's just not reasonable to think that sort of lawsuit would ensue.

Mr Fletcher: Correct me if I'm wrong. Is it a statute or under the legislation that the Workers' Compensation Board has to be located in Metro Toronto?

Mr King: Yes, the head office of the board has to be in Toronto.

Mr Fletcher: In other words, looking outside the city for space would be—could you do that?

Mr King: Presumably, if we had a head office of four people. These are lawyers' questions.

Mr Fletcher: I was just thinking of the relocation of other ministries such as Mr Sorbara had raised, where Agriculture and Food went to Guelph or somewhere else, and the registrar general to Thunder Bay. I was just wondering, as far as that's concerned, right now it's saying that the location has to be in Toronto.

Mr King: That is correct.

Mr Sorbara: Guelph already got a head office.

Mrs Marland: Just for the record, in the Globe and Mail on November 19, 1992, there is a quote attributable to the Treasurer:

"I'm concerned about it," he said in an interview, noting that he has spent the past two years trying to get departments and agencies to accept the financial squeeze facing the government.

"Mr Laughren has asked senior WCB officials for a meeting to explain why they want to move into a new building at Simcoe and Front Streets."

Mr King: That may very well have been the meeting I suggested occurred between the chair and—

Mrs Marland: He was concerned about it.

Mr King: I never suggested he wasn't concerned. I'm saying he never asked me for a legal opinion.

Ms Angove: He also got up in the House and confirmed that he did have a legal opinion that confirmed we are in a legally binding transaction. That was from the Treasurer.

Mrs Marland: That's fine, but he sought the legal opinion because he thinks it's a rotten deal. He doesn't want to spend this money on behalf of the people of this province, and an arm's-length government agency is still the people of Ontario's money.

The Chair: Thank you. That should do it for committee members. I have a couple of short questions and our Provincial Auditor has a number of short questions. If you're unable to answer them today or don't have the information, I'd appreciate it if it could be noted and the material could be made available.

Mr King, as the vice-chair of administration, do you sit in on the regular briefings of the Minister of Labour?

Mr King: Yes, regularly. I miss occasionally, because I have a lot of other things to do as well.

The Chair: Have you ever attended a meeting where the Minister of Labour was briefed on this transaction; that is, the discussion before this committee today?

Mr King: In all honesty, I would have to check my calendar to see if I attended the briefing on this particular issue. I simply don't recall whether I was there last April, but I can certainly answer that tomorrow.

The Chair: Would you agree that a matter of this magnitude probably caused more than one briefing of the minister to take place?

Mr King: Well, the minister has staff who can brief him. For instance, we provide issue sheets to the minister on various items at his request or the request of his staff, so I'm sure he's been briefed by his own staff on the matter.

The Chair: You believe then that information which emanated from the board office, some of it even from your own office, could have ended up in the hands of the minister's personal staff and then into the minister's office.

Mr King: Once a month, we discuss what the board is generally doing and what's on the agenda for the board of directors' meetings.

The Chair: Mr King, I'm assuming you would probably have more knowledge on this subject matter, or maybe the people with you today would probably have more intimate knowledge on this subject matter than, say, the chair of the board, who has overall, global responsibilities for the operations of the board.

Mr King: Most certainly. The board is a multibillion-dollar operation and this is one part of that multibillion-dollar operation.

The Chair: It would be appropriate then for me to assume that either yourself or any of the people with you today would have been in on the briefings that would have been given to the minister. I'm trying to narrow down the scope of people who have the capabilities to answer a list of questions that an energetic minister like Mr Mackenzie might have.

Mr King: I can certainly determine who was at the ministry briefing. I'm not certain, in this particular province, what the client-solicitor privilege or the bureaucrat-politician situation is and whether or not—

The Chair: I'm not asking for any detail. I just want to know whether or not you or anyone else at the table today sat in on briefing meetings of the Minister of Labour and exchanged information and answered questions. I haven't asked yet about confidential briefing documents or maybe some political comment that the minister might have made or some confidential information you might have given to the minister. All I want to know is who at the board would have attended these meetings in your absence, made representations to the minister and answered the minister's questions.

Mr King: I'll have to provide that information tomorrow. Just a quick poll here: None of the three with me today recalls having personally attended the briefing at the ministry, but I should be able to get that information for you tomorrow.

The Chair: It's my intention to call that person or those persons as witnesses.

Mr King: would you say that the relationship between the Workers' Compensation Board and the Minister of Labour is friendly, cordial and professional?

Mr King: Yes.

The Chair: Why then, if that is the case, would you seek legal opinion to extract the Workers' Compensation Board from the requirements of section 64 of the Workers' Compensation Act, which reads, "Subject to the approval of the Lieutenant Governor in Council, the board may purchase or otherwise acquire such real property, as it may consider necessary for its purposes, and may, with the like approval, sell or otherwise dispose of any such property"?

Why would the board, with your knowledge and acquiescence, and the people with you today—if you have that kind of relationship with the minister, with these words being as clear as they are—seek outside legal opinion that would allow you to circumvent the protection of the public that is in this legislation?

Mr King: I think I had indicated to you earlier that I wasn't the one who sought that advice. To my knowledge, an opinion was sought for the board of directors prior to my coming to Ontario, and in addition to that I believe I indicated earlier that Dr Elgie sought his own personal opinion to make sure that he was on clearly solid legal grounds to proceed with the matter.

The Chair: So the legal interpretations we are going to receive from the board tomorrow, hopefully, will show by date that the relief sought by the board in regard to section 64 was done by Dr Elgie?

Mr King: That's one of them, and the other one would have been done for the board of directors. I don't know to whom it was addressed. I'll have to find out.

The Chair: Do you have any idea what that date might be?

Mr King: Some time in 1991.

The Chair: In 1991, the Minister of Labour was Bob Mackenzie, the same minister we referred to only a minute ago, where we all concluded that the board's relationship was friendly, cordial and professional. If that is the case—

Mr King: I'm sorry; there's a 1990 opinion as well. It may have been after the election that Dr Elgie sought an additional opinion. I don't know. I haven't talked to him in particular about this.

The Chair: Have you yourself reviewed section 64?

Mr King: Yes.

The Chair: How do you read section 64?

Mr King: I read section 64 that the board should not purchase or dispose of real property without the permission of the Lieutenant Governor in Council.

The Chair: Do you not agree that what you are doing in the construction of this new headquarters is in fact just that?

Mr King: The interpretation that the lawyers put on it is that this is an investment—

The Chair: I'm asking your opinion, Mr King. I'm asking your opinion as the vice-chair of administration.

Mr King: It's not the most comforting position one could be in, but it is a valid investment for the Workers' Compensation Board investment—

The Chair: Please, Mr King, I didn't ask about whether the investment was valid or not. I want to know how you, as one of the chief and senior administrators at the WCB, interpret section 64, and then I want to know whether or not in your view the proposed head office is in fact part of section 64, that there should be compliance with section 64.

Mr King: First off, I don't believe there is non-compliance with section 64. But you asked me whether I was totally comfortable, and I said no, I'm not totally comfortable—

The Chair: I didn't ask you if you were comfortable; I asked you whether you agreed with it.

Mr King: —but I think we're in a legally correct position. There is a difference.

The Chair: We only know whether we're in a legally correct position or not when something is litigated in court and an officer of the court—a judge or a panel of judges—renders a decision. The fact that a lawyer, a group of lawyers or anyone else says something is legal or illegal doesn't mean anything until it's adjudicated. That's why to me it's important to know how the senior administration of the board is thinking and whether it's adversarial. To me it appears to be adversarial, because I look at section 64 and to me it's very clear: You can't buy any property and you can't dispose of any property unless you get approval of the Lieutenant Governor in Council, and that is the cabinet and your minister, the Minister of Labour. So I view the situation as a little bit more adversarial than I would have hoped it would be.

Mr King: Can I give you a bit further? I had indicated earlier to the committee that I arrived in April 1991, as did Mr Di Santo. The week prior, the board of directors had unanimously voted to proceed with this project—unanimously. It's our job to give advice to the board of directors, and we are prepared to do that. The board of directors then moves ahead and makes decisions.

There was a difficult time period of accommodation or getting to know each other between Mr Di Santo and I and the board, as I believe they may have been suspicious about the socialist tendencies of Mr Di Santo and Mr King. Actually, I believe the committee that questioned my appointment questioned me about my beliefs. I believe the board was jealously guarding the new facility as a good business deal against people who might have wild left-wing ideas and try to—I mean, I'm trying to give you the climate that was going on.

The Chair: I appreciate that, Mr King, but I can only deal with what I have before me and what's written in law.

Mr King: Yes, I appreciate that.

The Chair: That's why I want to deal with section 64.

Would you agree with me that this transaction is not an arm's-length transaction?

Mr King: In what sense, sir?

The Chair: In that you're spending funds to build a building and then you're renting the building to yourselves, causing further expenditure of funds.

Mr King: In my view, this is the Workers' Compensation Board pension fund making an investment in a real estate transaction, and it is the Workers' Compensation Board as a tenant making a long-term lease at advantageous terms.

The Chair: Mr King, how long have you been a public servant?

Mr King: Something like 20 years.

The Chair: So you have great experience with what would be considered an arm's-length transaction or a non-arm's-length transaction.

Mr King: Yes.

The Chair: With all your years of experience, would you agree with me that this could be considered a non-arm's-length transaction?

Mr King: I have a difficult time as the one in the middle between the tenant on the one hand and the investor on the other saying what the interest of the corporation is when the investor is making an investment and the tenant is making a decision to move in.

The Chair: Let me see if I can help you. I perceive an arm's-length transaction to be that you own a building, you and I have no personal relationship or family relationship or any other business relationships, and I come to you and say: "I wish to lease X number of square feet. Give me the market rate or better and we'll see if we can do business." That is an arm's-length transaction. Would you agree?

Mr King: Yes.

The Chair: Right. Now, you and I have a pension fund we own together—it's for a group of individuals—and we both have something to do with it. Then you and I and a third party decide we're going to build a new building, we're going to use the money from that fund that we have something to do with to help finance it, then we're going to rent it to ourselves. Do you consider that an arm's-length transaction in the true sense of the word?

Mr King: There is a veil or a wall up between the two positions. I'm the one who's sort of the wall.

The Chair: How can you be the wall if you're here before us answering all the questions?

Mr King: Because you asked me to come.

The Chair: You were sent by your chair because he was unable to be here due to ill health. Surely he sent you because he thought you were the most capable person to answer these questions.

Mr Duignan: On a point of order, Mr Chair: It is my humble belief that as Chair of the committee you should be in a position of impartiality. If you want to continue cross-examining the witnesses like this, maybe you should vacate the chair.

The Chair: As a former Chairman of the committee that worked on committee rules and House rules and having served under Michael Breaugh, the former esteemed member for Oshawa, who helped set up a lot of these traditions, I am doing no differently this afternoon than what Mr Breaugh did as Chairman for innumerable years here in the Legislature.

Mr Sorbara: I'm wondering if I could put in a request for a supplementary to the questions you've asked.

The Chair: I gave everybody lots of time for questions. I told the committee members two or three times that when you had finished all your questions I had a series of questions. Some people view them as adversarial; I'm sorry to hear that. Then I said that the Provincial Auditor had a short series of questions.

Mr Farnan: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: I have no objection to your asking questions. However, in fairness, I would think there are many members around the horseshoe here who would envy a time allocation equal to what you are enjoying.

The Chair: I checked the clock.

Mr Farnan: I would say to you that only in the area of time allocation maybe are you abusing the office of Chair. With 15 minutes remaining, I would suggest that five minutes be allocated to each caucus.

The Chair: I have no problem with that. I foresaw your point being asked and I appreciate the point you made.

Mr Farnan: Maybe it's time for the auditor to make a statement.

The Chair: I've done a quick tabulation and I have not used up any more time than any other individual member. As a matter of fact, I could name three members who have used up considerably more time than I have, which was their choice, which was the choice of the individual caucuses and the choice of this committee. I will make sure I do not use up any more time than any other members of the committee, but thank you for allowing me to do so.

I also want to ask Mr King, would there be a more appropriate person, other than yourself, who could answer the question about whether or not this is an arm's-length agreement?

Mr King: As I'd indicated to you, in order to make sure I can determine what options are available to us, not because I think it's a bad deal but because I think others might ask that question, I have retained for my own purposes a set of counsel in order to advise me on the matter, and I suspect they may be the ones, who are not working for either the investor or the tenant but for myself, who might be better able to answer a question like that.

The Chair: Thank you. The Provincial Auditor has some questions, and then we're going to have five minutes for each caucus, if they wish it.

Mr Peters: I'm asking my questions essentially because the motion on the floor is whether we should do a value-for-money audit. My questions are really aimed at getting some information that might help us to determine whether such an audit is appropriate and how we should proceed.

The first one, following up a little on these questions: Could you somehow develop for us, not tonight but at the next session, the legal framework within which the Workers' Compensation Board accident fund makes this investment, in the overall, so that there is a legal view as to what is arm's length and what is not arm's length, and how the fund is managed as opposed to how the board is managed, as a separate management, these sort of questions, to just determine what the legal framework is within which this operation takes place.

Mr King: Yes, we can do that.

Mr Peters: The second one, similarly, is whether you could also outline, maybe in a fairly concise form for the members to understand, the financial framework—

Mr King: I can't hear the question.

Mr Peters: I guess we lost the Chair for a moment—what the financial framework is like, how the fund's flow is going to operate, what funds will flow to whom from whom.

In this connection is a very specific question: You made reference to the borrowing, that the Workers' Compensation Board will borrow funds for this investment and not all the funds will be funded. The question is, does the board have the power to borrow? If you wouldn't mind addressing that particular question.

Mr King: Yes.

Mr Peters: The last one is just again on the value-for-money basis, because it might influence it. Once the decision was made to use the accident fund for the funding, did that in any way limit the extent of your search for alternatives? You can answer that directly if you wish, but I wanted to raise that question because once in your testimony you referred to the fact that the existence of the contract stopped you from doing certain things.

Mr King: Yes. The alternatives were no longer explored after the March 1991 meeting of the board of directors where the board directed the administration to proceed to negotiate the final items in the agreement with the partners: Cadillac Fairview, Toronto-Dominion Bank, Bramalea and CBC. It would have been from March 1991. Other alternatives were not looked at after that.

The Chair: Mr Callahan.

Mr Callahan: I just want to get this clear. The act prevents you from borrowing or purchasing land without consent of cabinet. Let's not use "Lieutenant Governor in Council." I always find that's deceiving to the public. It's the cabinet, the government.

What you did was, you set up a numbered company, which has the power to borrow, as an Ontario company does, which borrows the money to build the building along with its partners and thereby gets around WCB's no-no of doing these things without government approval. Isn't that right? And then WCB leases the building from that numbered company.

Somebody must have gone to a lawyer and asked that question, because it's a neat one. It's like, "How do we get a building built without having to go and get government approval?" The lawyer says, "Well, you can't do it under the act because it says you've got to have government approval." "So how can we do it?" "You can do it by setting up a numbered company," and the numbered company does the things I've just suggested. They become the inviolate corporate veil that you can't pierce, that has all the powers to borrow, to build and all the rest of it, and WCB just becomes a long-term tenant of that numbered company. That's exactly what happened, isn't it?

Mr King: Our investment fund or pension fund does not invest in real estate as the Workers' Compensation Board. It invests through numbered companies because if we go out and purchase an investment, we don't necessarily want it known it's us because it may affect price, it may affect whether someone is foreclosed and a few other things. So all of our investing on the real estate side is through numbered companies.

Mr Callahan: Okay, but that in fact gave you the ability to bypass the government, which is what was done.

Mr King: Look, this all happened before I got here when you guys were in there.

Mr Callahan: I know. No, no. When I say, "gave you," I'm talking in terms of the royal "you"—not you "you," but the WCB. So, just finally, if it turns out that they're wrong—I mean there's a principle in law that you cannot do indirectly what you can't do directly. It seems to me that's exactly what has happened here. You have done indirectly what you cannot do directly and as nice as that legal opinion may be, I think if it were to be found, it's more than just because of your pension fund that that's the reason it was done.

The people on the other side of the coin may very well find themselves faced with that proposition being thrown at them by a judge, that you've tried to get around the government. It's clear you did because the Treasurer didn't know about it. The Treasurer is reported as disclaiming any responsibility for this that he's going to talk you out of buying it and suddenly I see the government members over there praising the accolades of this whole thing. So I have to decide that the Treasurer has changed his mind. He's now in favour of it.

Mr Sorbara: Just following up on the Chair's questions and back to section 64, there is a sense that there is some qualification on the efficacy of this transaction because of the absence of cabinet approval, notwithstanding that the building is being invested in through the investment fund. The board becomes the tenant and there is a non-arm's-length transaction. As a real estate lawyer, I would look at the title and I would read section 64 and I would say, "Hmm, maybe there is not good title in the lease because the board has not done what it's required to do under section 64."

Now this matter, having been raised, can be cured very simply. The Workers' Compensation Board, subsequent to your arrival and before the deal is signed, can go to the cabinet and say: "Look, we are about to enter into this transaction. We think we have structured it in a way that does not force us to get your approval as the cabinet under section 64, but we would be airtight in this deal if we got cabinet approval. So would you please approve this to make sure that this real estate transaction cannot be challenged by any title searcher down the road?" Did you give that advice to the cabinet, to the chair or to anyone that cabinet approval be sought just to ensure this transaction could be airtight?

The Chair: Mr Sorbara, your time is up.

Mr Callahan: That's a good way to do it. I think Floyd will give it to you now.

Mr King: I cannot tell you in honesty whether I discussed this with the chair. It certainly went around in my own mind as to whether this possibility should be explored.

Mr Sorbara: Would it not be a good idea now to go to the cabinet and get its approval just to ensure that the deal is not attacked under section 64?

The Chair: Mr Sorbara, your time has expired. If there's an answer, I'll allow the answer. If there's no answer, we're going to move right along.

Mr Farnan: I think it's time we moved on to the next question.

The Chair: You're absolutely correct, Mr Farnan.

Mr Tilson: We'll ask the question. Do you not think it would be wise to receive permission from the cabinet?

Mr King: It probably would have been easier. I maybe don't understand the culture in Ontario, not having come from Ontario.

Mr Sorbara: The culture?

Mr King: Yes, the culture. Where I come from, the workers' compensation boards enjoys a true arm's-length relationship from government. I've served as chairman of the board in two different provinces and I never received an order from a minister.

Mr Tilson: Did they have numbered companies where you came from?

Mr King: To invest in real estate, we did.

Mr Tilson: Did you? Who are the shareholders of this numbered company?

Mr King: The WCB owns the shares.

Mr Tilson: I'm sure they are. Mrs Marland has a question.

Mrs Marland: Mr King, as the afternoon has proceeded, you have said that you can't answer some of the questions because you were not here at the time. However, did you not say that this final contract was signed in June of this year?

Mr King: That's correct.

Mrs Marland: Are you proud of that? I mean, you were here in June of this year. You've been here since April 1991. You said the final contract was signed in June of this year. You can't hide behind the shroud of "I wasn't here." You were vice-chairman when this contract was signed six months ago, and six months ago the economy of this province and the situation of available leased space in the greater Toronto area was the same as it is now. So are you proud of the agreement to build this 30-storey building on land that you don't own in the most expensive real estate in Toronto?

Mr King: I am personally not apologizing for anything I did during the period of time I have been here. I am proud that the WCB of Ontario has come up with the best possible business case for itself both as an investor and as a tenant. Unfortunately, the timing could probably not be worse.

Mrs Marland: Are you proud of the fact that you may have violated section 64 of the act?

Mr King: I believe it was sheer speculation that the board is in any violation of section 64. I have two and possibly three legal opinions from rather august law firms that we are not in violation of section 64. Rather than speculate, I believe your colleague suggested maybe legislative counsel might look at it before we begin pointing fingers about people in violation of the law.

Mrs Marland: And you're bringing those opinions tomorrow.

Mr King: That's correct.

The Chair: Mr Fletcher and then Mr Hayes.

Mr Fletcher: I'll defer to Mr Hayes.

Mr Hayes: Thank you, Mr Fletcher. Mr Chair, there have been a lot of accusations thrown back and forth and at the board and also at the Treasurer. Just for the record, because there are comments about whether the Treasurer was concerned at one time and is not concerned now, let me read from Hansard. This is from the Treasurer in response to a question from Mr Offer.

"It was my understanding that before the present chair of the board took his job at the board, an agreement had been reached, and I think unanimously, by the directors of the Workers' Compensation Board, including all of the employer representatives on the board, that such an arrangement should be struck and that they should proceed with the construction of a new building."

He also goes on to say: "I think you should separate my responsibilities from those of the board of directors of the Workers' Compensation Board."

"I did ask for a legal interpretation as to what extent what had already been done was legally binding on the board of directors. I didn't make any commitment to approve or disapprove of the project, because I'm sure the member opposite would not want us to become engaged in an expensive lawsuit if that was to be the final outcome. I've simply asked for a legal interpretation to determine just what the status is of the obligations already undertaken by the board of directors of the Workers' Compensation Board, not by me."

In other words, I believe the question is that the concern the Treasurer did have was that something had already taken place, a decision to do something before the present chair was even here or probably before even this government was here, and the Treasurer was finding out if he could really get involved, whether it be legally or not. I think that should certainly be put on the record.

Mr Tilson: He was here in June 1992.

Mr Farnan: Just a couple of quick questions: Prior to your arrival at the board, Mr King, and the arrival of Mr Di Santo, would it be fair to say that something of a head of steam had been generated around this issue and that in fact the activity around this issue increased with the imminent prospect of your arrival?

Mr King: I had indicated that the week before I was appointed and took office, the board of directors unanimously voted to proceed to the detailed negotiations on the project. I want to agree with one of the members on my right, however, that I accept responsibility for the decision at the present time. I'm not trying in any way to duck from that. You inherit something but then you have to make it your own. We inherited a unanimous opinion by the board of directors that they wanted to proceed with this building. We could probably have counselled that they stop and not proceed with it. I repeat what I said earlier, however, notwithstanding what one hopes is a short-term significant problem with commercial real estate in Toronto, that from any strategic point of view, this is a good decision from both an investment and a tenant point of view.

Mr Farnan: I think the point I'm trying to make is that the decision is not a decision in one day, one week, one month or a year. It's a decision that has some kind of continuity over several years and indeed over several administrations, I would suggest. I think the point that has to be emphasized, certainly to my community in Cambridge, is that if you are to walk away from this kind of decision, there are very serious consequences. Is that not the case?

Mr King: At this point in time, if we were to become in breach of contract, it would have very significant financial implications for the WCB.

Mr Farnan: The final summation then would be that you have a project that can provide accommodation at approximate market rental value but that would have severe consequences to the taxpayer ultimately were you to walk away from it.

Mr King: I stress the early part of our presentation. This is a good deal for both the Workers' Compensation Board as investor and the Workers' Compensation Board as tenant. It will improve the service to the public of Ontario, the employers and the workers of Ontario. It is a good deal for Ontario.

Mr Farnan: All of the worker reps and all of the business reps on the board unanimously supported the project?

Mr King: They unanimously supported the project in March 1991. There was one demurring vote in May 1992.

The Chair: Time has expired. The committee is adjourned until 10 am tomorrow.

The committee adjourned at 1803.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 14 January 1993

The committee met at 0936 in committee room 1.

PRE-BUDGET CONSULTATIONS

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): We will resume the hearings on the pre-budget consultations in the standing committee on finance and economic affairs.

FEDERATION OF WOMEN TEACHERS' ASSOCIATIONS OF ONTARIO

The Chair: The first group on this morning is the Federation of Women Teachers' Associations of Ontario. Would you come forward, please. I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. They're not unfamiliar faces, but Hansard can't see you, so perhaps you wouldn't mind reading into the record who you are.

Ms Margaret Dempsey: Yes, certainly. Good morning. My name is Margaret Dempsey and I'm president of the Federation of Women Teachers' Associations of Ontario. With me this morning are Barbara Sargent, first vice-president of FWTAO; Joan Westcott, executive director, FWTAO; and Bev Gardner, second vice-president, FWTAO. We also have with us this morning several members of our FWTAO board of directors and an executive assistant for political action-public relations from our office.

The Chair: Come forward. One can sit beside Mr Carr, and there's another seat on that side. Don't be shy.

Ms Dempsey: FWTAO is pleased this morning, on behalf of our 41,000 women teachers who teach in our public elementary schools, to present to you, the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. As for the last number of years, we want to speak not just about adequate funding for the education of the young child but about some wider social issues as well.

Let me acknowledge right up front that we as women teachers, along with most other people in Ontario, do recognize the serious problems within our economy and how difficult it is at this time for a government even to maintain existing funding for the current programs. But the responsibility facing any government, regardless of the economic situation, is to determine the priorities for public spending. So what we will deal with today is our view of what the government's priorities should be, given the limited financial resources available. We will be discussing the financing of education, including the funding of junior kindergarten programs, poverty, and the integration of services to children.

Reduced spending in education contradicts the government's policy on training a workforce that can compete effectively in the global economy. FWTAO is well aware of the need to prepare young people with the foundations for lifelong learning. In 1988, in a submission to the select committee on education, we presented, on the philosophy and goals of education, these words in part:

"Schools can help prepare children for tomorrow's workplace...but with that base for future learning, young people can go with confidence to post-secondary institutions or directly into the workforce for more specific skills training according to the changing requirements of business and industry."

Decreased funding to the school system undermines the objective of developing a skilled workforce that is capable of competing in the world economy. What happens to children in the early school years largely determines whether or not they will be successful in school and whether or not they will remain in school. As women teachers we are pleased with the growing public awareness of the importance of the early years in a child's education. The government's initiative to reduce class size in grades 1 and 2 is, we believe, a recognition of the importance of the early years.

We are counting on the government to carry out its promise to ensure that junior kindergarten programs are in place in every school board by 1994. FWTAO has long believed in the provision of quality junior kindergarten programs for children. However, we do alert you as to the need to provide adequate resources, including proper classroom space, transportation, adequate materials and supplies, class size limits, professional development for staff and adequate services for children with special needs. We are counting on the government to carry out its promise to provide properly funded kindergarten programs in 1994. Research has shown that money spent on early-years education is money saved from future remedial and social programs.

While the financing of education in this province is a key focus for us as women teachers, our main concern is for the child. Therefore, we must address with you this morning issues which are the mandate of other ministries, as well as education.

Helping poor children: This committee received a brief from our organization in January 1990 entitled Poor Children in Ontario Schools. It was a call to action and it remains as true and urgent today in 1993 as it did then.

In this province we are doing a disservice to both individuals and to society. Poor children are 2.2 times more likely to drop out of school. Our teachers on a daily basis, including right now as we speak, see the effects of poverty on the faces of their students: hunger, abuse, neglect, drugs and violence.

In specific reference to the issue of violence in our society, let me take a moment to say that on behalf of FWTAO we are gratified to see the establishment of the violence prevention secretariat. The issue of violence and the eradication of violence from our society ties very strongly to women teachers' agenda and to the agenda of FWTAO.

We have undertaken a mammoth two-year, province-wide No to Violence campaign in which women teachers are serving as the catalysts within their local jurisdictions to reach out to students, parents, trustees and community groups. We can do something to eradicate violence from our society.

In terms of the violence prevention secretariat, it is also our understanding, as FWTAO, that this secretariat was created using existing resources currently within the ministry. Also, the word "prevention" is keenly noted within that title.

Numerous studies indicate the need for collaboration across professional and sectorial boundaries in order to meet the needs of all children. FWTAO believes that the coordination of services may be a better use of current resources and has the potential to help children to develop socially, emotionally and educationally. We commend the current government for establishing the integrated services for children and youth secretariat and we look forward to the implementation of its action plan.

Last spring we surveyed our 41,000 members on the delivery of services within their respective schools and their communities and we found a wide variety of services that are currently being offered through the coordinating of resources of schools and local service agencies. These models of integration, we believe, should be publicized so that other communities can build on the current experiences and integrate those services within their communities.

We do not believe that extensive funding will be required, but yes, there is a need for more coordination. In some cases a reorganization of the current resources, to prevent duplication, for example, or to fill the gaps, could achieve perhaps a better overall service to children within that community.

One particular project we've highlighted on page 7 of our brief this morning refers to the integrated services for northern children and that this program provides services to children with special needs in underserved areas of the province. As far as we have determined, the funding is shared by a number of local community sponsors as well as by the government ministries of Community and Social Services, Health, Northern Development and Mines.

At the bottom of page 7 we suggest as an organization both short-term and long-term priorities that we believe should be priorities for this provincial government: provincial funding for school meal programs and nutrition counselling; a substantial increase in low-cost and non-profit housing; funding for health care professionals to be in the schools; eliminating the feminization of poverty through government action on accessible, affordable child care; fully enforced pay equity; mandatory affirmative action, and better training opportunities for women.

We urge you to give priority to the needs of poor children, to the needs of women and poor families. When the poverty cycle is broken, we will all benefit. We know as women teachers that a child who comes to our classroom in the morning hungry or hurting or frightened will not be able to learn.

These are the priorities of FWTAO. We hope you share them and we hope they will be reflected within your recommendations as a committee. Thank you for the opportunity to be with you this morning.

The Chair: We have a few questions from the committee. We have Mr Phillips up first.

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): How much time do we have, Mr Chair?

The Chair: About five or six minutes apiece.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the brief. I think you've really focused on one important area for us. In some respects, some of the funding would normally come from other portions of the provincial budget, the Community and Social Services budget.

I'm also interested in your comment about what we should be expecting as a result of the planned transfer payments to school boards for next year and what impact, if any, your federation sees as a result of that. We were anticipating originally that the government was going to transfer 2% in transfer payments this coming fiscal year and then 2% the following year. It ended up, as I think you know, being essentially 0%-0%, with a 2% transition fund. I think the committee would be interested in just what impact the federation sees as a result of that. Should we expect no problems as a result of that, should we expect to see larger classes or should we expect to see larger taxes in the property tax? You people know this well and we'd value your advice on that.

Ms Dempsey: Certainly, on the basis of what we have collected already, there are staff and program cutbacks within many school board jurisdictions, and the children and the classroom teachers are feeling the impact right now. To anticipate where we would be a year from this time or in the spring of 1993 is of grave concern to us. We are already recognizing, as you heard yesterday, that when you cut consultants and resource people or teachers who are there to benefit the most vulnerable children, children with special needs, for example, and to be a support to the teacher, you can only cut those programs and personnel once. So yes, we do share concerns about what action has already been taken within many jurisdictions because of the transfer payments and have grave concerns about what lies ahead.

Mr Phillips: Have I got more time, Mr Chairman?

The Chair: Almost three minutes.

Mr Phillips: Almost all of your recommendations involve focusing on areas that wouldn't traditionally be ones where the money would be flowing to the teaching profession. They would be areas where the money would be flowing elsewhere. Therefore, the message I'm getting from here is that that's your priority. The committee likes to get expert advice from people like yourselves on what's happening in the schools as a result of decisions we're making here at Queen's Park. It would be helpful to me if you, in whatever way, could be specific with the committee in terms of, as we look at funding for education and trying to allocate scarce resources, what's actually happening in the schools? Are we seeing larger classes or are we seeing virtually no change, that we're just being more efficient out there? I take from your comments here, because there is no comment on the transfer payments, that the federation feels that's a reasonable response by the government in today's economic climate.

Ms Joan Westcott: As we noted on page 2, we are concerned that there will be no additional funds available for the per-pupil grant this year. We wait, as do other educators in this province, to find out how the additional 2% fund will be dispersed for this year. We are very concerned. We are hoping teachers will continue to be involved at the local level in the discussions that will be held at the school board level to see how best those few resources can be allocated.

We're hoping there will be some increase. It is very simple just to say that the current education program cannot survive without some additional funding, but that's about the point we're at, because we know the problems every school board is facing in trying to maintain the current program. So financing continues to be a concern of this organization as it has always been.

Tying into the presentation from the Ontario Teachers' Federation yesterday, I believe you had some examples in that document about what's happening at the local situation. Our teachers continue to be concerned about that. What we are hoping is that the best use of the money that has been announced will be used at the local level. We urge also that the government not back off its commitment to things such as class size and junior kindergarten, because we believe these are key in being able to maintain program in light of the economic times we're in.

Mr Monte Kwinter (Wilson Heights): I notice you stress the need for funding to provide for the mandatory junior kindergarten program. What are your contingency plans for both destreaming and junior kindergarten if the government maintains its stand that it's going to keep the funding to what has been announced with no increased amount of funding?

Ms Westcott: In regard to junior kindergarten, we know there are many junior kindergarten programs in place already in the province. A number of our members who are teaching in primary and kindergarten are qualified and prepared to teach the junior kindergarten program. As to contingency plans, we think it's a matter of assisting the board in putting the necessary resources in place curriculum-wise—resource materials and equipment—for those junior kindergarten programs.

Regarding changes for the transition years, we are working with our teachers in the grade 7 and 8 programs to assist them in preparing for the changes the government is proposing with the transition changes, with the expectation that we will attempt to make the changes as we can in light of the resources that can be available under the current economic situation. It is a matter, again, of detailed planning at the local school board level based on what's available there.

Mr Norman W. Sterling (Carleton): As the son of a mother who taught in the elementary school system for 25 years and raised four kids on the basis of a salary of somewhere around $7,000 or $10,000 a year during the 1960s and early 1970s, I know how hard some elementary school teachers work. I know my mom was out the door at 7 o'clock in the morning, out in the school yard on cold mornings, putting work on the board; late into the night, she would stay up marking papers. I know how much extra work she gave to all of the children.

Since that time, things have changed quite dramatically. My mom, who is still alive at the age of 83, watches the teaching profession and watches what's going on in provincial politics from time to time.

We heard yesterday that there's some evidence that Ontario spends more in the education area than just about any other jurisdiction in the world. There's some concern that we don't get a product as a result of that. That kind of question was put to some of the people in here who were from the post-secondary education sector. They indicated that there were not excessive amounts of money being spent in their area, but excessive amounts of money were being spent in the elementary and the secondary school areas.

If we are spending the most in both of these areas, I'm definitely getting signals from my taxpayers that there aren't any more taxes to be collected. Your brief asks us to recommend to the Treasurer that the elementary system be given even more money. We are spending $1.20 for every $1 we're collecting now in the province of Ontario. Our federal government is out of money. Is it realistic to ask for more money at this time? Where is the money going to come from?

Ms Dempsey: Like yourself, I recognize the investment in education that the taxpayers and the government do contribute financially, but I believe that education for children and youth is an investment and it is an obligation that we as adults have and need to take very seriously and continue to do so.

One of the ways we, as women teachers, are proposing in terms of meeting the needs of the whole child is to look at the coordination of services interministerial, and that is occurring. Along with Health and Comsoc, along with Education, we need to focus on the whole development of the child and youth. As an educator, I'm charged with a very serious responsibility of the education component, but if there was better coordination of financial and human resources among the ministries, we might be able to take a more coordinated approach to achieving that investment, because I believe we're all after the same thing, and that is quality lifelong learning for our children and youth.

Mr Sterling: Nobody can argue with the goals. It's like motherhood, in terms of the proposals you put forward; everybody sees that. But there's a problem here that nobody coming in front of the committee seems to be realizing: There isn't any more money. We're spending more than we can afford already. What things are you going to take out of your own system in order to put what you believe is more important in place? Nobody who appears before this committee seems to understand that. Is there anything we can take out of the system in the elementary area, anything significant, so that we can reallocate these funds to some of your priorities?

Ms Dempsey: The elementary system is stretched to the limit at the present time, Mr Sterling. In terms of taking out, I'm trying to understand where you're coming from. I'm trying to refocus it back to the obligation which we as adults have within this province for the quality lifelong learning of our children and youth. That has to be a priority and I believe that has to continue to be our focus.

Ms Anne Swarbrick (Scarborough West): Both as a member of a government that's trying very hard to do progressive things in spite of governing in the midst of the worst depression since the 1930s and as somebody who hears a lot from my own constituents as well about the great concern over taxes, deficits, but protection and improved quality of the services they need, I want to say a very big thank you for your presentation in terms of (1) the recognition you gave of the problems we're facing, (2) the kind of positivism you've expressed around some of the things we have been able to do and policies we are trying to put in place in spite of the difficulties of today's economic climate, and (3) to very much recognize the spirit of strongly progressive commitment you've expressed as an organization. I don't think I've heard one word of self-interest; instead, simply the massive commitment I know your organization has to the wellbeing of the children in this province.

I want to say a very big thank you, because it seems to me that today there is too much of a spirit in this world of people being so me-oriented instead of other-directed, and I think you express the spirit of being other-directed.

I think what you're hearing in the questions from all of us on this committee, though, given our shared concern, also what we're grappling with in terms of that economic climate I've made reference to—I'm wondering if there's anything you might say with regard to the issue of whether there are any ways we as a province can help you any further within the school system, in terms of the kind of creative redistribution that might need to happen to try and help meet what you see are the real needs of the children? Or do you feel there are some specific extras in terms of financial resources you need, and can you give any added specifics with regard to what you feel is absolutely mandatory?

Maybe I should have asked that the other way around, because I'm hoping to hear more that you feel there are ways we could help further in terms of the creative redistribution.

Ms Beverley Gardner: I think the creative problem-solving you are speaking about can occur and does occur at the local school level when teachers and resource people can get together to deal with a specific problem that is presented to the school.

Perhaps I can give a personal face to it. My responsibility for the last few years has been as an elementary school principal. With the staff in a school that would be seen to be fairly typical and somewhat privileged in Ontario, in comparison to children in schools elsewhere, the face of the school has changed. We had a group of teachers come together and look at how we can integrate children who come to us with severe behavioural difficulties, have a lot of difficulty fitting into the routines in school. We know those kids are right to be there and we have a responsibility to see that they get the best education possible. My concern as an elementary school principal is that if we can't continue to provide at least the baseline support we have in terms of resources other than a classroom teacher, I don't know how more creative we can be in helping keep those kinds of kids productive and happy and changing the direction they might otherwise be in.

I'm coming at it a bit backwards. We need to be sure that the resources that are in place—the child care workers, the psychological services, the additional counselling that's necessary, the administrative staff in schools—aren't reduced any further. My fear is that there is no other place to reduce, and boards have reduced at the support level.

The Chair: Presenters, I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee. Some of the information you've given us is a little different from some of the other presenters' and we appreciate it.

ONTARIO SECONDARY SCHOOL TEACHERS' FEDERATION

The Chair: The next group we have is the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation. Would you come forward, please. For the purposes of Hansard, we all know you, but as I said earlier, we need to put it in print, if you don't mind identifying yourselves

Mr Chris Malkiewich: I'm Chris Malkiewich, chair of education finance, OSSTF.

Ms Liz Barkley: Liz Barkley, president of OSSTF.

Mr Larry French: Larry French, legislative research, OSSTF.

The Chair: Do you work for the Legislative Assembly, Larry? Okay; I thought you were one of those guards up there.

Ms Margaret H. Harrington (Niagara Falls): Mr Chair, Mr Malkiewich is from Niagara Falls.

The Chair: Okay; thank you. You may begin and we have until 10:30. If you can leave some time for questions at the very end, I know the members of the committee will have quite a few and I'll have to cut them off, I imagine, at times. You may proceed.

Ms Barkley: Good morning. We are very pleased to be able to present to you today the OSSTF report, Fair Taxation for Responsible Education, in which we have 43 recommendations to make the system of taxation fairer in Ontario. This report was produced by the OSSTF funding initiatives and new directions committee, the FIND committee, and is our submission to the Ontario Fair Tax Commission.

With me today are members of the FIND committee. They are Larry French, OSSTF director of external policy, and Chris Malkiewich, the chairperson of our educational finance committee. We'd like, really, to address the question of where funds could be changed and could be accessed for the educational system. Within our report we have two presentations to make.

The genesis of the FIND committee can be traced to the 1990 provincial elections. At that time OSSTF undertook a campaign based on the slogan, "Underfunding public education is child neglect." During that election campaign, the NDP promised to return to 60% funding of real education cost, a stance which won it significant support among our members. We were further pleased when the government set up the Fair Tax Commission to investigate and recommend better, fairer ways of taxation. But since the election this government has reduced its share of educational funding even more drastically than did the preceding government, with the result, I know personally, that many educators across the province are very disappointed with the gap between promise and performance.

That aside, OSSTF is pleased to present its report with its 43 recommendations. OSSTF/FEESO recognizes the terrible physical jam in which many property taxpayers and the government find themselves. We also recognize that Ontario must have an excellent educational system. We believe that answering the concerns of taxpayers and giving the best service to society are not incompatible. It is possible to provide excellent service to our society without taxing it to death. This indeed is an absolute necessity as we are facing the most serious challenge to the universality of publicly funded education we have ever encountered in Ontario, and its major expression is in the tax coalitions and the several tax revolts happening in various parts of this province.

I am not, however, going to attack these groups. In fact, the FIND committee in some ways finds itself in agreement with some of their approaches. Taxes are too high on property taxpayers. We agree with that; they are too high. There is too much duplication, most of all in education, with three publicly funded systems—three. We cannot afford that. OSSTF is completely supportive of the property taxpayer who is unable to understand why, in a period of low inflation, he or she is getting walloped—well, hit—with double-digit percentage increases. But what has spawned the tax revolt has been the economic policies of the federal government. We are here not to simply lambaste the federal government for its policies, but to recommend relief.

First of all, we recommend that low- and middle-income earners should receive a tax break. This is always the group which gets hit and it's time, we feel, that they got a break. The other group we say must get relief are property taxpayers. The property tax, especially when it is expected to be the major source of funding for education, is enormously regressive. Tinkering with rebates and allowances is just that: It's tinkering. If this government thinks property taxpayers are going to continue to cough up money from a bottomless pit, it is sadly mistaken.

It is time the NDP started to make good on its promise to restore 60% provincial funding of real education costs. Many educators supported them in the last election just because of that promise: 60% funding.

The issue then is, where does Ontario find the money to give this relief? OSSTF recommends several steps. First of all, cut out systemic waste. We have to learn to maintain the constitutional guarantees for public, French and Catholic education while creating a sensible structure—I underline “sensible structure”—to deal with the enormous costs of running three duplicate systems.

The confederated school board is our proposal to accomplish these goals. It is well delineated in our brief here. I know this is not a popular thought among some establishments in Ontario, but many people now—as far as we can ascertain, the consumers of educational services—by and large are beginning to agree with us. We must eliminate needless duplication, thus saving millions of dollars. We are not talking of undermining constitutional guarantees again. We are talking about common sense from a business, administrative and educational point of view.

We are also suggesting a solution to the pooling of taxation for separate and public education. Right now, across Ontario both separate and public boards have hired staff to go out after assessment for their own boards, on salary. A board can argue that an assessment hunter—and we call them that—will pay for her or his own salary, but you and I know who's really paying those bounty hunters, and that is the taxpayer. Let's get these dollars back to education instead of to the bounty hunters. If Ontario confederates boards as we have recommended, then OSSTF is willing to support the local pooling of assessment. Goodbye, bounty hunters.

Like the other people in this room, I welcome the opportunity to pay my fair share of the burden of maintaining an advanced, well-educated society, but OSSTF believes that taxpayers more than anything else demand and must have fairness. Fairness is not fair, nor is it perceived to be fair when major corporations manage every year to whittle away their share of the tax burden. We recommend that there be a minimum corporate tax, that the share of revenue from corporate taxation be fixed in a ratio to the personal income tax as a percentage of gross domestic product.

Just as an example, in 1988 through 1990, each year the insurance industry had profits of $1 billion and paid no taxes, and it is not the only corporate sector where that occurs. Since 1984, when the Mulroney government came to power, the share of taxation paid by corporations has fallen from 15% to 8.7%. That does not seem fair.

Right after the war, the corporations paid 50% of taxes of the total revenue: 50% was paid by the corporations. In 1984, they paid 15% of the total and now they pay 7% of the total, and many pay nothing at all while personal income taxes continue to escalate along with sales taxes.

As part of this package of recommendations that OSSTF is presenting, we recommend that many of the loopholes open to the well-to-do and corporations be closed. “Fair is fair” should apply to everyone, not just middle-income earners. The other place where there should be real revenue for Ontario is from federal transfer payments. If you look on the first page of the executive summary you can see—and I won't read them out to you—what we mean by the—

Mr Phillips: Are you reading from somewhere or is this—

Ms Barkley: No, I'm reading a totally different thing, trying to get everybody to pay attention, you see.

Mr Phillips: And then you told me to look on the page here and you threw me off.

Ms Barkley: Fooled you. I'll start that again.

We were talking about federal transfer payments now and the problem that they're causing to both provincial and of course municipal governments. What has happened is that the federal deficit has been pushed on to provincial shoulders and subsequently on to the shoulders of the municipalities and then to their property taxpayers.

It's time that we woke up, that all people woke up. The property taxes cannot carry the federal deficit, and that is what Mulroney has done to it. He has forced provincial governments to underwrite the federal deficit and property taxpayers are shouldering the greatest part of this increase. No wonder there is a property tax revolt.

We also believe that our government should pull itself into line with other public servants. You're not going to like this, but let us end the tax-free salaries for MPPs, MPs and senators. They should not be out of pocket for public service, for sure, but they should also not be given private pork barrels. Their pensions should also fit the rules for other public service funds. As it is now, age 55 is, for most people, the earliest at which they may claim a pension. MPPs, MPs and senators should live by the same rules.

Finally, let me stress that the real key to adequate and fair education funding is prosperity. We know that. We need to keep in mind that Canada's competitiveness is only enhanced by its investment in education, and we have a huge workforce of highly motivated people who are returning to high schools, hundreds of thousands each year. We need to make sure that we give these people the educational services they need. In that way, we will go a long way to maintaining and enhancing the competitiveness of the Canadian workforce, and these are people mainly over 18.

Now I would like to ask Chris Malkiewicz to give you a five-minute overview of the follow-up to the FIND report, the OSSTF proposal—this is the blue one—for education funding in Ontario, Adequacy, Equity and Democracy. We will obviously be pleased to answer questions at the end.

Mr Malkiewicz: Adequacy, Equity and Democracy contains 36 recommendations for looking at the system that funds education and how we can change it. Let me state, first of all, that most of the problems, or some of the problems that have occurred in the funding system have come not because of the province's fault, but because of federal programs as well. The system started off as one of the best funding systems anywhere in the world.

Having been at the American Education Finance Association conference for several years and seen presentations from around the world and having done studies comparing our system, it stood up very well for very many years; however, it's now stretched to its limits. Part of the problem is competition for the same funds and duplicate boards, competition from duplicate programs, and also the introduction of new program after new program after new program with no new resources.

Education needs a real costing, and not just from the people at the ministry but from the people who deliver it, all people who are involved in the programs and all stakeholders; for example, the cost of destreaming. Special education needs need to be addressed and costed in a realistic fashion, otherwise these people will be lost.

Part of the problem which now exists and may exist in the new grade 9 program is a change in funding where a student now crosses a street, changes from an elementary to a secondary level and changes category and, therefore, funding.

Lifelong learning needs to be dealt with and we need to address training at all levels for those who need to come back and be competitive in a workforce. A possibility for doing this would be to provide a flexible school day and different sites for education delivery. This would allow boards more freedom in how they actually spend their money.

We also believe that there should be boards to allow for a local level and local input. Confederated school boards would get rid of duplications while guaranteeing all rights. Pooling of commercial and industrial taxation should exist where there are confederated school boards.

It's interesting to note in a study done by OSSTF that in the last 15 years the greatest increase in costing occurred at the administrative level.

Transportation, with the little yellow school buses that cause so many problems, needs to be looked at. One of the ways to help solve this problem is to provide a minimum walk distance set by the politicians; also, the use of local transit to a greater extent.

A database which is accurate and which is available to all needs to be produced so that all people looking at education funding can take a look at the reporting and also the costing of education in real life. Real money and grants, not fake money or reassigned money, need to be handed out when grants are put out. Quite often when grants are announced, that money does not really exist, nor is it ever handed out. It makes it very difficult for boards to plan and provide services.

Long-term plans for integration of students who are both physically and mentally challenged need to be addressed. You cannot expect boards, in a time of very little money being put out to them, to provide all services at all locations. In this light, new designs for schools with multiple uses and community access should be used. There needs to be the addressing of adult basic education. FSL, ESL and credit courses need to be looked at.

We also suggest that flow-through moneys from the ministries of Health, Transportation and Tourism and Recreation be set up. Part of the problem in education is the fact that some of the services which used to be provided by these ministries are now in the jurisdiction of the school boards and no funding has come from them.

A corporate surtax to replace the business tax for training needs to be set up. The number of trustees, directors and superintendents needs to be changed so we can share these facilities and again save money. The mandating of professional support people for education with flow-through money needs to be addressed. Part of the problem that was made at the presentation before is the fact that there are long waiting lists and there are no support groups within schools which ensure a high success rate for students.

The rest of the recommendations are in the book and what I've tried to do is group them together for you, Adequacy, Equity and Democracy, the blue one.

The Chair: I guess we'll start off with Mr Sterling, and don't get Liz upset—she's already wound up this morning—because I can only bang the hammer; I can't protect you. Go ahead, Mr Sterling.

Mr Sterling: I must say, as a member who put forward during the debate on Bill 30 an amendment during the process that at least boards of education be given the opportunity to amalgamate, which was rejected by both the Liberals and the New Democratic Party at that time, we do have some empathy for at least a voluntary kind of situation which could take place in order, hopefully, that some efficiencies could be taken.

I guess it's perhaps being a bit of the devil's advocate. An MPP gets paid around $65,000 a year when you add in everything. That's roughly equivalent to a senior teacher or perhaps an assistant department head. A principal in my area gets paid about $90,000 and a director of education gets paid about $125,000. I'm elected by about 90,000 to 100,000 people, my job is up for review about every three and a half years, the average life of an MPP is about—I guess it's less than five years now. I'm just wondering, where do you rank an MPP in his importance or his responsibility—

Ms Barkley: His or her.

Ms Swarbrick: Or hers; thank you, Liz.

The Chair: I told you, Norm.

Mr Sterling: I mean, if you want to put other things into it. Where do you rank his responsibility with that of those within your own profession? Do you think he or she is more or less responsible than a teacher and the vulnerability of his position or her position is equivalent to a principal or a director of education? You can't have it both ways. You're taking a crack at us, yet you are one of the very highest-paid public professions in this province. Give us your evaluation.

Mr French: That's a very interesting question. OSSTF has long believed that our political leaders and elected leaders should be compensated adequately, and it's our opinion that you're not. The leadership you must show must attract good people, must retain them and must recognize that. What we are worried about is the tax-free allowance, that the perceptions of a tax-free allowance are not any good. It should be folded into salary and everybody pay taxes like everybody else.

However, in defence of the teaching profession, the teaching profession, education, underlies all other public enterprise, you might say, and in order to produce doctors, lawyers, whatever, MPPs, we must have a good basic education. It's of fundamental importance to society, and therefore educators have to be recognized too. We have one of the highest-qualified staffs in the world in Ontario, we're pleased to say, and I think they can stand up with any teaching corps in the world. Our society is getting to the point of recognizing that, and we think it's healthy. If you don't, you end up with what's happening in England, where we've got something like 10,000 teachers who are teaching outside their subject area. They can't get these people. Chris has pointed out in some of his educational finance committee studies that in the States up to 90% of the teachers of science and math are not qualified. They can't get the qualified teachers. In Ontario, we're still doing that.

Mr Sterling: So you think we should get paid more, is that your answer?

Mr French: And it should be taxed.

Mr Sterling: That's fine.

The Chair: Mr Sterling, I've got to go on to Ms Harrington. Ms Harrington has the next question.

Ms Harrington: Thank you very much, and it's nice to see Chris here. I believe we taught together. Was it science, about 15 years ago at Westlane?

I found this process very helpful both yesterday and today. Yesterday we heard about the basic inequities in the funding and the property tax crisis, of course, which you have again mentioned, the need for less red tape and the capital grants process between boards. So there are a lot of really important things coming, and what you've proposed today is a fundamental type of change in the system.

The question I would like to ask you is that I think more and more people, as well as politicians and the people out there whom you're speaking about, are probably coming to some of those same conclusions. As times get tougher, change looks easier, or at least we're pressured towards more fundamental change. My question is with regard to the profession, the other federations. There needs to be a broad consensus for change before it can happen. We can't just impose it from the top down. Have you been working closely with other groups in education to come to these same kinds of conclusions, or are you at the initial stages?

Ms Barkley: There is a twofold answer to that. Initially, when we proposed this, it was very threatening, particularly to the separate school system, so they still have many questions around it. It would not be threatening, I don't think, to any of the public school associations. What the separate school teachers and French teachers would want to make very sure of before this was pursued was that their constitutional rights both to the French language and the Catholicism of the separate schools were protected within whatever model was pursued.

We know that many trustee associations, certainly in the public sector, agree with it simply from a very pragmatic point of view of costs. Metropolitan Toronto really reflects that, I think, and the Ottawa area reflects a duplication more profoundly than any other area in the province. I would assume, just knowing that change is slow, is that what will occur, almost by necessity, is that in the proposals from any government—your government, any other here—would be that some of the duplication that exists now within the system, ie, the buses etc, would be mandated. They would be changed because they are expensive, excessive etc, and then slowly, as people began to find this amalgamation, confederation or whatever you want to call it less threatening, I think we would find more and more we would go towards one system, again making very sure that the constitutional rights of all the constituent parts were protected.

We're dealing with community meetings now through OSSTF with destreaming, decrediting, the "de's," and one of the things the parents are saying to us is that the systems are too expensive. We bring forward this particular proposal and it is one that, regardless of the religious background of the person, as long as you say, "You're protected," they seem to find very, very worthwhile, and it is a saving. It is a fundamental saving, and we think educationally very sound.

Ms Harrington: I would urge you to work with the groups and I would urge us to work in our ridings doing that.

The Chair: Mr Ward wants a question.

Mr Brad Ward (Brantford): One quick one.

The Chair: Yes, you've got time for one quick one.

Mr Ward: I'd like to thank you for your presentation. I think you're one of the few groups that suggested not only what you feel is important in expenditure but also how you think the government can raise the revenues to pay for that direction.

The one thing you would like the Treasurer to hear as far as the OSSTF is concerned loud and clear, is it not, is that the government should this year begin to move towards the 60% funding as far as provincial education is concerned. Is that the one message you'd like the Treasurer to hear?

Ms Barkley: We have a multiple message. That's one, because it has been a promise. We recognize it's difficult to achieve in this period of economic crisis; there's no question. But a move in that direction, not away from it, would certainly be something we and the teachers would look on very happily.

The confederated school board is very important. We would also ask you to deal with the questions that were asked earlier, I think. We would ask you to look at the 43 recommendations that we think reallocate resources and bring some new things into the system without disrupting the economy and would improve the system and would improve education. There are 43 recommendations here which we think deal with fairness. The 60% funding certainly is one, and the confederated school board, but also look at the changes in the tax system as well.

We sort of have it as a package. If we had to say one, certainly 60% funding is important; the confederated school board, too.

The Chair: I'm going to go on to Mr Phillips, the man who had his hand up first.

Ms Barkley: I bet I can guess.

Mr Phillips: An area that we need your advice on is in many respects the big money item in the budget, and that's the pensions. As you recall, the government was supposed to pay the teachers' pension, this fiscal year, $938 million. The government paid $438 million and delayed paying you $500 million. I've been critical of that, not with the teachers but with the government, because we're paying 11.25% interest on that. That's $50,000 a day extra interest payments we're making just for the optics. It's a complete waste of taxpayers' money. The teachers are quite correct in asking for the 11.25%, but the government is wasting $50,000 a day on it, because we could have borrowed the money $50,000 a day cheaper on the marketplace. So I've been quite critical of that.

Next year, the government is supposed to pay you $1.044 billion in the pension plus the $500 million that it owes you from what should have been paid this year and is being put into next year. By the way, that's 1% of the budget which has been delayed just for the optics of saying we're spending $500 million less.

My question to OSSTF—to Larry, I guess—is: Is it your expectation that the government will pay you both your payment for 1993-94—that is, the $1.044 billion—plus the $500 million it owes you from this fiscal year in 1993-94, the upcoming year?

Mr French: Our understanding of it, Gerry, is that through the OTF, the partnership arrangement, all those things have to be negotiated by mutual consent. I think we would agree with you that the most economical way of putting the funding into the pension fund is the way to go. The way I think it was explained to us was that it wouldn't be a major increase cost to the government because either it pays the money first outside the fund or it goes into the fund and it earns the revenue from within the fund. But I don't think there was any agreement, certainly that we've been informed about, that there would be a major change in the funding into the fund.

Mr Phillips: I know Monte has got a question, but I wouldn't mind maybe a follow-up letter just on what your expectation is, because in my opinion the numbers are understated by $500 million this year, and it's a penalty of $50,000 a day. Next year we have a decision: Is it going to be a $1.044 billion or is going to be $1.6 billion?

Mr Kwinter: In the two documents that you presented there are 78 recommendations. I find it strange that there isn't one single recommendation where the teachers themselves feel that they are a part of the problem and that something should be done about that. I have had constituents over the years call me complaining about things like 12 months' salary for nine months' work, professional development days, teacher tenure, all of the areas that have to be addressed somewhere along the line, whether it's year-round teaching or things of that kind.

Could I get some kind of a comment as to why the teachers have not looked at themselves as being part of the problem and offered some solutions?

Ms Barkley: We do, I think, often try to offer solutions as we proceed. The way we offer the solutions normally is through the collective bargaining process. I think you know that. For example, we've not disagreed with year-round schooling. We have just said that the rights of teachers within that year-round schooling had to be protected. Boards, simply through lethargy or whatever, just have not incorporated that.

We're trying to deal with the whole curriculum reform by trying to make very sure that what was happening last year—for example, when they would destream grade 9, you would say this was the teachers' fault, if you had a grade 11 son or daughter, that they were putting more resources and smaller classes into grade 9 while doing away with some programming, and large classes in 11 and 12. You would say that's the teachers' fault, or the timetable or the school, but it wasn't. It was a problem of something external, and we always try to at least bring those things in.

When you indicate that we are paid a 12-month salary for 10 months of work—

Mr Kwinter: Nine months.

Ms Barkley: Would you go away?

Mr Kwinter: I have been a teacher. My wife is a teacher.

Ms Barkley: I know your wife's a teacher in Scarborough. We don't agree with that at all. I find it quite ludicrous. I wonder what you think we do over March break and Christmas.

Mr Kwinter: I know; my wife comes with me to Florida.

Ms Barkley: Your wife's going to get into trouble right now. I can't speak for all affiliates—it would be unfair for me to—but we have an awful lot of teachers, particularly now, over 70%, who are taking summer courses of some variety to try to prepare for all the changes that are occurring. That is almost continuous.

I'll tell you one thing, though, that you may not understand. The workload on teachers, because of all the changes—decrediting, detiming, holistic etc—has increased markedly. We have the second-highest burnout rate, compared to air traffic controllers, in the workforce. Unless you want a dead teaching force, there has to be some time for them to breathe, and there's an awful lot of requalification that goes on.

Remember something: As you criticize salaries, which I think you're about to do, as you've done to me before, you have to really take into effect that we've got the best teaching force here now. We do. We don't have everybody rushing to the private schools, as you do in the United States, or a very inferior situation, as in Britain, where you don't have qualified teachers, you have 10,000 empty classrooms and those who can afford it get a good education. We're trying to preserve within the context of Ontario the universality, the equity of education for all, while still trying to retain its pluses.

I would suggest to you that we are always open to any change. You propose concrete changes of how we should change the teachers or what we do. We would be very happy to dialogue with you. We do change. We change very quickly because we get the impact out there in the society of new forces coming into the school. We're constantly changing, but we would be happy to hear any proposals from you.

The Chair: Okay; time has expired. I can say one thing, Liz: In half an hour you were able to actually talk what would take someone else one hour. I had to listen really closely, because you talk very fast. I'd like to thank all of you for coming forward to this committee for your presentation.

Ms Barkley: I just want to stress one point here, because I know, as Gerry was pointing out, that the documents got a little confused. This is an actual model for funding, a model for across the province. The other is much more dispersed. Thank you very much. I appreciate your hearing us.

ONTARIO PUBLIC HEALTH ASSOCIATION

The Chair: The next group to come forward is the Ontario Public Health Association. I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs and our pre-budget consultations. You are familiar faces, your group. We have half an hour. We'll go till 11:05. If you can leave some time after your presentation for members of the committee to ask questions, and if you could identify yourselves for the purposes of Hansard, you may begin.

Ms Audrey Danaher: I'm Audrey Danaher.

Ms Nancy Day: I'm Nancy Day.

Mr Peter Elson: I'm Peter Elson.

Ms Day: I would like to extend appreciation for the opportunity to once again address this committee about the issues, as we see them, in the public health area.

The mission of the Ontario Public Health Association, OPHA, is to strengthen the impact of people who are active in community and public health throughout Ontario.

Our members are drawn from every discipline and location within the province of Ontario, from Windsor to Thunder Bay. They include people from community health centres, public health units, universities and community agencies.

Community health centres provide a comprehensive response to specific populations. Public health units are the only structure in place in Ontario with a mandate by the provincial government to promote health and prevent disease. This activity covers the whole province and every community within the province.

Public health workers work collaboratively with community literacy groups, schools, social service agencies, community residential facilities, and commercial food and recreational facilities to prevent disease, educate, foster healthy and supportive environments, and inform and refer people to other human service organizations in their community. As one district health council executive recently stated, "Public health is the first line of defence in a community and it's the first line of opportunity to create a healthy community."

In the past year, OPHA has become increasingly concerned about the lack of concrete action taken to implement the strategic directions for provincial health reform, as announced by the minister, the Honourable Frances Lankin, on January 19, 1992. This lack of action has had a direct impact on public health.

Last year, OPHA came to you with the message that an investment in community and public health is an investment in healthier places and healthier people; an investment in prevention contributes to keeping Ontarians as healthy as possible for as long as possible in places where they live, work and play; an investment in prevention pays dividends in a reduced number of accidents at work, on our highways and in the home.

Someone wasn't listening.

Ms Danaher: Public health units throughout Ontario are experiencing an unprecedented erosion of their capacity to fulfil their mandate, as defined by the Ministry of Health. This week, a potential layoff of 20 public health staff was reported in York region. In Kitchener-Waterloo, public health staff watch as 30 positions are put on the block. Managers and supervisory staff across Ontario are taking unpaid leaves. Gapping, using current workers to take over the workload of anyone who leaves, has become the order of the day. While maintenance agreements for computers might be considered part of the cost of doing business, training budgets for dedicated professional and support staff have either been slashed or eliminated in their entirety.

What do these cutbacks mean? School students will miss public health input in classes on human sexuality, nutrition and smoking. What do these programs prevent? A wide variety of sexually transmitted diseases, diminished health status due to poor eating habits and lung and other diseases resulting from tobacco use.

As other programs are eliminated, we can expect increased isolation, neglect and premature institutionalization among our growing population of seniors and incidences of family violence which could have been prevented. Therefore, while government policies champion the virtues of disease prevention and health promotion, the very people who work on their front lines and communities across Ontario justifiably feel that their work and their positions are being devalued.

While the shift to community-based services has the full support of OPHA and its 3,000 members, the gap between the rhetoric and the action continues to widen; in short, less support to health workers and community groups at a time when our economic and social fabric is being tested to its limit.

We support the action which has taken place in the last year on hospital reform, review of laboratory services, the drug benefit program and long-term care. This needs to occur if we are to shift towards a system which is focused and based in and with the community, yet to date we have not seen any resources committed to the structural and systemic changes necessary to support health reform based on the health goals for Ontario.

OPHA calls on the government to develop a comprehensive financial strategy to reallocate resources to community-based services.

We have followed the government's various announcements regarding the tremendous difficulties encountered in dealing with the deficit, yet we believe it is possible to address the deficit while phasing in the incremental allocation of dollars to community-based services.

Therefore, OPHA calls on the provincial government to make a commitment to reallocate 0.25% for 10 years to shifting the resources to community-based services. In 1993-94, this would amount to $35 million from a health system management budget of $14 billion.

For public health units, even a reallocation of resources will be reduced to rhetoric unless attention is given to disentanglement. We have no evidence that this government is prepared to put public health on its disentanglement agenda with the Association of Municipalities of Ontario, yet the existing double-jeopardy funding arrangement between municipalities and the province continually strikes at the heart of public health programs and services. This must be addressed in the context of health reform.

OPHA calls on the government to initiate negotiations with AMO in the next 12 months.

Ms Day: The Healthy Communities Coalition, of which OPHA is a part, calls on the government to support the healthy communities movement as a cornerstone of health reform in general and community health in particular. OPHA adds its recommendation to others who have seen this concept adopted worldwide from a health conference which took place here in Toronto.

Healthy communities support active participation by their citizens in decisions which affect the social, environmental and economic health and wellbeing of their community. It provides a framework to assist communities to make better use of existing resources and assess the impact of local governments' decisions in promoting health and wellbeing, and fosters intersectoral partnerships.

The provinces of British Columbia and Quebec have already made a substantial investment in healthy communities for these same reasons. We call on the government of Ontario to do the same.

Mr Elson: Healthy and safe communities: The value of an investment in the prevention of heart disease and tobacco-related illness has been well established. OPHA is here today to bring your attention to an issue which we feel is equally important: injury prevention.

In Ontario, injury is a leading cause of death for the under-44 year age group. It is the fourth leading cause of death for all age groups. Motor vehicle crashes, which are only one type of injury, claim one life every seven hours in Ontario. More than 120,000 people reported personal injuries from car crashes; that's in one year. Head injury is the primary or contributing cause of death in about 80% of bicycle fatalities, yet of the 2.5 million bicyclists 16 years of age and older in Ontario, 90% report never wearing a helmet.

The direct and indirect cost of injury in Canada is approximately $11 billion. On the basis of proven strategies, 29% of all childhood injury deaths and 85% of motor vehicle accidents could be prevented. An estimate of the direct and indirect cost of injury in Ontario amounts to more than $4 billion a year.

In 1985, the United States National Academy of Sciences stated that "injury is probably the most underrecognized major health problem facing the world today, and the study of injury represents an unparalleled opportunity for reducing morbidity and mortality and realizing significant savings in both financial and human terms—all in return for a relatively modest investment."

Therefore, OPHA is justified in asking, what is being done to prevent injuries in Ontario? Injuries can be prevented and predicted. Known strategies reduce injuries, yet Ontario has no comprehensive system to coordinate injury prevention programs, no provincial goals for injury prevention and a minuscule budget.

OPHA has conducted a comprehensive study of injury in Ontario and has established the following priorities for action: prevention of motor vehicle occupant injury in 16-24 year age group; prevention of cyclist injury in the 5-15 year age group; prevention of unintentional falls for the elderly; prevention of motor vehicle occupant injury in all age groups by increasing correct restraint use and by decreasing the incidence of impaired driving.

What, OPHA asks, is the current government doing to prevent injuries on roads, bicycle helmet injuries and falls among the elderly? The current direct investment by the Ministry of Health in injury prevention is approximately $500,000. A modest 0.1% investment in prevention programs and strategies to combat injuries would be $4 million.

OPHA calls on the government to use existing and proven strategies including public education, legislation and engineering knowledge, existing research expertise and existing non-government organizations and community agencies to reduce the incidence of injuries on streets, roads, in homes and in workplaces.

Unless injury prevention goals for the province are established and financial resources are both allocated and coordinated to address these themes, people will continue to die or sustain crippling injuries. Ontario has invested tens of millions of dollars in treating injuries. Now is the time to invest in injury prevention.

Ms Day: In conclusion, a reallocation of $3.61 for each citizen of Ontario within the Health budget to community and public health in 1993-94 will reduce visits to physicians, illness, hospitalization, family violence and injuries while promoting healthy places and healthy people throughout Ontario. OPHA supports health reform. This reform requires commitment, policy and action. A Vision of Health: Health Goals for Ontario provides the policy. We've heard about the commitment. Crisis or opportunity: It's your choice.

The Chair: I'm going to Ms Coppen. I didn't see her wave her hand, but I was going to ask her to ask the first question because she's involved with healthy lifestyles, I believe in the Port Colborne area, and has been promoting health care in her area. So not even looking at any one else, you've got the floor, Ms Coppen.

Hon Shirley Coppen (Minister without Portfolio): This seems ironic, because I'm so sick with a cold right now. I haven't been following what I've been preaching. If I could ask you a couple of quick questions, who do you get your direct funding from, municipalities?

Ms Day: Our funding comes from a variety of sources. We have a small sustaining grant from the Ministry of Health. We have membership dues because we are a nonprofit association. We also do projects and get grants for doing those projects and that also helps with our funding.

Hon Mrs Coppen: When you talked about injuries and the different programs, correct me if I'm wrong, please, but when we talk about injuries in the workplace, there has been an intensive education program by the Ontario Federation of Labour, from the Ministry of Labour. I was a health care worker in a hospital and there was a very good training program from the Ministry of Health. When we talk about potential injuries out in the public, our local police departments, with the community-based policing, are out there educating people. I see a duplication over and over, and these people are helping out in the community.

Mr Elson: Yes, there is. At this point there are very sort of fragmented and uncoordinated, basically, programs, if you want to call them that. They're a program a particular police department might evoke but it's not necessarily province-wide. There are some programs public health units are engaged in, but in many cases they're not necessarily coordinated with what the police are doing.

Hon Mrs Coppen: If I'm correct, then you see an umbrella from the public health making sure that every community in the province is serviced and all the safety programs are made known to the citizens, correct?

Mr Elson: Yes. As I said in the brief, there are no injury prevention goals for the province, so in fact there has not been an opportunity to date for all those multiple stakeholders—the police, the fire departments, the ambulance attendants, the schools, the public health people—to actually come to—

Hon Mrs Coppen: So it's been haphazard.

Mr Elson: It's been extremely haphazard, and in these days of diminishing resources, there are some things—you may have, for example, a group that's doing a program on snowmobile safety in one area.

Hon Mrs Coppen: To reduce your anxiety about the head injuries on bicycles, about people not wearing bicycle helmets, we have a very progressive member, Dianne Cunningham, who is from the Tory party, and she led the fight in this House that there be mandatory bicycle helmets. In my own riding, I am hearing people complain about it. Can you believe that? We all owe her a big thank you that she was so progressive and pushed for it in this Legislature.

I wish you well. Thank you very much for your presentation and your message has been heard.

The Chair: Mr Ward.

Mr Ward: I was only kidding.

The Chair: Oh, you were only kidding; okay. Mr Kwinter.

Mr Kwinter: In your presentation you call for a reallocation of resources from the institutional health care to the community health care. Yesterday, we had a presentation by the Ontario Hospital Association, and one of the comments made was that there was monitoring, that there were standards, that there was control over the institutional health care sector but that this didn't exist in the community health care system. Do you have any response to that? Do you have any comments?

Mr Elson: Just a point of clarification: You said "standards"?

Mr Kwinter: The point they were making was that in a hospital there are international regulatory agencies that monitor the hospitals, regulate them as far as their operations are concerned and that they all have to be accredited. They have to be accredited by the various organizations that take responsibility for these hospitals, and most hospitals take great pride in their accreditation. Their comment was that this does not take place in the community health sector. I'm just asking for your comments as to whether or not you agree, what the standards are and what is happening out there.

Ms Day: What is happening in the public health area is that the Ministry of Health has developed mandatory programs and guidelines which all 42 health units are required to implement. Each year we are sent forms which we are required to fill in to address what we have done under each of those. Under the act, we are required to fulfil those mandated programs.

Mr Elson: In addition, contrary to the statement that was made, in fact there is an accreditation program, in which the public health units in Ontario take equal pride. The Ontario accreditation program has been in place for some time, and independent auditors review the performance and the activities within the health units on a rotating basis. So that program does exist and it's in operation.

Mr Gary Carr (Oakville South): Thank you very much for your presentation. I agree with Shirley about Dianne and the great job she did with the helmet bill, and I'm glad to see you support that. There's another one: You pointed out the accident deaths of people 16 to 24. I went to speak to a high school a little while ago, St Thomas, and I thought the big questions would be on health care or education or getting jobs. All the kids wanted to know was about the bill they'd heard about, which was graduated licences. Of course, they were opposed to it: "I want to drive. When's it coming in?" What is your feeling about that bill, the graduated licences to reduce the number of accidents among our young people in this province?

Mr Elson: A licence as a right of passage, as it were, is something that has certainly been with us for some time. I have made available to the committee the research report that we did on injuries in the province, and there's absolutely no question that the age group of 16 to 24 years of age not only results in a combination of more accidents, but I think when a young person gets severely injured or killed, it's a tragedy that's hard not only for parents and families but also for communities to live with.

I think it has to be put in that context, that the risk is known: When you combine inexperienced driving with hazardous conditions or impairment, the combination is lethal, and it has been. We have to recognize that. There has to be responsibility, because we pick up the cost of that not only in social service agencies and in families but also in the emergency wards of hospitals right across the province.

Mr Carr: Plus I know it's a big issue in our area because we had a group of kids who were killed at that age and they were piled in. So I appreciate your support and input on that. I want to go to another issue, the issue of funding. The Treasurer came before this committee earlier this week and complimented Frances Lankin. I notice you talked about the cutbacks and were a little bit critical of the funding issue. He came before this committee and for the second time that I can remember—because I remember he did it in the House—said she has been a fantastic Health minister, that she's made all these cuts, that the growth has been less, that it's been the best we've ever had in health care increases, that she's done a terrific job and that there hasn't been any effect on the health care in the province.

In my particular area, I had to miss a meeting this morning with my hospital in Burlington, Joseph Brant. It's going through some more layoffs and cutbacks. One of the questions I asked them was, "What has happened in terms of delayed surgery as a result of some of these cutbacks?" They said, "We don't keep the stats." My feeling is a lot of the negative stats that may be out there saying, "We've delayed X number of operations this week because of cutbacks," aren't kept because they would embarrass the government.

You've got a Treasurer who comes in and says there's been no impact on the health care system. You come in and say, "We're at a crisis point." What would you say to the Treasurer, who says there has been no impact on health care with the cutbacks that his minister, Frances Lankin, has done?

Ms Danaher: First of all, I think everyone recognizes that there is enough money; we do not need more money in health. The health budget has an adequate amount of money. What we are saying is that funds need to be reallocated from institutional-based care to community-based care.

One of the difficulties is that there are a lot of issues that are not identified in terms of numbers. It's difficult to talk about the numbers of child abuse cases that are prevented or the number of people with mental illness or the number of family violence issues. A lot of those issues can be addressed through preventive programs and it's difficult to see the effect right away, but definitely we are seeing an erosion of services in the community. If you look, there are a number of cutbacks in public health units.

We already have an existing structure in place. There's a commitment on the part of the government, it says, to shift to community-based care, but that structure is being eroded. I think you are starting to see the effects of that, and will continue to, over time. The amount of money in institutional-based care, I would say, has been adequate and needs to be reallocated. We need to prevent those people from going to surgery.

Ms Day: I think that if you're talking about seeing an impact on health of these cutbacks, the institutional sector is demonstrating an impact on illness. Today, we want to talk about and have you think about health. Health is not determined by the number of hospital beds or the number of surgeries that are done. The determinants of health, as defined by the Premier's Council and a lot of research that has been done, are housing, a lot of social security issues. We're talking about income and education.

The impact this recession has had in those areas is significant, and yes, it doesn't happen like an accident, where the accident happens now and half a second later you see the blood. It is slower. We are talking about reallocation of a very small per cent, 0.25% a year, over to the community sector to start to build on the determinants of health, to bring together the people, who already know how to address those issues, to work on it. We are calling for strategies to support that.

Mr Carr: Have you had direct discussions with the minister on the amount of funding that you outline here, and if so, what has been the reaction of the minister to what you've proposed?

Mr Elson: We met with the deputy minister last year related to disentanglement. I think we have to look at that, because the issue of funding from the ministry, if there aren't matching funds, as I said, is double jeopardy. If there aren't matching funds from the municipality, if the municipal tax base is starting to decline and it doesn't have the 25 cents for the dollar, then it really doesn't matter how much money the province has; it basically can't be flowed. It's the nature of that arrangement.

Mr Carr: I know that's what provinces do. They commit the money and then they say—I'm not saying specifically this government—"See, we allocated. The municipalities wouldn't give their share. It's not our fault, it's theirs." It's this mindless finger-pointing. You'd like to see, then, the responsibility for this be with the province 100%?

Mr Elson: We want to make sure that issue is on the table, for sure.

Mr Carr: But you don't have a recommendation.

Mr Elson: Not at this time. I think there have been a number of recommendations. The recognition of the relative responsibilities as well as the viability of the contribution by municipalities is important. We believe equally that in fact the programs need to be responsive to the communities. There needs to be ownership within those services and that allocation of resources within the municipality. What that necessarily looks like will need to be done, but when we met with the deputy, it was very clear, as I said, this wasn't on the agenda at this time. It's something that for us and our members comes up every single day. Like you say, that mutual finger-pointing is something that—you know, if the energy that was taking place in the finger-pointing was resolved, there would be a release of a tremendous amount of energy that could go into something much more productive.

Getting back to your other question, though, in terms of what this looks like—for example, in many cases, particularly in rural communities, the budgets are such that the capacity of public health nurses to visit isolated seniors living in rural communities has basically disappeared. There's a move towards a sort of community-wide program, where the onus is for the community to come to the program, as opposed to the expertise to go to those individuals. When those public health nurses, for example, visit those seniors, it's not just foot care or eye care; they're dealing with safety around the home. As I said before, it's the primary intervention to prevent any institutionalization that might come up. They are involved with such a wide variety of programs that they play a tremendous information referral service for people.

The Chair: Mr Carr, time is sort of running out. Would you allow me just two questions?

Mr Carr: For you, anything.

The Chair: Okay. The two questions are: Do you work with the school boards across the province?

Ms Day: Yes, we do. Each health unit has, to varying degrees, liaison with and definitely works on curriculums.

The Chair: Do you work with Niagara south?

Ms Day: Personally, I don't. I'm not in that health unit.

The Chair: I'm going to tell you what the problem is. I've got two younger children and I try to tell them that pop and chips and all the junk food, we don't eat that. "But," he says, "at school I can buy it." I just want to leave that comment with you. You don't have to answer it, because I'm the Chair; I can't interfere in the hearings here. But I just want to give that point—

Ms Day: We hear you.

The Chair: —and say that I think that's where it is too. If they're learning in school it's all right to buy these products, then when they get home, they say, "But Mom and Dad, at school I can get it," because they look up to their teachers. But in Lincoln it's a little bit different; they get into the juices. But there are some school boards I think you'll have to talk to there.

Okay, thanks for appearing before the standing committee here, and have a safe trip home.

ONTARIO COUNCIL OF REGENTS

The Chair: The next group we have is the Ontario Council of Regents. Would you come forward, please? If you don't mind identifying yourselves. Okay, you may begin, and welcome to the committee.

Mr Richard Johnston: I'm Richard Johnston, the chair of the Council of Regents. We're making a joint presentation today. With me is Barry Moore, the president of Fanshawe College and chair of the Council of Presidents. We had hoped to have Doreen Delouzio with us, who is the chair of the council of all the boards of governors of the system, but logistics got in the way and she couldn't come.

Last year we decided, rather than the Council of Regents alone speaking to you, that we wanted to have the management, if you will, of the college system speak to you as one, with our differences of opinion, but to at least let you know that we're trying to work in some kind of cooperation in the system.

We're going to take a slightly different approach today. If I might point a little further past this particular budget line and into the future a little bit, then Barry is going to talk a little bit about where we are as a system at the moment and then we'll be happy to field questions from you, if you have some at that point.

This is the 25th anniversary of the college system since Bill Davis established it a number of years ago. I think it's maybe important to start off with what's happened since and where we were at then and where we're at now.

Before the colleges were established, there were nine technical institutes in the province of Ontario, with about 8,000 students going to them for technical training past the secondary level. When the colleges were established in the late 1960s, about 13,000 full-time students registered the first year, or about 30,000 if you bring in all the part-time students who were participating. This year we will have about 130,000-plus full-time students, almost a million people taking part-time courses in the colleges, and a fairly significant number, which we don't have the figures for at moment, but probably in excess of 100,000, in training of one sort or other which is not post-secondary-related. So there's been a massive growth in the numbers of people availing themselves of this particular form of education.

I guess the context I want to put this in is that if you look at the 1950s, a grade 8 education was seen as all the majority of people needed to get by in society. By the end of the 1960s, grade 12 was definitely the requirement—a grade 12 technical or a grade 12 academic. Either was seen to be appropriate.

It's my sense that we have not had an educational reform of any major consequence structurally since the late 1960s. Yet the need in our society today for education has changed dramatically and any of the stats that you've probably seen out of our national government or things that come out of the United States would indicate that most of the jobs in the 1990s will require at least two years of college education equivalent; in other words, 14.5 or 15 years of education rather than the 12 years upon which our whole system is still based at this point. We have not made any structural change in that matter.

If you then look at the fact that we went from a very small percentage, about 5% of the population, participating in this part of post-secondary, and a total of about 18% of the population going to universities or colleges during the early 1960s, to about 35% of the population going to those institutions at the moment, ironically, there are more going to universities than to the level underneath that in terms of the technical expertise and things that we need to move our economy. That is a matter I'd like to come back to. But we have, during that whole period of 20-some years, people who are in the workforce now, with probably another 20 years to go in the workforce, finding they're being displaced in the workforce because of all of the major restructurings that are taking place and without the adequate education to move on.

At the same time, our graduates out of the high school system are being primarily directed through an OAC-driven curriculum, if I can put it that way, into the university sector and not into the colleges. So a huge number of our people, whether they're dropouts of the high school system or graduates, are still not availing themselves of the post-secondary education that they require in order to be able to participate in a modern economy.

Where we are at the moment, it seems to me, is at a point where we need some new vision of what the organization of education should be in the province of Ontario. The position I would like to put forward to you is that in fact we need a major extension and investment in the college-style level, if I can put it that way. I don't think we need 23 new colleges in the province of Ontario and that kind of massive capital infrastructure change, but we need an emphasis on where people should be getting educated, for our economy, that we don't have at the moment.

We're getting bits and pieces of that vision coming forward, and I think Barry will talk a lot about how the colleges are trying to respond to that at the moment. But I don't think we have a holistic view of it, if I can put it that way, and I think it's time that we did. If you look at the clarity of vision that was there in the 1960s for establishing the colleges and expanding the universities, I think something equivalent is needed now, although the answer is by no means the same.

The argument I would make is that OTAB's development and the Jobs Ontario developments are all parts of a puzzle, but if we try to focus only on job-specific training at this point we will be selling short the needs of the majority of our citizens. That is to say that you can train people for a specific job and in three years that job could be gone, the way technology is moving. If you've not given them generic skills to enable them to move to other kinds of advanced training as they're in their employment and to prepare for change, we're going to have this continual displacement of people, high welfare rolls and a lot of people on unemployment for the next period of time.

The place where at the moment we have applied learning and generic skills put together most effectively, I would argue, is the college system, where all the courses are related to prospective jobs. Right now, even in the depths of this recession, the latest figures I've seen, which are not released yet, show that we're still finding jobs for over 80% of the students who go into our colleges, which is remarkable given the nature of the downturn of the economy at this point.

It's clear as well, if you look at stability of employment, that major stability comes with the level of education you're at. The greater your general level of education, the greater your capacity to remain employed. Again, from our perspective it's time to think about a massive new shift in direction to make sure everybody gets at least a college level of education. Then you can't stop at that, because if you do, I think you're running into a dead end as well. That is to say that one of the flaws, perhaps, of the system when it was established in the 1960s was that there was no direct linkage to the universities out of the colleges, partially because the universities did not want anybody messing around with their degrees, frankly, and being able to offer degrees like they could.

In part that's been useful to our system, and I would argue it's been more effective than the CEGEP system in Quebec because we have much better technical programs than it does. They are a junior college system and everything is oriented to getting people through a classical education into the universities, whereas we are actually producing people who are better equipped to deal with the economy than the CEGEPs are.

However, the need to make the linkages to the universities is crucial. If we now start to see general education moving to not being grade 12 but, say, two years of college, we have to make sure that's not a dead end but that people can then move to other kinds of superior training, and hopefully the work that Walter Pitman's up to at the moment will point some directions for us in terms of how that can be done.

I'd like to come back to some of these comments at the end, if I might, after Barry's had a chance to talk a little bit, but there are linkages that are just crucial. We've got to change the way colleges and high schools work together. We've got to change the way colleges and universities work together or, more importantly, don't work together at this point. We've got to talk a lot more about federal-provincial shared visions and shared resources, because we are being decimated in certain aspects of what we're doing in the colleges by problems with federal funding at this stage.

We need to think more clearly about how income maintenance programs, like those operated through Comsoc, should be directly integrated into training and education, and not just through a Jobs Ontario kind of project but much more intrinsically organized. I'd like to come back to that after Barry's had a chance to tell you about how we're trying to manage at the moment with the financial difficulties we have.

Mr Barry Moore: It is a pleasure to be here. My comments all refer, in a very brief fashion, to the notes, which I think were circulated to you, Ontario Colleges: Well Positioned to Support the Province's Economic Renewal. There are a number of headings there which I think describe the reasons for that.

One does have to do with access. Richard has mentioned the tremendous growth in the system over the past 25 years—that's the same across the country—but if you would look at the first chart that's in your handout indicating the figures, a very recent period, 1988-92, you can see a very substantial increase in enrolment there. This is just in the post-secondary area of our operation, not the training side where there are similar kinds of things happening, but you can see the tremendous increases.

I think one of the things that's important for members to be aware of as well is that colleges don't just deal with individual students, full-time or part-time. We deal with a lot of agencies and a lot of industries, through continuing education, through the skills development offices. I know in my own institution of Fanshawe College the skills development office at any one time is dealing with between 300 and 400 small and medium-sized businesses in our southwestern Ontario region, enabling those companies to develop educational programming for their own employees. We're not just talking about individual students; we're talking about our connections to agencies and industries and so on throughout the whole province.

In terms of access, access will be greatly aided by the prior learning assessment activity which is coming. We can come back to say more about that, if you wish. Distant education programming is being looked at on a much wider basis than it was previously.

On the quality issue, there are a number of ways in which colleges do a good job. One is certainly by the strong connections they have maintained over the years with their local communities, having programs driven out of real, local community needs. Another part of that is through the fact that most colleges have very strong program review processes in place. As a very quick aside on that, even before I came to Fanshawe College in London, five years ago now, I had heard a number of years before that, out in British Columbia where I worked previously, about the superb program review process that was in place at Fanshawe College, where virtually every program in the institution—and this is matched in many colleges in the province now—is reviewed about every three years, primarily by employers who hire the graduates. So it's quality control that I think really does work.

The other quality issues: Richard has already mentioned the strong employment record, still going out in the teeth of the recession. Our graduates, about 80% of them, are getting employed in areas directly related to their education and training, and another 6% or 7% are finding work. Many of the others are on to other things, other forms of education. A very small number are still looking for work.

We also, I think, have a pretty good record of high satisfaction with the results of the college work. There's going to be—and we can't refer to it too publicly today because it will be announced tomorrow. The Ontario Institute for Studies in Education is circulating a document tomorrow, reviews of a thousand folks here in the province of Ontario which provides some rave reviews for the college system. We were anxious about what might be found. We are now overjoyed by what is in that report, and there will be more, I think, available on that.

Responsiveness: You can read what's there as well as I can say it. There's a tremendous diversity of activity in our institutions, and that's one of their strengths. I think also that we have been quick to respond to labour initiative needs. You can see the list of things there, labour force adjustment activities and increasing numbers of mature students in our institutions. The figure that's there—this in the second-last bullet under "Responsiveness"—refers in the fall term of 1990, in the post-secondary area, to about 20% of our students being 25 years of age or older. I would suspect that probably has increased dramatically over the past couple of years. We don't have that information yet, but my own faculty indicates that even this year there was once again apparently a dramatic increase in the age of the students, many of them casualties of the recession, and we are indeed the prime institution of choice during the time of recession.

A lot of partnerships, and that's important to this government; I think it should be important to any government these days, for trying to work things out. I think too long, right across the country, we tried to do things in isolation from one another. You can see a list of the kinds of things that colleges have been involved in and are working on. One of the reasons that colleges are a good bet to do that is because we are so connected to our local communities, and if you are tied in there, then the ability to operate in isolation is much more difficult.

The accountability area: We are a crown corporation. Some of my colleagues complain about that a little bit at times, but, for better or for worse, that means we are very closely connected to the requirements of provincial and indeed federal governments in having their programs—social and economic and other programs—come into place. You can see some of the ways in which our accountabilities are maintained.

With regard to restructuring, if I could ask you to look at the second chart—fortunately, I guess they hang together fairly well. One of the dilemmas we have right now is that you can see the enrolments are up very, very substantially. If you look at the chart, and particularly the grant per funding unit, which is the bottom line of figures, you can see that the funding unit for our institutions over the past three or four years has gone dramatically down. So it's very possible for us to say, I think quite accurately, that we have already been involved in restructuring for the past three or four years. I think there is a point now, however, where those numbers are starting to collide in a very, very difficult way, and I think that's partly the reason for our visit today.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, a question. Is that funding unit the student body?

Mr Moore: It's not exactly a student body, because full-time and part-time sometimes get a little bit mixed up, but you can certainly equate that to a student. If we had the accurate information on students, it would show exactly the same picture.

The Chair: Maybe for clarification, I think Mr Kwinter is saying it might take five part-time students to make one full-time. Is that how you're counting? The clarification could also be for the Chair.

Mr Moore: No. The funding unit would relate very directly. You could equate it to full-time students.

The Chair: But you count five part-time equivalent to one? Is that how you're doing it here? In other words, if you had people going part-time and they were taking only one course whereas maybe you're taking five as a full-time student, it would take five of them to give you one.

Mr Moore: I would say 99% of the document here refers to our full-time operation. The 900,000-plus people we operate through the other side of our organization are funded in quite another way.

The Chair: I think Mr Johnston was saying one million part-time students.

Mr Johnston: It's around 900,000 or so.

Mr Moore: I'll conclude, because I know our time is just about up. The point we want to make is that whatever we've done over the past 25 years, I think we've put together an infrastructure that really is poised to do some continuing new and dramatic things. It was just 25 years ago that we began. We have an infrastructure that's deeply rooted in every community in this province, we have a good record of partnerships, and I think we are poised to move in the directions the province wishes by way of rebuilding the economic and social base that's necessary for the future.

Mr Johnston: What we are missing at the moment is the clear direction the government wishes us to go in. We're getting lots of hints of it through a variety of various programs, and, as Barry said, we're trying to adjust to them at a time of fiscal restraint. But it seems to me we need more clarity on: How much is going to be done by high technology?

How much can be done by self-directed learning? How much can we do through prior learning assessment of older people coming into our system? And just what is the overall vision of where the shift will be in terms of our education system, hopefully for the next 25 years, because it's still primarily designed on a 1960s model.

Mr Phillips: I think the thing that will impact you the most is OTAB. I think this is a fundamental shift. I'm interested that you're supportive of it. Many of the things you do right now in my opinion will shift over to OTAB, and it will be an independent agency. I think there are some major risks in it. It is not accountable, in my mind, to the public. It's accountable to the 22 directors and their constituency, which is a limited constituency. It is going to have a fundamental shift. Many of the things you say you do is in their mandate, that's going to be their role now. Under OTAB, as it picks up the responsibility for the partnership with employers, with sectoral training, with all those things, won't that fundamentally shift your role? You will be a supplier to OTAB.

Mr Johnston: Both of us will probably want to say something on this. Barry?

Mr Moore: I think it's very important to note that OTAB is not primarily a delivery mechanism. It's a coordination mechanism.

Mr Phillips: I understand that.

Mr Moore: We are really saying that the college system is the prime delivery mechanism that is available to put the programs out. We do about 70% of the training activity in the province right now, for instance. We see it from an operational perspective. While, as you pointed out, while there are some difficulties with OTAB, when it finally begins to operate, it will be so much better than the absolutely sporadic diversity and confusion that's out there about who does what and when at this point that it will be a blessing.

Mr Phillips: Good. I'm glad to hear you say that.

Mr Johnston: One of the advantages for us through it is that when it has local boards, we're well tied into those local communities, and we're expecting that colleges will still play a major role.

The other thing we recognize is that the colleges can't do everything. When I talk about the new vision, I don't think that means that every training program in the province needs to be dealt with in a college. The generic skills base is something that I think a college can deliver better than any of the others. Sectoral partnerships are things we can do better because we have institutions all around the province to be able to help with sectoral things, but there are many kinds of training that could be done better by private trainers, by boards of education. We need to work that stuff out and rationalize that stuff out better.

But from our perspective, we're worried a little bit about the potential of being shut out of an OTAB in the way you're portraying. But we just look at what's happening to us with federal dollars at the moment: A college like George Brown or Fanshawe, which does an awful lot of training at the moment, is getting devastated by arbitrary cutbacks, as we would see it, of money from our system, without having any input. At least with OTAB, we'll have a voice at the table and will be able to try to say: "We can do this part of things. We're happy to have open competition and lose this other matter but there are certain things a college can do that others can't do." So on balance, we prefer that to the status quo.

Mr Moore: We welcome the competition.

Mr Phillips: Very interesting.

Mr Sterling: I have a whole host of questions I'm interested in. We've heard some evidence in front of this committee that Ontario is paying huge amounts of money for its education system and we're not getting a good bang for our bucks. Because you're at the end of the system that has been seen as more of a training function, you probably aren't receiving the same kind of criticism that other ends of the system might be.

I don't know how long your teachers teach; I don't know how well they're paid. I understand they're paid roughly equivalent to secondary school teachers.

Mr Johnston: I wish. That's part of our problem.

Mr Sterling: But they're only teaching for a fairly short period during the year, September to the beginning of May or something like that. We have to get a better bang for our bucks, whatever we're talking about. How are we going to address this within your area? It's nice for everybody to come here and say, "The feds aren't giving us"—you know, the supply side is down, but there aren't any more bucks, I don't think.

Mr Johnston: I think you put your finger on a problem. When we went into collective bargaining last time with the faculty, our big problem was that the gap between high school teachers at max and our professors was going to be $6,000. It's strike time when that kind of separation happens, because always the comparators have been between those two systems and between ourselves versus the universities, which is another $20,000 or so above our faculty's level, at this point. So our people were quite nervous about that.

On the other hand, we as management wanted exactly the kind of reconsideration of workload and participation in the classroom etc that you're talking about. As part of our agreement, we have now what's being called an effectiveness committee or quality of education committee, jointly with management and the union, which is going to be looking at ways we can reorganize how we're operating in the classroom and elsewhere to try to make ourselves continually more efficient.

To follow up on what Barry said, we have been making efficiencies by necessity: to have a 30% growth, as we've had, in the number of students in this last period of time, with the small amount of increase, when we've had increases, in terms of the pass-through or grant. We've already been making those efficiencies, but we're at the edge of what we can do now within our present collective bargaining structure, and we're trying to work at new ways of rethinking that.

That committee we're hoping will be up and running effectively in the next month or so, and within the next year or two will tie in with our restructuring committee, which is looking at many large issues of technological change, in terms of delivery, compressing the school year for our mature students, a number of things of that sort, and see how we can meld the labour reality with the desires for reorganization. We have some hope we'll be able to manage that.

Mr Sterling: I think the taxpaying public is going to demand even more from all parts of the education system.

Can I ask another question which is very important to me? The college system, when it was originally set up, was an alternative route for some people in our society, to go to community college to obtain more practical skills, and in some cases for people who had less academic qualification to obtain another level of education.

It seems that those very people whom the system was designed for are getting squeezed out, because we now have university graduates who are coming back into the college system and squeezing out the people the system was meant for originally. It may lead to the fact that you are getting 80% of those people who were, first of all, university graduates, then trained, then are out, so I'm not sure the 80% is a reflection of people the system was originally set out for.

Can I add another part to it? Is there some logic to ending education for some of our people within our secondary schools at, say, a grade 10 level and then transferring them into the colleges, because you are then talking about the transfer of resources from one system to the other? I think we had the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education come in here two or three years ago and say: "You know, in a lot of cases, there isn't any justification for keeping kids who are 16, 17 and 18 in high school. We really don't know why we're doing that."

Mr Moore: On the first question with regard to whether the college system is still serving those for whom it was originally intended and, for instance, not primarily those who may have been recent university graduates or something who are bouncing back in, in my own situation in London, where there are certainly some students who have come back from part of a university or a total university pattern, I think the publicity that has surrounded a lot of that is much larger than the actual numbers.

When you start to look at the actual numbers in classes, particularly in the health area—a lot of our health programs seem to draw a large number of those people—you will still find, I think in most colleges anyway, a preponderance of recent high school persons or persons without university education in them. There is sometimes a lot of publicity when students can't get into particular programs. Of course, there are thousands of those at this point, but I think the driving out of those for whom the college system was intended is not a huge problem. It gets a lot of press.

Mr Johnston: It could have been a problem, however, if we had not continued to admit as many people as we have, because the squeeze might have happened. The debate continually takes place in the colleges, because the range of things they do is from Ontario basic skills level, the upgrading of individuals who don't have a grade 10 kind of a level, to doing very high-tech stuff which is not even done in universities in some cases. There's always that debate: Can we do all of this? Up to this point, the colleges have said they still want to be the welcoming kinds of institutions they were established to be in the 1960s.

Mr Moore: On the grade 10 issue, on the question with regard to whether there should be transfers to colleges, a number of jurisdictions have thought of that and contemplated it—British Columbia did some years ago—and there just seemed to be so many problems associated with it.

My own personal answer to this, and some of my school colleagues won't appreciate this too much, is that in some ways the dropout rate in high schools may not be enough and it probably would not hurt many people to drop out, find their way, dramatically decrease enrolment in the school system and return back to adult education and retraining when they are truly motivated, and moving on to that much more quickly. That would shake loose millions of dollars. But as I say, that's not too popular with my school colleagues.

Mr Sterling: Just in response, I guess my question was put because I believe you could prevent a lot of the dropout rate if you took a certain segment after grade 10 and said, "We're now going to train you specifically on a path which you see as useful to your ends."

Mr Johnston: I would not disagree. The only thing I would say at the moment is that there are some steps we could take even before that in terms of making the curriculum at the high school level an awful lot less biased towards trying to move people into universities and more into getting them prepared for the workplace and for college.

Ms Swarbrick: One clarifying question and then one of more substance: Am I understanding correctly from the document you presented that the federal funding is direct and that therefore it's not included in this chart?

Mr Moore: That's correct.

Ms Swarbrick: I assume it would make your picture look even worse if you had a chart of it.

Mr Moore: Yes.

Ms Swarbrick: The question of greater substance is that I was at the retirement dinner for Bev McCauley—I believe you were too, Barry—and I was talking to a number of the community college presidents there, some of whom were advocating having greater freedom to be able to raise money for the college system independently. I was wondering if you would comment on that, and if the two of you disagree, whether you would each comment on that.

Mr Moore: I don't even know whether we disagree. I know a number of colleges are involved in capital campaigning or other campaigning. My own institution is among those and is doing quite well at it, thank you, for first ventures. In most cases, this is new for colleges because we were prohibited from doing it by the government here in Ontario until just before my time, about five or six years ago. Those ventures, I think, are quite positive, again not only from the perspective of the funds which are raised—they don't relate to operating colleges; people at this point anyway in Ontario are not willing to consider giving money for operating the institutions—not only the money, but it is the important community partnerships that those activities bring.

I think all the colleges that have been involved in fund-raising have found that their connections to large- and medium-sized and other corporations that give them things, dollars or equipment, are often done on the basis of some kind of activity that then links them together with the institution much more strongly. From that perspective, it's much more than the money, and I strongly support that kind of activity. There's a lot of it going on.

Ms Swarbrick: I understood that some were throwing around the pros and cons of a greater freeing up than what exists now in terms of raising money, maybe for operating money, some of the cons being that I gather there are problems in the United States where that is wide open and there are some problems with it. I wonder if you can comment on that.

Mr Johnston: The real difficulty is structural, in my view. It's not like a university, which has an independent charter and has a great deal of autonomy. Colleges are crown corporations, extensions of the Ministry of Colleges and Universities, and therefore to try to attract money for operating purposes is a very difficult thing to do because people presume the government should be doing it. If you started to get successful doing it, then I'm sure the government would also start to reduce its funds. If you look at some of the colleges in the United States and their economic problems, it's because of that. They've gained some on the private side and then they've lost enormously in terms of the public side involvement, so I think there's a lot to be lost.

I look at some of the projects that have come out of our colleges for capital stuff, and there's wonderful cooperation, so the government gets asked for, say, a quarter of the dollars required because of all the local input. It seems, in terms of startup of the economy and things, funding more of those capital projects, which have a lot of local community involvement, would be a very wise idea.

The Chair: The time has expired. We've actually run the clock a little bit over. I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee.

Mr Johnston: It's a pleasure. I've always liked being on this side of it.

ONTARIO MEDICAL ASSOCIATION

The Chair: The next group we're going to hear from is the Ontario Medical Association. I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on our pre-budget consultations. We ran over a little bit. We're just getting extra copies of your brief for members of the committee, so I wasn't letting them have extra time, but to keep the committee going.

If you wouldn't mind identifying yourselves for the purposes of Hansard and the committee here, we have until 10 after 12. Mr Phillips, we'll be going 10 minutes late for lunch again today. Sorry, Gerry. You may begin, and leave some time at the end for questions from the committee.

Dr Michael Wyman: I'm Dr Michael Wyman. I'm a family physician in North York and I'm the treasurer of the Ontario Medical Association. I have with me Mr Darrel Weinkauff who is the director of economics of the Ontario Medical Association. We'll try to keep our brief brief, so that perhaps you might be able to hit lunch closer to time.

On behalf of my colleagues in the medical profession, I'd like to thank you for the opportunity to come this morning and address the committee. Based on recent comments, the Treasurer of Ontario is cautiously optimistic about the economic prospects for 1993 and 1994. Economic growth is expected to be moderate, but it's also expected to exceed the growth in other G-7 countries.

As the Treasurer has pointed out, despite the severity of the recession in 1991, Ontario's gross domestic product per capita was greater than for Canada as a whole and was the largest of all G-7 countries but the United States. While the recession has clearly had a significant impact on the economy, it's important to keep it in perspective. As well, we should also keep expenditures on medical services in perspective.

The latest figures available to the OMA place the budget of the Ministry of Health at approximately $17 billion for 1992-93, or one third of the total operating expenditures of the Ontario government. Expenditures on physician and medical services are less than a quarter of that amount. In 1992-93, the government of Ontario will spend roughly $413 per person for medical care. In comparison, total health care expenditures from all sources, both public and private, will likely reach more than $2,100 per person.

Extrapolating on historical trends, each person in the province sees a physician, on average, 11 times per year and receives 2.5 medical services per encounter. This means the cost to government is $37.60 per visit or $15 per service. Physicians do not believe that such fees are excessive, especially if one considers that, on average, 42% of a doctor's income goes to cover office overhead.

We do with the Treasurer's recent statement that the increased need for social programs, including health care, presents the government with a fiscal challenge. However, physicians fear that to help meet its budgetary objectives government intends to lessen the fee or the price it pays for medical services. We feel strongly that this is not a viable solution to controlling health care costs and would in fact be detrimental to the significant progress we have achieved in this area.

One objective of the framework agreement reached in 1991 between the profession and the government is "to ensure fair and equitable compensation for physicians." We urge the government of Ontario to remain faithful to the spirit of this agreed-upon objective. However, we would like to stress that doing so will in no way prevent the government from fulfilling its fiscal responsibility.

The profession is acutely aware of government's need to control expenditures and to ensure that fiscal resources are used effectively and in a manner conducive to the wellbeing of the public. Certainly, moderating the growth of publicly insured services will reduce costs, but any success in this area can be a double-edged sword. At some point—many of us on the front line would argue that this point has been reached—the decline in services may severely threaten the quality of care we provide.

We believe that fiscal responsibility and quality health care are not to be mutually exclusive. It can be achieved by promoting the efficient delivery of medical services. In this sense, we are partners. While the framework agreement requires both parties to ensure fair and equitable compensation for physicians, it also commits the medical profession and the government of Ontario to providing more effective management of health care and physician services and to enhancing the quality of care.

The commitment of the profession to these tasks is substantial. We do not take the opportunity to be an active partner in the management of the system lightly. Through its participation in the joint management committee, JMC, the profession has made an enormous investment in improving the delivery of medical services in Ontario.

The JMC has established a sound infrastructure and has begun to address major challenges in earnest. The Institute for Clinical Evaluative Sciences, ICES, which is the JMC's research arm, is now fully functional and will rely heavily on the critical experience and expertise of Ontario's physicians. It is clear that improvements we achieve in the management of the system will be due in large part to the insight of physicians as front-line health care providers.

Let me assure you that the profession will not shrink from making the difficult decisions ahead and that it is determined to provide leadership in the areas of physician resource planning, utilization review and quality assurance. Through the JMC we are working closely with government to tackle such difficult issues as the development of clinical guidelines, training and licensure of international medical graduates and physician distribution. The tasks before us are formidable, but they would be even greater without the cooperation of government and the profession, the expertise of ICES and other researchers and the support of the public.

Already we have seen a significant decline in the growth of medical services. Following an average annual increase of 5.5% over the last decade, and averaging about 7.2% over the previous three years, medical services grew by only 3.2% in 1991-92, the first year under the framework agreement. For 1992-93, it is currently running at only 1.5%. This represents a reduction in expenditure growth of nearly $250 million over the last two years.

Furthermore, the profession has agreed to work with government to ensure that medical services used to meet the requirements of third parties are not billed to the Ontario health insurance plan. Although we do not have firm estimates, those figures that we do have, combined with what we can learn from other jurisdictions, suggest to us that this could represent a savings of $90 million to $120 million in each and every year.

The medical profession has also shown considerable restraint in its negotiations with government. At a time when the expenses of operating a medical practice were rising by 6% per year, the profession agreed to a modest 1% increase in the OHIP schedule of benefits. In addition to these costs, physicians must now also absorb the employer health tax, which will reduce net fees and incomes by a further 1%.

Many people from many walks of life have suffered the effects of this recession, and physicians are no exception, but we will continue to meet our commitments under the framework agreement and work to ensure access to quality medical care in a cost-effective fashion. We recognize the need of government to show fiscal restraint, and at the same time we are acutely aware of the needs of our patients. Clearly, a balance must be struck, but we urge government, as it sets the budget, to remain sensitive to the health care needs of our society. We must be vigilant that in striving to contain costs we do not jeopardize the quality of the system that we have all worked so hard to establish. Thank you, Mr Chairman. I'd be more than happy to answer any questions.

The Chair: Okay, from the Conservative Party, Mr Carr.

Mr Carr: Yes, I'll go first. Thank you very much for your presentation. I had a question relating to the cap on doctors' salaries, the $400,000. I have spoken to many doctors. Way back when I was 18, I tore up cartilage when I was playing hockey, and a doctor by the name of Dr Jackson, who went on to become chief of surgery and so on, did the operation. To this day, it's been terrific. I went through six years of playing pro and have had no problems up to and including last weekend.

They tell me he has now left to go to Dallas, where he'll make a substantial amount of money doing teaching as well. The people we will lose with this cap won't be the regular GPs, because quite frankly they say the States won't take us; it's a tough time. But the ones we will lose are the top in their professions. This incidence was Dr Jackson. Do you see a lot of our top specialists leaving because of the cap that was put on by this government?

Dr Wyman: That's a very difficult question to answer because while there are a large number of people who do migrate to the States, it is difficult to obtain the numbers that have gone in the last two years. We've been trying to get those figures, and mostly they are anecdotal.

Mr Carr: They don't report in and say, "I am leaving."

Dr Wyman: They often don't; they often will maintain their Ontario licence even though they move away. But the preliminary estimates are that there has not been a dramatic increase in the number of people that are going. There's no question that we in Ontario, through our educational establishment, have created a large number of world-class physicians. There is also no question that the American system provides these people with significantly more money for research facilities, for hospital and operating room facilities and for personal income than we can offer in Ontario.

Has the $400,000 cap significantly changed that? I think it has affected some of the people going, and I think it will probably continue to do that. But I think some of the other efforts that have gone through in the budgetary concerns, the budgetary cutbacks, related more to hospitals than to physicians' incomes, are going to have significantly greater impact on people leaving.

Mr Carr: I hope this is isolated, but I've also heard of some specialists who say: "That's fine. We've got a cap on $400,000. I'll work the six months, nine months, and then"—they might be a specialist in hand surgery—"I'll be down in Florida, and I could work seven days a week, 24 hours a day because of my specialty, and I'm just not going to do it." I hope that's isolated, because I don't think doctors get into it—in spite of what some in the government think—for the money; they do it because they care about people.

But I want to touch on another issue. I was supposed to go to a meeting today at my hospital in the Burlington area, Joseph Brant, which has been ravaged by cutbacks, has laid off a tremendous number of nurses and services have been cut back dramatically. When we went to the finance meeting—and

I know yesterday some of the government members said they keep everybody involved. They have; they've had nurses there, they've had workers, they've had the chief of surgery, they've had everybody, including MPPs. We can't even fit in the boardroom.

But one of the problems they've got is that they do not keep records of postponements of operations. So the hospital can't say, "I'm sorry, this week, because of cutbacks, 13 people have had to wait for elective surgery." As the medical profession, what is your assessment? Can you give us some numbers on what the health care cutbacks are doing in terms of, let's say, surgery being postponed? How many people are being pushed back that we don't know about? You've got a Treasurer saying, "See, nothing has happened in the health care system," and no one knows about the number of operations being postponed. Could you give us an idea of what's happening in that area?

Mr Darrel Weinkauff: This information is anecdotal. One of the problems we have with our—

Mr Carr: Just quickly, if I could—and sorry to interrupt—why is it anecdotal? If you could just explain that too.

Mr Weinkauff: I was about to explain that.

Mr Carr: Okay, sorry.

Mr Weinkauff: Actually, the difficulty we have with our information system is that we don't get final information until, very often, a year after the fact. Most of the changes you're talking about, these squeezes, restrictions in hospitals or access to hospital services, have occurred in the last year. We expect that, shortly, we'll be able to give you a better estimate, but at the moment all we know is that it is happening.

Actually, I'm wondering if I can comment just briefly on your question on thresholds. Again, it is anecdotal. We will get better information, but I think it's clear that it does in fact induce physicians to reduce the level of care they provide to the community. Many of them incur this penalty and I believe the government expects it will recover about $37 million from physicians for providing services above the $400,000 range. But once you get above that, most physicians are not really willing to pay 33-cent dollars for those services. In many instances it costs them money to provide that care.

So, again, I don't have figures, but I think you can be confident that it does have that effect.

Mr Carr: One last question, too, in regard to your relationship with the government. This is a difficult one and I'll play devil's advocate. The problem you've got is that you, of course, negotiate with the government and many doctors have been critical of your association because they said it hasn't taken on the government. It's a delicate balance. I firmly believe that in dealing with this government you have to do like the police did: confront it and stand up to it.

Many doctors are coming to me, saying—and forgive me for saying this—"They are not going hard at the government like they should on our behalf." Knowing you have to negotiate with them is a lot different, because you can say that when you're not sitting at the table with them in the open here and knowing it's going to get back to the government. How would you categorize your relationship with the government today? How's that for an easy question for you?

Dr Wyman: I think in the last couple of years there has been a shift in the relationship between organized medicine and the government, and I think it's been a positive one. Going back over the five, six, seven years previously, we've had a very antagonistic relationship.

Mr Carr: When you were throwing the rolls in the legislative dining room.

Dr Wyman: Yes, it's not been a pleasant time. I think, as a result, the provision of care has suffered. I think there is a need for a cooperative approach between medicine and the government towards management of the system. At the same time, that does not mean we have to roll over and play dead. If there are specific issues we are unhappy about, I think it is absolutely appropriate for us to be stating that loudly and clearly. There are some current issues that in fact the profession will be stating loudly and clearly very shortly in terms of government follow-through on some of the things it has committed to do that it hasn't. That will be coming out within the next couple of weeks.

I don't think the fact that we have a cooperative management approach towards the system in any way means we are either in bed with the government or that we can't be critical of things that deserve criticism.

Ms Harrington: I'm glad to hear you have a better relationship. I have two questions. You mention in the report here that one objective of the framework agreement of 1991 is "to ensure fair and equitable compensation for physicians," and "doing so will in no way prevent the government from fulfilling its fiscal responsibility." I would ask you to be a little more specific here, because what we're talking about is that people are not willing to pay any more taxes. Where do we cut back in the health care system?

My second question: You talked about the joint management committee and addressing major challenges in earnest together, which is great. That's the way it should be. You have an evaluation committee which is actually looking at the management of the system. Improvements, you say, "will be due in large part to the insight of physicians as front-line health care providers." My question to you is, how would you see the place of, say, nurse practitioners as part of those front-line health care providers?

Dr Wyman: In answer to your first question, the framework agreement is a six-year agreement between the government and the profession, and has a series of objectives. One of the main objectives of the agreement, of course, was to provide fair and equitable compensation for physicians. "Fair" and "equitable" are terms that are defined under the Canada Health Act, so it's not a matter of what one person deems to be fair; it requires sort of a national as well as provincial perspective and in comparison to other sectors of society.

We have an ongoing set of negotiations with government and are currently in the process of negotiations with government to determine a fair and reasonable price for services. What has often happened in the past as we've gone through that is that there has been confusion between price and income. One of the ways we've started to deal with the income side of things is in looking at the utilization formula and the way in which the system is being used.

As data is becoming available, the joint management committee is beginning to review and develop a better understanding of how in fact the system is being utilized. One of the direct outflows of that is the component of the recently signed agreement between the government and the profession with regard to third-party services, a large number of which had previously been billed to the Ontario health insurance program, were never intended to be and should not have been. Through a conjoint effort between the government and the profession, we are in the process of letting the population of Ontario know that these things are not a public purse responsibility.

It's by reviewing that type of utilization process, it's by looking at the way in which services are being provided, that the total budget, the globe, can be maintained at a reasonable level while not negatively impacting upon what is a fair and reasonable price for the services being provided.

Ms Harrington: So you're saying that by working together you can look at other things around the direct health care provision as to how to do it—even from what we've done so far, cut back further. There is something there we can cut back.

The Chair: I'm going to get my hammer out, Margaret. You had two questions. I've got to go on to Mr Phillips.

Mr Weinkauff: Perhaps I could make one comment on that, though.

The Chair: A short reply.

Mr Weinkauff: Dr Wyman said we have to differentiate between considerations on price, fees paid for medical services, and budget. That's what you alluded to. How do you not compromise quality of care, given the fiscal restraint that the government hopes to impose? That is, of course, the dilemma that faces us. Efficiency, the JMC, improving efficiencies within the system, will take us so far, but you're right. If we are as efficient as we can be and the government wishes not to spend any more money, it will have to face the decision about cutting back. It is as simple as that.

Ms Harrington: You didn't actually answer my question about the place for nurses.

The Chair: I'm sorry, but I've got to move on, Margaret. You put one question forward at a time so you can get that one answered, because sometimes when you put three or four—

Mr Phillips, after being on committee for three years now—two years?—knows the rules. Go ahead, Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: I've been waiting for two years.

What was that again? I have to ask it all in one question?

The Chair: One question at a time, not put five questions in one question.

Mr Phillips: How much time do we have?

The Chair: You've got five minutes, Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: Just as an aside, that's an interesting observation. I think we have to keep in mind, when we think that we are cutting back on health care spending, that there's $120 million that would normally have shown up as government expenditures that now is being taken not in taxes but billed directly to employers. So as we think of how we're managing the system and what we're spending on health care year to year, I think it's helpful for the committee to have those numbers in our minds, because the government is quite proud of its record on health spending, part of it real, part of it illusory, because it's simply—

Mr Sterling: Transferring.

Mr Phillips: —transferring it, privatizing it, and extra billing on it.

I really appreciate your comments on the framework agreement and how well it's working, because I think it was a breakthrough agreement. I happen to think the OMA did a very good job on that negotiation. I think it's a very good agreement for the doctors. I know not all of your doctors share that view, but I think over time they will find that it was a very good agreement for the profession.

The thing that I think is on our minds is just what we should be thinking about for budgeting purposes for health care in the upcoming year. I can't remember exactly the framework agreement, but I guess you know it pretty well; there are several components in it. What sort of year-over-year increase should we be expecting in budgeting for that provision, for that framework agreement? I see you're thinking that utilization may go up 1.5%, is that right?

Dr Wyman: It's currently running at about 1.5%.

Mr Phillips: Fees may go up 1%. Is there anything else we should be thinking of to put in that budget?

Dr Wyman: There is a normal growth curve in the population, there is an aging curve, there are demographic shifts within the community we all serve that have to be included. When we put the agreement together, the anticipation was based on historical principles that the system should expand by 3.6% on an annual basis in order to maintain a status quo, and that is not including any price increase.

Mr Phillips: And is that what we should be expecting next year, is it, a 4.5% increase?

Dr Wyman: I think in fact there has been, at least from the medical perspective, a decrease below that level. I think that's because there's been a decrease in the number of services being provided.

Mr Phillips: I see. I'm not sure if you have that number today, but it may be useful for the committee to have some idea of the total amount you think may be required in that, because that's a collective agreement, I guess, that will be signed shortly?

Dr Wyman: There are negotiations going on currently with regard to price. That negotiation table has opened and we're trying to come up with some answer on that. Obviously we would hope the amount of the price increase would not be predetermined by the budget before those negotiations are finished. It's always been a major concern to us that we get constricted before the fact rather than on a fair and reasonable basis.

But the use of the system itself I think you have to assume should, as an historical process, increase by 3.5% to 3.6%. Hopefully, through the continued efforts of the JMC and the utilization process we've been going through, we may be able to moderate that somewhat, but I wouldn't want you to think in numbers much less than that.

Mr Weinkauff: Except that I could add, and it was pointed out in Dr Wyman's statement, utilization for 1992-93, at least those figures that we do have for the first seven months, suggest a growth in the system, at least the medical sector, of about 1.5%, and that is exclusive of any price adjustment. As you know, we signed an agreement that adjusted benefits by 1% effective October 1, so that will serve to affect expenditures by an additional 0.5% that year. For next year, yes, we do not negotiate the budget; we negotiate the price, and what we would urge is that there is separation—

Mr Phillips: But the 3.6% is built in, isn't it?

Mr Weinkauff: No, the 3.6% you're referring to is in the utilization formula. It says that to the extent that utilization or growth in medical services exceeds roughly 3.6%, the profession and the government of Ontario will share equally, and the profession's share is taken back in the form of a reduction in payments.

Mr Phillips: But if you were just speculating, because the budget has to be prepared shortly, what increase should we be thinking of putting in for the physicians' portion of the budget in gross terms?

Mr Weinkauff: For 1993-94?

Mr Phillips: Yes.

Mr Weinkauff: You're asking us to do the impossible, really. We would have to predict the—

Mr Phillips: A settlement? But exclusive of the fees.

Dr Wyman: Exclusive of price. You would have to build in, based on historical trends, an increase of between 2.5% and 4% to the system just for normal demographic changes.

Keep in mind that the 1.5% we've gone through so far has not included any epidemics; we haven't had a real flu problem for the last couple of years. That hasn't been included, so if we come up with a March flu, that utilization number will go way up.

Mr Phillips: We've got to pray for good weather. That's very helpful, thank you.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you, gentlemen, for coming before this committee today.

Dr Wyman: Thank you. It's always a pleasure.

The Chair: I'd like to say to the committee that we're going to be adjourning until February 22. Sorry. I'm correct about pre-budget consultation, but we'll be going to Bill 164 on January 25; some of the members will be changing. What we need is a subcommittee meeting to look at presenters for the week of February 22. The closing date is January 15, I believe. Mr Phillips, are you on the subcommittee?

Mr Phillips: Yes, I will be.

The Chair: I didn't know whether Elinor would be there. And Mr Carr?

Mr Carr: Yes.

The Chair: We're trying to fix 1:30 on January 19, if it's convenient to the subcommittee members. I'm having the clerk send out a list of all the presenters so you can go through the list ahead of time and see which ones your caucus would like to see come forward, because you might not agree; you might have different areas you want to bring forward.

Mr Carr: The only thing I was going to suggest, Mr Chair, with committees being what they are—speaking to some of our caucus members, they sometimes don't know where they're going to be and who's not going to be on that day, so we're a little bit all over. If we got them—

The Chair: Submit a list?

Mr Carr: The list: Do you actually need to be here? If I say, "Here it is"—

The Chair: That would be a lot easier. We'll have choices. I don't know how many will be coming in, but we'll have to say, "These are your priorities; this many."

Mr Carr: And if worse comes to worst, divide it by three to get the total.

Mr Sterling: Just as a matter of interest, if you say the cutoff day is the 15th, that's tomorrow. Presumably, you haven't.

Clerk of the Committee (Ms Tonia Grannum): It's February 15.

The Chair: February 15?

Clerk of the Committee: I think so. The deadline's in February.

The Chair: Forget everything I said. Sorry. I've got that other bill in my head, 164.

Mr Carr: How many do we have now, do you know?

Clerk of the Committee: We have about 30 people.

Mr Carr: For four days, right?

The Chair: It's two weeks, because each caucus is going to be writing its own report in the end.

Mr Carr: We've got two more weeks of finance hearings?

The Chair: Correct. We'll get those lists out as soon as we can on the closing date, and we'll call a subcommittee meeting at that—

Mr Phillips: The 19th?

The Chair: No. The other one is February 15, not January 15, for the pre-budget consultations.

Mr Phillips: That's good, because tomorrow is January 15.

The Chair: That's the Bill 164 deadline; that bill's coming to this committee. I don't want to confuse you.

Mr Phillips: Why did you, then?

The Chair: This committee is adjourned.

The committee adjourned at 1214.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Tuesday 26 January 1993

The committee met at 1004 in committee room 1.

INSURANCE STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1993 LOI DE 1993 MODIFIANT LES LOIS CONCERNANT LES ASSURANCES

Consideration of Bill 164, An Act to amend the Insurance Act and certain other Acts in respect of Automobile Insurance and other Insurance Matters / Loi modifiant la Loi sur les assurances et certaines autres lois en ce qui concerne l'assurance-automobile et d'autres questions d'assurance.

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): I'd like to call this committee to order, the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. We're considering Bill 164, An Act to amend the Insurance Act and certain other Acts in respect of Automobile Insurance and other Insurance Matters.

I'd like to welcome everyone here this morning, and I'd like to start off by introducing the members, since we have quite a few new faces on this committee which I haven't seen before. We've got some older ones here too—not agewise, just members. Mr Ward, would you mind starting off at the end, and introduce yourself and your position in the government here.

Mr Brad Ward (Brantford): Brad Ward, MPP for Brantford and parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology.

Mr Stephen Owens (Scarborough Centre): Steve Owens, MPP for Scarborough Centre, parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Financial Institutions.

Ms Christel Haeck (St Catharines-Brock): Christel Haeck, a mere backbencher representing the riding of St Catharines-Brock.

Mr George Dadamo (Windsor-Sandwich): Good morning, I'm George Dadamo. I'm the MPP for Windsor-Sandwich and as well the parliamentary assistant for the Minister of Culture and Communications.

The Chair: And Mr Kwinter.

Mr Monte Kwinter (Wilson Heights): I'm Monte Kwinter, MPP for Wilson Heights.

Mr Remo Mancini (Essex South): Remo Mancini, MPP for Essex South.

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): Gerry Phillips, Scarborough-Agincourt.

Mr David Tilson (Dufferin-Peel): David Tilson, Dufferin-Peel.

The Chair: Mr Kormos? Are you sitting there?

Mr Peter Kormos (Welland-Thorold): Peter Kormos. I'm the MPP for Welland-Thorold and the government's critic for auto insurance.

The Chair: I'm Ron Hansen, the Chairman of this committee, and I represent Lincoln. I'm going to call it the head table up here. I don't know if that's the head table or this is the head table. Would you mind identifying yourself and your position and how you will be involved in these hearings, from my far right. Go ahead.

Ms Pat Girouard: Pat Girouard, Hansard branch.

Mr Andrew McNaught: Andrew McNaught, legislative research.

Ms Rebecca Chan: Rebecca Chan, committees branch.

Clerk Pro Tem (Mr Franco Carrozza): I'm Franco Carrozza, the clerk pro tem of the committee for this hearing.

The Chair: Before we start, we had a delay in the committee yesterday as one of our committee members passed away, Ms Margery Ward. This committee will miss her presence, and I guess the whole Legislature will also. That's why we had a delay in the hearings, and what we were going to do on Monday has been moved to today. Wednesday will remain the same. Thursday will remain the same. The travelling will remain the same next week; nothing changes there. Tuesday, what actually was to be scheduled today, the subcommittee will be meeting. We'll find a time to meet maybe just before lunch or just right after the hearings to discuss how we're scheduling. There have been some additions of people who want to go before the committee and there have been cancellations, so there's going to have to be some slotting and some switching around. If you can keep that in mind, we can address those problems later on.

I believe Mr Mancini has a point of order. I think he had his hand up there.

Mr Mancini: Yes, thank you, Mr Chairman. I have a point of order. I want the record to show that on behalf of the Liberal caucus, I had asked yourself and the clerk to have this committee's proceedings take place in committee room 151, known as the Amethyst Room, which is on closed-circuit television and shown on cable throughout Ontario. It is my belief and the belief of the Liberal caucus that since this bill affects every driver in the province of Ontario and since information made available to me leads me to conclude that insurance rates are going to go up, forcing greater costs on drivers, it would have been absolutely appropriate for this committee to sit in room 151 so the government could explain its policies and have an interface with the general public.

I can't tell you how strongly I feel about that and how disappointed I am that we are not in committee room 151. While it is all right for people from the industry, people from legal organizations, people from industry associations, other organized groups and a few individuals—they will be able to come and join us in this room and hear the participants from all sides speak—the millions of drivers in Ontario who do not have the opportunity to come and join us in this particular committee room will not have the opportunity to have seen what has transpired, to have listened and to have made up their own minds. I want the record to clearly show how disappointed I am, on behalf of our caucus, and I don't know why it was not possible for us to be in committee room 151. It was only for four days, Mr Chair.

The Chair: Yes, I take your point. I know you've raised it with the subcommittee; you've raised it with me. As a committee Chair, I was approached by the clerk of that particular committee, the standing committee on resources development, that's looking after OTAB and it requested at that time if it was possible to get 151. I was surprised I was in 151 because this committee normally meets in committee room 1. At that time, I gave it away. It just seems to be that we haven't come up with any negotiations with my friend Mr Peter Kormos on an agreement. I see him sitting next to Mr Harnick, and he had his—

Interjection.

The Chair: Okay, I'm sorry. I haven't got my glasses on. I can't read that far, so it didn't make any difference whether you turned it around. I see Mr Kormos had his hand up there. Maybe there is some agreement now with the Chair of resources committee that we get 151 for Thursday, anyhow.

Mr Kormos: As you know, Chair, in the interest of compromise, I, being the Chair of the committee meeting in the Amethyst Room, offered you the Amethyst Room for both Thursday morning and Tuesday morning. You declined that offer.

The Chair: I was—

Mr Kormos: One moment, Mr Chair, please. I thought it was a fair compromise, because I recognized the importance. I know that people who were making presentations, for instance, who were scheduled Tuesday morning, would have been of interest the whole province. After you have your subcommittee meeting and revise your schedule, I suggest to you that perhaps we can reach a similar compromise.

I was surprised that you would not accept my offer of having the Amethyst Room for those two mornings. You insisted on having it for only one morning. It struck me as peculiar.

The Chair: It was that I wanted it for all day Thursday, which would run till 10 o'clock at night. I'm going to just recognize Mr Owens over here.

Mr Owens: I'm pleased that these proceedings have started off on such an amicable note. In the interest of people who are waiting, perhaps we can move to the technical briefing and discuss the issue in subcommittee after the hearings.

The Chair: Okay. I'm going to recognize Mr Tilson for some short remarks until we go into subcommittee.

Mr Tilson: I was just going to say the same thing as Mr Owens. Surely all of these matters can be dealt with later. We're here now, so—

The Chair: I believe some wanted it on the record.

Mr Tilson: I agree with Mr Mancini that this topic should be—the calls that I've had asking where this is going to be heard, and why we're being put up in this room is really strange. We came here to hear the minister's staff and—

The Chair: Okay, fine. Let's proceed.

Mr Mancini: Wouldn't want to keep the minister's staff waiting.

The Chair: Okay, Mr Mancini—

Mr Mancini: It's okay that people can't watch the proceedings, but we don't want to keep the minister's staff waiting, Mr Chairman.

The Chair: Okay. Well, the one thing is that at first the subcommittee didn't request the technical briefing. Another meeting of the subcommittee agreed that there were some people who wanted private briefings, and this is why we're having them. It was optional this morning, if any committee members wanted to come for this. I just want to make that known. If someone's not here, it was optional.

MINISTRY OF FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS
WILLIAM M. MERCER LTD

The Chair: We'll carry on now with the technical briefing, and I believe the deputy minister is Mr D. Blair Tunny.

Mr D. Blair Tully: Tully.

The Chair: I pronounce names wrong all the time. That's either your first name or last name. You know how they write them sometimes; you never know. But if you don't mind introducing yourself and your colleagues there, you may begin. We have about one hour. Okay, go ahead.

Mr Tully: Thank you, Mr Chair.

The Chair: Tully. I'm sorry.

Mr Tully: What I intend to do is make some opening remarks describing the principal features of the bill and to describe for the committee the provisions and the regulation; then have a short presentation by representatives from William Mercer Ltd, who have been our actuaries in this exercise; and then to call some of my colleagues from the auto insurance review forward to join me for any questions which members of the committee might have.

With me at the table right now I have Mr Gordon Hall, the vice-chairman of William Mercer Ltd in Canada; Stan Khury, a consulting actuary and managing director of William Mercer; and Ted Zubulake, who is a principal and consulting actuary with William Mercer. I have them at the table at this time because I think it will be—

Mr Mancini: What is this gentleman's name?

Mr Tully: Ted Zubulake. I think it's easier to have them here now, and we'll just move into the Mercer presentation and then reorganize ourselves for the question period.

I intend, first, to describe the principal features of the bill and, since they are so closely connected in terms of the government's plans, the statutory accident benefit schedule, which will be a regulation under the Insurance Act.

My presentation will take place in four parts: firstly, an overview of the bill; secondly, a description of the provisions of the bill dealing with benefits and access to tort action; thirdly, the benefit provisions of the regulation; and fourthly, the statutory provisions which regulate the insurance industry.

I'll start with my overview of the bill. Firstly, Bill 164 is an act to amend existing legislation, primarily the Insurance Act but also certain other acts, in respect to automobile insurance as well as other insurance matters. I intend to provide a broad-brush review of the kinds of amendments contained in the bill and to describe for the members where these can be found.

The amendments related to auto insurance take up most of the bill. Generally, these are in sections 11 to 43 and 49 to 52.

There are three major areas of change: those sections dealing with changes to the system of compensation for people suffering losses in automobile accidents, those dealing with changes in the regulatory system which oversees the auto insurance industry, and those which will update the Insurance Act as it relates to automobile insurance. The other sections of the bill are mostly technical amendments.

Because this is an amending bill, sections relating to the same subject are scattered throughout the bill. Therefore, I will talk about the three major areas of change in the bill and where related amendments can be found, rather than trying to deal with the sections of the bill in numerical order.

Changes are made to the system of compensation for people suffering losses in automobile accidents in bill sections 24, 25 and 26, on pages 16 through 23. The bill removes the right to sue for pecuniary, or economic, losses suffered as a result of automobile accidents. At the same time, it lifts existing restrictions to sue for non-pecuniary losses, or pain and suffering. Section 1 on page 1 of the bill changes the term "no-fault benefits schedule" to "statutory accident benefits schedule" throughout the act, and the bill requires that every contract of automobile insurance issued in Ontario provide the benefits set out in this schedule. At pages 20 to 23, there is a list of benefits in the statutory accident benefits schedule and there is a provision for indexing them.

In order to make the administration of the statutory accident benefits schedule run more smoothly, the bill also provides that regulations, called rules, can be issued to assist in interpreting the schedule. The commissioner of insurance is also given the authority to issue guidelines which must be considered in the interpretation of the schedule.

The bill contains a number of amendments which are required to support the new statutory accident benefits schedule and to make it work well.

Section 3, on page 2 of the bill, expands the role of the accident benefits advisory committee. This committee, appointees with a cross-section of interests in automobile insurance, currently makes recommendations on the appointment of arbitrators and advises on procedures used during arbitrations, as well as performing other functions assigned to it by the commissioner or the minister. The committee will now be specifically mandated to advise the commissioner of insurance and the Minister of Financial Institutions regularly on the operation of the statutory accident benefits schedule.

There are changes to both the Workers' Compensation Act and the Health Insurance Act which will be made as a consequence of the new compensation system. These changes are found at the end of the bill on pages 33 and 34.

The second major area involves changes to regulatory powers affecting the activities of automobile insurers.

A number of provisions in the bill are designed to work together to provide the insurance commission with expanded market management capacity and to ensure the continuing availability of automobile insurance. Section 11 of the bill contains new controls over the withdrawal of automobile insurers from the market. Section 18 gives the commissioner more power to control the underwriting grounds being used by insurers. Section 49 amends the Compulsory Automobile Insurance Act, which governs the Facility Association, or insurer of last resort.

Provisions in subsection 12(11) and sections 36 to 42 allow for the prescribing of the elements of the risk classification system used by insurers. This regulatory capacity will enable the government to eliminate the use of discriminatory factors, such as age, sex and marital status, in any insurer's risk classifications, and provide for the establishment of a uniform approach to the classification systems used by insurers. Sections 36 to 42 also give the commissioner powers to limit the rate dislocations that might arise in changes to classification systems.

A number of technical changes to the automobile insurance system are dealt with in sections 13 to 18 and sections 25 to 29.

Other amendments to the Insurance Act, including changes to the dispute resolution system, are found in sections 30 to 33 of the bill. They allow arbitrators and the director of arbitrations to make interim orders. Arbitrators are specifically provided with the authority to make interim awards of expenses, which will help the insured person to defray the cost of the proceedings as they go along. Arbitrators are also given the power to penalize persons who bring frivolous proceedings.

The bill also amends provisions of the Insurance Act that are not related to automobile insurance. Generally, these provisions are found in sections 3 through 10 and 43 through 48 of the bill.

New powers for the commissioner to limit the licence or seize the assets of an insurer found to be operating in a manner prejudicial to its policyholders are found in sections 8 through 10. These sections increase the power of the superintendent of insurance to seize the assets of an insurer. Under the current provisions of the act, the superintendent can only take possession of an insurer where there are solvency concerns.

Under the current act, the superintendent is only authorized to take possession of the assets of an insurer that is incorporated in Ontario. A number of insurers not incorporated in Ontario are licensed and do business here. The bill broadens the scope of the superintendent in relation to all assets held in Ontario.

Throughout this overview, I have referred to the regulations made under the act. The additions to regulation-making powers are all found in section 12 of the bill at pages 9 to 12.

I'd like now to turn to the provisions of the bill that deal specifically with compensation for personal injury and death resulting from motor vehicle accidents. The changes may be categorized under two broad headings: access to tort, that is, the ability to sue on the basis of negligence, and second, the framework for the new statutory accident benefits.

With respect to access to tort, the bill does essentially two things:

First, it ends the application of the current threshold system, including the abolition of the collateral source rule when the new provisions come into force.

Second, it introduces a new framework for access to tort. Access for economic losses will be eliminated and access for non-pecuniary losses, including care, companionship and guidance, will be subject to a deductible. The deductible for any individual claimant is $15,000, except in the case of claims for loss of care, companionship and guidance for which it is $5,000.

I'll say more about the deductible in a minute, but for now I'd like to point out that the proposal to repeal the current provisions respecting the collateral source rule does not reflect a change in policy. The rule will no longer be required because the plaintiff will no longer be claiming economic losses in tort. It's not intended that collateral sources be deducted from non-pecuniary damages.

The transition will work in much the same way as did the OMPP, the Ontario motorist protection plan, with the changes to both tort and accident benefits being "read in" to the insurance policies on the day the provisions are proclaimed.

One of the effects of the proposed reforms will be to virtually eliminate liability-limit problems for accidents in Ontario. The reforms are premised on the continuation of the current ceiling on non-pecuniary damages that was created by the Supreme Court of Canada in 1978. This means that those who are most seriously injured in car accidents will be entitled to $240,000, less the $15,000 deductible, as compensation for their pain and suffering. The current approach used by the courts to assess non-pecuniary damages with a $15,000 deductible will provide the appropriate recognition of fault in accidents, balanced by the availability of economic loss compensation for everyone through the automatic accident benefit schedule.

The legislation as currently drafted directs judges to assess the amount of non-pecuniary damages without regard to the restrictions on tort. An amendment proposed by the minister will further clarify the legislative intent by directing the courts to assess damages for non-pecuniary loss in the manner they would in other non-auto-related cases.

With the ceiling in place, the current liability coverage purchased by most people should be more than enough, and in fact, underinsured coverage should not be needed for accidents in Ontario.

Another issue addressed in the bill is allocation of fault when more than one person is negligent in an accident. There is no change to the policy of the current system whereby changes to the tort system do not apply to any negligent persons who were not at the scene of the accident; for example, the manufacturer of a defective car. However, rules are required to apportion liability in cases where there are both persons at the scene of the accident and others who are liable. The policy is the same as now: The other negligent parties should derive neither a benefit nor a burden as a result of the changes to the auto insurance system.

Before turning to the accident benefit provisions, I'd like to make a few comments on the deductible and the indexing of that deductible.

The reason for the deductible is twofold: to eliminate the smallest claims, which are seen to burden the system, and as part of the overall balancing of cost in the system.

A deductible is intended to reflect the intrinsic value of the claim. There are no arbitrary restrictions based on type or duration of injury. It provides the maximum flexibility to recognize the impact of the accident on the individual.

It is also seen to provide greater certainty, because it taps into the existing settlement practices for non-pecuniary losses. Although each plaintiff is unique, it's not difficult to establish a range around which a claim may be settled. The use of a verbal threshold introduces an element of uncertainty which makes settling more difficult and consequently more expensive. Also, based on the Michigan experience, it is subject to considerable change. Fluctuations in interpretations can increase transaction costs.

Case law has established that the cap on non-pecuniary damages is indexed to inflation. To ensure that recovery of non-pecuniary damages will be consistent over time, a provision has been included in the bill to index the deductible.

The minister has also indicated that he intends to establish a committee to develop general guidelines on what a $15,000 claim represents. This is not intended as a new threshold, but rather a guideline that will assist injured persons in evaluating whether it is worthwhile to pursue a claim. This is an approach proposed by the Alberta Automobile Insurance Board in its recent report on auto insurance reform in that province.

I'd like to mention briefly the other area where changes have been made to the compensation structure, the statutory accident benefits schedule. I'll take you through the provisions of the regulation where most of the changes have been made in a moment, but there are important changes in the bill itself.

The most significant change in the bill is the inclusion of a framework of the benefits that must be provided in the schedule, and a statement of some of the principles in providing compensation. These are found at sections 25 and 26 of the bill, pages 20 to 23.

The introduction of an accident benefits framework in the legislation itself is different from previous systems. For example, the types of benefits that must be included in the schedule are set out. The list is inclusive and does not prevent the addition of other types of benefits.

The schedule will set out either the amount of benefit which must be paid or the maximum amount payable. The bill specifies that when a monetary amount is established by the schedule, it cannot be reduced by a subsequent revision of the schedule. Any reduction would require an amendment to the act.

The subsection on rehabilitation sets out the objectives in making rehabilitation benefits available to claimants, specifically reasonable measures which will reduce or eliminate the effects of any disability resulting from an injury and facilitate an injured person's reintegration into his or her family, the labour market and the rest of society.

This provision reflects the fundamental importance to the scheme of insurers' obligation to provide rehabilitation benefits. It does not, however, prevent a further refinement of what benefits and standards are to be available for rehabilitation but will provide guidance in disputes over entitlement.

Finally, given the significance of indexing to persons with permanent injuries, the principle and the method of calculation have been included in the bill itself, subject to terms, conditions and exclusions that may be provided in the regulation.

The new benefit structure will increase the importance of the accident benefits in the compensation structure. One major challenge, particularly in the context of private sector delivery, where there are many different providers, is to obtain consistency in interpretation and delivery of benefits.

Also, as many benefits are new, there may have to be adjustments from time to time.

To allow for greater flexibility, provisions have been added, as I mentioned earlier, to create rules interpreting the statutory accident benefits schedule, authorizing the commissioner of insurance to issue guidelines on the interpretation and operation of the schedule and to provide for regular review of the schedule by the accident benefits advisory committee.

Let me now turn to the statutory accident benefits schedule, which will be a regulation under the Insurance Act. A second draft of this document was released by the minister last week. First, I will describe the basic weekly benefits for earners, students, care givers and others. Second, I'll discuss certain other economic loss benefits, including provisions concerning rehabilitation, supplementary medical benefits and attendant care. I'll conclude with some of the new procedural provisions in the regulation.

First, with regard to the income replacement benefit, the maximum income replacement benefit is $1,000, up from $600 under the OMPP. This new ceiling covers approximately 97% of the working population in Ontario. An injured person who was employed in the three years before the accident is entitled to this benefit. The amount is 90% of the person's average net weekly income and the person chooses whether to calculate the average based on the 4, 52 or 156 weeks before the accident.

Some special adjustment rules are available to keep people from falling through the cracks. Special provisions deal with people in new jobs, those with future contracts and those who were or are on strike, layoff or leave of absence. Unemployment insurance benefits are included in calculating average weekly income. Adjustments are possible in certain situations after one year of disability.

There are special provisions for working seniors. Income replacement benefits for claimants over age 65 at the time of the accident are reduced gradually over four years. These claimants may also qualify for the disability benefit under part V.

Special rules also apply to the self-employed to ensure that the income replacement benefit better reflects their cash-flow losses from an accident. The benefit also takes into account new expenses like replacement salaries that are necessary because of the accident. Alternatively, a self-employed person can agree on a benefit with the insurer when purchasing his or her auto policy. The income replacement benefit would be based on the predetermined amount if the self-employed person has an accident.

There's a minimum income replacement benefit of $185 for anyone unable to perform one or more activities of daily living because of the accident. Activities of daily living include personal care, mobility, household or communication activities.

A loss of earning capacity benefit replaces the income replacement benefit after two years of disability. It represents compensation for a total or partial disability resulting from the accident that affects earning power. It's the difference between what the person could earn before the accident based on the income replacement benefit and an assessment of what he or she can earn after the accident.

Where claimants and insurers are unable to agree on an appropriate benefit, an independent assessment of post-accident earning capacity will be conducted by facilities accredited by a committee established under the Insurance Act. The facilities will assess the personal and vocational characteristics of the claimant and identify a job that the person is able and qualified to do. The job must be of a kind available in the area where the claimant lives.

Either the insurer or the claimant can appeal the assessment. The loss of earning capacity benefit will be reviewed at three and eight years following the initial establishment of the benefit. The claimant can also ask for a review if he or she suffers an unexpected permanent deterioration.

The schedule also provides for temporary income supplements if an accident-related injury leads to a future interruption in employment. For example, this supplement could be available if the claimant missed work for an operation needed several years after the accident.

Loss of earning capacity benefits are replaced at the age of 65 with a kind of pension benefit. Claimants receive 2% of the final benefit for each year they received weekly benefits, to a maximum of 35 years. This is payable for life and is in addition to other pensions payable to the person.

The new schedule provides significant enhancements in benefits for students. Students are entitled to two types of benefits: lump sums for the loss of a school year and weekly benefits. These benefits will increase with inflation. Students can receive one lump sum benefit per year of lost education. Only one lump sum benefit is payable after the age of 16. The benefit is $2,000 for each lost year of elementary school, $4,000 for each lost year of high school and $8,000 for each lost year of post-secondary education.

Disability benefits are payable to students over the age of 16 unable to continue with their studies. Benefits for up to two years of disability are based upon 50% of the net average weekly earnings in Ontario.

When a student reaches age 16 or has been disabled at least two years, the student is entitled to a loss-of-earning-capacity benefit. The pre-accident earning capacity is deemed to be a percentage of the net average weekly earnings in Ontario. This percentage ranges up to 90% of the net average industrial wage in Ontario at the age of 30. Benefits are adjusted to reflect a partial disability. Students who qualify may choose to receive an income replacement benefit instead of student benefits.

People who care for children under the age of 16 or for physically or mentally incapacitated people are entitled to care giver benefits. The benefit is available to those who are not working full-time and are not self-employed at the time of the accident. The benefit is $250 for a care giver who is caring for one person at the time of the accident and $50 for each additional person for whom care was being provided. The benefit is payable as long as the child or disabled person being cared for is less than 16 or continues to require care.

After one year of disability, care givers who have left the workforce to provide care qualify for special treatment. The care giver is entitled to an income replacement benefit based on earnings in any six-month period during the three years prior to the person becoming a care giver. This old income base is indexed for inflation to reflect what the care giver might be earning at the time of the accident. A person who qualifies for more than one type of weekly benefit can choose between them.

An injured person who does not meet the criteria for any other weekly benefit may qualify for a disability benefit of $185 per week. This benefit recognizes the situation of those who are unable to carry on their normal lives as the result of an auto accident. The concept used is an inability to perform one or more activities of daily living. In certain situations, a person receiving this benefit may qualify for a permanent loss-of-earning-capacity benefit after two years of disability.

Aside from the weekly benefits, the regulation also provides for other economic benefits. I'll turn to some of these.

Death benefits are the most significant. They're payable to the spouse and dependants of a person killed in an auto accident. A spouse receives four times the annualized income replacement benefit to which the deceased person would have been entitled. The minimum benefit is $50,000 and the maximum benefit is $200,000. The OMPP provided a basic death benefit of $25,000 to a surviving spouse.

The spousal benefit is paid to dependants if there is no surviving spouse. A dependant benefit of $10,000 is also payable to each dependant of the deceased. Dependants are those who were primarily dependent upon the deceased for care or financial support. The $10,000 benefit is also available to a former spouse if the deceased person was obligated to provide him or her with support. Ten thousand dollars is also available to a supporting individual where the dependant dies in an accident; for example, a parent who loses a dependent child in an accident.

Reimbursement for the cost of funerals is provided up to $6,000.

Reimbursement for child care expenses that result from the accident is payable to injured people who are working at the time of the accident. The benefit is up to $75 a week for the first dependant and up to $25 for each additional dependant. The maximum payable is $150. This is a new benefit for earners. Under the OMPP no child care benefit was available for people who were entitled to the income benefit.

A new provision provides coverage for housekeeping and home maintenance expenses. Coverage for such expenses was unclear under the OMPP.

With slight differences, this draft regulation continues the exclusions from weekly accident benefits that were in the OMPP. Those excluded include those convicted of a drinking and driving offence arising out of the accident or of driving while uninsured.

Exclusions do not apply to weekly care giver benefits because the recipients will need the money to provide for replacement for the children and disabled people in their care. Under OMPP, $50 per week per dependant was available for the care of dependants of excluded individuals.

I turn now to the regulation provisions outlining entitlement to supplementary medical benefits, rehabilitation benefits and attendant care benefits. These are found in sections 32, 33 and 34 on pages 36 to 40 of the draft regulation. These benefits have all been enhanced in the proposed regulation.

The principal change to the medical and rehabilitation benefits is the elimination of the limit or caps on these benefits. The OMPP has a $500,000 cap on medical and rehabilitation benefits and limits medical and rehabilitation benefits to the 10 years following an accident, 20 years for children. These limits have been removed to provide greater protection to the long-term disabled where the duration of treatment may last a lifetime and accumulate to over $500,000. These expenses have also been separated into different sections in order to clarify and broaden the current list of eligible expenses.

As I indicated earlier, a rehabilitation principle has been included in the bill, and it is reinforced in the regulation. This principle states that an insured person who is injured in an accident is entitled to be reimbursed for reasonable measures taken to reduce or eliminate the effects of any disability resulting from the injury and to facilitate the insured person's reintegration into his or her family, the labour market and the rest of society.

Where there is a dispute over payment of medical expenses, an insurer is normally obliged to pay the expenses while the dispute is being resolved. The regulation limits this pay-pending dispute obligation to medical expenses of less than $3,000, however. The $3,000 limit has been included to address large medical expenditures which may not be recoverable at the outcome of a dispute or which may cause financial hardship on an insured person who could be asked to repay. An insurance company would continue to have the right, as it does under the OMPP, not to pay for rehabilitation expenses where a dispute exists.

Insurers may require a certificate from a treating physician or a psychologist before paying for rehabilitation expenses. This is consistent with the OMPP approach of having physicians and psychologists act as gatekeepers to rehabilitation services. One change from the OMPP is that health professionals under the new Regulated Health Professions Act will be permitted to authorize rehabilitation expenses as long as the treating physician or psychologist does not disagree with the recommended service. Chiropractors will not have to have their own services certified by a physician or psychologist, but will not be able to certify the need for services of another regulated health profession.

Long-term care, or attendant care as it is referred to in the draft regulation, will no longer be subject to a $500,000 lifetime cap, and the maximum monthly benefit of $3,000 will now be indexed. This will provide greater protection to the long-term disabled. Under the OMPP, this benefit could be exhausted in under 14 years.

Entitlement to attendant care benefits has been clarified by describing attendant care as the services provided to assist the insured person in performing activities of daily living. The attendant care benefit can also be used to pay for a nursing home, home for the aged or chronic care hospital. The benefit could be used to reimburse a person who loses income to care for an injured person, so if a person wants to stay home from work to look after an injured family member, that lost income can be recovered.

Before incurring medical, rehabilitation or attendant care expenses, an insured person may ask to have expenses pre-authorized or directly billed to the insurer. This will make it easier for an insured person to incur lengthy or expensive treatment or services. Under the OMPP, these expenses are reimbursed on an expense-incurred basis. Often the insured person must pay for these expenses out of his or her pocket and then send the bill to the insurer for recovery.

Rehabilitation and attendant care benefit entitlements will be subject to further development and clarity as the result of a task force established by the Minister of Financial Institutions last week. The task force is made up of representatives of insurance companies, consumers, rehabilitation specialists, accident victims and government. The mandate of the task force is to establish a framework for the control of rehabilitation and attendant care costs to replace the caps that will be removed by Bill 164.

There are new procedural protections in this regulation. The most significant governs the stoppage of weekly benefits. There have been complaints under the OMPP that insurers sometimes unreasonably cut people off weekly benefits. This leaves the claimant without income benefits while the issue is mediated and appealed. This has changed. Now, where there is a dispute based on the opinion of the treating physician or psychologist and an insurer's medical adviser, an assessment will be provided by a third, independent professional. The parties can either agree on who the independent doctor should be or can apply to have one appointed by an advisory committee set up under the Insurance Act. The insurer can dispute the assessment of an independent doctor, but must continue to pay benefits until the dispute is resolved.

To assist claimants in applying for benefits, insurers are required to provide an explanation of the benefits available under the regulation and must provide information to assist claimants in making choices.

The last point I want to make with respect to the regulation is that the auto insurer is still a "second payer."

The Chair: Excuse me, could I just break in? Mr Mancini.

Mr Mancini: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: I've just been informed that the committee has a copy of Mr Tully's presentation and that it was not handed out to the committee members at the beginning of Mr Tully's presentation. We have been scribbling furiously to try to keep track of everything that Mr Tully has been telling us when all along we've had copies of his presentation sitting before you. What is going on here? Why can we not have copies of Mr Tully's presentation?

The Chair: I'll let the clerk answer this because I just requested of him copies. He said he had them already.

Clerk Pro Tem: Mr Mancini, I was asked by the staff of the deputy minister to hold on to Mr Tully's statement until he was finished.

Mr Mancini: Well, I appreciate that—

Mr Charles Harnick (Willowdale): Why?

Mr Mancini: Just a minute, I've got the floor. I appreciate that, but with all due respect to Mr Tully and his staff, he is not in charge of this committee. Our Chairman, Ron Hansen, is in charge of this committee and it's up to him to make these decisions.

Frankly, Mr Chairman, the work of this committee has not gone smoothly, as you know, and to have that information sitting before you while members are trying desperately to keep up to snuff with what the delegation is telling us is just not right, fair or in any way proper. I would request that we get to copy that information immediately.

The Chair: Mr Tully, do you have a problem handing this out? Normally when we have submissions from the finance and economics presenters, the opposition and the government can make notes beside questions they want to ask later on. It's unusual in this committee not to give information to the members of the committee and they can make notes as they go along.

Mr Mancini: Mr Chairman, you have that authority. You don't need anyone's permission.

The Chair: No, no. I'm just saying that I would rule the other way but it's nice to have an agreement.

Mr Mancini: I appreciate that.

The Chair: Okay, Mr Mancini? Fine. We'll hand them out now and notes can be made. What page are you on, sir?

Mr Tully: Page 30.

The Chair: Okay, and carry on while we're handing them out.

Mr Tully: I was in the middle of the page on page 30. I think that's the same version.

The last point I want to make with respect to the regulation is that the auto insurer is still a second payer. If an injured person has an employer-sponsored sick leave or long-term disability plan, the work plan pays first. The auto insurer tops up the other coverage by the maximums in the schedule. For example, the auto insurer will pay up to $1,000 on top of other coverage, to provide a maximum benefit of 90% of net income.

Sick leave benefits are only deducted if the injured person receives them. If a person chooses not to use his or her sick leave, the auto insurer cannot deduct these amounts. A one-week waiting period for income replacement and disability benefits continues.

Finally, then, I will turn briefly to the provisions in the bill regulating the insurance industry, specifically the concepts of underwriting, risk classification and rates.

Drivers are entitled to know the grounds upon which an application for auto insurance may be rejected by insurers. At present, insurers are required to file a list of the grounds they use and the commissioner may at any time challenge a ground on the basis that it is arbitrary, not predictive of risk or is contrary to public policy. The bill proposes to alter this slightly. Insurers will have to file grounds at least 15 days before they can use them. The commissioner will be able to review and challenge any ground before it can be used. The regulation-making powers that govern risk selection grounds have been changed slightly to make them more flexible.

Bill 164 introduces the concept of a risk classification system, which refers to the elements that are used by an insurer to classify risks in order to determine the appropriate premium to be charged. These would be things like driving record, type of vehicle etc. The risk classification system replaces the present concept of class of risk exposure. The bill contains the power to prescribe the elements of a classification system, including the use of a uniform classification system by regulation. This will permit the abolition of the use of discriminatory criteria, such as age and sex, and the introduction of uniform criteria and rules that must be used by all auto insurers for specified classes of automobile insurance or coverages. A uniform risk classification system will assist consumers because it will be easier for them to understand how driving characteristics influence insurance rates.

Amendments are also proposed to smooth out the transition from the classification system used by any individual insurer. Regulations may be prescribed limiting the percentage and/or dollar changes in rates in a given year that might result from changes to the elements of a risk plan. In the event that an insurer cannot stay within the prescribed range, it must apply to the commissioner to phase in the new classification system. The commissioner may approve the insurer's phase-in plan if it meets certain public interest statutory tests. This is designed to minimize the disruption to both the insurer and the market. The commissioner will also be required to monitor the operation of the risk classification system and consult regularly.

The bill also enables the commissioner to request rate refilings from insurers instead of proceeding directly to a rate hearing. The commissioner will be able to deal with stale rate filings in a more effective manner.

As I indicated earlier, certain proposals in Bill 164 address the issue of auto insurance availability and market stability and the operation of the Facility Association. The plan has a "take all comers" provision that requires insurers to accept almost all applicants for private passenger automobile insurance at their approved market rates. However, "bad risk" applicants that meet a number of tests can be rejected by insurance companies and referred to the Facility Association.

The Facility Association is intended as an insurer of last resort and its rates are higher than those charged in the regular market. It is a collective pool managed by insurance companies who provide servicing capacity. Over the last several years, many people have been placed in Facility, even if they do not have demonstrably bad records. Under an agreement reached with the industry, only bad risks will in future be placed in the Facility. All others will be insured by regular insurance companies at their own rates. However, insurers may choose to share the risk on some business that can no longer be placed in the Facility Association through an invisible industry risk-sharing pool.

Other legislative changes will strengthen regulatory supervision of the Facility Association and clarify the obligation of individual automobile insurers, which are required by law to be members of the Facility Association.

There have been occasions in the past when auto insurance has been difficult to obtain because insurers decided to stop writing new business in certain areas. Amendments to Bill 164 propose to give the commission a window on insurance availability so that trends can be identified. An insurer intending to withdraw from any part of Ontario or from the entire province must give the commission 180 days' advance notice. The commissioner will assess the impact of the proposal on market availability and may permit earlier withdrawal or delay the withdrawal for up to an additional 90 days.

Notice will provide the commission with an improved capacity to ensure market availability of a compulsory product. The withdrawal provision is not intended to apply to the day-to-day business decisions of insurers.

This concludes my remarks on the bill and the draft regulation. I would now like to ask the representatives of William M. Mercer to describe the actuarial work they have done on the package.

The Chair: Fine. Go right ahead.

Mr Gordon M. Hall: Thank you, Mr Tully, and members of the standing committee. I am Gordon Hall, vice-chairman of William M. Mercer Ltd in Canada. I have acted as the overall project manager in connection with the preparation of the actuarial costing of The Road Ahead: A Comparative Study. It's been prepared for the Ontario Automobile Insurance Review. This study was published in June 1992.

It's my pleasure to introduce summary information about Mercer that's directly applicable to the study and to introduce Mr Stan Khury, who had responsibility for the technical direction of the study and who will make some remarks about the study this morning and will be available to answer questions. I'd like to also introduce Mr Ted Zubulake, who was heavily involved with the analysis and interpretation and who is assisting Mr Khury today. Other Mercer team members included Mr Karlinski, Mr Wright and Ms Bass. They are not in attendance today.

First of all, I'd like to provide brief information on the Mercer organization that's directly applicable to this study. Mercer is an international consulting firm with operations in over 20 countries and with a staff of over 6,300 employees. Professional services are provided by the Mercer firm to clients in the fields of actuarial science, pensions, benefits, human resources and insurance.

In conducting this study, Mercer drew on its extensive background and experience in automobile insurance in Canada and in the United States.

Specifically, the project team brought Ontario-specific background that began with a 1987 study for the Ministry of Financial Institutions, and Mercer's involvement has continued since 1987 with hearings by the Ontario Automobile Insurance Board. It has continued with consultations to the Ontario Insurance Commission, which was created following passage of OMPP, and it has continued with the preparation of this analysis related to the report for the Ontario automobile insurance review.

The project team's experience includes many years of direct involvement with all aspects of automobile insurance transactions in more than a dozen jurisdictions in North America.

Summary information setting out the professional credentials, the business experience, the responsibilities of all of the team members, including those specifically for Mr Khury and Mr Zubulake, are part of the package that I believe has been handed out to standing committee members; I'll therefore not elaborate on those details of our two specialists here this morning.

I'd like to call on Mr Khury to make remarks regarding this study.

Mr C.K. Khury: I have a brief statement, perhaps 10 minutes' worth. We appreciate the opportunity to present a brief statement on the actuarial costing project that Mercer has carried out for the Ontario auto insurance review.

The purpose of this statement is threefold: (1) We would like to provide some brief background on our choice of methodology; (2) we would like to summarize the key conclusions of the study; (3) we would like to present you with the status of our key conclusions, given that more recent data have become available since our study was completed.

First, some background: Our mandate from the auto insurance review was to conduct an actuarial study that would yield a comparison of loss costs and corresponding premiums for three alternative auto insurance products as of July 1, 1992. The first product was the tort product we referred to as the pre-OMPP product; the current product, that is, the OMPP product; and The Road Ahead, that is, the product described in Bill 164.

The purpose of this study would be to assist decision-makers in their deliberations on alternative auto insurance models and their costs. This mandate did not include an assessment of the adequacy of rates or what companies are likely to file for in the course of implementing Bill 164.

Mercer brought together a team of its most experienced auto insurance experts. To give you a sense of the scope of the experience of the members of the team, I can tell you that each member of the team brought to the project roughly 20 years of experience in costing auto insurance products of all manner and variety in North America.

The most significant choice that faced the team early on was the choice of specific methodology and the data base that would be used to arrive at our costs.

In our experience, we have learned that the process of costing a particular product meant literally taking an available historical body of experience and estimating what would happen to that experience under the proposed product in the environment in which it is expected to operate. We have also learned that this process, modelling past history into a future environment, can be carried out in several levels of depth, ranging from a general conceptual analysis supplemented with numerical modelling all the way to a comprehensive analysis of each data item and assumption of the new system.

Mr Mancini: Mr Chairman, I note that the gentleman is reading from a text. Do we have copies of that text?

Mr Khury: It's just my own copy I'm working from here. It's not intended to be a statement on file. I'd be happy to make it available later. I did not intend to distribute this.

The Chair: Fine. As soon as it's done, we'll have the clerk make copies.

Mr Mancini: I appreciate what the gentleman has told us, but the gentleman has to understand and you have to understand that it's vitally important, because of the complex nature of the bill and because the gentleman is giving an actuarial summary which is technical and very detailed, that we be able to go over his presentation as he's making it. Otherwise, his presentation only serves his own purposes and not the purposes of the full committee.

The Chair: Okay, another thing I will request is the Instant Hansard for members of the committee also.

Mr Mancini: I appreciate that.

The Chair: Maybe any further witnesses coming forward, if they're going to read from text, could have copies of the text prepared for all members of the committee.

Mr Phillips: There may even be a photocopier somewhere in the building we could actually photocopy it with.

The Chair: If he's only got one copy, it's pretty hard for him to read at the same time as we're photocopying.

Mr Phillips: I realize that, but maybe after he's finished—

The Chair: Have you got an extra copy with you?

Mr Khury: I have some notes for myself, which I am reading; it is marked up for my use, sir. I will be happy to get this prepared—

Mr Phillips: Even more valuable.

Mr Tilson: Those are the notes we want.

Mr Khury: I want them to have it.

The Chair: Right after you're finished, if you can hand it to the clerk, the clerk can make some copies.

Mr Tilson: We want those handwritten notes.

Mr Phillips: We have our answer.

The Chair: I think Mr Mancini's just trying to show us that he can read and write too. All right, carry on.

Mr Khury: As I indicated, this kind of analysis can be carried out on several levels of depth, ranging from a general conceptual analysis with some numerical modelling all the way to a comprehensive analysis of each data item and assumption for the new system.

Early on, the Ontario auto insurance review indicated its interest in a comprehensive study, and we attempted to respond accordingly. The basic building block of data we used consisted of the then latest Ontario auto insurance experience. That was recorded and gathered in the pre-OMPP environment. This basic body of data was augmented by numerous other sources of information from other jurisdictions that have related experience under a variety of auto insurance schemes. This extraterritorial experience included data from Quebec, Michigan, New York, US-wide data on the impact of recessions on insurance data and so on.

We also drew on several one-time efforts—studies, interviews, surveys—aimed at sharpening the many assumptions we needed to make in order to complete our work. This effort included numerous consultations with law firms, adjusters, injury and rehab specialists and so on.

In our opinion, the process we have used has been most exhaustive and covered all that needed to be covered in order to answer the mandate given to us. In fact, in our collective experience, we have not known a more complete assessment of a proposed auto insurance product anywhere.

One special condition of this assignment has been the fact that the OMPP product was only recently introduced at the time we conducted our work. An experience under OMPP was, for all intents and purposes, non-existent. Therefore, the only historical Ontario claim experience we had on which we could rely at the time as a starting point was the experience generated under the pre-OMPP or the tort environment. Since our report was released, additional data have become available, and we have considered the updated experience in a brief update of our conclusions. That update will be provided to you later on in this statement.

Now I would like to turn to the key conclusions of the study. Very briefly, I would like to tell you that, although I give you the conclusions here, all of the methodology, description of the methodology, the rationale and all the limitations are detailed in excruciating detail in the four-volume report, so I will not review any of that with you here. I will just describe the highlights of the conclusions.

(1) The indicated loss cost per car that would be necessary to pay for the product described in Bill 164 is estimated to be approximately 4.4% higher than the comparable indicated loss cost per car that would be necessary to pay for the OMPP product.

(2) The estimated proportion of injured persons who are not at fault who can effectively sue for non-economic damages under Bill 164 is 18.1%, compared to 5.8% under OMPP.

(3) The total cost of benefits paid to injured persons and their dependants under Bill 164 is estimated to be 13% higher under OMPP. This figure is composed of an increase of 45% in the cost of accident benefits and a 15% decrease in the cost of bodily injury liability awards.

Mr Mancini: I'm sorry. Could you back up to the beginning of that? Slowly, please.

Mr Khury: I'd be happy to. Let me do that again. The total cost of benefits paid to injured persons and their dependents under Bill 164 is estimated to be 13% higher than under OMPP. This figure is composed of two things: an increase of 45% in the cost of accident benefits and a decrease of 15% in the cost of bodily injury liability awards and settlements.

Mr Mancini: Those two figures equal 13%?

Mr Khury: Yes, they combine weight to 13%.

The Chair: Mr Mancini, I think we'll have some time at the end, because you're taking up time, which will mean less time for all members to ask questions. If you'd just make notes. Carry on, sir.

Mr Khury: (4) The total cost of awards and settlements for non-economic damages under Bill 164 is estimated to be 45% of the cost under pre-OMPP, while the cost of awards and settlements for non-economic damages under OMPP is estimated to be 31% of the cost under pre-OMPP.

(5) The proportion of injured persons, regardless of fault, who are eligible for income benefits under Bill 164 is estimated to be 98%, while the comparable ratio under OMPP is 91% and under pre-OMPP is 62%.

One additional note: In the course of doing our work, the Ontario auto insurance review also asked us to examine and estimate the efficiency of various forms of delivery of insurance benefits to injured persons. Here, let me add that the term "efficiency" is used to mean the proportion of the claim dollar that is ultimately returned to the injured person after all expenses.

We conducted a special study on the subject and the results were recently released. Our key finding in this area is summarized for you as follows: Pure no-fault systems can be expected to return roughly 91% of the claim dollar to injured persons, while pure tort systems can be expected to return roughly 70% of the claim dollar. Other elements of efficiency were outside the scope of this study.

Finally, I would like to give you the status of our conclusions since new data have become available. As I indicated earlier, shortly after the release of our report, more current insurance claim data became available. We took a look at the new data to try to estimate its effect on our conclusions.

In particular, we attempted to reflect the following: We reviewed the claim experience under pre-OMPP, specifically; second, we reviewed the experience that has emerged under OMPP; we reviewed the updated data on the recession in terms of the duration and depth; fourth and finally, we also reviewed the updated information we have on inflation and interest rates.

Based on this review, we can make the following two representations: (1) Our original conclusions on the relative cost of the OMPP and Bill 164 products remain essentially unchanged; (2) we also examined the emerging early OMPP experience on its own and we can find no contra-indication which would cause us to change our view of the relative cost of the OMPP and Bill 164 products.

One final note: We are told by the Ontario auto insurance review that several adjustments, changes and refinements in Bill 164 benefits have been proposed. We have reviewed those changes, and on balance, in our judgement, we find that those changes, if implemented, should not materially change the order of magnitude of the difference between the cost of the two products. Of course, finer comment on the effect of these revisions cannot be made until we have worked all the changes into our costing.

This is our brief statement. I return it to you, Blair.

Mr Tully: I would then ask—

The Chair: How much time is left in your presentation?

Mr Tully: We've completed our presentation. Now I would just ask some of my colleagues to join me at the table here and we'll entertain any questions the committee might have.

The Chair: Okay, fine. What I've asked the clerk to do is to hand out some paper and some markers. Can you mark your names down as you play musical chairs there, so it's easier for Hansard and for the members of the committee, so we all know whom we're talking to.

Mr Kwinter: Is it 15 minutes for each caucus?

The Chair: Each caucus. We start off with Mr Mancini.

Mr Tully: If I could—

The Chair: Oh, I see. I thought you were bringing technical staff.

Mr Tully: They are coming up, and I'll just introduce them for you so that you know, if they try not to be too shy and get up here quickly.

The Chair: What someone can do is sit in that chair right beside Mr Harnick and just turn the mike around. If someone wants to sit at that corner there, there are enough chairs. As long as you can get to a mike, that's the main thing for Hansard.

Mr Tully: If I could, I will introduce Mr Craig Simons, Ms Rosemarie Cochrane and Mr Eric Endicott.

The Chair: Are you ready for question period?

Mr Tully: We are.

The Chair: Okay, Mr Mancini, 15 minutes.

Mr Mancini: Mr Chairman, will you please let me know when 10 minutes are up, as Mr Kwinter has a number of questions?

The Chair: Okay, fine.

Mr Harnick: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: My understanding was that we were all getting 20 minutes and that was something decided by the subcommittee. Why are we now down to 15 minutes?

The Chair: Because of the time we lost.

Mr Harnick: I think we could probably survive if we stayed here till 12:15. I don't think anybody's going to starve to death by waiting 15 minutes for lunch.

The Chair: There is a problem there, because of a meeting that's going on at 12 o'clock for the government caucus at that time.

Mr Harnick: Quite frankly, the business of this committee is important and takes precedence over private meetings that the government caucus is having, and the fact that you are scheduling meetings and cutting down the time of this committee is totally improper.

The Chair: I am not cutting down the time.

Mr Harnick: We have an agreement that we get 20 minutes per caucus and that's what we're going to do. Who are you to unilaterally change the rules?

The Chair: Because I'm going within the time frame, and 12 o'clock was the time frame. Which frame do I look at, 12 o'clock?

Mr Harnick: You look at 20 minutes per caucus. This is very, very complicated material. These people have made themselves available, and the fact that you have some damn meeting that the government has to go to is totally irrelevant to the work of this committee.

Ms Haack: It's a memorial service for somebody who died.

Mr Owens: Excuse me, Mr Chair, just to add some historical clarity, first of all, the opposition, especially Mr Harnick, suggested that this technical briefing was not necessary. Later Mr Harnick came back and suggested that he wanted a private briefing.

Mr Harnick: That's totally untrue.

Mr Owens: This is not untrue. Second, this committee was supposed to begin at 10 am. We were delayed.

The Chair: Mr Harnick, would you withdraw that, because this is what this committee had heard also and this is why the subcommittee had changed and had the technical briefing and felt that. I think the clerk can clarify that. This was optional to any member who wanted to come; it wasn't necessary.

Mr Harnick: Let me explain something. We have a subcommittee and the subcommittee made rules. The committee started its hearings on the basis of the rules set out by the subcommittee, and that was that we were going to have one hour to question these witnesses. It's as simple as that.

Mr Owens: If you had deigned to show up on time, sir, then we would have been able to start.

Mr Harnick: I didn't tell you to wait for me.

The Chair: I'm sorry. If I could I get in here, Mr Mancini's sitting on the edge of his seat. We'll get going. We'll give him 15 minutes. We'll see what we can do at the end. Mr Mancini. We'll start over again. We'll set the clock back again.

Mr Tilson: Yes, set the clock back.

The Chair: Start your 15 minutes, Mr Mancini.

Mr Harnick: Set it back about four years.

Mr Mancini: Mr Tully, is it not correct that when the minister introduced this legislation he stated that there would be no rate increases?

Mr Tully: I think at the time the minister introduced the legislation, a little over a year ago, in the environment at that time and in a comparative sense, on the basis of the kind of indications of cost that Mercer's was providing to us, he indicated there wasn't a substantial difference in the cost associated with this product and what was being carried by the OMPP.

Mr Mancini: Let's be very clear about this. The minister indicated and was quite specific in his words, both inside the Legislature and out, that he did not foresee any rate increases under Bill 164. Is that an accurate statement?

Mr Tully: I think particularly you should ask the minister that question.

Mr Mancini: Well, you and the minister work hand in hand. Let's not play semantics here. You're the deputy minister. You're providing the minister with information, and these experts who have joined you at the table are providing you with information. Having had some little bit of experience in government, I know ministers usually rely on their experts, their deputy ministers and others to make public pronouncements. I'm assuming you know as much as the minister knew and vice versa. Is it not correct that when Bill 164 was introduced, the idea, from the government anyway, was that there would be no rate increases?

Mr Tully: You'd have to ask the minister whether any specific comment like that was made.

Mr Mancini: What was your opinion at the day then, sir? Did you foresee rate increases with the introduction of Bill 164?

Mr Tully: My view was guided by the kinds of costings that were being provided to us by Mercer's which indicated there was a minor difference in overall costing between the OMPP product and that provided in Bill 164.

Mr Mancini: Can you give us your definition of "minor"? Is minor 1%, 2%, 3%, 15%? What is a minor difference, Mr Tully?

Mr Tully: The "minor" relates to the 4.4% which Mercer's is indicating in its costing analysis is the difference in cost between the two products.

Mr Mancini: What you're telling the committee this morning then is that when the Minister of Financial Institutions introduced Bill 164, you as deputy minister had enough information to conclude that rates could go up 4.4%.

Mr Tully: No. We didn't have the specific information that it was 4.4%. Mercer's costing and the full analysis of its costing wasn't completed for some months thereafter.

Mr Mancini: Then you didn't know if rates were going to go up or not, 4% or 15%. So it was obviously wrong of the minister and members of the government to go around saying there'd be no rate increases. That was obviously wrong.

Mr Tully: No. Mercer's had been consulting with us for some time and was honing in in terms of the specific numbers it was going to come up with and was indicating a difference—not that specific number—in the order of what the ultimate decision was.

Mr Mancini: I have a question for Mr Hall. I missed the last portion of Mr Khury's presentation, the last minute or so, but I did sit through the portion of the hearings where he compared the Ontario motorist protection plan and The Road Ahead plan. The figures I was able to copy down, because the information was not provided to the committee, indicated that on The Road Ahead plan—there was some other explanation that went along with that—the rates would go up 4.4% per car. Non-economic loss would be 18.9%, payments to injured persons, 13%, and there were a lot of other percentages that were used, all in excess of 4.4%.

Not being an actuarial expert but knowing that 18.9% and 13% are substantially greater than 4.4%, how is it that when we compile all these figures, which are all greater than 4.4%, we end up with an average of 4.4%?

Mr Khury: May I answer that? Actually, this is really an outstanding question. The thing that was not stated here which is relevant is that the property coverages, which is roughly 60% of the equation, has essentially no change. So you factor in zero for all of that, with all of these, and you get to about 4.4% change in the relative costs.

Mr Mancini: Sorry, what is not changing again?

Mr Khury: The property coverages.

Mr Mancini: The property coverages.

Mr Khury: Yes. Collision, comprehensive, the damage to the automobile itself is essentially unchanged; that's at zero.

Mr Mancini: So you're assuming that the costs of automobiles will not rise? You're assuming that the costs of repairing automobiles will not rise?

Mr Khury: No, sir.

Mr Mancini: You're assuming that the people who work in the body shops will not get increased wages? You're assuming that new technology and equipment will not be bought which will force costs to go up? You're assuming that new government regulations and taxes will not force the costs of repairing automobiles to rise? Is that your assumption?

Mr Khury: Absolutely not, sir.

Mr Mancini: What is your assumption?

Mr Khury: What I said is that the zero refers to if you were to play out the cost of repairing cars and the replacing of cars, the property coverages, if you look at the costs of that, whatever it is under OMPP, under Bill 164, that change, side by side, is zero. The annual rates of increase could be anything, but the relationship between the two products is weighed in at zero.

Mr Mancini: Now I follow your argument. I don't necessarily accept it, but I follow how you came to that conclusion.

Mr Khury: If I may just add, in fact we are assuming increases in the cost of repairing automobiles, but it applies under both products. Therefore, the relationship is unchanged; therefore, they come into the equation at 0%.

The Acting Chair (Mr George Dadamo): If I may jump in, Mr Mancini, here's your time check. You've consumed about 10 minutes. Do you want to leave five minutes?

Mr Mancini: You're kidding. I started at 11:22.

The Acting Chair: Oh, I'm sorry, five more.

Mr Mancini: Mr Tully, has the ministry taken any public opinion polls as to consumer satisfaction with regard to the current Ontario motorist protection plan?

Mr Tully: No, it hasn't.

Mr Mancini: Has any other body of government taken some type of public opinion poll which would result in the population being able to express an opinion?

Mr Tully: Not that I'm aware of in government.

Mr Mancini: So you don't know whether or not the public's happy with the current plan.

Mr Tully: No, I don't. I assume that's what these public hearings are for.

Mr Mancini: If you haven't seen any public opinion polls, I'm assuming then that the minister hasn't seen any and doesn't know whether the public is happy or not with the current Ontario motorist protection plan.

Mr Tully: I think you'd have to ask him that question.

Mr Mancini: But that would be a reasonable assumption to make. Since we don't know whether or not any public opinion polls were taken, was there any work done with focus groups?

Mr Tully: In the course of the exercise of preparing for Bill 164, no, there was not.

Mr Mancini: Did you check with industry associations? Did you check with people who provide the insurance to find out what kind of feedback they were getting from their customers? Did you check with the insurance commissioner?

Mr Tully: The auto insurance review?

Mr Mancini: Yes.

Mr Tully: The auto insurance review was consulted with over the past year.

Mr Mancini: Did they find a great deal of public dissatisfaction with the Ontario motorist protection plan that they reported to you?

Mr Tully: Yes, I think there has been.

Mr Mancini: They did?

Mr Tully: Certainly, in releasing Bill 164 and subsequently, the minister has spoken very much to the problems with the existing legislation that were identified by groups that we consulted with. That, of course, was the purpose of the establishment and continuation of the auto insurance review. Those consultations have been extensive and a number of the changes that are part of this bill and the draft regulation reflect the advice we've got.

Mr Mancini: One last question, if I have time, Mr Chairman; it has to deal with the draft regulations.

These draft regulations are 68 pages long, and I defy anyone in this room who claims to be an expert on these draft regulations, particularly the government members. These draft regulations are basically turning the insurance system in Ontario into a copycat of the Workers' Compensation Board, and I'm wondering, from an administrative point of view, how many more employees is the government going to have to hire to administer this new Workers' Compensation Board we're putting in place? You must know the estimates, because Bill 164 has been in the public domain for quite a while now. How many more employees are going to have to be hired to administer these 68 pages of draft regulations?

Mr Tully: I'd say with respect to that issue that this is a more elaborate regulation, this being a draft regulation but a more elaborate regulation than that which exists currently under the OMPP. In length it's approximately twice as long.

Mr Mancini: I have the current regs and they're 18 pages, Mr Tully. The new regs are 68 pages. We all know how many pages there are. My question was, how many more government employees will you be hiring to administer the new draft regs?

Mr Tully: I appreciate that the version you have of the existing OMPP is a different kind of version. One is a typed foolscap version; the other one is a two-column legal drafting. I mean, we could argue—

Mr Mancini: How many more employees, Mr Tully?

Mr Tully: I was going to get to that issue and what is necessitated out of this product because there are so many cracks in the current regulation with respect to a variety of interest groups. There is a necessary provision of regulation relating to those things.

Mr Mancini: How many more employees, Mr Tully?

Mr Owens: Why don't you let him answer?

Mr Mancini: Well, my time is quickly expiring. All I want to know is how many more employees. Is it going to be zero, one, 50, 150? Surely the deputy can tell the committee that without an elaborate explanation.

Mr Tully: I don't have an estimate at this point of what might be required because, as I say, what one would expect out of a regulation that takes doubt and confusion out of what people are entitled to will reduce the amount of dispute that may go on in the system.

Mr Mancini: You're saying you don't know?

Mr Tully: I'm saying that at this point it's speculative to have an answer.

Mr Mancini: What is your speculation, Mr Tully?

Mr Tully: I wouldn't—

Mr Mancini: You don't know.

Mr Tully: I wouldn't have a response.

Mr Mancini: Maybe we need the insurance commissioner in to tell us.

The Chair: Okay. Mr Kwinter.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Khury, could you tell us the number of drivers in Ontario who claim on the system in a given year, a percentage of the number of drivers and the number who claim insurance?

Mr Khury: Would you narrow the question a little bit, please? It would be helpful. What kind of coverage are you talking about?

Mr Kwinter: All I'm saying is, let's say we have six million drivers in Ontario who buy insurance. What percentage of those ever have an insurance claim in a given year?

Mr Khury: Any insurance claim?

Mr Kwinter: Yes.

Mr Khury: This would have to be a speculation, because—

Mr Kwinter: I just want a speculation.

Mr Khury: Let me just tell you now; I'll give you my sort of folklore knowledge of this.

Mr Mancini: It's a speculation.

Mr Kwinter: I'll take a speculation.

Mr Khury: Basically, one accident can generate five claims. The only data that's available we look at is claims. I would have to guess at this point it would be—all coverages, I would have to say one third.

Mr Kwinter: Okay, so two thirds of the people pay insurance and never claim on it.

Mr Khury: I didn't say people, sir. There was about one third.

Mr Kwinter: Well, I'm asking about people.

Mr Khury: Then I don't have that.

Mr Kwinter: All right. Let's try to give the same transposition. I may be wrong in the way that you may wrong as well, but let's assume that of the people who pay insurance, one third of them claim for an accident and the other two thirds pay the insurance and never have an accident.

Mr Khury: Let me say again, sir, I did not answer you on people. I said this is claims that come up, about every car, like a third of the cars—

Mr Kwinter: You can't give me it. I'm just saying it seems—

Mr Khury: Hypothetical, okay.

Mr Kwinter: It seems to be reasonable, just for the premise, because what I want to do is spend a minute to talk about the insurance industry pre-OMPP, under the tort system. There was nothing wrong with the system. What was wrong was the perceived cost. Nobody could tell you—I was the minister at the time—what insurance should cost. All they know is, "Last year I paid $600 and this year I'm paying $1,500, and that's ridiculous," even though $1,500 may be the best bargain they ever had in their lives.

The point I'm making is that this whole exercise is political as opposed to economic. The whole reason for all these things is that there are people out there who for whatever reason have been sold a bill of goods that their insurance costs should be cheaper. I'm saying to you, because most people don't understand insurance, that when they get their increase, whether it's 4.4% or whatever it is, the first reaction is: "Why is my rate going up and I've never had an accident? This is ridiculous." That is what triggered this whole exercise.

If the point of the exercise is to provide better service and to do it at a cheaper cost, I say to you that this plan isn't doing it, because what it's going to do is create very much the problem that started this whole thing. People are going to say, "How come my insurance is going up when I've never had a claim?"

The Chair: Mr Kwinter, I'm going to have to go on to Mr Tilson.

Mr Tilson: I'd like to continue with Mr Khury with that line of questioning, because that's how this mess started. When the Liberals brought in OMPP, it was because of the insurance companies saying, "Rates are going to go up." It was a response to that. Both the Conservatives and the NDP at that time were very critical of the OMPP, and I will say that we continue to be critical of the OMPP.

There are four studies at least that we know of; there may be some others that the government hasn't told us about, although with due respect to Mr Tully, he doesn't seem to know a great deal. He doesn't know what this is going to do to the bureaucracy. I'm saying this with due respect, Mr Tully—I'm simply responding to your comments—that we really don't know where we're going in this direction as far as cost is concerned. You have said 4%. The other four studies, which have been done by four other firms, say something substantially different as far as what it's going to cost the consumers of this province is concerned. You're shaking your head. I'm sure you're aware of them. Wyatt is one.

Mr Harnick: Coopers.

Mr Tilson: Coopers is another. I believe the bureaucracy will be unbelievable. The comparison is being made to workers' compensation. Who's going to explain all this to people, not only in the insurance industry but the government, the insurance commission? It's going to be substantial.

Mr Chairman, if you could cut me off at 10 minutes, I know Mr Harnick has some questions.

The Chair: Okay, fine.

Mr Tilson: There's the tripling of the number of people, according to statistics, as to who can be sued and who will be required to pay for pain and suffering awards. The caps will be lifted on the accident benefit coverage to provide lifetime benefits and there's no dollar limitation with respect to that. There will be continuously increasing benefits, as Mr Tully has indicated, which would be indexing these benefits to the consumer price index. There will be an increase of the wage-loss benefit limit by 70%. The death and funeral benefits will be doubled. The benefits for students, the unemployed, the self-employed, again repeating what Mr Tully has indicated, will be expanded. All these costs are going to be substantial. Already you're outvoted, because there are three firms that say quite different things than what Mercer says.

I try to be a reasonable man in these things, and I listen to all of these things that this wonderful legislation is going to do. I, as an individual, cannot believe the 4% figure that you're saying. I have a terrible fear that this legislation is going to be passed, because these people rarely listen to what the opposition or anyone else says with respect to legislation—in the past anyway. I doubt if there will be any amendments.

All of a sudden, Bill 164 is going to be law, and I can't believe that the cost is going to be only 4%.

I'd like you to comment very briefly, because time is limited, in response to the other three studies—I can't believe you haven't looked at them—and second, in response to all of this package, as to what it's going to cost the consumer.

Mr Khury: First of all, I have seen only one other costing of this. That is the one that was conducted by the Wyatt Co, I believe. I have not seen the other studies. The only comment I can make is about that. I know Coopers did a study. I was not aware that the Coopers study was a costing of—Mr Tilson: Let's take Wyatt. Keep your comments on Wyatt.

Mr Khury: Yes. I'll be happy to give you our comments on the Wyatt report. Basically, I think the reconciliation that I will give you is that the Wyatt report stated that premiums are expected to go up by 12%, and the Mercer report indicated that the difference in cost would be roughly 4%. This is the reconciliation I'm prepared to give you right now.

Mr Tilson: I'll take anything at this stage, sir, because with all due respect, I can't believe your figures. However—

Mr Khury: Right. We have compared the Wyatt study to our work as much as we can, and we have not discussed the study with the Wyatt folks. But let me take out the areas on which we agree, indicate those, and then I can focus on the area of disagreement.

Remember, the comparison I've given you of the 4.4% compares the costs of delivering the product under Bill 164 and under OMPP. That relationship is 4.4%. That is in components, as I indicated earlier to Mr Mancini. The property coverage is essentially coming to that equation at zero. Between Mercer and Wyatt, if you take the bodily injury coverage, if you take the income disability benefits, if you compare those between Bill 164 and OMPP, then we find we're in the same ball park. There really are not very substantive differences.

The area we have found where there is substantial difference in that relationship is in the area of the medical costs. There is a very huge difference here. For example, we estimate the cost will go up around 20% and Wyatt, I believe, estimates the cost will go up around 90%.

Mr Tilson: Why are you different from Wyatt?

Mr Khury: I'm going to get to that. We have identified numerous reasons for this difference. I will not go over all of them. I will give you three key ones to illustrate the nature of the difference.

First, Wyatt assumes a much higher number of long-term disabled who will enter the benefit system than we do, roughly twice the number that we assume. That's one very important difference.

Second, Wyatt assumes that a high percentage of the long-term disabled would require continuing home and workplace modifications. The assumption of the Wyatt study is roughly $10,000 per year for each year of disability up to age 65. Then the number goes down to $5,000 per year for each year of the remainder of life. Our assumption on that is $30,000 a year, one time. That's very substantial; this is roughly one third of the difference.

A third example I will give you is that the Wyatt report assumes that medical and rehab benefits will be spread uniformly throughout the term of the disability of the long-term disabled. That's essentially for life. We feel that most of the rehabilitation work will be incurred at the front end, after the accident, and will taper off substantially, as opposed to assuming it will continue for the duration of the disability.

There are many other differences. If you put all these together, these things compound and they just contribute to an enormous difference.

That is the reconciliation we've been able to come up with between our 4% and the Wyatt 12%.

Mr Tilson: Given what OMPP does and given what this bill is suggesting, I would then like you to comment on the second part of my question as to all these wonderful things Bill 164 is going to do while costing the consumer only 4% more.

Mr Khury: Remember, the work we have done is really in comparing how things would operate under two different environments, what the cost would look like.

Mr Tilson: The real question is getting back to Mr Kwinter's question: What is Bill 164 going to cost the consumer? You say 4%, yet Bill 164 is going to be doing an awful lot more than what OMPP or tort ever did.

Mr Khury: Let me try to answer you, sir. First, 60% of the package is untouched: That's the property coverages; that's coming into the equation at zero. The recoveries under bodily injury are going to be reduced.

Mr Tilson: The lifting of the caps on the accident benefits alone is going to create unbelievable cost.

Mr Khury: May I answer the question, sir?

Mr Tilson: You're right. Thank you.

The Chair: One minute before we go to Mr Harnick.

Mr Khury: We estimate that the cost of accident benefits, just that piece you're talking about, will go up by 45%. Against that, we have the reduction in the bodily injury of roughly 15%—

Mr Tilson: The economic loss?

Mr Khury: Yes, the elimination of the economic loss and the effect of the deductible. That generates about a 15% reduction, and the property coverages come in at zero. So if you average the zero and the reduction of 15% on 45%, you get 4.4%. That's really that balance. I think you're focusing on all the things that go up. There are other things that are mitigating.

Mr Harnick: My first question is for Mr Tully. Sir, the NDP made certain promises in 1990. They said quite simply that they were going to restore the right to sue for pain and suffering and for economic loss and they were going to hold the line on premiums. Does this plan fulfil this promise? It's either yes or no.

Mr Owens: Is there another choice?

Mr Tully: I think that's a question that you should properly address.

Mr Harnick: No, sir. Quite frankly, you understand this. You wrote the legislation with your friend Mr Endicott. Tell me, does this fulfil the promise the government made? It's a very simple question, and you more than anyone else understand this piece of legislation. You wrote it.

Mr Tully: I think this legislation meets the—

Mr Harnick: Does it fulfil the promise that was made?

Mr Tully: It's seen to fulfil the commitment made by the government.

Mr Harnick: So the government, you're telling me then, promised people it was going to take away their right to claim for economic losses. Is that correct?

Mr Tully: I didn't say that.

Mr Harnick: Let's go on to the next question. I've read this material, and it seems to me that you're sanctioning a scheme where people can still suffer an economic loss beyond what their accident benefits will pay them. Is that correct? Is that possible?

Mr Tully: I think this plan provides reasonable—

Mr Harnick: No, no. Just tell me if people are going to suffer that economic loss.

The Chair: Mr Harnick, would you let him answer the question.

Mr Harnick: I'm not asking what the plan provides. Is it possible that someone will suffer an economic loss beyond what the accident benefits pay?

Mr Tully: Yes, it's possible.

Mr Harnick: Thank you. So you are sanctioning a scheme where people are going to suffer economic losses. That's the first thing.

Now let's talk about fatal accidents. The maximum anybody can get for a fatal accident is $200,000, correct?

Mr Tully: Yes.

Mr Harnick: All right. And if somebody has an income, if a breadwinner—a man or woman who has a family—has a loss of income of $50,000 a year if that's what they're making at the time they're killed, it seems to me that in four years they've exhausted the $200,000 they're going to get from this brilliant insurance scheme. They might have a lifetime working loss of $50,000 a year and you're going to recompense them for four years. Is that correct?

Mr Tully: I think you have to take into consideration that other forms of life protection—

Mr Harnick: What if they don't have other forms of life protection? We're just talking about the auto scheme you've come up with.

Mr Tully: And relative to the current plan that provides $25,000 in death benefits.

Mr Harnick: Well, the current plan, as I understand it, is that if you have a fatal, you've passed the threshold and you can sue for your actual loss. So don't give me that garbage, because that's exactly what it is.

Mr Tully: If you've got somebody you can sue, if you were not at fault. I think you're making a generality out of a very specific case.

Mr Harnick: Well, sir, $200,000 is the maximum you can get. It seems to me that that covers four years at $50,000, if that's what someone's earning. If someone's earning $50,000 and has a working life expectancy of 20 more years to look after paying the mortgage for his family, to look after sending his kids through university, 20 years times $50,000 comes out to about $1 million. If you commute that to present-day value, it's probably $600,000. You're going to pay $200,000. There's a $400,000 loss from this brilliant plan you have. Correct?

Mr Harnick: You're going to give someone $200,000 for a $600,000 loss.

Mr Tully: This is not correct in the generality of situations. There may be a situation where someone doesn't have any other protection which people do have against death.

Mr Harnick: Are you telling me that this plan is all based upon people having other protection?

Mr Tully: No, I'm not.

Mr Harnick: That's what you just said: The beauty of this plan is that we have to have other protection to protect ourselves.

Mr Tully: The reality is not the kind of situation which you're describing.

Mr Harnick: Let me ask Mr Endicott a question. How can an insured person be expected to understand these regulations? The regulations in fact are in the standard form policy. When I go out to buy my policy, my insurance agent hands me the policy and says, "There it is; it's all there." How is any individual who is buying insurance today expected to understand what's in that policy, those 68 pages of regulations? How can an insured person who obtains an insurance policy ever expect to understand that?

Mr Eric Endicott: I would suggest first of all that if you look at the current standard policy, there isn't any basis for understanding that either.

Mr Harnick: So you're pleased about that. You're going to make that a little worse.

Mr Endicott: I am not going to do anything. I should say that, like everything else, there will be a number of different forms of consumer information that will simplify and explain the nature of the benefits.

The reason the regulation is so complex is because it is attempting to deal with a number of special circumstances in a clearly defined way so that when people have disputes they actually understand what exactly their rights are. In fact, the philosophy of the regulation is precisely to see what people can get as opposed to a system where people do not know what they get, which is what the recovery is when it's in tort.

Mr Harnick: Terrific.

The Chair: Mr Owens.

Mr Harnick: I have one more very brief question.

The Chair: I'm sorry. Mr Owens.

Mr Owens: Thank you, Chair. I'll yield my time to Mr Ward.

Mr Ward: I'd like to thank you for coming out this morning and undertaking to give us a technical briefing as well as answer some very pertinent questions that are on the minds of the committee members here today.

I would like to focus a little on the costs of Bill 164 as well. But before I do, I think it's fair to say that our government has tried to strike a balance when it comes to the auto insurance system in Ontario, where there are adequate or decent benefits for victims of motor vehicle accidents as well as keeping a lid on the insurance premium costs that all drivers face. We think we've struck that balance with Bill 164.

Some of the questions have related to the differences of the perceived costs of Bill 164 in reference to the Mercer report, which the government commissioned in relation to Wyatt, as well as Coopers. My understanding is that the representative from Mercer did not really have a chance to peruse the Coopers report that State Farm had commissioned. That says in essence that costs may go up by 20% and makes other references to tourism etc. But the Wyatt study, which the Mercer representative has had a chance to review: Did it not also include a percentage that suggested the feeling that insurance premiums currently are undervalued or underpriced, and that they had written in a percentage of the overall cost to include that underpricing? Was that not part of their overall costing?

Mr Khury: If I may, I think you're talking about what the Wyatt report indicates is the current rate shortage, the inadequacy in the existing rates. We have tried to understand that because, first of all, in our study we made no such attempt to evaluate the current rate adequacy in the marketplace. Our effort was trying to understand why the absolute numbers of the Wyatt study were so much higher than ours.

We were able to trace a number of factors in that, and there are really two large ones that I'll share with you. One is the effect of the recession on insurance statistics. Our report fully reflected the anticipated effects of the recession on the rates of accidents. To the best of our knowledge, we cannot find an equivalent reflection, at least in terms of degree, of the effects of the recession in terms of the cost of insurance. In fact, since the time our report came out, additional insurance statistics have become available where the original judgement we had made on accident rates has been more than confirmed. It indicates, in fact, that we should have gone even deeper in recognizing the recession. So this is probably the largest single area.

The second-largest reason, we believe, for the inadequacy that Wyatt points to is the jumping-off point; that is, the level of loss cost that is assumed in the Wyatt study. These are the tort-based numbers from which Wyatt goes forward to create Bill 164 costs.

Mr Khury: Those figures are substantially higher—the jumping-off point—than the figures that we have used, and it reflects fully the results of the most recent experience, which in fact includes some aberrations. There are some unusual things in the data which, frankly, we cannot explain, have been unable to explain. That is taken at full face. We have discounted that somewhat, a little bit.

So those are the two largest reasons. There are others. If you would like to take time on those right now, I'd be happy to get into them, but those are two of the larger issues.

Mr Ward: Mr Tully, the minister recently announced the creation of a task force to look at rehab and long-term care. I believe there are representatives from the industry and consumers on this task force. The intent is to look at cost control; in fact, maybe even to reduce the long-term costs. If this task force makes appropriate recommendations looking at costs, may not the 4.5% that Mercer has said Bill 164 may end up costing the insurance industry in fact be even lower, depending on what this task force finds?

Mr Tully: The role of that task force is to assess the need for and kinds of appropriate standards and guidelines to be put in place to, on the one hand, ensure that the seriously injured accident victim has access to all the rehabilitation services he requires for maximum restitution, and, at the same time, put in place controls that will effectively limit abuse of that kind of system and make sure that those costs are used where they have maximum value.

As we've gone through the discussion here, obviously one of the big areas of disagreement that exists between the Mercer people and the Wyatt people and others who have looked at potential costs is what will happen; not whether or not the cap is a good thing, because I think everyone would agree that adequate care for the long-term disabled is the objective, but ensuring that that is not something that has significant impact on the consumer, that there be a balance there.

The task force has the objective of bridging the gap between what Mercer has assumed in its costing can be achieved in a reasonable environment and, I might say, what Wyatt has probably assumed, which is what might happen if we were in a situation which was abusive of access to those kinds of services. The task force will put in the kinds of standards and guidelines that will ensure that there is cost control, without using the artificial measure of the $500,000 cap, which quite obviously was imbalanced or discriminatory towards the most seriously injured, who need that kind of—

Mr Ward: Finally, to the Mercer representatives, looking at the résumés included in the background, you're not fly-by-nighters. You have a wealth of experience in the insurance industry and costing. What's the difference between loss cost and premiums?

Mr Khury: I could define loss cost by example, which is easiest. At the end of a year, you take all the amounts that were paid for claims and you divide them by the number of cars on the road. That's the loss cost: cost per car. You take all the claims and you divide them by the number of cars.

The premium is what an insurance company would charge an individual for an individual automobile insured. Usually, there's a relationship between those two.

Mr Ward: Usually.

Mr Khury: Usually there's a relationship, because the price that is charged by an insurance company does not have to follow the actuarial indication. In fact, in my 25 years of experience, I can tell you categorically that generally the actuarial indication is a point that is used for an insurance company to arrive at its costs. Then business judgements get in, as to what it is they're trying to accomplish by being in the marketplace. That includes: What are our competitors doing? What is our objective in the marketplace etc? There's a whole complex of business decisions that get in. So the loss cost is an abstract quantity. The premium is a business—

Mr Ward: Decision.

Mr Khury: A business decision, right.

Mr Ward: Mr Chairman, do I have any more time?

The Chair: Yes, you do, another five minutes. I was mistaken: You actually had 10 minutes.

Mr Ward: I thought, "Gee, I know I talk a lot, but not that much."

Again, to Mercer, I'd like to continue to focus on the cost of the actuarial study you conducted for the government. You mentioned, I believe in an answer or in your opening presentation, that you used some data from Quebec. Why did you include that data, or how did you use it?

Mr Khury: I'm just trying to frame the answer to this. Actually, I need to point out right away that by far and away the main source of data that were used in our study are Ontario data. It was part of our work to ask, what else is relevant that can be brought to the situation? What can be brought in from anywhere that can illuminate the answer to the question? Because, frankly, all of us are staring in the dark trying to bring a little candle to see what this might do. So first of all, the main source of data was Ontario-based. We looked at lots of jurisdictions, as I indicated earlier; one of them was Quebec.

So to get back to your specific question right now, one of the disadvantages of the general actuarial methodology in a situation like we have here, where you really don't have any statistics that are directly derived from a similar environment that you could impute to, you have to look at all you can get. So we used Ontario data to the maximum extent we can, then we looked at Quebec to see what elements of the Quebec experience can illuminate the answer we arrived at by just using Ontario experience.

There were three specific elements we used. I'd like to point to them. One, we used the Quebec experience to derive a table of disability durations: How long disabilities can be expected to last and how they are distributed because of auto injuries, because of auto accidents.

Second, we used a small element of Quebec's long-term trend for the income disability and medical and rehab data, because that is predominantly a first-party, no-fault system.

Finally, we incorporated some element of Quebec's loss experience itself, adjusted for Ontario demographics: wage scales and injury rates. Let me comment just a couple more sentences on this and I will stop.

The reason we used the Quebec disability duration table was that that's the only one we can find in North America that is done in a predominantly and pure no-fault environment. It was very helpful to us. May I quickly point out that that table was also one that Wyatt built on in conducting its study. That is a perfectly acceptable practice.

The second item, the use of long-term trends: The reason we did that is that when you look at the long-term trends of insurance in general and long-term trends in a pure no-fault environment, we have found in the Quebec experience that there is a vast difference, over a long number of years, in what the rates of increase are. We tried to explain that difference. We reconciled some of it, but some part of it just remained unexplained. We therefore concluded that there must be something else that happens in the system when you go to a predominantly no-fault system, and we had to recognize some part of that. We took a small part of that trend and reflected it into our work.

The third and final element, the elements of Quebec's loss cost that we actually reflected: This is basically to try to overcome the advantage of building the Bill 164 costs based solely on tort-based data. There's a fundamental disadvantage but that's all that's available, so we used that to try to water down that disadvantage.

All of these together, if you take them all together, really do not change our answer to the point that it would blow it out of the water. It would make 1% or 2% difference in the answer.

The Chair: Time has run out. I'd like to thank you for appearing before the committee.

Mr Tilson: Before you thank them and ask them to leave, as Mr Tully was speaking, I wrote down approximately nine questions I had for him. My questions consisted of one two-part question to Mr Khury, and Mr Harnick asked a couple of questions in the same area. My point is, Mr Chairman, that the amount of time that's been allowed the committee to ask questions of clarification of the staff who have been preparing the regulations, the regulations alone, has been completely inadequate. I'm not critical of you; I know you're doing—

The Chair: Mr Tilson, is it possible that you can put this down on paper? The clerk will make sure that Mr Tully gets it, and all members of the committee.

Mr Tilson: Mr Chairman, I'm telling you orally that the process that has been devised is terrible. I don't know whether it's because insufficient time has been provided by the NDP. I suspect that's it.

Mr Paul Klopp (Huron): Mr Chair, if we could move on here—

Mr Tilson: Mr Chairman, my point is that surely this committee is prepared to allow more time to ask questions of particularly Mr Tully, who spoke for almost an hour, and very few questions have been directed to the many points Mr Tully has raised.

The Chair: Mr Tilson, in my record here it shows from 10 to 12. I know that in subcommittee it was thrown around that it would be 20 minutes for each caucus. It wasn't printed out. I had asked Mr Tully and his staff to shorten up so we had enough for question period. If you have more questions, address them to the clerk, who will address them to Mr Tully, and we will have those answers back, and any other questions you didn't think of today, and we'll put them through so you've got them back before we get into clause-by-clause.

Mr Tilson: Mr Chair, I'm not being critical of you, but that's not the way to run a committee. I'm just shocked that this is the process, that questions are being asked of this committee—

The Chair: Mr Owens.

Mr Owens: Mr Chair, I find it passing strange that once again—

Mr Tilson: Surely one's got the floor—

The Chair: One at a time. I've got two ears but—

Mr Owens: Just a second. I have the floor.

Mr Tilson: No, you don't have the floor.

Mr Owens: Excuse me; the Chair recognized me.

The Chair: I'm going to recognize Mr Owens for a comeback.

Mr Tilson: A comeback? I haven't finished.

The Chair: I thought you were done.

Mr Dadamo: How much time do you want, David?

Mr Tilson: I'm simply saying that I want to be able to ask these people more than one question. Mr Harnick asked about half a question.

Mr Dadamo: Then that's it. Get to the point.

Mr Phillips: Can they come back?

The Chair: Let's see what we've got on our schedule: a subcommittee at 4 o'clock. Let's discuss it then. I know these people are looking to go for lunch also, just like the rest of the members of the committee. I'd like to thank you for coming, and possibly you'll get a written invitation to come back again. Thank you.

We're recessed until 1 o'clock sharp.

The committee recessed at 1209.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1301.

The Chair: Okay, could everybody take their seats please, it being 1 o'clock. We're discussing Bill 164, An Act to amend the Insurance Act and certain other Acts in respect of Automobile Insurance and other Insurance Matters. This afternoon we'll start off with the Honourable Brian Charlton, Minister of Financial Institutions. He'll be on for one half-hour, from 1 to 1:30. At 1:30 Mr Remo Mancini will have from 1:30 to 1:40 and 1:40 to 1:50 will be David Tilson. Those are the subcommittee members, but anyone else in their caucus can ask questions. We'll have a 10-minute recess, and at 2 o'clock the Insurance Bureau of Canada will be coming on. We're going to try to keep on schedule. We're on schedule now. Mr Minister, the floor is yours.

HON BRIAN A. CHARLTON

Hon Brian A. Charlton (Minister of Financial Institutions): Thank you very much, Mr Chair. It's good to be here. I guess I'd like to welcome all of you to the opening of public hearings on the Insurance Statute Law Amendment Act, 1993, the government's auto insurance reform legislation. I have a few initial comments that I hope will give some context to these discussions.

First, some general thoughts about Bill 164, how it was developed and what we believe it will achieve. More detailed background on the work that led to the proposed legislation is outlined in a booklet I released a couple of weeks ago. It's called Considerations in Reforming Accident Compensation: Toward a Fair and Balanced Automobile Insurance System.

The problems Bill 164 addresses go back a long way in this province. They won't all disappear overnight. Neither are there perfect solutions in an imperfect world. That said, Bill 164 is a huge step in the right direction. It will deliver major, immediate improvements, and it also provides continuing reform.

Bill 164 will give Ontario motorists fairer, more accessible, more comprehensive auto insurance, and at affordable rates. Simply put, the reforms I have put forward will mean better insurance coverage for everyone. In fact, these reforms will provide the best auto insurance currently possible.

No system can please all of the critics because the ends of the spectrum are just too far apart for that. There are some who believe that we should go back to the old uncontrolled litigation days. That would be a disaster for both consumers and accident victims. Earlier this month, we released an efficiency comparison of various insurance systems. That study estimated that under a pure tort-based system less than 70% of total claims dollars would end up in the pockets of the claimant. Under a pure no-fault system, this figure increases to over 90%.

Unrestricted access to the courts contributed to spiralling premiums in the 1980s. Ontarians can't afford that again. Our actuaries estimate that the old tort system would cost consumers 23% more on the average policy, about $200, than what is proposed in Bill 164, and that's with only token accident benefits. In a litigation system, settlements can take years. Sometimes victims get nothing, and too much of the premium dollar goes to support the legal system rather than helping people injured in accidents.

The government itself has had to accept some compromise between the ideal and the feasible. Our first choice was a publicly owned insurance system. We still believe in public auto, but the startup cost, in both jobs and dollars, carried too high a pricetag in a depressed economy.

What we are proposing to do through Bill 164 is eliminate the injustices of the OMPP within the existing private delivery system. We believe that unacceptable compromises were made in the development of the OMPP, compromises at the expense of injured accident victims. Fairness and equity were sacrificed to provide insurer profitability and temporary premium relief.

Some aspects of that system were laudable, but it is now clear to us that the structure of the OMPP is not capable of providing a fair, equitable and affordable insurance system. It's not simply a matter of minor adjustments to the accident benefit schedule or the fine-tuning of the threshold; changes of this kind would have far-reaching cost implications.

We went back to the drawing board and found ways to address many of the outstanding inadequacies of the OMPP and to honour our commitment to fair, accessible and affordable insurance. Our reforms to personal injury compensation involved making choices between conflicting values. The new plan proposed in Bill 164 reflects compromises between the objectives of the court-based system and those of the no-fault approach. I believe that we have successfully reconciled the competing objectives by drawing on the best features and important values of the structured benefit and tort systems.

Overall, when the facts of Bill 164 are laid out, we find support for its balanced approach, but that hasn't stemmed the public debate, even though most drivers may not understand what all the fuss is about. People usually don't become aware of the need for insurance reform until they've had an accident. Then they find that they're left out, that they won't get the help they need for economic, physical or psychological recovery. By then, of course, it's too late. Many of the stories I've heard like this are extremely tragic.

Reforms are necessary. Most of us in Ontario rely on automobiles in our daily lives. Auto insurance is a normal part of this reliance. Few of us could afford the economic aftermath of an accident without it. Compulsory auto insurance protects us if we are victims of auto accidents. That's as it should be. But when government delivers a captive consumer to the private sector and when the potential risks of that transaction are catastrophic, government has an obligation to protect that consumer.

Claims costs soared through the 1980s, resulting in a decade of spiralling premium prices. For many drivers, coverage was hard to get at any price. Wide access to a costly and inefficient adversarial court system added to the costs, but didn't deliver fair or universal compensation in return.

The Liberal government responded with the Ontario motorist protection plan, and that's the system motorists are burdened with today, a no-fault plan which provides inadequate accident benefits to those most seriously injured and insufficient recognition of the suffering of those not at fault in traffic accidents.

About the only good thing to be said about the OMPP is that it temporarily curbed the rate of premium escalation that characterized the 1980s. But it was a shortsighted, stopgap solution to soaring insurance prices. Consumers may have saved something on their insurance premiums, but they have paid dearly in other ways. Insurers enjoyed a $1-billion turnaround in profits while huge gaps remained in the OMPP. Worst of all, the insurers are now telling us that the OMPP provided only a one-time fix to soaring prices. They say they still need double-digit increases in premiums just to keep pace with OMPP costs.

The scheme simply ignores the insurance needs of many people. It severely limits court access for many with serious injuries. Accident benefits are inadequate and too often fall short of required income protection. Price stability was a fleeting phenomenon. The OMPP provides only limited recognition of the special circumstances of the recently unemployed, students, care givers and the self-employed.

Benefits are not indexed. As a result, people with long-term injuries see month-to-month erosion of compensation that wasn't enough to begin with. Unrealistic caps on rehabilitation and long-term care mean permanently disabled people may not get the benefits they need.

The ability to recover for pain and suffering through the tort system is very limited, discriminatory and uncertain. One court has held that only near-catastrophic injuries qualify. The OMPP unfairly prohibits suing for psychological injuries, no matter how devastating. Only serious permanent physical injuries are recognized for purposes of tort compensation. The result is that the OMPP threshold denies access to suing to an estimated 94%—and some would say even greater than that—of those who had the right to sue before the OMPP.

All of that sounds like bargain basement coverage, but consumers aren't paying bargain basement prices. In fact, this minimal coverage is often unjustifiably expensive. Too many drivers have been unfairly and arbitrarily placed in the Facility Association.

Discriminatory rate classifications do not place sufficient weight on actual driving performance. Making matters worse, there's little consistency among dozens of classification systems, so drivers have difficulty shopping around for the best price available.

Overall, the system is not consumer-friendly. In addition to the confusing classification systems, drivers don't get the simple consumer information that they need, and there is little help for consumers attempting to resolve disputes. The OMPP paid only lipservice to safety, and didn't promote industry investment in safety either. The OMPP has not provided the answers it promised.

Bill 164 offers a welcome alternative. It's an innovative approach that will achieve the goal of ready access to fair and reasonable compensation for everyone, along with special recognition of pain and suffering of those who are seriously injured as a result of the negligence of others.

The new plan combines the best features of structured, automatic accident benefits and court-based compensation.

It's a unique model which draws on the best of both systems, and at an affordable price.

The improved automatic accident benefits are the most generous and equitable in Canada and they eliminate the need to sue for economic losses. Access to the courts will be reserved for non-economic losses, which courts are best able to assess. Everyone stands to gain from these improvements which are designed to close the gaps in the OMPP and guarantee enhanced protection for all accident victims.

The motor vehicle is an essential part of our way of life in Ontario. A momentary lapse in judgement or attention can have catastrophic results. Auto insurance is compulsory and all drivers pay premiums as a mechanism of sharing significant financial risks. In such a system there is an obligation on government to look after the economic needs of anyone who might be injured in a motor vehicle accident, regardless of fault.

We are convinced that where compensation for fundamental economic losses is concerned, structured accident benefits provide the most compassionate and equitable response.

Automatic benefits provide reliable and equitable recovery for economic losses, unlike the court-based system, which involves high costs and lengthy delays. Compensation through the tort system is uncertain, dependent upon many things like the skill of the accident victim's lawyer, the adequacy of the other party's liability coverage and difficult assumptions which must be made about the future in determining a tort award. This can result in overcompensation for the few successful tort claimants and undercompensation for far too many others, inequities which are simply unacceptable.

Early access to compensation means that rehabilitation and recovery can begin immediately. This allows injured persons to return more quickly to productive and full lives. This in turn contains costs.

Structured benefits also mean that compensation is fair. Everyone's economic loss is compensated on the same basis.

Let me highlight some of the accident benefit improvements we are proposing:

- Income replacement benefits will be indexed to inflation.
- The ceiling on income replacement benefits will increase from the present $600 a week to $1,000 a week.
- We are eliminating the lifetime caps on attendant care, rehabilitation and supplementary medical care expenses.
- Death and funeral benefits for spouses of deceased accident victims will be improved.
- For the first time, the earning potential of persons not yet in the labour force or temporarily outside it will be recognized, and that's especially important for students, care givers and the unemployed.
- The plan also will better recognize the special income situations of the self-employed.

— Injured students will receive lump-sum payments and, in the event of a permanent debilitating injury, an indexed weekly benefit for life. Those temporarily not employed at the time of the accident—care givers who intend to return to the workforce, for example—will receive an indexed income replacement benefit based on their employment history.

— People who are self-employed will be able to purchase pre-determined income replacement to meet their special needs. As well, rules of determining income will be clarified.

Indexation of benefits and removal of caps on medical and rehabilitation expenses will better address the long-term needs of those with serious injuries by protecting against the erosion of their benefits over time. People with disabilities as a result of an auto accident will have appropriate access to attendant care benefits and rehabilitation services for life.

In the event of a fatality, a surviving spouse will receive a death benefit up to eight times higher than the current OMPP benefit, up to $200,000. Where there is no surviving spouse, surviving dependants will share the additional award. The funeral expense benefit doubles to a maximum of $6,000, up from $3,000 under the OMPP.

Under Bill 164, 97% of full-time wage earners will receive income benefits that cover their loss of income as compared with only 73% of full-time wage earners covered under OMPP.

Just as important as Bill 164's accident benefit provisions is its wider recognition of fault and recovery for pain and suffering by those seriously injured in auto accidents as the result of the negligence of others.

Pain and suffering are individual, intangible and difficult to define. Since such losses vary considerably from one person to the next, they are not well suited to compensation based on a fixed schedule of benefits. The more appropriate forum for addressing these special losses is the court system, which has well-established principles for determining fault, assessing pain and suffering and providing guidance in settling claims. And where the settlement process fails, people deserve their day in court.

Our reforms widen recognition of fault for those situations in which courts can best provide fair compensation. Under Bill 164, people who are seriously injured and can prove someone else was at least partly at fault will have the opportunity to sue for the appropriate compensation for their pain and suffering.

At the same time, less serious claims should be discouraged in the interests of an affordable, efficient insurance system. The OMPP's cumbersome and highly restrictive verbal threshold will be replaced by a $15,000 deductible. This deductible will result in consistent interpretation that doesn't differentiate between types of injury, including those due to psychological injuries, as has been the case with the OMPP.

Although access to the courts will be available, we expect most cases to settle through negotiation. There will be no need to argue over whether the injury meets a defined threshold. This change will allow three times as many people to recover damages, more than 15,000 annually as compared with 5,000 under OMPP. Reserving court action for assessment of significant non-economic loss will keep more money in the system to pay for enhanced benefits for everyone.

As I indicated earlier, we are not attempting an overnight fix for the complex and long-standing problems of auto insurance in Ontario. Some improvements will be swift—enhanced accident benefits, for example. Other ongoing reforms will be carefully phased in to maintain market stability.

Continuing improvements will come, in part, from the regulatory change that will be provided for in Bill 164. Others will result from government working with the insurance industry and other interest groups in support of positive action to meet consumer needs.

We were pleased to announce just last week the appointment of a task force to develop standards for cost control of rehabilitation in long-term care. The work of this task force will be to ensure predictability and certainty in the setting of premium rates by recommending standards which are sensitive to both the concerns about costs and the need for appropriate rehabilitation services.

The task force includes representatives of the insurance companies, consumers, rehabilitation specialists, accident victims and the government. It is an initiative which demonstrates our commitment to a consultative process in finalizing and implementing our reforms.

The government plans to encourage a number of specific improvements beyond those specifically legislated through Bill 164. These improvements include enhanced consumer service; clearer, customer-friendly language in insurance policies and consumer information; development of consumer-advocacy mechanisms; a support system to help people involved in disputes with insurers and new rules to protect claimants in such disputes.

The government will also insist on uniform, non-discriminatory classifications of drivers for premium-rating purposes. Not only are there too many classification systems now; they promote discriminatory treatment based on age, sex and marital status. As well, consumers can't compare products based on varying definitions and rating factors. The resulting confusion encourages arbitrary rate setting.

Working with the industry, we will introduce a new system that will remove age, sex and marital status as rate-setting criteria. Instead, it will promote common, clear definitions and universal rating factors that emphasize driver experience and driver behaviour. Increased risk to the system should be recognized through higher premiums, but such penalties must be based on driver conduct, rather than characteristics like age or gender.

Reasonably priced insurance must also become more widely accessible. In the past thousands of good drivers have been forced to pay high rates in the Facility Association, and unfair classifications have had a lot to do with that.

Facility Association reached a peak of 267,000, 8% of all policies, up from 2% in 1987. Intended as an insurer of last resort, Facility became Ontario's largest insurer when you measure it by premiums. We are working closely with the industry to depopulate the Facility Association. Insurers recognize that the FA is often unfair. In cooperation with government, the industry began more than a year ago to reduce the number of drivers assigned to Facility. More than 60,000 policies have been removed.

But the process has to be accelerated. Our goal is to see that every good driver in Ontario is removed from the FA and has access to auto insurance at market rates. After extensive consultation, new rules have been implemented by the industry. As a result, we expect more than half of all drivers currently assigned to the FA to be able to return to the regular market. At the same time, the industry has developed a new risk-pooling mechanism to ensure that the normal market is able to deal with higher risks that don't meet the new FA guidelines.

Road safety and accident prevention is another priority of our reform program. Far too many people are being injured in auto accidents. Accidents now cost taxpayers about $4 billion a year. Where insurance is concerned, the high level of accidents leads directly to high claims costs and to high premiums.

Our reform strategy will link automobile insurance with road safety in order to save lives and reduce costs. The Minister of Transportation tabled a bill last June to establish the Ontario Road Safety Corp. The corporation will develop new incentives for safe driving, promote safety education and driver improvement programs, coordinate public education and safety campaigns, and encourage partnerships and information linkages with the private sector and other groups.

In closing, I'd like to take a few moments to address the issue of price and, in particular, criticisms that warn of major premium increases resulting from auto insurance reforms. We have not been impressed with the calibre of research. The most recent of these, the Wyatt study for the Insurance Bureau of Canada, does nothing to change my view that significant premium increases will not result from our reforms.

Cost estimates of an insurance product are necessarily based on speculation about the future. We have not had much experience with the costs of no-fault in Ontario, and therefore it's pretty easy to find room for debate. I believe the IBC report distorts the impact of the proposed reforms with assumptions that particularly skew the results, including high rates of disability duration and unreasonable projections regarding additional medical and rehabilitation costs and the costs of renovations.

Based on examination of jurisdictions with considerable experience with no-fault auto insurance benefits, our actuaries have a different view. The fact is that Bill 164 will mean better insurance coverage without forcing significant additional costs on consumers. The unprecedented profit performance of the past two years indicates to me that the insurance companies are well positioned to deal with the additional costs of these reforms.

We have designed the reforms to achieve a balance: cost savings in administration and in other areas to allow benefit improvements. On the other hand, the path proposed by many critics of Bill 164 would result in substantial premium increases. The Bill 164 reform package strikes the right balance between fair and reasonable benefits for accident victims and affordable premiums for consumers. We are committed to both fairness and affordability.

We've consulted with representatives of the industry, lawyers, consumers and advocates for accident victims. We've proposed appropriate changes to the bill and its regulations as a result of those consultations.

The public hearings and committee reviews we begin today continue the consultation process, and the government will continue to refine its reform program in keeping with any worthwhile and workable suggestions brought forward.

The reforms proposed in Bill 164 will:

- Introduce enriched benefits, at an affordable price, for everyone injured in automobile accidents.
- Expand access to the courts for accident victims seeking compensation for their pain and suffering.
- Ensure affordable and stable premiums.
- Enable the implementation of a non-discriminatory, industry-wide system for classifying drivers.
- Guarantee wider access to insurance coverage.

Mr Kwinter: Minister, I noticed on page 2 that you say, "Our first choice was a publicly owned insurance system."

Mr Mancini: Mr Chairman, what are we doing?

The Chair: I'm sorry, but he put his hand up earlier.

Mr Mancini: No, I want to know the procedure here. What are we doing at this moment?

The Chair: Responses.

Mr Mancini: You mean this is part of my critic's time, the 10 minutes?

The Chair: Yes, it is. Okay? It's between your caucus. Tell Mr Kwinter that you want the time.

Mr Tilson: The clocks are running too.

The Chair: Yes. It's up to you. You've got 10 minutes to share.

Mr Kwinter: Go ahead.

Mr Mancini: I am pleased to have the opportunity to present the views of the Liberal caucus on Bill 164, a bill that will raise the costs of car insurance for the average person in Ontario, a point the minister tries to downplay at every turn. This bill will thoroughly and unnecessarily disrupt the insurance industry. It is yet another NDP anti-business initiative. This bill continues to expose the NDP bias against the private insurance sector, and the end result will be increased rates for Ontario's drivers.

In the mid-1980s, rising insurance claims led to rapidly escalating car insurance costs in Ontario. People were upset about high insurance rates. They called Queen's Park, and the Liberal government listened to their concerns and responded with necessary action. The NDP members opposite will recall that Bob Rae opposed the Liberal government's action to protect people from higher rates. The NDP made outrageous promises and has broken every one of them since the election. Bob Rae's response to any broken promise is to say, "Well, that was then and this is now."

None the less, the Liberal government passed the Ontario motorist protection plan. This plan brought greater fairness and stability to the marketplace and ensured the best possible protection for consumers at the best possible price. It kept auto insurance rates affordable and struck a balance between comprehensive protection for insured victims and keeping costs down. This progressive reform undertaken by the Liberal government of the day preserved fair access to the courts by allowing injured accident victims to sue for loss of income, something the minister has taken away. This Liberal legislation is fair and has stood the test of time.

The NDP ran an election campaign on the promise to create a government-owned automobile insurance system, but the NDP forgot to tell the people of Ontario during the 1990 election that it was going to cost nearly $2 billion for the government to take over the insurance industry and that more than 12,000 jobs would be disrupted.

Mr Owens: You forgot to tell the people—

Mr Mancini: Maybe your job is not disrupted at the present time, Mr Owens, but there's the possibility that many thousands of people will have their jobs disrupted.

The Chair: Mr Owens, you'll have your chance later on.

Mr Mancini: Thank you, Mr Chairman. After the election, Bob Rae, the man of broken promises, dropped the idea of government-owned auto insurance, a cornerstone of the NDP election platform. He said it would cost too much money and too many jobs. Guess what? Studies conducted by the previous Liberal government had already come to that conclusion about government-owned automobile insurance. By backing away from his promise, by flip-flopping on automobile insurance, Bob Rae and his government started, and continue, a trend of broken promises.

Bob Rae and the NDP, in order to save political face, have introduced Bill 164. This bill is a complete reversal of everything the minister and the NDP stood for. But who needs a place to stand when you don't know what you stand for? Far from restoring the right to sue, which the—

[Interruption]

Mr Mancini: Mr Chairman, can we have order?

The Chair: Yes. If you want to make comments, I'll ask you to be removed from the room.

Mr Kormos: I didn't mind the interruption.

Mr Mancini: Far from restoring the full right to sue, which the NDP promised, this bill will actually eliminate the right of accident victims to sue for loss of income, a point the minister just sloughs off. This bill will cause insurance costs and rates to go up, perhaps as high as 20%, Mr Minister, or more than $200 per vehicle. This, by the way, is the opposite of what the minister promised when he first introduced the bill in December 1991. Who knows what the minister will say tomorrow, the next day or the next? The NDP just wants to be able to say that it has done something about auto insurance. Well, they are doing something; they are raising your insurance rates.

As you know, I have been a member of this assembly for more than 17 years, and in that time I've seen many members come and go. I've learned to respect those who believed in what they said, like Mel Swart, who served in this assembly for more than 13 years. Mr Swart, the NDP member for Welland-Thorold, was a hard-working, dedicated member and an advocate of government-owned auto insurance. His commitment to that issue has never wavered. While I respect Mr Swart for his honesty, I don't agree with his ideas or policy. However, with Mel Swart what you see is what you get. Unfortunately, this is no longer the case with Bob Rae and the NDP. What you see today is not what you get tomorrow. That's the problem. No one knows where the NDP stands on this issue or many others.

With auto insurance, the NDP is changing a system that doesn't need to be changed and wasting precious resources in the process. It is causing further disruption to consumers and providers and is forcing the entire industry to retool for the second time in three years. That costs money, Mr Minister, and these costs will be passed on to the consumer, thanks to your legislation.

Do you remember what the NDP did in its first budget? They imposed a 3% tax on all auto insurance rates. With this tax, they made every consumer pay more for their insurance rates while at the same time saying that rates should go down. What hypocrisy. Average people in Windsor, Kingston, Ottawa, Sudbury and elsewhere in Ontario can't afford to pay more for their insurance. They are already paying enough.

This bill and its accompanying regulations will cause car insurance rates to increase. There's no doubt about that. Even the government's own study proves that. The only question left is by how much.

The minister says the rates will go up 4% or 5%. Others say the rates are going to go up significantly higher, and I remind the minister that when he introduced the bill, he said this would not cause rates to go up at all. That's what the minister said at the time. Now it's only 4% or 5%, maybe.

The government study is based on unrealistic and flawed assumptions. It relies on data from Quebec which doesn't work in Ontario, and it assumes the existence of road safety initiatives which aren't in place yet. This report, I say to the minister, is baloney.

The minister should review the three other actuarial reports that have been prepared right here in Ontario. They clearly show the possibility of insurance rates rising by between 12% and 20%. This could mean an increase of up to $200 per vehicle per year, money that people just don't have. Average people in Ontario simply can't pay more. Maybe NDP ministers can pay more, but the average person cannot.

The Liberal party is also concerned because the regulations that accompany this bill are so complex that one will need to hire a Philadelphia lawyer to figure out exactly what they're entitled to.

Mr Kormos: Would you settle for a Welland lawyer?

Interjections.

Mr Mancini: Even the lawyers from Welland can't understand the legislation.

Mr Kormos: We've got some good lawyers down there, Remo.

Mr Mancini: The NDP government has taken the 18-page, user-friendly regulations approved by the past government and you've turned it into an incomprehensible 68-page document which is a bureaucrat's dream and a consumer's nightmare. The NDP is creating a new Workers' Compensation Board.

If this government is really determined to reduce insurance costs, it should stop messing up the insurance system and make a genuine effort towards road safety. Despite all its rhetoric, this government has done nothing to promote road safety.

Liberals believe this is bad legislation. It will drive up insurance costs. It will eliminate the right to sue for economic loss. It will needlessly disrupt the insurance industry. It is another NDP anti-business initiative.

We cannot support Bill 164. The NDP government made a mistake in promising government-owned auto insurance, and this bill, Bill 164, is another mistake. Average people across Ontario and accident victims will be forced to pay for these NDP mistakes.

We here in Ontario are in the middle of a long and devastating recession. We have record unemployment, record plant closures, record disinvestment, record deficits. With all these major issues the NDP government is facing, what does it turn its attention to? The insurance industry. Why? For ideological reasons. And the result? Increased costs of up to $200, taken out of the Ontario family's already tight budget.

Let me put these costs in perspective. In the recent past, the government has said it had no money to give to hospitals because taxpayers couldn't pay any more.

The Chair: Is it very short?

Mr Mancini: It's very short, but very important.

The Chair: Okay.

Mr Mancini: The government said it had no money to give to hospitals because taxpayers couldn't pay any more. If the government is correct and insurance rates only go up by the minister's assumption of 4% or 5%, that means Ontario drivers will pay $158 million per year more for insurance, while the last time hospitals got any money, all of the hospitals in Ontario only got $140 million.

I say to the government, where are your priorities? Get in touch with the real world. This legislation deserves to be withdrawn.

The Chair: Okay; Mr Tilson.

Mr Tilson: I have a few comments to make as critic for the Progressive Conservative Party. I guess the good news about being here this afternoon and at these hearings is that we're not throwing a bon voyage party for the 25,000 jobs, since the government backed away from its plans for the nationalization of the insurance industry. The bad news is that what we're here for amounts to a promise from this government to take control in the future. Bill 164 is bad legislation. I can put it simply no simpler. This legislation serves no purpose other than for this government to cover its collective political behind for failing to live up to its promise to nationalize the industry.

What is amazing about this government's approach to this legislation is its virtual admission that it does not have any real policy motive for introducing it and that the only reason it is here at all is political. The minister as much as admitted it last June when he was required by law to table an adequacy report on the performance of the existing legislation.

That report was all of one page long and consisted of four paragraphs. In this, the minister claimed that "after extensive consultation, we determined that the schedule must be amended to correct its significant deficiencies," but he did not say whom he had consulted with and he didn't say what those deficiencies were. From what we heard this morning from the administrative staff, I have to wonder whether he bothered at all to consult with anyone other than his political staff or if indeed he knew what the deficiencies were.

Over the past two weeks before this committee began, examination of this bill has commenced. We have been subject to a virtual orgy of action by the minister's office as he attempts to deflect criticism of the bill. He released, first of all, a thesis on insurance which attempts to make a case for change. Secondly, he released an actuarial study which demonstrates absolutely nothing related to this proposal. Thirdly, he proposed amendments to the bill which temper one of the peripheral issues associated with his proposals. Fourthly, the remaining regulations were presented, which demonstrate only the extent to which this legislation will confuse the issue. Finally, he has announced the formation of a task force to discuss the rehabilitation and long-term care benefits.

I have to wonder, when this legislation was introduced over 13 months ago, why all of this activity has occurred only within the last two weeks other than to try and deflect attention away from the examination of the legislation which we are about to undertake.

When the Liberal government introduced the Ontario motorist protection plan, we felt that it too was bad legislation. The reason we felt this was that it sought to change our system of insurance—which we did not agree with, although others did. It was and is our argument that legislation needlessly deprived consumers of their full legal rights and fell far short of meeting the needs of innocent accident victims. We believe that some of the evidence this committee will hear will demonstrate the specific aspects of OMPP which may be improved upon.

Bill 164, on the other hand, is bad because it is unnecessary and malicious. It claims to improve upon the existing legislation, but that is not true, as I'm sure we will hear from many of our witnesses. The real fact of the matter, which I am confident will be borne out by the testimony of our witnesses, is that this legislation has no support whatsoever. Over the past two weeks, we've seen a flurry of activity from the minister's office as they try to justify their actions. This hasn't worked. We don't buy it and neither does the public.

I'd like to take just a few moments to go over some of the highlights of the bill. I will start with the area which is of most interest to consumers, and that is rates. The minister started off with a claim which he was slow to relinquish, that rates under his plan would go down. Four different reports have since come out to prove him wrong, including one commissioned by the ministry itself. The only difference between the studies is the amount by which the rates will increase. The report commissioned by the government from Mercer, which we heard some comment on this morning, to no surprise shows the lowest level of rate increase, although I must say that some of the assumptions employed by Mercer are highly questionable and do not, I think, fairly represent the current state of either the industry or this legislation.

I'd like to give the committee one example. Mercer assumes that the road safety initiatives promised by this government will result in a 5% decline in accidents, but the government has not even told us what these initiatives will take, let alone introduced them. How can anyone extrapolate from that vague promise a 5% decline in motor vehicle accidents? I don't know.

To add insult to injury, Mercer does not consider the fact that such a decline in accidents would have a beneficial effect on any insurance system, not just under Bill 164. A move to graduated licensing, which is an issue my caucus has been encouraging this government to act upon, would be as effective in reducing costs under OMPP as it would under Bill 164, a fact which Mercer neglects to mention.

The level by which rates will increase varies by reports, as we have seen. The report completed by the Wyatt Co for the Insurance Bureau of Canada calculates a double-digit increase between the current and the proposed schemes. Regardless of how you cut it, no matter which report you look at, rates are going up, and they're going up a lot.

The NDP seems to feel that it can do the same thing to the private sector that it has done to the public sector, and that's drive it into bankruptcy. I have tried to understand this, but I'm afraid I simply cannot. How do you offer more product for less money? It doesn't make any sense. I spent some time with the representatives from Mercer on that this morning.

Bill 164 proposes to remove a number of caps on costs and it also provides indexation for a number of benefits. Now I can understand these amendments, but what I don't understand is that the claim from costs will only be moderately effective. Where do these ideas come from? Perhaps in the testimony that's going to be given to this committee we'll hear from that, but I must confess it's just voodoo. If the minister thinks he can force the industry to increase the benefits under auto insurance while at the same time decreasing costs, he's dreaming, and he's dreaming in Technicolor. Just ask Floyd.

The minister also makes the claim that more individuals will be able to seek compensation from the courts under this scheme, and while this may in part be true in pure numbers, it's really an example of manipulating the public. Under OMPP, with the threshold so ambiguous that it will take years for innocent accident victims to actually receive adequate compensation, those who pass the test are at least allowed to sue for future economic loss, and this is the most significant loss the people of Ontario are being put to. Bill 164 removes this ability while allowing people to sue only for pain and suffering and then withdraws, on top of that, the first $15,000 of that claim.

Interjections.

The Chair: I can't hear the speaker.

Mr Mancini: Throw Mr Owens out. He's been interjecting all afternoon.

The Chair: Go ahead, Mr Tilson.

Mr Tilson: Even the lawyers, whom I hear talking in the background, will agree that the deductible you have implemented in this legislation is fictitious. The judges will quite quickly and simply top off the value of awards by the level of the deductible, so that costs will not decrease for the involved parties and the only effect will be to needlessly discourage innocent accident victims from seeking their full rights under the law. I would even venture that with time, the courts will increase the size of pain and suffering awards to accommodate the removal of economic loss. This serves no one.

This bill does create more work for the lawyers; it certainly does. With the regulations, someone's got to explain all this to people. That's not necessarily to the benefit of the public. As my Liberal counterpart has indicated, under the existing legislation there are 18 pages of regulations. This is an acceptable number for many members of the public to understand, and this is being replaced by 67 pages of confusion which I challenge anyone to understand.

Under the amendments being proposed by Bill 164, it will be necessary—

The Chair: Mr Tilson, can you wind it up there?

Mr Tilson: Yes, I'm very close.

The Chair: I'll give it one minute.

Mr Tilson: Thank you, Mr Chairman. If I keep getting interrupted, I won't have that.

The Chair: That's extra time I gave you.

Mr Tilson: Under the amendments being proposed by Bill 164, it will be necessary for all accident victims to retain a lawyer just to determine what they are supposed to receive under the system. More work for the lawyers, but not of the sort that anyone, themselves included, actually needs.

Last week one of the legal groups that has an interest in this issue released a new proposal for an add-on portion of insurance which would have a tort base. I look forward to hearing the response of the minister to this proposal.

I also look forward to further discussion of this proposal to determine if it really would be of benefit to Ontario consumers. The recession, which has decimated the employment ranks of Ontario, is, according to Statistics Canada, over, but this government seems intent on continuing to erode the economic base of Ontario. In particular, the relevant sections of this bill will effectively destroy the reinsurance market in Ontario. The companies that rely on that market are not the large US patent firms, they are the small Canadian firms. To what purpose?

When OMPP was first introduced, we fought against it, as did this government that's sitting before us. While we still believe that OMPP is flawed, we do not see the purpose in revamping a system which appears to be working and which no one appears to want. We believe that the current system can be amended to better serve the interests of the consumer, but we don't believe that it's necessary to throw out the baby with the bath water. If this piece of legislation is allowed to pass this committee, we'll then have three different schemes of automobile insurance before the courts—pre-OMPP, OMPP and Bill 164—and neither the consumer, the courts, the lawyers nor the industry needs this confusion.

The misdirection of this legislation is being recognized not only by this province but also by insurers outside of Ontario. US insurers have been warned that their existing policies will not provide coverage sufficient enough to protect their clients while travelling in Ontario. As a result, US tourists may be forced to seek additional insurance just to visit Ontario. This does not mean a boom for insurers, this means a bust for the Ontario industry.

The Liberal government foisted—

The Chair: Mr Tilson, I'm sorry. I'm glad you're not paying me, because one minute—it's a long minute. Perhaps you can make some of your comments in some of the questions coming up. We've got the Insurance Bureau of Canada coming. I know Mr Mancini had about 12 minutes, you've had about 12 minutes and I think I've been overly fair. You know, another thing—

Mr Tilson: Mr Chair, when we originally set these meetings, we were allowed more than that. Somehow the time is being shortened considerably.

The Chair: No, I remember I read it out before we went for lunch and I read it out after lunch, so everybody knew exactly what the time frame was. We recess now until 2 o'clock.

The committee recessed at 1354 and resumed at 1401.

INSURANCE BUREAU OF CANADA

The Chair: Would everybody take their seats. Insurance Bureau of Canada, come forward please. I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. Today we're taking witnesses on Bill 164, An Act to amend the Insurance Act and certain other Acts in respect of Automobile Insurance and other Insurance Matters.

For the purposes of Hansard, before you begin, if you would identify yourselves, and the clerk will be coming down with a piece of paper to put in front of you so all committee members will know who you are when they come and ask questions later on. It's easier for Hansard also. We have until 2:30. If you can, leave some time for the committee members to ask questions on your brief. If you go 30 minutes, committee members don't have a chance to ask some very important questions.

We'll be starting off with the Conservative Party, then the government and then the Liberals, and we'll keep rotating throughout the rest of the day. We'll start off the next one with the government and go around like that. The time will be equally divided, what's left up until 2:30. You may begin.

Mr Stan Griffin: Good afternoon. My name is Stan Griffin. I'm vice-president for Ontario at the Insurance Bureau of Canada. Thank you for the opportunity to appear before this committee. With me is Brigid Murphy, who's senior vice-president, underwriting, at Guardian Insurance Co, who is here today as a member of the Ontario Auto Insurance Coalition. Also with me is George Cooke, who is president and chief executive officer of Dominion of Canada Insurance Co and is here today as a director of the Insurance Bureau of Canada.

IBC is the major industry association for property and casualty insurers in Canada. More than 80% of all private general insurance business written in Canada is done so by our members. IBC's primary mandate is to represent the interests of its member companies to governments and the insuring public.

Canada's property and casualty insurance industry currently employs about 118,000 people, of whom 47,500, or 40%, work in Ontario. Total industry employment is split about evenly between insurance companies on the one hand and independent agents, brokers and adjusters on the other hand.

Total assets for our industry in Canada were approximately $32 billion in 1991. Current industry investment in the province of Ontario is about $9 billion. In 1991 total premium income in Canada was $14.5 billion, of which $7.3 billion came from business in Ontario. Auto insurance in this province represents 60% of that $7.2 billion.

Through Bill 68, the Ontario motorist protection plan was introduced to this province just two and a half years ago following extensive public review. It has worked well. In general, consumer satisfaction is high. However, the industry has recognized some deficiencies in OMPP and has recommended to government improvements to OMPP. We believe that the fundamental structure of OMPP provides a more stable and predictable pricing environment than that currently proposed in Bill 164.

Bill 68 required a review of OMPP at the two-year period following OMPP introduction. This was to have included a review of cost control, particularly in rehabilitation services, to ensure not only fairness of benefits available but also continued affordability. If appropriate cost controls were in place, this might have allowed for the removal of monetary caps on rehabilitation and medical services currently in the regulation.

These hearings, however, are intended to review the government's proposals to change the auto insurance system in Ontario as set out in The Road Ahead and more specifically in Bill 164 and draft regulations. Effectively, Bill 164 proposes conditions for withdrawal of business, gives authority for risk classification and no-fault compensation to cabinet and establishes conditions for tort access. We note that the minister's extensive consultation with various interested parties over the past months has resulted in some positive changes to the bill and draft regulations as originally proposed.

We will focus our comments on four major areas: the complexity of the Bill 164 proposals, the absence of any road safety initiatives, tort versus no-fault compensation in auto insurance and cost. In general, we believe Bill 164 creates an administrative nightmare, will help lawyers more than accident victims and will cost people too much money.

Brigid, whom I introduced earlier, is senior vice-president at Guardian Insurance Co. She will address the issues of complexity and road safety and George will address the issue of access to tort.

Ms Brigid Murphy: The draft accident benefits regulation is, in our opinion, unnecessarily complex and lengthy. The government's own regulatory body, the Ontario Insurance Commission, estimates it will need 100 more staff and a $5-million increase in its budget to administer the new system. This is an administrative nightmare that will add costs all through the system, not just at the commission. In our opinion, we should look for every opportunity to simplify the system, first of all, to make sure that Ontario drivers are not financing paper-pushing and, just as important, to have a system that can be understood. In our experience, it is virtually impossible to satisfy customers who do not understand what they are buying, what benefits they are entitled to and when.

The draft regulation attempts to address a wide variety of potential losses and to prescribe appropriate compensation. The detailed categorization of benefits in the regulations may create certainty in the minds of those who have drafted the document, but in fact it creates barriers for consumers, claims handlers and adjudicators. If I can use a very simple example, being specific is like saying, "We cover broken arms and broken legs," rather than being more general and saying, "We cover broken bones." In our experience, there will always be situations that could not possibly have been anticipated, so being specific is not the preferred approach.

We believe that the complexity of these regulations will result in an increase in the number of inquiries and findings necessary to process a claim. This increases opportunities for confrontation and frustration for consumers, who of course must pay the increased costs for this process.

While creating barriers for some, the attempt through these regulations to adequately address all possible losses will lead to overcompensation for others. Some claimants will receive more money than they have lost as a result of an injury. This will increase the incidence of "illness behaviour," a condition well documented in medical journals as a major disincentive to rehabilitation and reintegration. We fully support the reintegration benefit approach now included in the draft regulation and the welcome recognition that this is a major component in rehabilitation.

The degree of complexity in the proposed regulation will also mean inconsistency in the payment of benefits to accident victims. The regulation cannot be easily understood, and the best of intentions will not be sufficient to provide equal and consistent access to benefits. Straightforward and timely access with a minimum of red tape and complications are important benefits in themselves and must not be overlooked in the review of this proposal.

No amount of brochures, ad campaigns or other explanatory material can, in our opinion, demystify this complex schedule and help the accident victim or his or her family in understanding exactly what they are entitled to. Spending more money at the commission, at insurance companies or claims adjusters' offices will not eliminate the red tape and the number of confrontations the proposal entails.

Where that money could be well spent is in the area of road safety. People want action to reduce the number of individuals killed and seriously injured in road accidents. Improvements on a number of fronts can and should be made to reduce the frequency and severity of accidents. There is too much carnage on our highways which could be reduced by government action. We need decision and execution, not proposals for shell corporations without mandates. Progress in road safety will result in reduced human suffering, lower medical costs and lower insurance costs.

Drivers who don't wear a seatbelt while travelling on Ontario roads are 16 times more likely to die in a collision than if they were wearing one. Seatbelt use in Ontario, at 81%, is the lowest rate in Canada and far below the compliance rate in Quebec, at 92%, where driver fatalities have been declining for more than a decade. Furthermore, alcohol is involved in close to 40% of all driver fatalities, and half of the convictions for drunk driving involve repeat offenders. Progress can and must be made to promote the use of seatbelts and to reduce drunk driving.

Car accidents are the leading cause of death for men and women under 25 years of age. In particular, the lack of driving experience and training, rather than the age of the drivers, is the most important factor contributing to more frequent and more severe accidents. Accordingly, a program of graduated licensing has been demonstrated to reduce car fatalities by 25% or more. We know that Nova Scotia is about to move forward with legislation in response to our public awareness campaign. Our campaign in Ontario drew overwhelming public support. Still, there has been no action on graduated licensing here. George?

Mr George Cooke: Mr Chairman, members of the committee, I think we can agree that any product, whether it be that proposed in Bill 164, OMPP or any other, involves tradeoffs among the level of compensation, that is, fairness, equity and adequacy; the timeliness of compensation, that is, how quickly payments are received; and affordability, that is, cost. The balancing of compensation, timeliness and affordability is fundamental to the public interest, but at the end of the day people must be able to afford insurance.

It seems clear that at least part of the intent of the amendments in Bill 164 is to allow greater access to tort while at the same time controlling the cost of damage awards. You must decide if Bill 164 achieves either, or an appropriate balance. The industry is opposed to the tort-deductible approach in Bill 164. We believe it is unfair and unaffordable.

To illustrate the significance of the balance between tort and no-fault compensation, the two charts in the package distributed to you may be of assistance. These are the charts that I refer to, if you could find them in your package. They indicate the differences in approach between OMPP and Bill 164 to the compensation for economic loss—for example, income replacement or medical costs—and non-economic loss, that is, pain and suffering and loss of amenities of life.

Under OMPP, tort access is determined through a description of injuries. People with permanent and serious physical injuries and the families of those killed in car accidents have access to the courts. Approximately 6% of claimants for compensation for economic and non-economic loss obtain tort access. The threshold remains largely untested by the courts at this time and, as such, the 6% that we use, that Mercer used, that Wyatt used, that government uses, could very easily become 12%, depending on the eventual interpretation by the courts.

For economic loss under OMPP, some 94% of claimants are compensated on a no-fault basis. This 94% of claimants do not suffer injuries sufficient enough to penetrate the verbal threshold and therefore are not compensated for non-economic loss.

The structure proposed by Bill 164 compensates all economic loss on a no-fault basis. The government estimates that Bill 164 will allow tort access for non-economic loss for 18% of claimants after application of the proposed deductible; 82% of claimants receive no compensation for non-economic loss. Others believe that up to 35% of claimants will be permitted to recover non-economic loss under this scheme. In any event, there is great uncertainty. If anything near the 35% penetration turns out to be correct, this product will simply cost too much.

With the changed structure, the real winners are the lawyers and the at-fault claimants who will recover more than under OMPP through higher benefits. The losers are the most seriously injured not-at-fault claimants, who won't recover their full economic or non-economic loss, and the consumer, who will pay more.

What's wrong with the deductible approach? We have a philosophical objection to the notion of applying a deductible to damage awards. Damages for pain and suffering and loss of amenities of life are assessed on very subjective grounds with an attempt to put the victim in the position he or she was in before the injury so far as monetary damages are able to do. The courts intend to be fair, having regard for the scope of the injury. Thus it is inconsistent to immediately deduct $15,000 from an assessment which was set at a level thought to be fair.

A very seriously injured person will now potentially receive less than full compensation. There is no objective set of criteria with a deductible by which the fairness of an award can be judged. The deductible invites inflation of the damage award to ensure that the final result, after deduction, is fair.

This will either lead to significant inflation of damage awards for personal injury or it could lead to a situation of unfairness to those most seriously injured and subject to compensation, without the deductible, under OMPP.

The level of monetary deductible is not based on any defined set of criteria. Where did $15,000 come from? It is unlikely to be understood by injured people, who cannot reasonably be expected to translate injury to dollars. We believe that public understanding would be enhanced through a verbal threshold, that is, a description of injuries, which, admittedly not easily understood either, has at least an expressed set of criteria as the standard.

Under Ontario's regional court system we fear that there may be different reactions to the deductible in different regions. In the absence of a common definition to be applied by the courts in all regions, there is a much greater potential for inconsistent damage assessments.

It is not clear how a monetary deductible will be handled in a trial situation either. Judges and lawyers are now permitted to propose a range of damages to juries and it is reasonable to assume that the jury will either be told or will soon understand that there is a deductible to be applied in personal injury awards. While most courts will attempt to apply the spirit of the law, we are concerned that there will be a natural tendency to inflate damage awards, particularly near the margin.

There will also be a strong incentive for claimants and their lawyers to drive damages above the deductible level. This way, the injured party, who by definition has suffered damage, will receive something. But to the extent that settlements are achieved by paying small sums in cases approaching the deductible level, the legal costs will be disproportionately high. The lawyer will have to charge a fee based on the work required to develop a claim worth, say, $20,000 and yet recover the fee out of the $5,000 paid to the plaintiff. The resulting increased insurance premium pays the lawyer, not the claimant.

It is argued by some that the deductible will discourage lawyers from taking on cases which are close to the line and that therefore there will be many claims at or about the deductible level which will not be advanced. This is probably true. The same can be said about the verbal threshold.

However, a deserving accident victim may not receive compensation because the return after the deductible does not justify obtaining expert legal advice. The same situation probably exists with the verbal threshold, although it may be that lawyers will be more prepared to take on marginal threshold cases because success means 100% recovery of legal fees.

Where uncertainty exists, unnecessary transaction costs—such as legal, adjusting and investigation costs—increase and consumers will be forced to pay unnecessarily high prices, increased prices. From an insurance perspective, this uncertainty will make it difficult if not impossible to accurately set claim reserves or close files, and so the minister's goals of predictability and stability of prices, which we share, will not be achieved.

The analysis undertaken by Mercer and introduced by the minister demonstrates that under a pure tort environment, some 65% to 70% of claims costs pass through the system to the claimant. Under a pure no-fault system, some 91% of claims costs pass through the system to the claimant. A public policy question you must answer is whether the perceived or actual fairness introduced through a tort remedy is worth the added cost to the system, the increased cost to the consumers and the corresponding reduction in the award to the claimant.

The courts have set a cap on general damage awards of some $240,000, commonly referred to as the "trilogy cap." This trilogy cap is premised on there being full recovery for economic loss. A very serious concern, however, is whether the basis of the $240,000 trilogy cap will hold given the proposed no-fault compensation scheme for economic loss. To the extent that economic loss is not fully compensated, one must expect that the cap on general damages will be removed by the courts. The obvious consequence is an increase in awards and an increase in costs. The affordability of auto insurance is jeopardized. The structure of OMPP does not create a similar problem.

To clarify this situation, the industry strongly recommends that a cap on general damages be legislated. Alternatively, we recommend that the government immediately, while the bill is proceeding through committee, state a case to the Court of Appeal to clarify the court's interpretation of the trilogy cap, given the structure of Bill 164. If the court agrees with the industry's view that the cap is unlikely to be maintained, then there will still be time for an amendment to be made prior to the bill receiving third reading and royal assent. It is our view that a failure to pursue either of these two options is to seriously ignore the responsibility we have to the public to provide affordable yet fair auto insurance.

Mr Griffin: For governments that regulate auto insurance, insurers that deliver it and consumers who pay for it, the real issue is affordability. Even though estimates of costs of insurance under Bill 164 have been made by William M. Mercer for the government and by the Wyatt Co for the insurance industry, there is still a large uncertainty as to what actual costs will prove to be. Mercer acknowledges this uncertainty, noting in its report that actual costs may vary significantly from its estimates. But they make no allowance for it in their costing estimates.

Both Mercer and Wyatt studies indicate that under OMPP costs are rising. Both studies reach the same general conclusions about Bill 164: Auto insurance after Bill 164 would be more expensive than it would be under OMPP.

The actuarial studies differ in a number of significant respects. I will summarize just four.

Wyatt relies on recent experience under both OMPP and tort environments in order to estimate costs, whereas the Mercer study ignores OMPP data entirely.

Wyatt relies only on historical experience within Ontario, whereas the Mercer study, as we heard this morning, blends experience from other jurisdictions, most notably Quebec.

The minister, in speaking just a few minutes ago, in his criticism of Wyatt, has ignored the fact that our assumptions through Wyatt reflect the most comprehensive review of claims details since the Osborne study, giving rise to the figures on catastrophic injuries, whereas the Mercer study relies exclusively on data from the tort environment of the mid-1980s. This isn't presumption; this is reality.

Mercer includes a reduction in the frequency of claims by 5% as a result of some unspecified road safety initiatives assumed to be in place on January 1, 1993. Wyatt makes no such assumption. Road safety initiatives announced in The Road Ahead over a year ago don't yet exist.

We are concerned that the government may act on inaccurate and outdated information on the actual cost of these proposals. The issue is not whose actuary is better, but rather, what is the real cost of change and who benefits from it? You might ask whether it's lawyers or claimants. The balance of compensation, timeliness and affordability must be based on relevant costings.

The Mercer study is not intended to be, and is nothing more than a relative comparison between the costs of two products at a point in time under a number of assumptions, some of which are now dated and others not identified. In fact, a rate filing made by an insurance company to the Ontario Insurance Commission using similar analysis undoubtedly would be rejected.

In his announcement of January 18, creating the rehabilitation task force, the minister has clearly recognized the need to address cost and affordability while providing timely, acceptable levels of compensation. Until the work of the task force is complete, neither Mercer nor Wyatt can reasonably predict costs in this area.

In summary, we are concerned that the insurance system presently proposed is unnecessarily complex and will result in increased costs to consumers.

In conclusion, the insurance industry recognizes that the current auto insurance product can be improved.

The minister has engaged in constructive consultations with the industry and others and has expressed willingness to continue to do so. We are prepared to work with the government and others to introduce change that is in the public interest. We will be submitting a more comprehensive brief to this committee at a later date.

We appreciate the opportunity to appear before this committee and thank you for your consideration.

The Chair: We don't have much time. We've got 27 minutes for the brief. Mr Owens had a technical—

Mr Owens: Just a quick explanation with respect to the deductible: I think it might be instructive for those in the audience and those who will be watching the news this afternoon to have an understanding of exactly how we came to the deductible, and I'll turn the floor over to Mr Endicott.

Mr Endicott: Mr Cooke, in his presentation, commented about the uncertainty associated with the deductible, and we thought this might be helpful. The starting point, which I think you can infer from Mr Cooke's remarks as well, was that no attempt to restrict or eliminate the smallest claims is going to be perfect.

Mr Tilson: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: I think this is wonderful, hearing the administration give its explanation of the deductible—

Mr Harnick: We heard from them this morning.

Mr Tilson: —as long as it doesn't interfere with our time to ask questions.

The Chair: What I was going to do, Mr Tilson, was to skip the government and come around, a question there and a question here, with the remaining time.

Mr Tilson: Fine. Thank you.

Mr Endicott: In any event, I will be brief, just to say that the deductible approach was chosen because it does cater to, if you like, the existing settlement practices that are already in place. It's true there's no certainty, but as lawyers will tell you, most cases settle out of court. Very few actually go to court because people can generally evaluate what the claims are worth. On that basis, because that's the traditional system, the existing structure that is in place, it was felt that system which didn't introduce any additional factors or components, new words defining what is and what is out—additional, if you like, litigation around what additional words mean—

The Chair: Okay; that's it. Mr Tilson.

Mr Tilson: With respect, that probably tells us nothing.

I have one question to the delegation. All four reports have indicated that insurance rates, which is really a lot what the public thinks about, are going to go up, you say, I think, 20%. The minister has said and still continues to say no, that rates will not go up.

I assume he has therefore two alternatives to fulfil his promise that rates will not go up. Either he'll make a cabinet decision, which is allowed for in the bill, that the cabinet can decree that there will be no more rate increases—I believe there's a provision in the bill that says that—or he can put his socialist puppets on the insurance commission and they will then say, "Too bad; you don't get any rate increases," when you apply to have your rate increases—

The Chair: Mr Tilson, it's got to be a quick question.

Mr Tilson: —notwithstanding these unbelievable costs that we're being put to. I would like you to comment again on the impact if that takes place and there are no rate increases to allow for these tremendous costs that you're going to be put to.

Mr Griffin: First of all, I tried to make the point during the presentation that there was great uncertainty around the issue of cost. The question whether it's 4% or 20% or somewhere in between is very difficult to assess at this point. Our assessment through our actuarial firm is that it is in the order of 12%. However, we recognize that the minister has announced a task force to study rehabilitation which is one of the big areas of cost pressure in the system, so nobody knows what the eventual cost is going to be, but obviously, if the costs go up, so will the prices.

Mr Tilson: He's not going to allow you to raise your rates.

Mr Harnick: May I have 30 seconds to ask a question?

The Chair: I'm sorry; your time's up. Maybe some of the other presenters would make it a little bit shorter, because this will go on the record, if you can condense it so that members of the committee can ask a question. I stated that at two o'clock. I'm sorry, but this is the group that wants to present. It's up to them whether they want to present for 30 minutes or present for 20 minutes and give 10 minutes to the committee. They are the presenters. We're listening to them. Sorry.

Mr Mancini: I want to thank the bureau for its presentation this morning, which is quite comprehensive, very clear and very user-friendly and easy to understand, which I think is important. I have one specific question.

The Chair: Just one short one.

Mr Mancini: This morning when I was questioning Mr Tully, I asked him very clearly on several occasions how many more employees the Ontario Insurance Commission would need, how many more government staff it would need to administer the new 68-page document of regulations. Mr Tully evaded my questions and concluded by saying, "I wouldn't have a response." I want to ask the presenters, how is it that the deputy minister wouldn't have a response, but on page 5 you can tell us that, "The government's own regulatory body, the Ontario Insurance Commission (OIC), estimates it will need 100 more staff and a $5-million increase in its budget to administer the new system"?

Mr Griffin: Yes, Mr Mancini. We understand that a member of this committee, Mr Tilson, asked that question to the minister in the House and in his question stated that he understood the commission had said it would need 100 more staff and up to $1 million more dollars a year, and that is the source of our information.

Mr Mancini: From the minister's own lips.

Mr Griffin: Yes.

Mr Mancini: I have great difficulty then with the testimony that we heard this morning. Surely, the deputy minister knows what the minister has or has not said in the Legislature. For a deputy minister to come to this committee, refuse to answer a question and say, "I wouldn't have a response," when the actual response was actually quoted in the Legislature, says a great deal about the testimony we heard this morning.

The Chair: Okay, fine. I'm sorry; the time's up. I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee.

ADVOCACY RESOURCE CENTRE FOR THE HANDICAPPED

The Chair: The next group we have coming forward is ARCH, the Advocacy Resource Centre for the Handicapped. Gentlemen, would you please identify yourselves for the purposes of Hansard. I'd like to welcome you before the committee. We have until 3 o'clock. I don't know if you heard what I said earlier: Perhaps you can cut some out and answer more questions, because what you have here will go into the record. But yours doesn't look quite as long.

Mr David Baker: My name is David Baker. I'm the executive director of the Advocacy Resource Centre for the Handicapped. With me is Ron McInnes, who is our vice-president, and Harry Beatty, who is the director of policy and research at ARCH.

ARCH is a non-profit community legal centre. It was established in 1980. Currently, we have representation from 41 disability organizations on our board. As the brief makes clear, we have been involved virtually from the beginning in the auto insurance discussions, and I should say that we're proud to be one of the few groups that's still saying the same thing now that we were saying back at the beginning.

Throughout our involvement in the automobile insurance reform debate, ARCH has acted independently of both lawyers and insurer organizations. We have been pleased to co-operate from time to time with the consumers' association, which is certainly another organization that should be listened to by this committee, because it is that organization which will have something to say about concern about rates.

Our basic position in relation to automobile insurance is derived from our representation of the disabled community. We believe that people who are injured in motor vehicle accidents should be compensated fairly and adequately. We believe it's important that people who are disabled as a result of accidents are reintegrated into society and that they have the opportunity to live, work and otherwise participate fully in the life of that society. We believe this goal is justifiable both in human and, as you'll hear, economic terms.

ARCH has not championed one particular model of automobile compensation. We have tried to respond to the various proposals which have been brought forward from time to time by various commissions and governments of the day. We acknowledge that there are competing objectives in automobile insurance reform, and at this point in time we're prepared to support a mixed model which combines the best features of no-fault and tort compensation.

At this point, I'd like to turn matters over to Harry Beatty.

Mr Harry Beatty: I'd like to address two items, beginning on page 2 with our position with respect to the OMPP.

In looking at the OMPP or at any reform proposals, perhaps our primary concern has been those who are most seriously injured in motor vehicle accidents, because many compensation systems in auto insurance and elsewhere tend to undercompensate those who are the most seriously injured. From this perspective, we found OMPP to be inadequate for three reasons, which we presented to this Legislature at the time.

(1) The total lack of inflation protection of course works very much to the detriment of those most seriously injured for the longest time, especially children and young people. If you assume a 5% inflation rate, the value of all benefits is cut in half approximately every 14 years.

(2) We are strongly opposed to the caps in OMPP on rehabilitation and long-term care; those are listed at the bottom of page 2. At the top of page 3, we point out that the $3,000 cap, which remains in the current plan and which we'll come to in a minute, is only adequate to purchase about six to eight hours of basic attendant care in the current market. That is much less than is required for those who are most seriously injured. As well, in the OMPP with the $500,000 lifetime limit, in the most serious cases, even disregarding inflation, again in about 14 years the money would run out.

(3) Like other disability groups, we were opposed to the particular wording of the threshold in that we felt it was discriminatory against people with psychological disabilities.

We note that since OMPP has come in, insurers have recognized increased profits but the people who are injured and who have not had a tort claim or who have not been fully compensated in tort are left with unindexed and capped benefits. If the insurers do not pay the costs of significant and long-term disabilities, then those costs are borne by the disabled people themselves, who do without care or services or are put into an institutional setting rather than in the community; or their families, who may wind up delivering care uncompensated or who have to purchase necessary disability-related items and services out of their own pockets; or of course the general public. Those are the only three options.

If insurance does not pay rehabilitation and long-term care costs, then the costs are effectively either borne by the individual, his or her family or the taxpayer, because people will wind up being supported by the ministries of Health and Community and Social Services.

That brings us to our position with regard to the current Bill 164 proposals. In overview, we think that the mixed package, as David indicated, could be made to work fairly if it were amended appropriately, but, as you no doubt will have gathered, we are still very strongly opposed to the $3,000 monthly cap on long-term care.

It is part of the task force recently announced by the minister that this cap will be re-examined, that the task force will have in its mandate to look at alternatives. We are pleased to participate with this task force. We believe, however, that it is essential that the final result be that the $3,000 cap come out of the statutory accident benefits regulation.

Secondly, while indexation has been introduced for the benefits in Bill 164, it excludes those outside the labour force, and we think this is unfair to people who may be outside the labour force through no fault of their own. It sort of penalizes again those who may have already been penalized by the lack of opportunity and lack of employment equity that has existed in the past in our society. So we also advocate the indexation of the $185.

It is especially important that these items be addressed now, because the right to sue for any economic loss is being taken away altogether and, in the case of long-term care, those who were compensated in tort and would have been allowed to remain in the community as a result, will now be at risk of institutionalization against their will.

I'm not going to address the costing in detail, although it's in the report, but our essential point with regard to the costing prepared by Mercer is that if you look at the table, which is the appendix, essentially Mercer says that the total of injury coverages in dollars per car per year, which was $424 pre-OMPP, has gone down to $240 under OMPP and under The Road Ahead is slightly increased to $271.

In the overall reform process, we still have a picture where dollars have been taken away from total compensation. Some of this is no doubt due to the greater efficiency of having more no-fault benefits and less reliance on the courts. Nevertheless, we believe that the savings in premiums, which have resulted in insurers' profits, have to a significant extent been achieved so far by cutting compensation, and Bill 164, without the improvements, we are suggesting, doesn't go far enough to redress that balance.

There has been a strong public perception created, I think, that the current package is spending so much on compensation that it will drive rates way up. At the same time, in the Bill 164 package, something that is not taken account of very much, if at all, in the Mercer costing is that it's a secondary coverage provided by auto insurance. Every improvement in CPP, long-term disability and workers' compensation will be reflected in decreased costs to insurers in cases where people can claim from both systems. As our society becomes more accessible to persons with disabilities, as there is progress in employment equity and human rights, we will find more and more people being integrated into society, being accommodated by employers and by public services and, accordingly, given that auto insurance is a secondary payor, the costs are going to go down. So we would like that taken into account.

Finally, if you look again at the Mercer costing, the reductions and savings in auto insurance have all come from the personal injury side. There really have not been any reforms at all to make a significant reduction in costs on the property side, and that is something that might be considered as well.

I'll now turn it over to Ron to address long-term care issues.

Mr Ron McInnes: Just before getting into long-term care, to follow up on what Harry has said, it would appear that under all three systems, disabled vehicles seem to be getting a better deal than disabled people.

Long-term care is the major issue we're concerned with. We have always stated our strong opposition to the $3,000 monthly limit in that area. We are going to be participating in the task force, as Harry mentioned, and we hope the task force will lead to a resolution of that issue that we can support. Without anticipating all the issues that will be addressed at the task force, we would like to summarize the reasons why that limit can and should be removed.

As Harry has mentioned, the limit is going to force significantly injured people to accept institutional care when their wishes and the wishes of their families are that they remain in community settings. I think this is something that not only this government but previous administrations have been opposed to. Deinstitutionalization has been a policy of government in Ontario for some time now. This would seem to be moving us away, at least in part, from that policy.

As Harry mentioned, $3,000 a month purchases only six to eight hours' basic care a day, and those with significant injuries will require more. This could lead, and probably in many cases will lead, to them being forced into institutions, and there are a number of undesired consequences to that.

There's loss of independence and enjoyment of life, which should be a major concern to all of us, apart from the monetary considerations which seem to be taking up so much time at these hearings.

When people with disabilities are not part of the community, when they're in institutions, their prospects for employment are greatly reduced. Accordingly, the chances that they'll achieve financial independence and no longer receive income replacement payments are reduced. This adds cost to the system as a whole. This is a poor long-term strategy at a time when increasing awareness of the employment capabilities of persons with disabilities and enhanced supports to their training and employment are being emphasized.

Also, once people who've been injured go into an institutional setting, the government ends up paying 100% of the cost through the ministries of Health and Community Services. This adds significantly to the cost of those particular systems at a time when they're already overburdened. At the same time, it means the insurer no longer has to pay any long-term care costs at all. It would be less expensive for government to cost-share with insurers in the long-term care costs over the $3,000 monthly rather than keeping the $3,000 cap and winding up paying the entire cost itself in these serious cases. This is an option we have presented to the government.

In other cases, faced with the option of placing family members in an institution, many families may make heroic sacrifices rather than do so. Usually, this will be a situation where you have a mother, a wife or a daughter providing care for many years on an uncompensated basis. The Bill 164 proposals do not address adequately this problem, in our opinion, because of the $3,000 cap.

There are a number of reasonable alternatives. If additional funding is required for long-term care, this could be achieved through a modest reduction in property coverages, as Harry mentioned, or premiums could be increased slightly to higher-income earners or those who require business interruption coverage. These are options we will be presenting in the task force, but either option we consider fairer than simply putting an arbitrary cap on long-term care. Thank you.

The Chair: Ready for questions? Okay, Mr Tilson, five minutes.

Mr Tilson: Mr Harnick.

The Chair: Or Mr Harnick.

Mr Harnick: I understand you have had some reservations with respect to the setting of the deductible at $15,000 and you've had some discussions about that. I wonder if you can tell us what your reservations are about a $15,000 deductible.

Mr Beatty: I'm not sure what information you've had. We have not specifically opposed the idea of the $15,000 deductible. Of course, it adds to our concerns about long-term care and these other costs, because in those serious cases, it would come off the total amount of funding people have. But we have not specifically objected to the $15,000 deductible.

Mr Harnick: Is $15,000 too high, too low or the right amount as far as you're concerned in terms of a starting position for a system based on a deductible threshold?

Mr Beatty: I think it's approximately in the right area. The real problem that existed in tort, in the pre-OMPP period, was that there tended to be a lot of smaller cases that seemed to be somewhat inflated in terms of the administrative cost they imposed on the system and lawyers' fees and so on. They were getting a disproportionate amount of the funding. So if you're going to have access to the courts and tort, some mechanism is needed to remove those smaller cases. Now, there are pros and cons to every approach, but the $15,000 deductible is one way of achieving it.

Mr Harnick: If a $15,000 deductible had the impact of eliminating $20,000 or $25,000 claims, would that cause you some reservation as to the level of deductible, if it had an impact on more serious claims?

Mr Baker: I think our basic position is that the system has to be looked at as a package. It's costed as a package and it needs to be examined as a package. We've taken the position that this approximates a fair balance between the various approaches. We've also indicated that we would be prepared to sit down and discuss what a total no-fault package would look like.

Mr Harnick: That's not my question.

Mr Baker: I understand that, but I think it is the answer to the question. The point I'm making is that we have to look at how we are allocating scarce resources between people who are injured in automobile accidents. In our view, while we feel insurance profits will remain excessive under the proposal and there is room to remove the cap, the emphasis should be placed in that area rather than in the area of pain and suffering.

Mr Harnick: In terms of eliminating cases that are not the minor cases your colleague indicated, if the $15,000 deductible had the effect of eliminating those claims that are more serious as opposed to the minor claims, would that cause you some concern? That's what I'm driving at.

Mr Baker: We would like to see the maximum amount flow through the system into the hands of people who are injured in auto accidents. That's where we're coming from. The question is also one of efficiency. As we've said, what has happened in the past is that people with less severe disabilities have tended to be overcompensated because of the transaction cost. A mechanism had to be found to keep those claims out of the court system. Whether the cases in excess of $15,000 would be deterred I think has a lot to do with the way in which lawyers handle negotiations and representation of clients.

It concerns us of course if people are not being fully compensated for their losses. Our view is that the emphasis should be on the no-fault benefits, however, in terms of addressing those losses.

Mr Harnick: One thing you just said that struck me is that you're concerned about people not being compensated for their losses. What is your position in terms of your concern about not being compensated for the losses of a scheme such as Bill 164, which does not compensate victims for their actual economic loss sustained?

Mr Baker: Our position has been that there needs to be consideration given to supplementary types of insurance. We haven't been opposed to looking at ways in which people can purchase additional types of insurance to cover those kinds of losses.

Mr Harnick: That would not be something you're upset with?

The Chair: I'm sorry, Mr Harnick. I've got to go on to Ms Haeck.

Ms Haeck: Actually, I believe Mr Owens had a question. Did you want to raise it at this point or shall I continue?

Mr Owens: Go ahead.

Ms Haeck: Okay. I do appreciate your comments. In my riding the Ontario Head Injury Association has a rehabilitation facility. I've had a chance to tour that. So your comments really are quite timely, I think, with those visits.

You've raised the concern of the immediacy of rehabilitation and basically the need of rehabilitation, and I think there's a recognition, at least by some around this room, that the tort system really doesn't address that or allow for that at all. What is your experience with regard to the importance of immediate access to rehabilitation?

Mr Beatty: Clearly, all of the evidence shows that rehabilitation is more effective the earlier it begins in the process. If someone has been injured and there is a big gap between the time that he's stabilized medically or whatever, when the treatment phase is over, and when rehabilitation begins, the person becomes discouraged. They become less part of the workforce. Ron may want to add to this, but I think there's a consensus that rehabilitation should start at the earliest possible time.

Mr McInnes: Yes, and I think certainly as well as that it's not only going to be more successful beginning at the earliest possible time, but it's probably also going to cost less in the long run.

Ms Haeck: Very good.

The Chair: Mr Owens has got a question here.

Ms Haeck: Oh, he does. Okay.

Mr Owens: I'd like to thank you for your presentation. You've posed some tough questions to the government on the issue of rehabilitation.

As you're aware, we will, should the legislation pass, remove the caps that have been placed on rehabilitation with a task force set up to look at the $3,000-monthly cap on rehabilitation. I'm curious to know. In terms of the kind of role ARCH will play on the task force, what recommendations will you be looking at with respect to psychological rehabilitation and physical rehabilitation of accident victims?

Mr Beatty: I think a lot of those issues are quite difficult, and I think it's important to have the deliberations of the task force. We have felt throughout the auto reform process that there should be this kind of detailed look at the whole area.

Basic objectives for rehabilitation are that it is readily available, as we've already indicated, that the injured person be an active participant in deciding the future of the rehabilitation process and that a whole range of rehabilitation options be available which will meet individual needs. What people need is quite different in, say, the area of education and training that follows the period of medical rehabilitation, and we will want to see that a range of options is available that is appropriate for the individual.

The Chair: Okay, I'd like to thank you for appearing before the committee. The information that you've given to us here is very important.

ADVOCATES' SOCIETY

The Chair: Will the next group, the Advocates' Society, come forward, please. We're on until 3:30. We all have your brief up here. Looking at 21 pages, you can read it all into the record, but there will be no time for the committee members to ask any questions after. You are the witnesses, so it's up to you whether you want to give 30 minutes of speech or give 15 or 20 minutes of an oral presentation and then leave some time for the members of the committee to ask questions. I'd like to welcome you to the committee. You may begin by identifying yourself for the purposes of Hansard, and then you can start into your brief.

Mr John Soule: My name is John Soule. I am the chair of the insurance committee for the Advocates' Society. With me is Duncan Read, the executive director of the society. I appreciate your comments, Mr Chairman, and I do not intend to read all of the papers that we've produced. I will, however, highlight, and I hope to leave about 10 minutes for questioning.

First of all, I'd like to comment that I didn't realize I had such a great future in front of me. Most of the lawyers I speak to don't believe there will be that much litigation out of the legislation that is arising, but I'll leave that aside.

The Advocates' Society is a group of 1,800 Ontario trial lawyers whose practice is primarily restricted to the courts and administrative tribunals. A significant portion of our members practise in the automobile insurance field, both for injured victims and for insurance companies, and because of that experience we feel that we bring to the committee some understanding of what the pragmatic results and the end results of the legislation may well be.

The Advocates' Society wishes to point out that the government campaigned on the automobile insurance issue and promised the electorate that, if elected, it would create a publicly owned insurance scheme and restore the right of all innocent victims to seek compensation through the traditional tort system. The government has not been able to keep its first promise, and in our view the provisions of Bill 164 and the regulations that have been made pursuant to it suggest that the government may not be keeping its second promise.

Although the society is philosophically opposed to the nature of the legislation by reason of the fact that many victims are being asked to forgo their right to potential recovery of full economic loss, particularly their right to recover their actual loss of income or wages, the fact remains that we appreciate that the government has put forth legislation, and we hope that our comments today will be made within the framework of that philosophical point of view.

We hope to cover areas that we feel require correction or amendment in order to provide reasonable coverage and reasonable rights of recovery to those significant and large groups of the population whose compensation we believe to be glaringly inadequate. So in essence, this paper is from a victim's point of view. I propose to first talk briefly about the bill and then the statutory accident benefits that the regulations provide for.

We have three concerns about the bill. The first and most major concern, and the concern upon which I will comment later, is the fact that it does not allow victims to recover their economic losses, and that's both from an income point of view and from a care point of view. I also wish to speak on the $15,000 deductible and the issue of contributory negligence and how that may affect the working of the $15,000 deductible.

I propose referring to an example. I was recently involved in a matter in Milton. It's not an automobile accident but it involved a woman in her mid-30s who had fallen, while walking out of her home, on a concrete step which was wobbly. She fell and put her right hand out to break her fall. She broke her fall but she also broke her wrist. She suffered what is called a Colles' fracture, both bones at the bottom of the wrist. She was casted and off work. The fracture did not heal properly and she had to have a further operation. There were still difficulties with range of movement and some nerve problems in her hand. She is now going to have a third operation and that's scheduled for next week.

The pre-trial judge assessed her general damages at between $15,000 and $20,000. Now, by reason of the operation of the deductible that the government proposes, which is a $15,000 deductible, her recovery at most, on the judge's figures, would be $5,000. If I was advising her from a plaintiff's point of view, I would tell her that she should not risk going to court because of the probable level of recovery, weighing that against not only the cost of her own lawyer, but the risk of having to pay the defence lawyer something as well should she not get over a certain level.

The second aspect that relates to the $15,000 deductible that we feel requires comment relates to the issue of contributory negligence. Mr Charlton briefly referred to that in his remarks this afternoon, but I don't believe the impact of this particular section has been brought home to either the public or those actually working in the industry.

The rules that have been proposed as to how contributory negligence is to be dealt with suggest that in an automobile accident situation, the owner's liability or responsibility must be determined first. If we're dealing with a 50-50 situation, then if the driver of the car or the owner of the offending car is only 50% responsible, it's only at that stage that the deductible kicks in.

If, in the example of the woman that I have used, she even received an assessment of $30,000, she was found 50% at fault for not fixing her step even if her landlord did not, she would only be allowed the first $15,000—that's after contributory negligence is taken into account—and then the deductible is taken off. So if she has a $30,000 injury, she gets nothing if she's 50% at fault. In our opinion, this will have significant effects upon people with injuries of even greater monetary worth and greater severity.

It is the position of the Advocates' Society that the $15,000 deductible is too high. Persons with significant injuries, including fractures and nerve damage, are restricted from seeking recovery because of the financial risks involved. It is the position of the society that the deductible should be halved.

In addition, we feel strongly that if there is to be a deductible, it should be applied before a court considers the issue of contributory negligence. In the 50-50 situation, people will likely receive advice from a lawyer to the effect that they should not take the chance of proceeding to court unless it is clear that their injuries are worth in excess of at least $50,000, and more likely $75,000. None of you would like to suffer from the nature of the injuries necessary to achieve such an assessment.

I wish now to deal with certain of the provisions of the statutory accident benefits schedule which deal with specific categories of people and their ability to recover their economic loss through this system. As I've indicated, it's the only recourse people have for recovery of economic loss.

We believe that the regulations, as presently drawn, contain large cracks through which significant and important groups of the population will fall. These include, and they aren't limited to, children and students, the self-employed, surviving members of a family where the major breadwinner has been killed and those requiring round-the-clock care because of catastrophic injuries.

I'd like to deal first, briefly, with children and students and the effect the legislation has on them. There are two types of benefits that are available to a student. The first is a weekly benefit of $185 per week and the second is an annual lump sum benefit of anywhere from $2,000 to $8,000 per year if the student misses a year of school.

Until I read the regulations, I was under the impression initially that the $185 a week was available to any student. In fact it's clear it's not. It's not available to anyone under 16 years of age. The only benefit they receive under this regulation is an allowance of $2,000 per year if they're in elementary school or $4,000 per year if they're in high school. After they reach 16 years of age, they then become entitled to the $185 per week.

Unfortunately, that only runs for a maximum for two years, regardless of how long the person would have been in school. At the two-year point, or at 18 years of age or two years after the accident, if the person is still severely injured and unable to continue with schooling or work, he or she is entitled to receive loss-of-earning capacity benefits, which I'll go into later. They also, in addition to that two years of $185, get a lump sum payment, but only one. So if a person was in grade 12 and intended to go through a four-year degree and could not complete any of that, that person only gets one $4,000 lump sum payment.

For students who are catastrophically injured—not even catastrophically injured, but those with significant injuries that prevent them from continuing with their education and from entering the workforce, the society believes that the level of benefits that are being made available under this particular regulation is totally inadequate. If a student is injured in a car accident to such an extent that he or she is unable to complete his or her education and unable to obtain employment because of the injuries sustained in this accident, then he or she is entitled to receive anywhere from 55% to 90% of the average net income of an industrial worker in Ontario.

In June 1992 the average gross weekly income was $578. After standard deductions, the net income is $431, and by reason of the sliding scale the government has put in place in the regulations, if that student can't continue with his employment and if the accident happened when he was 16 or 18 years of age, he or she receives the grand sum of $237 per week to age 65, and then it reduces after that.

Mr Harnick: That's right.

Mr Soule: If they're 30 years of age when the accident happens and it prevents them from working—I'm sorry, Mr. Endicott; I disagree with you—they get $388 a week. If, for example, it's a university student who attempts to enter into the job market at 24 to 26 years of age and is married, he gets $325 a week if he can't continue to work.

Another group that we feel will suffer significantly is the self-employed and small business persons. These people, in our opinion, form a strong backbone of our population and they create many jobs. The government describes its legislation as

The Road Ahead. In the case of the self-employed and small business persons, it is anything but.

What the regulation does is it looks to the historical past in gauging what a self-employed person or a small business person is entitled to receive. It refuses to look to the future. In other words, regardless of whether I can show you that I am going to go out and my business will improve over the next two or three years or if I am just entering into the commencement of a professional practice, in the self-employed person's case there's no provision in the legislation to look to the future. There's no provision for productivity to permit the benefit level to reflect what this person's future would be. It is simply pegged to what the person was earning at the time of the accident or before the accident. It doesn't take into account artificially low incomes by reason of putting capital back into work or such things as a recession.

The third example I wish to deal with briefly is the fatality, and essentially the regulation provides that the minimum recovery for a fatality is $50,000 for the surviving spouse and $10,000 for each dependant. The maximum benefit is $200,000.

If we take an example and assume a 35-year-old married father of two children under 10 years of age is killed in an automobile accident, and assume that he earned $45,000 per year, then his gross weekly income is $865, or $625 a week net, assuming standard deductions. Under the government's proposed treatment of fatalities, the unemployed wife and the surviving children would receive a total of $117,000.

If the spouse had not been working and is now forced to enter the workforce, the interest earned on the lump sum payment would not even cover the cost of child care. If the family owned its own home and, like most of us, had a mortgage, then the spouse might choose to pay off the mortgage. She would still have to seek employment, find day care assistance and attempt to maintain the house. It is not unrealistic to think that the house will eventually be lost, that reasonably remunerable employment might not be found and that this family will end up on welfare.

Mr Harnick: The Endicott solution. Great. You ought to be ashamed.

Mr Soule: Now what has happened, what the government does in its formula—

Mr Harnick: It would never have happened—

The Chair: Mr Harnick, I know when some of us get a little bit older we talk out loud after a while. I just want to remind you that I can hear you. Would you carry on, please?

Mr Soule: Thank you.

Mr Harnick: The intention was that you would hear me.

Mr Soule: What the government has done is used a formula of net income times 187.2 weeks. In other words, what the government is doing is suggesting that the value of the worker's death to his family is three-and-a-half years of that person's net weekly income. Support awards made under the Family Law Act following marriage breakup almost always contemplate periods of support well beyond this. We fail to see why the government now feels that separation by death should be treated differently.

Under the OMPP and the previous tort system, that family likely would have recovered in excess of $700,000 on account of its economic loss to get it through, and that door is now being shut.

I don't propose to comment on care costs, as ARCH has commented upon the inadequacy of the $3,000 per month ceiling on attendant care. Two very recent medical malpractice cases found that the in-home care required for two infants was $11,600 per month for one and the other $6,700 per month. As ARCH has indicated, the level proposed by the government is low.

Accordingly, we, the Advocates' Society, suggest that the government must look to those inadequacies and correct them either in the legislation or in the regulations. If they don't want to, we are suggesting that there should be optional coverage that the industry must provide to cover the income, and I'm not speaking of care costs here, I'm speaking only of income: wages, productivity, salaries.

We're suggesting that there be some type of income protection endorsement made available by the insurers to all drivers in Ontario. As I say, that would cover the situation of students, it would cover the situation of fatalities and it would also cover the cost of people who receive, in income or wages, more than $52,000 a year.

We don't believe the coverage will be excessively expensive in that there is presently an SEF 44 available that most drivers have. It's called the family protection endorsement, and it covers the various losses that I've just been talking about if the offending party has inadequate liability insurance. We're suggesting that a similar product be made available, and if the government wishes, it may make a second endorsement available with regard to medical, rehab and care costs.

The income protection endorsement would cover net income losses over and above a maximum weekly benefit. It would be available to all drivers, but we propose that only those not at fault have access to it, on a 100% basis if there is no contributory negligence, and on a reduced basis to reflect contributory negligence if a victim is only contributorily negligent.

I have heard Mr Charlton argue in the past that there is insurance coverage available to cover these types of losses. With respect, I must disagree. He is referring, in my belief, to disability insurance. This is the most expensive form of insurance that is available on the market. It doesn't provide full income replacement, even if you can afford to purchase it. Generally, it will only permit someone to purchase coverage to the extent of 65% to 70% of his income.

One must have an income to be able to purchase it. The product is not available to students, as they do not have any income. The industry will not sell insurance of this type for future speculative losses that a student or a businessperson might suffer. It offers no protection in the fatality example. It is dependent on a number of factors, including age, health, occupation, benefit level and the waiting period.

I phoned an acquaintance of mine in the insurance industry on Friday and asked him to quote me the cost of disability insurance for an early-40s, non-smoking executive who wished to protect $150,000 worth of income. Of the two leading national companies that sold the product, one would provide coverage to the extent of $5,600 a month, and the other to $5,300 a month. The maximum coverage that executive could purchase would be $67,200 a year. With a 31-day waiting period, which is 3.5 weeks longer than that proposed in this particular legislation, the cost per $100 per month of that coverage is $78.24. For that person to attempt to protect his income costs $4,381 for a premium.

In addition, by purchasing that, the statutory accident benefits available to him are worthless, because the government has directed that you must seek recourse from all other insurance before you have recourse to the accident benefits under your automobile policy.

If the government wishes to truly refer to Bill 164 as The Road Ahead, and if the government wishes to keep its promise to the electorate to restore the right to sue and tort for traditional losses, then it must either amend the act and the regulations as suggested or, alternatively, provide optional coverage to the motorist in the form of an income protection endorsement. If the government fails to do so, then it removes the right of innocent victims to full recovery of wages and salary.

It also takes away a further and much more disconcerting right in our society. It actually prohibits innocent victims from attempting to protect themselves from economic loss over and above a level the government deems appropriate. This government is effectively saying that no one in this province is entitled to make more than $1,000 per week net, and that in the case of students and small business persons in particular, no one can hope for a brighter future, a more productive future from employment, than they had at the time of the accident which disabled them.

The Chair: Are we ready for questions?

Ms Haeck: I believe Mr Owens will have some useful comments on this, and I'll defer my questions till later.

Mr Owens: The issue with respect to the education benefit, I think, has not been stated as clearly as we have set out in the regulation. I'd like Mr Endicott to correct some of the perceptions that may have been left.

Mr Soule: You see, Mr Owens, lawyers are here because there are different interpretations of legislation. The government has one interpretation of its legislation. I've only made comments as to what I think a lawyer might interpret the legislation as. I don't know if it's—

Mr Harnick: Or a court or a judge.

Mr Endicott: First of all, I'm here to clarify the policy intent of what was there, and there may be disputes about what the regulation is, although I should add that regulations are drafted with the assistance of legislative council. In that respect, the intent of the regulation is to have the ramp increase with age so that everybody who has a disability will actually see an increased amount of the average industrial wage. Anybody, by the time he is 30 years old, will get 90% and will not be pegged at the amount at the date of his accident.

Mr Harnick: That's 90% of the average industrial wage?

The Chair: I'm sorry.

Mr Harnick: If you're going to let him answer, let him clarify it.

Mr Endicott: Weekly wage.

Mr Harnick: Ninety per cent of the average industrial weekly wage?

Mr Endicott: Weekly wage; there's no "industrial" in it. That was my mistake.

Mr Harnick: What is the average weekly wage, then? What are you pegging it against? The average weekly wage of everybody in society?

Mr Endicott: In the province.

Mr Harnick: I didn't know that statistic was published. How are you going to find that out?

Mr Endicott: It's Statistics Canada.

Mr Harnick: What is the average weekly wage right now?

Mr Soule: In June 1992, it's $578 per week gross.

Mr Harnick: The net of that is $460, and you're going to say that everybody gets 90% of $460?

Mr Soule: No, $416.

Mr Harnick: That's about $360 a week, and you're going to justify your position by saying that somebody who will never work again and is a student can live on $360 a week? You're going to stand here and justify that in front of this committee? You should be positively ashamed.

Mr Endicott: No, I think you're under a misapprehension, Mr Harnick. I'm not here to justify anything. I'm here to explain what is in the bill and what the intent is.

Mr Harnick: Is that what's in the bill?

Mr Endicott: It is 90% of average weekly wage and it is indexed as well. I would point that out.

Mr Harnick: So it's $360 a week indexed.

Mr Endicott: No, it isn't $360.

Mr Harnick: Well, if the average weekly—we'd better sort this out right now. You're the guy who wrote this stuff. I would think you'd know the answers.

The Chair: Mr Harnick, he's not on trial here. He's just giving you facts.

Mr Mancini: The legislation is on trial.

Mr Harnick: He wrote the legislation.

Mr Tilson: You people should be embarrassed.

The Chair: Okay, let him answer.

Mr Endicott: The information we have is that 90% net of the average weekly wage would pay $391 a week.

Mr Harnick: I'm sorry; pardon me. That person, then, that student will be relegated to an income for the rest of his life of less than $20,000, indexed.

Mr Endicott: Remember, it's non-taxable as well.

Mr Harnick: Okay, but it's $20,000. Assuming that it's non-taxable, it's probably the equivalent of a taxable income of about $26,000 for the rest of their life. Am I right about that?

Mr Endicott: I don't believe it's $26,000.

Mr Harnick: It's the equivalent of $26,000 because you don't pay tax until you get—

Mr Endicott: It's a little over $30,000.

Mr Harnick: A little over $30,000, so that student—I think you're wrong, by the way, because $17,000 is the minimum tax rate, which is virtually nil. But the fact of the matter is that you're saying a student is going to make $20,000 net for the rest of his life. That's what you're—

Mr Endicott: No, I'm not saying that. The benefit is indexed.

Mr Harnick: I'm sorry; indexed at whatever inflation is. Let's assume there's no inflation. That student, who's injured for ever, is going to make $20,000.

The Chair: Wait a minute, Mr Harnick.

Mr Harnick: It's very important, sir, that we clarify this.

The Chair: Mr Kwinter is on here until 3:30. He has an opportunity. He can carry on where you left off or he can give you his time.

Mr Harnick: You should be ashamed if you wrote that piece of legislation, let me tell you: $20,000 for a student for the rest of your life.

Mr Kwinter: Do I still only have a minute?

The Chair: No, you've got until 3:30; you've got a couple of minutes there.

Mr Kwinter: I've been sitting here since this morning and I get the feeling that somehow or other the wrong problem is being addressed. If you'll go back to the mid-1980s, to 1985 or 1986, when this insurance problem came upon us, the major problem we had was that the courts were reinterpreting what was liability, and the actuaries couldn't deal with it because the insurance companies thought their liability was limited to certain things and the courts were reinterpreting that.

As a result, they wouldn't write liability insurance, there wasn't availability, people weren't doing anything and the rates went sky-high. It was that which brought on this crisis in insurance. Up until that point, everybody was relatively happy. The problem was that suddenly insurance wasn't available, and if it was, the cost was prohibitive.

What has happened is that the political decision was, "We've got to come up with a plan that will make insurance affordable, whatever that number happens to be." That's all we're dealing with here. In order to do that, everybody had to compromise and come up with what they felt was the least expensive for the most acceptable coverage, and everybody had to give up something. That was the number that came up.

Now we have a situation where under Bill 164, depending on what actuarial consultant you believe in, it will either go up 4.4% or 20%. But in the presentation by the Advocates' Society, I read through the whole thing that really your major thrust is that there isn't enough compensation for various segments of the society that are going to be affected by an accident. I admit that and we agree with that, but there has to be a realization that this is all a factor of premium costs. There is no such thing as a free lunch. Money isn't going to come out of the air. Whatever increases you give have to be recovered through increased premiums. What is the reaction of the Advocates' Society about that particular problem, which is the major problem that we're dealing with?

Mr Soule: That is the reason we're suggesting the optional income protection endorsement. It costs the government nothing; no one has to buy it. The legislation can stay as it is or you can go back to the OMPP and have it as the Liberals wanted it, but the fact remains that no one would be forced to purchase anything he did not want to. They are only being given the opportunity to protect themselves and their families from real economic losses that may come about as a result of an accident.

I'm here primarily from the victim's point of view, Mr Kwinter, because I feel that the legislation has shortcomings in that fashion, but in so far as the cost factor is concerned, and we agree it's a legitimate concern, we believe that the way around it is to offer optional coverage to motorists, which is provided by the insurers to avoid any further increases, be it 4% or 20%, on that particular issue.

The Chair: Okay, gentlemen, I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee. Your information has added quite a bit to this process.

Mr Duncan Read: Thank you, Mr Chairman. May I just ask one quick procedural question? Do I understand correctly that we would have up until the time you start clause-by-clause to submit more complete written documents?

The Chair: You have until February 11.

CONSUMERS' ASSOCIATION OF CANADA (ONTARIO)

The Chair: The next group is the Consumers' Association of Canada (Ontario). I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. We have until 4 o'clock. If you can leave some time, as you can see, all the members of the committee are desperate to ask questions. Mr Harnick took a little bit more time last time with the questions he had taken—

Mr Harnick: No, no.

The Chair: Yes, it was.

Mr Harnick: Point of order, please.

The Chair: Yes?

Mr Harnick: When Mr Endicott is going to clarify something, I think, as a member of this committee, I have the right to make sure I understand what he's clarifying. That's all I did, and with due respect, I think we should take all the time we need so that we understand this legislation.

The Chair: It depends on the time. After 6 o'clock if you want to come back and ask Mr Endicott—

Mr Harnick: I'd be delighted to sit here around the clock.

The Chair: Okay, I'm carrying on with these people. You're cutting into their time.

Mr Tilson: On that point of order, Mr Chairman: On at least two occasions—it appears it's going to be a pattern that's going to be set—the government members of this committee are referring their comments to Mr Endicott. The difficulty I have, and it gets back to the point that I left this morning, is that we're not appearing to have an opportunity to question Mr Endicott, who was here this morning, on matters of administration and how the process works, yet you're denying us that opportunity as he speaks. It creates a great deal of difficulty.

It's one thing questioning Mr Owens or yelling at Mr Owens, but Mr Endicott is putting forth how the process is working. We, as members of this committee, must be given an opportunity to question Mr Endicott as to how that process is going to work.

The Chair: Can we take that up at the subcommittee meeting?

I'd like to welcome you again to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. I believe there was some mixup with your other two associations in Windsor and Ottawa phoning the clerk. Maybe you can just tell us a little bit about that. There are two other groups that didn't get on the list because of the confusion with the other two branches.

Mr Chris Ballard: Very briefly, what happened was just through some miscommunication between the Toronto office and our locals in Windsor and Ottawa. They had requested that they be allowed to speak before this committee when it visits those two cities and they missed the deadline. That's basically what's happened.

The Chair: Okay, fine. I just wanted to make sure that I had it straight too, as the Chair.

If you don't mind identifying yourselves for the purposes of Hansard, you may begin. We're on till 4 o'clock.

Mrs Audrey Verge: Mr Chairman and committee members, on behalf of the consumers' association of Ontario, I am Audrey Verge, and I have with me today Mrs Helen Anderson, former chair of the insurance committee, and Mr Chris Ballard, executive director. Both of these persons have made a major contribution to this submission.

The Consumers' Association of Canada (Ontario) is an independent, non-profit, voluntary organization that represents and informs consumers and advocates action on their behalf to improve the quality of life. It is the largest organized consumer group in Canada. The Ontario branch of CAC has over 40,000 members. Consumer advocacy, consumer representation and consumer education have been major activities of CAC and of its local association throughout its 45-year history.

CAC (Ontario) has been involved in the issue of automobile insurance reform for some time. As an interested group we appreciate the opportunity, before this legislation is passed, to comment on the draft regulations under the Insurance Act statutory accident benefits schedule respecting Bill 164. For the record, we wish the committee to note that this volunteer organization has had only four working days since receiving the most recent draft regulations in which to prepare this submission. For the most part, we will limit our input to comments on the statutory accident benefits schedule, because we believe this area to be of great importance to consumers.

In general, CAC (Ontario) approves the proposed regulations, especially those pertaining to the indexing of benefits. Not to index benefits has been a grave error in the past. We approve of setting maximums or limits to various benefits, since to award higher amounts, especially in higher-income replacements to higher-income persons, would weigh more heavily on all premium payers, especially those with lower incomes.

CAC (Ontario) concurs with the government on the proposal to provide better rehabilitation benefits. The sooner injured persons commence proper therapy and rehabilitation, the sooner they will be returned to society and be able to resume their former occupations. Everyone benefits: injured persons, their families, insurance companies, government and all premium payers.

We welcome the provisions of no monetary limits on reasonable medical expenses or reasonable rehabilitation expenses. Seriously injured persons must be supported and aided until either they recover from their injuries or are returned as far as possible to their former condition.

Affordability is one of the prime concerns of CAC (Ontario). We are cognizant, of course, of the needs of the injured persons and believe that they must be cared for and helped back to health as soon as possible. However, approximately 80% of all Ontario drivers at any one time are considered accident-free. In other words, they have not had an at-fault accident during the previous five or six years.

Those drivers, as insurance consumers, are anxious to keep premium levels as low as possible. Many drivers have not had an accident for 10 or 20 years, or even for their entire driving career. It is necessary to try to keep premiums as affordable as possible, while maintaining adequate benefits for those unfortunate ones who suffer injury on the road.

We wish to make one very strong recommendation: that as much documentation as possible be written in plain and clear language to make it user-friendly.

On to the specific sections. Part II, income replacement benefits, the responsibility to seek employment in disputes: Under this section, where a person received a notice from the insurer that the amount of weekly benefit is to be reduced and the person disputes the reduction, the insurer shall continue to pay the full amount of benefit until the dispute is resolved.

We recommend that before proceeding to the formal mediation-arbitration procedure, an informal procedure be established to deal with the concerns of the parties.

Part II, income replacement benefits, amount of benefit: "The weekly amount paid to a person under this part shall not exceed $1,000." Under the present Ontario motorist protection plan, a person wishing to provide income replacement higher than $600 weekly is entitled to buy extra layers of income replacement to a weekly maximum of $1,050. CAC (Ontario) believes the $600 limit plus the privilege of buying further protection should be left in place. We do not believe it is fair to ask lower-income wage earners to pay increased premiums to support high income earners.

Part II, income replacement benefits for care givers: This section appears to have answered the concerns of CAC (Ontario) by phasing out the benefits for injured care givers over the age of 65 rather than abruptly discontinuing them.

Part III, education disability benefits, lump sum benefits: Subsection 15(3) states, "If the accident occurred before the person attained the age of sixteen years, only one lump sum education disability benefit is payable under this section after the person attains the age of sixteen years." Yet the amount of the education disability benefit under clauses 15(1)(a), (b) and (c) is $2,000 for each year of elementary education that the person is unable to attend or successfully complete as a result of the accident, $4,000 for each year of secondary education and $4,000 for each semester of post-secondary education to a maximum of $8,000 in any one year. This regulation has some ambiguity, and we recommend that the wording be reviewed.

Subsection 15(2) states, "A person who was sixteen years of age or more at the time of the accident, is entitled to lump sum education disability benefits of not more than (a) one year...(b) one year...(c) one year."

This appears totally unfair. The weekly benefit will of course provide for a minimum standard of living while a student is disabled but in no way will provide compensation for the years of lost income he would have received had graduation taken place on schedule. CAC (Ontario) recommends that this limitation be re-examined.

Temporary return to education: This is a provision that will be of great benefit to injured persons.

Part IV, care giver benefits, entitlement to benefits: This section states, "No weekly care giver benefit is payable to a person under this section for the first week of disability." CAC (Ontario) finds this unacceptable. When a care giver is unable to care for a child or incapacitated adult, care for these people must be replaced immediately, not one week later.

As Mr Justice Coulter Osborne insisted in his report: "This benefit will acknowledge the need for immediate compensation for those responsible for children. When a person having responsibility for child care in particular is injured, the system must respond quickly. For this benefit there should be no waiting period."

CAC (Ontario) has stressed this in previous submissions and continues to see it as vitally important.

Part V, other disability benefits: CAC (Ontario) has made reference earlier in this submission to the first week of disability and would reiterate the same concerns with respect to this section.

Part VII, supplementary medical benefits and rehabilitation benefits: We note transportation to and from treatment sessions is to be provided for, including transportation for an aide or attendant. This is a good provision.

We presume that the expense for an attendant's transportation would only be reimbursed if a proper receipt is submitted. In the case of a friend, neighbour or family member driving the injured person to and from the sessions and perhaps staying with them during the treatment, a receipt such as that given by a taxi driver or an ambulance driver would not be available.

Regulations must be designed in such a way that these volunteer drivers can be reimbursed for their out-of-pocket expenses in a manner that does not invite abuse. This could result in two things: better public relations and, most likely, decreased transportation costs as well as paperwork.

On to part X, the death benefits: We note that these have been raised to the levels CAC (Ontario) approved at hearings on no-fault insurance held by the Ontario Automobile Insurance Board. CAC (Ontario) supports this.

Part XII, compensation for other pecuniary losses, house-keeping and home maintenance expenses and expenses of visitors: CAC (Ontario) feels that this is too open-ended and will be subject to abuse.

Part XIV, election of benefits: This is a good provision that spells out, "If a person does not elect which benefit he or she wishes to receive...the person shall be deemed to have elected the highest weekly benefit." This provision will be of great assistance to consumers and should foster a positive response.

Part XVI, collateral benefits: This section in effect makes the auto insurer the payer of excess insurance, while a claimant's individual accident and disability insurance becomes primary. It continues the same inequities that have existed under previous regulations.

As stated in previous submissions, CAC (Ontario) believes that automobile insurance policies should be made primary payers. If a consumer has taken the precaution and gone to the expense of providing for replacement of their own income, or whose employer has provided for income continuation or sick leave, perhaps in lieu of a higher wage, the insurance consumer should be entitled to receive the same benefits from their automobile insurance policy as any other person.

Part XVII, indexation, the weekly benefits: We recommend that benefits now set at $185 weekly be indexed in relation to the yearly cost-of-living index to avoid this amount becoming outdated and unrealistic. We believe this is particularly important for persons over 65 receiving their retirement benefit because they have few opportunities to increase their income.

This concludes our remarks on the draft regulations. We would just like to comment briefly on the right to sue for non-pecuniary damages, as outlined in subsections 267(1) and (2).

It has been the official position of CAC (Ontario) to support no-fault, government-run insurance which precludes an individual's right to sue for non-pecuniary damages. As of this date that position has not changed.

On behalf of CAC (Ontario) we thank this committee for allowing us to make this submission.

The Chair: Mr Mancini, three minutes.

Mr Mancini: I want to thank the Consumers' Association of Canada, Ontario branch, for its very thoughtful presentation this afternoon. I believe you made a couple of points I've been trying to make over the course of the debate regarding this particular legislation, Bill 164, which I consider to be regressive.

You stated in your brief on page 2, "It is necessary to try to keep premiums as affordable as possible, while maintaining adequate benefits for those unfortunate ones who suffer injury on the road." I think and I believe that sentence in itself explains what insurance should and ought to be: as much benefits as possible for the buying public at an affordable price.

I think you might agree with me if I said consumers today have maxed out on affordability as far as insurance is concerned and I would hope you would agree with me when I will say that any unnecessary increase in premium is going to have an adverse affect on families, on individuals and on the economy generally.

I was wondering if you were aware that the increase that the government has already acknowledged will take place because of this bill, using its own statistics, the Mercer statistics—those statistics tell us that globally a 4.5% increase in rates turns out to be $185 million, if I'm not mistaken, taken right out of the pocketbooks of Ontario families and individuals. That is more money than all of the hospitals got last year.

I was wondering if you thought, since you represent consumers, if you believe—using the government's statistics, not the others, which indicate it could be $568 million—that the exchange is in fact fair and balanced. Do you think Bill 164 is worth the $185 million that will be extracted from the consumers?

Mrs Helen Anderson: It's pretty hard for us to say yes or no to that because we don't have the research capability to look at the figures or estimate what the insurance companies are going to make, but we agree with you that affordability is one of the main purposes of any legislation for insurance for consumers.

When they mentioned that 80% of the people on the roads have no accidents, and a lot of them have never had an accident, like my husband in 50 years of driving, it comes hard every year to shell out more and more and more for presumably no benefit. Mind you, we're glad that we don't have to take one of those benefits, but it still comes hard to pay an increase. That's why we recommended in here two things.

We recommended going back to the $600-a-week income protection, with the option of buying from an insurance company extra layers. The reason we say extra layers rather than buying disability income is because the disability, as someone also noted, as well as we do, is taken first, so that your own disability insurance would be first payer and then the auto insurance would be second payer or excess payer. So we recommend that you can buy, as the OMPP policy did provide for; people could buy extras over the $50,000 if they wanted to.

The Chair: Mr Mancini's got a 10-second question here. This'll be a first.

Mr Mancini: Was your organization consulted by the government prior to the introduction of Bill 164?

Mrs Anderson: I'm sorry. "Insulted"?

Mr Mancini: Was your organization consulted by the government before it introduced Bill 164?

Mrs Anderson: I don't believe so.

The Chair: Mr Tilson.

Mr Tilson: Different groups seem to be advocating the acquisition of extra insurance. I guess it can be said that not all of us can afford to purchase add-on insurance and that we look at the principle of innocent accident victims who are driving along, minding their own business, and all of a sudden they get into these terrible situations.

OMPP took a lot of their rights away. The rates did not go down; they stayed the same, although some insurance companies are saying they're going down slightly. Now we have an even worse system that's coming along in which the insurance companies are guaranteeing rates are going up because of these increased benefits. I guess it's fine to say that it would be nice to buy added insurance but, really, can we all afford that?

Mrs Anderson: May I comment on that? A person getting $1,000 a week out of this plan would have to have an income, we've estimated, of roughly $90,000 in order to have a net income of $50,000. Persons between, say, $50,000 and $90,000 I don't consider poor. I think they're quite able to buy extra amounts and I don't believe that it would be very costly. I think the insurance companies would be able to figure that out and it wouldn't be a lot of money. I'm afraid I can't agree with you on that one.

Mr Tilson: I guess the difficulty is, of course, that's assuming that no one is going to improve himself, that a young person or a person who's changing jobs is not going to change his income, that he's going to stay at the same level for the rest of his life. I think we could debate that issue, and you're the first of the groups that are talking about that, and I anxiously look forward to hearing more thoughts on it, because I have reservations.

Mrs Anderson: Can I just mention that the average weekly wage—I don't know what that equates to in an annual income, but Statistics Canada did say that the average annual net income in 1991, I believe, was around $27,000. If that's average, that means there's an awful lot of people earning a lot less than that, and we'd hate to see them having to pay premiums to support people who are earning from $50,000 to $90,000 a year.

The Chair: I've got to go on to Mr Owens.

Mr Owens: I just very quickly want to gently correct the record. Mr Mancini asked the presenters whether the consumers' association was consulted during the preparation of the bill, and according to our records the consumers' association was consulted.

Mrs Anderson: I'm sorry. I thought Mr Mancini said "insulted."

Mr Mancini: You know something? I could believe both.

Mr Owens: We also appreciate the fact that you're not insulted as well.

Mrs Anderson: Mr Chairman, may I correct the record then? We were definitely consulted.

Mr Ward: You weren't insulted?

Mrs Anderson: We were not insulted, not at all.

The Chair: Okay, fine. Mr Klopp.

Mr Mancini: Do you think you were insulted now?

Mrs Anderson: No, not yet.

The Chair: Mr Klopp, did you lose your voice?

Mr Klopp: Yes, sort of. Thank you for being here today. Your opening comments struck me too, trying to get a balance between premiums, and you mentioned even yourself personally that you're lucky you haven't been in an accident for a number of years and, knock on wood, I hope you won't be.

One of the things I guess that I as a younger person with a family—it seems I'm taxed and insured to death. If I wouldn't have any insurance premiums, I'd probably have a lot of money, but at the same time tomorrow morning I might run into something.

Under the numbers that I've been told in our own government study—and we had a consultant who consulted with the insurance companies, plus advocates and groups that wanted their cake, and the insurance company wants its cake too, and then associations like yourself that try to make a balance also, and I think we did a fair align.

We increased some things but some things had to give, and we've even said that premiums could go up somewhere in the neighbourhood of 4.5%, although we're increasing benefits a lot more in a lot of areas. In fact, the number that I was told we're comparing—and this is my question—was 4.5%, and we'll assume that, but on the whole we're getting about a 13% increase in total benefits. My question to you is, is that a reasonable fairness in your mind, to pay a 4.5% increase in premium maybe and get the 13% increase in benefits?

Mrs Anderson: I think so, yes.

The Chair: You made a statement then, Mr Klopp.

Mr Klopp: I asked the question, did she think it was fair? She said yes.

The Chair: Oh, I didn't hear it. Did you nod?

Mrs Anderson: I did say I thought that probably—

The Chair: Okay, fine. I didn't hear it.

Mrs Anderson: I don't think anyone here would object to paying injured people what they need. We'd all say: "Thank you very much. There but for the grace of God go I." I would like not to have to be in that position and I would be willing to pay 4.5% more if it would help that person out. I don't think everybody, though, would be willing to pay enormous sums every year.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee with your advice.

This committee will recess until 4:30. The subcommittee members will meet in the clerk's office for a subcommittee meeting. Also, the members will notice that the Ontario Medical Association, which was to appear today, cancelled out but has a written brief that has been handed out to all the members.

Mr Mancini: We'll be convening at 4:30?

The Chair: At 4:30 we'll reconvene here.

Mr Mancini: For whom?

The Chair: We've got the Board of Trade of Metropolitan Toronto on at 4:30.

The committee recessed at 1602 and resumed at 1629.

The Chair: We've just finished our subcommittee meeting. We've come to an agreement that we'll be in the Amethyst Room, 151, on Wednesday and Thursday and we'll be going by the schedule. There have been some different slots filled. Some presenters have cancelled, so we've filled all the slots and there'll be a new list from the clerk tomorrow. The day we're going to be hearing for the day we missed will be on February 9 here in Toronto, plus there were a few more slots that were filled in by the subcommittee. I think that's everything, so all business has been looked after.

I know Mr Mancini just can't wait to drive up here on Sunday night to hop a plane for Thunder Bay. He better have running shoes on between planes, because we just fly in for one hour and back out again, and you should get a good night's sleep before we get into committee. I guess on Thursday night, you should get well rested because we'll be here until 10 o'clock in the Amethyst Room. So if people have schedules back home, maybe they better cancel.

Mr Tilson: Mr Chairman, on a point of order: I've noticed that Mr Kormos's name has appeared at this committee. He's not a member of this committee.

Ms Haeck: He appeared.

Mr Tilson: I also know he's sitting as Chair of the committee considering OTAB, but he seems to drop into this committee periodically. I guess I'm just looking at the rules of this committee. As I understand the rules, any member of the House can appear at a committee and if recognized by the Chair, can speak. I have a little trouble with the impression that Mr Kormos has joined the Progressive Conservative Party. I can assure you he hasn't.

The Chair: Maybe I can make some clarification here. If you remember the last night of the House sitting, I was very insistent that I ask a question which I'd been waiting four weeks to ask. I went over and asked Mr Bradley if I could sit in his chair and ask a question from the Liberal side. Mr Elston said, "Sure, it's all right with me, being the House leader," and Mr Bradley stepped out of his seat. I sat in his seat and when it came time for the Liberals to ask a question, I stood up. At that time, the Speaker was a little bit flabbergasted as to what I was doing on that side, but the thing was that I wasn't in my seat and I don't belong to the Liberal Party. The Speaker did not recognize me. This would be the same thing. Whether Peter Kormos has his name down there really doesn't mean a damn thing.

Mr Tilson: I don't want to start recognizing how this place works. It probably would be best that I don't. I will say, though, that I have a problem with the impression that Mr Kormos is sitting next to the Progressive Conservative caucus. He's a member of the New Democratic Party. The government party is on that side and that is where he should sit. Mr Chairman, I have no problem with him addressing this committee or speaking to this committee as a member of the government and the New Democratic Party, if so recognized by you. I do have a problem with him being identified with the Progressive Conservative caucus.

The Chair: Mr Harnick, would you turn it over? Mr Kormos isn't here. I'll have to tell him where to shove his name, maybe shove it to the other side. Just flip it over right now.

I think it's important also, because if he is sitting, he should be sitting on the other side. He's welcome to sit on the other side. These are the normal procedures that go on here in committee. Maybe the clerk can do an explanation—he had the book here with all the rules and regulations and he had a little tab on it for me—that Mr Kormos, being recognized by the Chair, can sit on the government side.

If I can get to Mr Kormos to ask a question, I will. The thing is that I haven't even got to half the committee members who are sitting here. As you know, with the length of time we wind up getting for questions, we're lucky if we get one question. Someone who is not a member of the committee I don't think should be above the committee members, but if there is enough time, I will recognize Mr Kormos and let him ask a question.

Mr Harnick: With respect, Mr Chair, I think you would be advised to read what the standing orders say. It's my understanding that the standing orders say any member of the Legislature is considered a member of the committee and is able to participate in the committee except to the extent that he can vote on any matter. Quite frankly, I'm concerned that you're going to try to set a precedent here that could be detrimental for many members.

The Chair: I'm reading standing order 126. What we'll do is run over a little past five, since we're eating a little bit of time here. It says, "Any member of the House who is not a member of a standing or select committee may, unless the House or the committee concerned otherwise orders, take part in the public proceedings of the committee, but may not vote or move any motion nor be part of any quorum." I think we all understand that quite clearly.

The other part of Mr Kormos sitting is that the Conservative Party give him its time. I would like to wind up getting a ruling from the Speaker on that, if you don't mind.

Mr Tilson: Wait a minute. I don't even want Mr Kormos sitting with the Progressive Conservatives, let alone having our time. If he's going to have time on this committee, he has the time of the government; he doesn't have the time of the Progressive Conservative Party.

The Chair: I just wanted to find that out.

Mr Tilson: Well, it's been clarified.

The Chair: Okay, fine.

Mr Harnick: Mr Chair, on a point of order as well: He is a member of your caucus. I would think that if he's sitting here, you would afford him the opportunities that any other member here should have, unless there's some particular reason you don't like what he's saying and unless there's some particular reason your caucus has decided to muzzle him. But the fact of the matter is—

The Chair: I don't take that—but Mr Harnick—
Interjections.

The Chair: Maybe the other thing, and Mr Tilson—

Mr Harnick: May I finish, Mr Chair?

The Chair: Okay; go ahead.

Mr Harnick: It would seem to me that if Mr Kormos is a member of the Legislature, which he is, and he's a member of your caucus, which he is—

The Chair: Correct.

Mr Harnick: —he should be sitting here with your caucus and you should afford him the rights that any one of your caucus colleagues should have in this place.

The Chair: But the one thing, Mr Harnick, is that every chair was filled here. I know he went over and sat there, but the two of you were arm in arm, so I took it that you gave him permission to sit on that side.

Mr Harnick: I had no objection to Mr Kormos sitting beside me and I still have no objection to him sitting beside me, but I think it's passing strange that Mr Kormos is being muzzled by his own colleagues, and I think—

The Chair: I'm sorry—

Mr Harnick: May I finish, please?

The Chair: Go ahead.

Mr Harnick: I think—

Ms Haeck: Point of order.

Mr Harnick: No, I'm speaking on a point of order.

The Chair: No, wait. Let Mr Harnick finish.

Mr Harnick: I'm speaking on a point of order right now.

Ms Haeck: You've been known to interrupt others.

Mr Harnick: If you read the standing order you just read, it said the committee may permit that particular individual to participate, and if you're concerned about that and you don't want him to participate, then I invite you to force the committee to a vote to say that Mr Kormos can't participate. As far as I'm concerned, I will vote in favour of Mr Kormos participating and you, his colleagues, can vote against it. It just shows what kind of caucus you people have.

The Chair: I would say, Mr Harnick, that if we had the vote right now, all the government members would not change anything, but he would be able to sit down with our caucus, because there's been no evidence to the effect that Mr Kormos could not participate. It's just that he came in here and sat down beside you. You're arm in arm with him. I just took it that you said: "Sit beside me. There's an empty chair. There are no chairs on that side." I'll go to Ms Haeck.

Ms Haeck: Thank you, Mr Chair. I am just somewhat concerned that this is a discussion that in reality should have occurred at the subcommittee hearing and we're taking away from some good testimony that the board of trade has to offer us.

The Chair: They'll get their extra time. They'll get their half an hour.

Ms Haeck: Thank you, Mr Chair. May I suggest we move ahead since time is a-wasting.

The Chair: Okay, we'll carry on.

Mr Owens: All this for the price of a subway token.

BOARD OF TRADE OF METROPOLITAN TORONTO

The Chair: Okay. I'm sorry, gentlemen, that I didn't welcome you first, but I wanted to get some family business done here first before we got into more witnesses. I'd like to welcome the Board of Trade of Metropolitan Toronto. We will start and we will have one half-hour; you didn't lose any time at all. We're waiting for your presentation. Before you start, would you identify yourself for the purposes of Hansard.

In the presentation, if you can leave some time at the end for the committee members, as you can see, they want to ask questions. If you can leave at least 10 minutes, at least three minutes per caucus, they would appreciate it. But it's up to you; you're the presenter. You can use your whole 30 minutes on your presentation. The one thing about your presentation is that what you don't cover will be part of your brief and will be included, so it's not that if you don't read it into the record, it doesn't get published. Okay? You may begin.

Mr Robert P. Hutchison: My name is Bob Hutchison. I'm the vice-chairman of the insurance committee of the Metropolitan Toronto board of trade. With me is Mr Lloyd Hackett, who is a past chair of that committee. He is currently risk manager at the T. Eaton Co. I am a partner at the law firm of Borden and Elliot.

We are representing the board of trade. We have tabled a submission, which I gather has been distributed. There is a brief summary of the board and its constituency attached to it. Just to remind the members of the committee, the board is a representative organization of businesses and individuals engaged in business in the Metropolitan Toronto area. It's the largest organization of its kind in North America, and the submissions of the insurance committee are made from the point of view of the board membership itself.

The insurance committee, just so you will understand, is made up of persons who are familiar with the affairs of the insurance industry, representing brokers, buyers or insureds of insurance products, professionals, intermediaries, as well as underwriters themselves. I'd also like to emphasize for the committee the fact that the membership of the board is primarily buyers of insurance products and, for the context of this hearing, auto insurance coverages, and not necessarily sellers, although we do represent insurance companies that are board members.

I referred to the fact that a submission was tabled which contains a summary of most of our submissions. I'd also like to point out that the board has taken a long interest in this subject, since the subject of auto insurance I guess raised its head most recently in 1984 and the adventures we've had since. We have met with government since that time, with the ministers responsible for this area, including recent meetings with the current minister and his staff.

I'd also like to point out, just by way of a general comment, that our comments are general. We are not insurance technicians and we will not be of much assistance to the committee in the in-depth, technical aspects of it. We are not actuaries and our comments, because of that, are necessarily general.

I'd like also to make it clear that my understanding is that this committee's mandate is to review Bill 164. Our position—and I think other people commenting and I hope the committee accepts it—includes general comments on the regulation itself, the benefits schedule. It's impossible to look at Bill 164 without considering the effects of the schedule.

With that introduction, I can summarize the board's position briefly. We are not in favour of the scheme proposed by Bill 164 or the benefits schedule from the point of view that we don't consider it's in the interests of the Ontario public in general. That conclusion is based on the aspect of cost, that this scheme will cost Ontario in general, and we're talking in general there. On the complexities of the proposals and their workability, the inequities—I use that generally and I can come back to that—of the proposals, and the general negative implications for Ontario as seen from beyond the borders of Ontario, we're concerned that Ontario is out of step with other jurisdictions, not only in North America but elsewhere, and that fact in itself will not be of benefit to Ontario and will hurt us in the long run in different and general ways.

This isn't to say that the board doesn't consider that amendments to the current auto insurance scheme in Ontario are not necessary, because we believe they are, and some of the particulars of that have been drawn to the attention of the minister's staff. But we do not believe that the scheme in general that's in force is fundamentally flawed and that it warrants a wholesale change of the kind that's proposed here, which has, apart from the negative aspects I referred to earlier, entailed what we consider to be a wholesale and disruptive change to auto coverages in Ontario.

That is, I guess, a summary of our position. What I'd like to do is refer to some of the main aspects of Bill 164 that this conclusion is based on, as well as some of the aspects of the schedule as we have it.

The whole subject of third-party liability is a concern. We are concerned with the introduction of the right to sue for non-pecuniary losses. The feeling is that this proposal will necessarily increase costs, which aren't necessarily costs that ought to be incurred in an auto scheme in Ontario at this time. On the other side, the economic losses which the board considers are very important to address and have not been dealt with satisfactorily under the proposals are restricted and are inequitable for persons engaged in businesses. On the latter aspect, our suggestion is to go back to the verbal threshold of a permanent serious disfigurement or impairment that's in the current legislation.

We have raised a point with the minister's staff that in some respects may be technical, but I think it's important that it be dealt with, and that is the cap on non-economic loss. To an extent, this is a drafting matter, but we are not satisfied that proposed section 261.1 satisfactorily codifies the cap on non-pecuniary losses currently in force by the courts, pursuant to the Supreme Court of Canada's judgements in 1978, the trilogy cases.

Another aspect of the bill that is of concern, not only in this legislation but frankly in other legislation that the board has commented on, is the fact that the guts of this proposal are included in the schedule and are not included in the legislation, where we think they ought to be. Obviously, certain matters are appropriate for the legislation itself and certain matters are appropriate for only the regulations; they're too detailed and subject to change.

When you stand back and look at this legislation as a package, our concern is that the government is continuing—it's not just this government, but governments in general—putting the substance of policies as important as this in the regulations, where it's beyond the review of the Legislature, if you will, and also, in effect, beyond suitable in-depth public comment.

The bill, as it was first presented, contained the withdrawal-from-the-insurance-market provisions for all classes of insurance. We're pleased that the government has proposed amendments to that provision, and we urge that those amendments be supported and adopted.

This particular point was very important for the board of trade as a representative of businesses which are sensitive to how Ontario businesses and Ontario in general in any constituency is observed from beyond our borders. Again, I referred to that point earlier. The negative implications of that kind of legislation, of not permitting entities to leave a jurisdiction—it's one thing not to let them in, but not to let them out is completely unnecessary. It may seem like a minor point, and I think the minister almost indicated that in a previous meeting with us, but from a philosophical point of view and from the point of view of Ontario in an international community, it's critical. We're pleased to see that changes are proposed for that, and we urge that they be supported.

I'm going to turn briefly to the benefits schedule now. My first comment is one that has been voiced by a number of interest groups. The fact is that it's hopelessly complex and very difficult to follow. If it's difficult for people knowledgeable in the insurance industry to follow it and make sense of it and make decisions on it, it can hardly be expected that the public is going to be able to deal with this scheme on a user-friendly basis. We consider that the decisions they have to make and ensure the victim has to make in terms of selecting options and coverages will be very difficult. Instead of making the product more accessible and understandable—it may be in a well-intentioned sense—I think the result is that we've made it less accessible and less understandable. That is another reason why our general approach is to amend and tinker with, to the extent necessary, the existing legislation and format of auto insurance, rather than introducing wholesale something that's unfamiliar and difficult.

If there's one single aspect of the proposals that we're concerned about, it's cost. As I indicated, we're not actuaries; we can barely make head or tail of the fat actuarial reports that have been prepared by the various interested parties, including the government, the IBC and others. But all you have to do is read the conclusion to understand that the costs are going to be that way—up—rather than down or sideways. In our view, an increase of cost of coverage for this kind of a program is simply unsupportable and unnecessary at this time.

There shouldn't be any illusions that the cost will be borne by only one segment of the industry or the economy. It won't simply come out of the pockets of the insurance companies or the insured. The Ontario economy in general will bear these costs. Frankly, we don't think they can be justified in this economic climate, particularly for the product that's being proposed.

A further aspect of cost apart from the proposed benefits themselves is what we anticipate to be increased indirect costs in terms of the bureaucracy and administration required to administer legislation as complex as this. Experience has indicated time and time again that whenever something like this is introduced it's difficult. It's all-encompassing, because millions of Ontario people drive. The cost of that invariably will go up and will contribute to overall cost-inefficiency of delivering the product.

I mentioned the inequitable aspect earlier, and by that I didn't mean that things aren't fair. Providing greater benefits to people is fair in one sense. What we mean by "inequitable" is the fact that this kind of legislation allocates risks and benefits on an arbitrary basis rather than on commercial experience or underwriting insurance principles. To the extent it does that, it's not only inefficient but it's therefore inequitable to the economic interests of people who are affected by auto insurance, and that's a very wide range of the public.

We are concerned—and this is a point that is perhaps of interest to a segment of the insurance industry itself—that our information is that the reception by reinsurers, most of whom are offshore, out of Canada, is negative. The treaties that are being rewritten currently contain the opportunity to amend the coverages or terminate them in the event that this legislation comes into force. We can't predict what can happen, but the message that we are receiving is that the scheme will reflect negatively and, at the very minimum, result in increased reinsurance premiums which, in turn, will have to be borne somewhere in Ontario. We don't think it's necessary. We also think that community, being an international community, again will reflect negatively on Ontario as an economy that ought now to be participating more, rather than less, in international commerce.

The last point we hope is a positive comment. The board, for a number of years, has advocated and encouraged other means of making auto insurance a safer, fairer product. The road safety initiatives announced by the government are supported by the board. We have reviewed them and encourage the government to proceed with them sooner rather than later. The beneficial effects in terms of cost recovery and reduction of costs in the auto insurance markets will be immediate. We'd encourage the government to pursue those.

Those, Mr Chair, are our comments. We'd be happy to answer questions to the extent we can, within our—

The Chair: Okay. We have five minutes for each caucus, starting off with Mr Tilson.

Mr Tilson: I was interested in your comments about trying to work with the existing system and I hope to hear more of that. I know our party certainly has never supported the threshold test that's put forward by Bill 68 or the Liberal test, the OMPP. But I guess it's a concern that we look at how long it took to establish the rules, the tort law, the pre-OMPP. We now see cases like Myer and Dalglish, who, incidentally, are coming to this committee; I understand Myer's solicitor is speaking in Windsor and Mrs Dalglish herself, I believe, is speaking on Thursday night. It'll be interesting hearing their thoughts.

But if nothing happens to Bill 68 there's certainly going to be some litigation. The insurance people are saying there may be a whole slew of cases which any new piece of legislation, particularly something like this that's changing the whole system of the law—in other words, Myer and Dalglish are probably the start, and the insurance companies are saying, "Give it a chance." I'd like their thoughts on that as opposed to simply saying that the words that are used in the current threshold test are not adequate. You talked about amending that test.

Mr Hutchison: We think we should amend it in the sense of leaving it as proposed in OMPP, as it exists now, because we think that if there's going to be recourse to tort that's where it ought to be, and frankly, that threshold is as good as any that we've been able to identify.

Mr Tilson: So you're agreeing with some of the insurance companies that are saying that the courts will ultimately tell us what that test means.

Mr Hutchison: Yes. They will anyway. No matter what test you write, it'll end up before the courts and we'll be going through the same exercise. As a general answer, though, to your question as to the existing system and whether we should be tinkering, our feeling is that the insurance industry and the Ontario public can't take any more of this footballing with insurance.

Mr Tilson: It'll take six years to define that test.

Mr Hutchison: It's just going on and on and on. Business—and we're representing general business constituencies—is cynical of the process, and it's time to put a halt to it. I'll also be frank with you that the board of trade did not take a position on fault or no-fault per se, and has not.

Mr Tilson: I have one other question, Mr Chairman.

The Chair: You've still got three minutes to go.

Mr Tilson: Thank you. And then Mr Harnick, I think, has a question.

There has been some mention of the erosion of the institution of OHIP, that Bill 164, because of the benefits and the way it's going to be set up, will erode the institution of OHIP, and then indeed OHIP could go bankrupt because of some of the provisions. Has your organization looked at that subject? Are you able to—

Mr Hutchison: No, we haven't.

Mr Tilson: Mr Harnick.

Mr Harnick: I was interested in your categorization of the board of trade as being primarily a business-oriented organization—correct?

Mr Hutchison: That's correct.

Mr Harnick: As opposed to a consumers' protection group or anything of that nature.

Mr Hutchison: As opposed to consumer protection. But just to clarify that, a good deal of our members are individuals, and business people are individuals who drive cars and have families and live in houses.

Mr Harnick: That's why I was struck—and really, I think you stated it very nicely—when, under the aspect of “inequitable,” you stated that “benefits are defined by classification of the insured rather than loss incurred, actual circumstances or the desire or ability of the insured to have greater or lesser coverage.” I think what you're saying there is that if people have income to protect they should be allowed to protect that income. Is that correct?

Mr Hutchison: That is correct.

Mr Harnick: In other words, you don't subscribe to this idea of the government taking away economic rights or economic loss.

Mr Hutchison: Absolutely not. We recognize that there have to be some legislative parameters but they should be as flexible as possible to protect those economic interests.

Mr Harnick: I see. I don't know if you were here earlier, but we had an interesting discussion with one of the people who is the author of this. As a businessperson yourself representing a business—

Mr Hutchison: Author of which?

Mr Harnick: Of this Bill 164.

Mr Hutchison: Oh, I see. Okay.

Mr Harnick: We were told that someone who would be a student and rendered unable to complete his education and ever work because of his injuries would be entitled to, I think, $391 a week for the rest of his life, indexed. Is that, in your estimation, an adequate amount of money to represent the loss of someone who could be productive in the workforce?

Mr Hutchison: I don't know whether the numbers are right, but probably not. We have had other examples raised to us, and I can't comment on the particulars of them, but a high-earning professional who gets knocked out suffers as does any high-earning individual.

The Chair: I'm sorry. We'll have to go on to Mr Phillips. I know I skipped you at first and went to the Tories.

Mr Phillips: Why are you going that way?

The Chair: Okay. You were supposed to be first but—

Mr Tilson: They always go backwards here.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the comments on the costs and what not because that's one of my focuses, in that I have no idea where the NDP's priorities are now, none at all. They've said that hospitals can get no increased money: zero this year, next year, none at all. They've said they're going to have to raise taxes.

But here, even the most conservative estimate of increased cost to the taxpayers, this thing is going to cost a minimum extra $160 million. In addition to the normal increases, this will be an incremental $160 million, which is frankly a lot of money. If you look at some of the other estimates of people who've looked at it, they say it could be up to $500 million of incremental premiums, so that's the range. They got the most conservative—the smallest number is $160 million plus overheads up to $500 million, and $500 million, by the way, is like taking the sales tax up one half of 1%.

The reason I go through all of this is that somehow or other the NDP think this is in isolation, that somebody out there who doesn't pay taxes and that sort of thing is going to pay this. I guess my question to the board of trade is: In the environment that you see out there right now in terms of the public and what it's trying to deal with—I think normally we're looking at 1% increases in income, that sort of thing—do you see an incremental minimum $160 million—by the way, I keep stressing that this is in addition to regular raises; this is just what this adds to it—having any impact on the economy of Toronto or Ontario?

Mr Hutchison: Any increased non-productive cost, which these costs are, will have a negative effect on our economy. It has to come from somewhere. It won't come out of the air. We're sitting in the middle, in view of your earlier discussion of who's on what kind of table. I don't know who to blame for it, but any proposal that increases the cost of a non-productive nature such as this is going to have a negative impact for business and what runs our economy.

Mr Phillips: It's going to be very interesting in the budget debate, as we head to it, that the government feels it can take, as I say, a minimum $160 million out of the pockets of people to fund this. They said, “No, the hospitals aren't going to get any extra moneys.” They're fascinating priorities for me to watch.

The second question I have is just your comment about the image this gives Ontario in the international investment community. Again I'd be interested in the board's perspective of how things are right now in terms of investment coming to—I know you're Metro Toronto focused—but what the current impression of Ontario is. Is this something that we as a committee should weigh heavily or is it a relatively minor thing?

Mr Hutchison: We think it's very important from a kind of macroeconomic point of view from Ontario. We rely on foreign capital, and every other jurisdiction is venturing out and trading with the world. We see this kind of expensive legislation that's possibly out of step and unaffordable as negative to the economic prospects of Metro to the extent it reflects Ontario in general.

The Chair: Time's run out; it's five after. Mr Owens.

Mr Owens: I have a quick question, then I'll turn it over to my colleagues. I wanted to thank you for your presentation as well as for your support on our proposed withdrawal amendment. While it was our view that the initial legislation may not have been as draconian as the industry felt, we want to demonstrate that we are listening and have gone forward with an amendment.

I'm pleased that you raised the issue of costs in your presentation. This afternoon George Cooke from the Insurance Bureau of Canada indicated in his presentation that we've set up a task force to deal with some of those cost issues and that in an interview that Mr Cooke did earlier in the week it was his view that our government again was hearing some of the concerns that you've raised with respect to cost.

Could you comment on our task force, and are you as a board of trade encouraged by the multiple partners that are on this task force and the role that they have to work through?

Mr Hutchison: A simple answer to that is yes, provided it's effective and provided that what's proposed or presented or submitted, whatever their mandate is, is taken into consideration and weighed in government policy.

Mr Owens: Thank you. Christel?

Ms Haeck: I was interested in hearing your comments about how this proposed legislation is going to affect Ontario in the broader marketplace. As part of my personal research for this committee—and I don't pretend to have it all memorized—I did in fact request and get details about other jurisdictions within a reasonable distance of the province of Ontario. I'm wondering, have you investigated the whole insurance industry to that extent yourself?

Mr Hutchison: Are you talking about other models like Quebec and BC?

Ms Haeck: Yes. Even the OMPP uses some models that were taken from Michigan, which we all have obviously a range of concerns or accolades for, but there is a range of things that are available within a number of states not too far from us which you make mention of, the fact that this would affect our market standing with the United States.

Mr Hutchison: I can answer that generally. I can't compare the systems, but from our point of view, the economy of Ontario is quite distinct from the economy of the Prairies, where they have programs, and BC, and even Quebec, for that matter, which is for various reasons isolated and isn't the international player Ontario is. Ontario's economy has been diverse, as opposed to the primarily resource-based economies of those jurisdictions, and we depend far more and we're far more in the view of other jurisdictions. You only have to watch Ontario's credit rating. Nobody hears about the credit rating of other provinces. Ontario is the economic guts of Canada and it's more important in context.

Ms Haeck: I won't in any way disagree with that, but I live in St Catharines, which is 10 miles away from the border, and New York is obviously the other side of it.

Then you have: "In New York a law capping physicians' services at 100% of the medical fee schedule for workers' compensation has produced overall premium savings of 10% to 12%. New York regulators are also investigating the cause of cost increases, such as overuse of new technologies," which raises the whole thing about medical fees, "the growing use of chiropractor services, which now account for 15% of personal injury protection."

You can go into New Jersey. Massachusetts is dropping its verbal threshold system and in fact coming into a bill for reduction of the amount accident victims can win in court.

The Chair: Question?

Ms Haeck: Have you looked at this and would you be prepared to look at what we're doing and really judge it in the context of what's happening in North America?

Mr Hutchison: We'd certainly be prepared to look at it. I think the caution is you can't look at those kinds of specific benefits in a vacuum. What we're looking at here is what this proposal is going to cost Ontario, and that's our concern.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee. I'm sorry that you got detained 10 minutes to get started, but things happen like that the odd time.

This committee will be adjourned until 10 o'clock tomorrow.

The committee adjourned at 1711.

of being compensated by this scheme, they won't, because they'll be out of court. They won't be able to take the risk of going to court. That's the effect of a $15,000 deductible.

Let me give you another example. These are examples which lawyers who practise in the field will tell you are a fair assessment of a person's damages. A 58-year-old man injures his ankle in a car accident. The ankle is broken. He has an operation and a good result obtains. He's left with a scar and he's left with the hardware in his ankle. Because he's older and he's not an athlete, he decides not to have the hardware removed and he puts up with the hardware in his ankle. He's got some moderate pain while running or walking long distances but, all in all, a fairly good recovery. The courts might very well assess that claim at anywhere from $15,000 to $22,000. Again, in that example, would that person take the risk of going to court for maybe $5,000 or $7,000 when it's open for a court to award $15,000, $17,000, $20,000? Of course not. No one's going to take a case for $2,000 or $3,000 when they could end up being out of court, losing and being forced to pay the costs.

A $15,000 deductible is not going to have its intended effect. Let me state what the deputy minister said yesterday: "The reason for deductible is twofold: to eliminate the smallest claims, which are seen to burden the system, and as part of the overall balancing of cost in the system." In our respectful submission, a $15,000 deductible will not do that. It will eliminate more significant and serious claims.

If they want to eliminate minor claims, then we submit that a $7,500 deductible will accomplish that, because that will dissuade the minor claims which the system does not want to have before the courts. The three- and four-year were known as whiplash cases, soft tissue injuries to the neck or back. Those cases will be removed, because those cases range anywhere from $7,500 to $13,000 or $14,000. Those people with those injuries, if that's what the system wants, won't be able to sue.

But by having a deductible which is too high, serious injuries will not meet the deductible, and people with serious injuries will be shut out of the system. To borrow a phrase used in libel law, it will have a "chilling effect" on those injured people, on those men, women and children throughout the province who have injuries such as broken arms, broken legs, fractured kneecaps and a wide variety of other fractures. If that's the intention of the Legislature, it is not going to be accomplishing that. If its intention is to get rid of minor claims, it will be getting rid of serious claims.

I've gone on about the problems which FAIR has. It is fundamentally important that government be reminded of its promise it made to injured victims. What Bill 164 does, in our opinion, is far worse than the Liberal plan, and there are no more vociferous critics of that plan than FAIR. At least with the Liberal plan, with all its problems—and it is a bad, flawed plan—people who were seriously injured had rights to economic loss: the quadriplegic, the brain-damaged person; if it wasn't their fault, they knew they would have a measure of dignity provided to them because of the rights to sue for economic loss.

This plan, if implemented without any change, is far worse than the Liberal plan. Members of the committee I hope will be aware of that, because this is the government which has always sided with the innocent victim. This is the government which was in favour of rights for innocent victims, which looks after the little people. This plan will not accomplish that. You may criticize us as lawyers with self-interests, but hear us out. We've been marginalized, defined and delegitimized by every political group, but what we say is right and what we've had to say about the threshold, the Liberal plan, has been right.

Those conclude the comments I have. I know Professor Carr has some comments he wishes to make before the committee.

Dr Jack Carr: I'm going to be very brief. We want to leave time for questions, and I've actually appeared in front of a similar committee, in front of the OMPP.

Let me just state my particular biases in this particular matter. I'm an economist and I've taught at the law school at the University of Toronto, and I've done research since 1972 on this issue. In 1972 I published an article called The Shaky Case of No-Fault Automobile Insurance. No-fault automobile insurance just came into North America in 1971 in the state of Massachusetts; that was the first time it was introduced, and I was interested in it right away. I was against no-fault then and I'm against it now. Let me state my biases.

But having said that, when I talk to colleagues in the law school—and there are some colleagues who in fact are in favour of no-fault. If you talk to people in favour of no-fault—and there are people in favour of pure no-fault or threshold systems or partial no-fault—the people in favour of partial or threshold no-fault will tell you that an inviolate principle is that you always allow people to sue for economic loss, you always allow people to sue for excess economic loss.

And that's been history: Every US jurisdiction allows suits for economic loss. In Michigan, which was sort of what the OMPP was modeled after, which is probably the most stringent of no-fault systems in the United States, whether you pass the threshold or not, everyone has a right to sue for economic loss. It makes no sense to take away the rights of people to claim full recovery. Why should innocent people injured in an accident be out of pocket?

If you're injured in a boat accident, if a drunk hits you on Lake Simcoe in a boating accident, you have rights to sue that individual and get full recovery for economic loss. If you put that same drunk on Highway 401 going to Lake Simcoe and he hits you there, you're out of luck, because then you no longer have rights to sue for economic loss. To put it mildly, it makes no sense.

The argument is that we're going to save on legal fees: We don't have to prove fault; we're going to give statutory accident benefits. The reason I say it makes no sense in the context of Bill 164 is that Bill 164 restores the right to sue for pain and suffering, so you're already going to have a court case where you have to establish fault, you're going to have to hire a lawyer, you're going to have to have fault just for pain and suffering. If you're going to have that court case anyway, why not allow suits for excess economic loss?

In fact, my colleagues in the law school favouring no-fault say, "Maybe pain and suffering isn't as real a

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Wednesday 27 January 1993

The committee met at 1037 in room 151.

INSURANCE STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1993

LOI DE 1993 MODIFIANT LES LOIS CONCERNANT LES ASSURANCES

Consideration of Bill 164, An Act to amend the Insurance Act and certain other Acts in respect of Automobile Insurance and other Insurance Matters / Loi modifiant la Loi sur les assurances et certaines autres lois en ce qui concerne l'assurance-automobile et d'autres questions d'assurance.

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): Good morning, or just about good afternoon. We're getting close to that. Sorry for the inconvenience. This is the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. This is day 2, Bill 164, An Act to amend the Insurance Act and certain other Acts in respect of Automobile Insurance and other Insurance Matters. Starting off a new day, I see we have quite a few people sitting in the audience and I'd like to start off on who the committee is and what ministry you're with, starting off with Mr Ward.

Mr Brad Ward (Brantford): Brad Ward, MPP for Brantford and parliamentary assistant for Industry, Trade and Technology.

Mr Paul Klopp (Huron): Paul Klopp, MPP for Huron.

Mr Paul R. Johnson (Prince Edward-Lennox-South Hastings): Paul Johnson, MPP for Prince Edward-Lennox-South Hastings and parliamentary assistant to the Treasurer, Floyd Laughren.

Mr George Dadamo (Windsor-Sandwich): Good morning. I'm George Dadamo. I'm the MPP for Windsor-Sandwich and the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Culture and Communications.

Mr Remo Mancini (Essex South): Remo Mancini, MPP, Essex South.

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): Gerry Phillips, member for Scarborough-Agincourt.

Mr Chairman, I think it's unnecessary for the members to say who they are parliamentary assistants for. I would hope that we're here representing the Legislature. We're not here representing ministries. If they need it for their own ego, that's fine, but as a matter of principle—

Mr Dadamo: Speaking of ego.

Mr Phillips: As a matter of principle, Mr Chairman, these committees seem to be turning into government and opposition and we are losing the role that we're supposed to be playing. If Mr Kormos chooses to come in this afternoon and you won't let him sit with his colleagues and he has to go on "the opposition side," that's a further indication these committees are losing their role.

I raise that, Mr Chairman, because you said "what ministries they're with." If they're here representing ministries, I'd like to know that.

The Chair: I thought that Mr Mancini would say he's the auto critic. Okay, fine. We won't do that any more then, Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: Well, they can do it if they want.

The Chair: Mr Tilson.

Mr David Tilson (Dufferin-Peel): My name is Mr Tilson.

Mr Stephen Owens (Scarborough Centre): And he represents no one.

Mr Phillips: I hope he represents the public.

Mr Tilson: I represent Dufferin-Peel and I'm in opposition to Bill 164.

Mr Charles Harnick (Willowdale): Charles Harnick, Willowdale, and I hope we can get this going now that the NDP's decided that we can sit in this room and have this televised, and we're only about half an hour late.

The Chair: And finally, the people at the front here.

Ms Pat Girouard: Pat Girouard with Hansard.

Mr Robert Nishman: Rob Nishman with legislative research.

Mr Harnick: And you were the people who wanted these introductions.

Clerk Pro Tem (Mr Franco Carrozza): Franco Carrozza, the clerk.

Mr Owens: Steve Owens, MPP, Scarborough Centre, as well as being the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Financial Institutions.

Ms Julia Bass: I'm Julia Bass. I'm with auto insurance review.

FAIR ACTION INSURANCE REFORM COMMITTEE

The Chair: Okay, since we've introduced, we'd like to find out who our first presenters are. They're the Fair Action Insurance Reform Committee, known as FAIR, and we have a Mr John Scott and his associate. If you don't mind, identify yourselves for the purposes of Hansard. Since we started late, you still have one half-hour and we'll be running about 40 minutes behind all morning. Okay, if you don't mind starting, and if you can leave some time at the end for questions from the members of the committee here.

Mr Richard Bogoroch: Let me just correct something: My name is Richard Bogoroch. I appear on behalf of FAIR, and with me is Professor Carr, who'll be here to answer whatever questions members of the committee have.

Let me state at the outset that FAIR is very much opposed to Bill 164. In our submission, copies of which have been provided to you, we have outlined our objections to it. I've been informed of what other people who have testified before this committee have said, and I will not repeat what's been said yesterday. I'm going to try and do what many lawyers have difficulty in doing: I'm going to be brief and I'm going to confine my comments to the parts of the bill which we have deep difficulty with.

Let me state at the outset that the law is unfair, it's unjust and it's cruel. I'm going to tell you why it's cruel. I'm going to also tell you what solutions FAIR has.

Fundamentally, what this law does is strip away the rights of innocent accident victims to sue for economic loss. Economic loss is fundamental. No jurisdiction in North America which has either a threshold or a partial no-fault scheme has ever stripped away economic loss. In fact, how fundamental it is and how important it is to innocent accident victims has been underscored by the comments of ARCH, which appeared yesterday, by the Metro chamber of commerce and the Advocates' Society. Diverse groups with different political objectives and agendas and different views on this legislation all condemned the legislation for stripping away the right to sue for economic loss.

What is so important about economic loss? Let me give you an example, and this may have been discussed yesterday before the committee. You have a breadwinner who's 35 years of age with two young children and a spouse. He's earning $35,000 a year. He has no other insurance, and he is killed by a drunk driver. All that his spouse and children will get under this legislation is $120,000; $120,000 for ever to compensate them for the loss of lifelong support.

What's going to happen after three or four years when that money is used up? More than likely, that family in the example I've given will be required to take social assistance. The effect of the bill in the example I've given will force young families to be supported by the taxpayers because the law does not provide for economic loss. That example is in our brief, and I invite you to look at our brief.

That's the effect of Bill 164. Is this government intending to shift the responsibility from the insurance industry to the taxpayers of this province? Are families that have a father or mother who's a breadwinner and is killed in a traffic accident going to be reduced to public assistance because of this inadequacy and their inability to obtain compensation for economic loss? No one anywhere in North America, no Legislature has ever done that.

Let me give you another example, and we heard this yesterday too from the representative of the Advocates' Society. You have a student who is 16 or 17. He wants to be somebody. He's interested in a trade, a career. He wants to be a plumber. If he meets the apprenticeship requirements, he should be guaranteed a good and decent living for his family. If at the age of 17 he's badly brain-damaged in a car accident such that his career, his dream, is taken away from him, this legislation will, by the time he's 30 years of age, start paying him approximately $381 a week, $20,000 a year, to somebody who had a good career taken away because of a car accident.

Mr Mancini: Is that $320?

Mr Bogoroch: That's $380 a week. This is the effect of the legislation: to destroy the hopes and aspirations of young people, to destroy families, because they do not want to allow for economic loss. It's unbelievable that this government, which stood shoulder to shoulder with injured persons while it was in opposition and which railed against the Liberals' plan, now is trying to strip away the right to economic loss.

Many of us will recall that Bob Rae attended a rally at the Sheraton Centre with members of the disabled community condemning bitterly and in the strongest possible terms the OMPP, the current plan.

Mr Ward: The Liberal plan.

Mr Bogoroch: The Liberal plan. Thank you. "If we're elected, we'd give back the right to sue. We care about injured people." Now we see what he's doing. It's a dreadful, dreadful turn of events.

But there is a solution to it; there's a solution, if this government wants to listen. FAIR Committee is proposing an add-on: that people be given the right to purchase excess coverage for economic loss. This was discussed yesterday, but it's fundamentally important and would involve a simple amendment to the legislation to allow people, to allow families, to make sure that in the event the worst scenario happens—the breadwinner or loved one is killed in an accident and the means of support is taken away—a simple add-on, the right to purchase excess coverage for economic loss, will be available. It's not mandatory. The legislation would simply allow that if people want it they can purchase it from the insurers.

We have today what is known as standard endorsement form 44, which provides for underinsured coverage or excess coverage. It's about $10 or $15 a year. It ensures people that in the event they are injured or killed by a person who doesn't have adequate insurance, their own insurance company will provide the difference. It's called excess coverage. It's simply an additional layer; it's very modest. FAIR feels very strongly that if this government wants to restore its promise to the people of Ontario, one of the ways it can do that is by providing this add-on.

Now, economic loss is not the only objection we have, and I have a very brief time to talk about FAIR's position. Let me say another thing which we're concerned about: We're concerned about the deductible. The deductible of $15,000 is simply too high. As a trial lawyer and as a group of trial lawyers, we know that a $15,000 deductible in effect will scare away, frighten, dissuade people with cases worth $20,000 to $30,000. Here's why:

A 12-year-old boy is injured in a car accident and breaks his arm. He has to have an operation. He has to have some plates and hardware put in. It's called an open reduction. He's left with a scar, but he's got a good result, he's got good function. That case, any trial lawyer will tell you, could be worth anywhere from $15,000 to, say, $25,000. Let's say it's worth $20,000. Does this family want to take the risk of going to court for $5,000, when a judge or a jury can say, "Maybe it's $15,000," and get nothing and then have to pay all the costs? No. So instead of being compensated by this scheme, they won't, because they'll be out of court. They won't be able to take the risk of going to court. That's the effect of a $15,000 deductible.

Let me give you another example. These are examples which lawyers who practise in the field will tell you are a fair assessment of a person's damages. A 58-year-old man injures his ankle in a car accident. The ankle is broken. He has an operation and a good result obtains. He's left with a scar and he's left with the hardware in his ankle. Because he's older and he's not an athlete, he decides not to have the hardware removed and he puts up with the hardware in his ankle. He's got some moderate pain while running or walking long distances but, all in all, a fairly good recovery. The courts might very well assess that claim at anywhere from $15,000 to $22,000. Again, in that example, would that person take the risk of going to court for maybe $5,000 or $7,000 when it's open for a court to award $15,000, $17,000, $20,000? Of course not. No one's going to take a case for $2,000 or $3,000 when they could end up being out of court, losing and being forced to pay the costs.

A $15,000 deductible is not going to have its intended effect. Let me state what the deputy minister said yesterday: "The reason for deductible is twofold: to eliminate the smallest claims, which are seen to burden the system, and as part of the overall balancing of cost in the system." In our respectful submission, a $15,000 deductible will not do that. It will eliminate more significant and serious claims.

The three- and four-year were known as whiplash cases, soft tissue injuries to the neck or back. Those cases will be removed, because those cases range anywhere from $7,500 to $13,000 or $14,000. It makes no sense to take away the rights of people to claim full recovery. Why should innocent people injured in an accident be out of pocket?

If you're injured in a boat accident, if a drunk hits you on Lake Simcoe in a boating accident, you have rights to sue that individual and get full recovery for economic loss. If you put that same drunk on Highway 401 going to Lake Simcoe and he hits you there, you're out of luck, because then you no longer have rights to sue for economic loss. To put it mildly, it makes no sense.

The argument is that we're going to save on legal fees: We don't have to prove fault; we're going to give statutory accident benefits. The reason I say it makes no sense in the context of Bill 164 is that Bill 164 restores the right to sue for pain and suffering, so you're already going to have a court case where you have to establish fault, you're going to have to hire a lawyer, you're going to have to have fault just for pain and suffering. If you're going to have that court case anyway, why not allow suits for excess economic loss?

In fact, my colleagues in the law school favouring no-fault say, "Maybe pain and suffering isn't as real a cost as economic loss." I don't agree with them, but that's their argument, and the argument in the law and economics literature is that if you're going to take away, if you want to save costs in the system, if that's the argument, then you take it away from pain and suffering, you don't take it away from economic loss.

I urge you to read our brief and look at a number of examples. These are just a few of a large number of people: infants, students, senior citizens, young workers starting out in their career. There's a whole slew of people who are left out, who fall between the cracks. The government tried to fill in as much as possible, but you really can't fill in all the cracks.

You really need to give people the right to recovery for full economic loss. If you're going to do one thing, allow recovery for full economic loss. That's the most important thing. There are jurisdictions which take away the right to sue for pain and suffering. There are no jurisdictions that take away the right to sue for economic loss.

This is something which should be dear to the NDP. The argument is that you want to look after innocent accident victims, that people should not be out of pocket. There are some cynical commentators who claim that the reason you have this system which doesn't seem to make sense, a system which gives rights to sue for pain and suffering but not for economic loss, is because the NDP made a pledge to restore the right to sue and didn't know how to keep its pledge, and what it did is it put a fig leaf on. After the government came into being, it decided to abandon its pledge, abandon its promise and put on this fig leaf, this minor fig leaf, of suing for pain and suffering, with a deductible. It's so the government can claim it fulfilled the pledge.

If you look at it in terms of cost, not in terms of the number of people but in terms of taking away the right to sue from quadriplegics and paraplegics—something the Liberals wouldn't do—if you look at how much cost you take out of the system by taking away the right to sue for economic loss and adding in the right to sue for pain and suffering, on net you're still taking away 15% of total cost. You're still reducing total cost.

That means that as far as economics go, the NDP has really not fulfilled its promise, an important promise and a promise which goes to the heart of NDP constituencies: to the worker, to the student, to the senior citizen. They're the people who in fact are going to lose.

I urge you to consider the aspects of the bill, to consider who's hurt and to at least restore in some measure the rights of accident victims to claim full compensation for economic loss. Let's open that up for questions.

The Chair: Mr Mancini, three minutes.

Mr Mancini: Three minutes. You're very generous today, Mr Chairman.

First of all, I thank both gentlemen for their brief. I want especially to thank you for highlighting how important economic loss is. While I understand that you did not support the Ontario motorist protection plan, I do believe you have articulated very clearly this morning why the Ontario motorist protection plan included economic loss and what it means to factory workers and other wage earners, what it means to students and to other people.

I've done some calculations here. Based on the government's own statistics, Mercer's own statistics, which have been challenged as being on the low side, we have concluded that Mercer's plan—the government's plan, the parliamentary assistant's plan—will increase rates in Ontario to the consumer by 4.4%. That's the low. That means Ontario consumers will pay $200 million more in insurance rates, more money than the government has given to all of the hospitals in this province. Do you think the consumers are getting any value for that $200 million?

Dr Jack Carr: The consumers are going to pay more. How much depends on which actuary you believe.

Mr Mancini: I'm using the government's actuary. That way, the members on the government side can't howl.

Dr Jack Carr: The problem is that people are paying more but innocent accident victims are getting less. If you were a quadriplegic or a paraplegic as a result of an accident, you wouldn't want to have that accident occur under this bill. Before, you had the right for full economic loss, and economic loss included the cost of future care, if you needed attendant care.

If you are quadriplegic, a $3,000-a-month limit for attendant care is not enough if you're going to be cared for at home. If you're going to be cared for in an institution, it's okay, but if you're going to be cared for at home it is not enough. If you were a plumber, you would not get full compensation. If you were just starting out in your career, you would not get full compensation. A large number of people in fact would be hurt.

Also hurt would be the low-income worker. It's interesting that there's a part of the plan which somehow gets ignored. The rules of the income replacement plan have been changed. It used to be 80% of gross; it's now going to 90% of net. That means that the low-income worker, if disabled for a year and an innocent accident victim, will get less. A worker earning $20,000 a year will receive 11.8% less under this proposed bill than under the Ontario motorist protection plan. A $30,000 worker will receive 15.9% less and a $40,000 worker will receive 18.4% less.

The few people who gain happen to be negligent people who are high income. An $80,000-a-year victim receives 46.1% more. It hardly seems that this would appeal to the NDP constituency, to hurt low-income workers and help high-income workers, but the plan does exactly that. You're paying more and getting less.

The Chair: Mr Tilson.

Mr Mancini: They claim to be experts on the plan, so they must know what they're doing.

The Chair: Sorry, Mr Mancini. Mr Tilson.

Mrs Elinor Caplan (Oriole): I don't think they know what they're doing.

The Chair: Mr Tilson, you have the floor.

Interjections.

The Chair: Excuse me. Mr Tilson has the floor. Somebody took my hammer away. Mr Tilson, go ahead. We're starting over again.

Mr Tilson: Thank you, Mr Chairman. I'm interested in your apparent compromise to lower the deductible to $7,500. I must confess that I have a lot of problem with the whole principle of the deductible, probably for many of the reasons you speak of. Whether you're talking about the serious and/or permanent injuries, whatever test we're going to use or contemplate, the fact is that no matter what deductible you're talking about, whether it's $15,000 or $7,500, that's still coming off the top of those serious injuries.

The second concern I have with the deductible, as I'm sure you have, is that no matter where you are, the courts are going to lean over backwards to increase that amount. At least, I believe they will. You in your wisdom may think not, but I believe they will. The $15,000—to get over that amount, the courts will lean over backwards to increase that amount.

Thirdly, it does not make any sense to sue for $20,000; with all the legal costs, you'd probably lose. So I'd like your comments as to what your apparent reasons are. What you appear to be doing is supporting the deductible principle.

Mr Bogoroch: FAIR's position has been well known. We were against any type of deductible. Unrestricted right to sue has always been the benchmark of FAIR. In fact, for a time we thought it was the benchmark of the NDP. That's not the case. But in terms of the deductible, we feel no deductible is necessary. However, to assist the committee, we wanted to highlight just how onerous a $15,000 deductible is, because, in practice, for those out in the trenches dealing with the cases, dealing with the rank and file who've been injured and need compensation, a $15,000 deductible is really a $20,000 to $22,000 deductible, and it will stop those seriously injured victims from going to court. We have a great deal of problem with that deductible; it's much too high.

We would prefer there be no deductible, but if there is going to be a deductible, $7,500 accomplishes what the deputy minister said. It would eliminate the smallest claims, which are seen to burden the system. Any higher deductible, a $15,000 deductible, does not accomplish what the deputy minister said before the committee.

Mr Tilson: Having said that, and listening to the rates of the four groups, the four consultants or whatever they're called, that presented the potential for possible rates—

Mr Owens: On a point of order, Mr Chair.

The Chair: Okay, Mr Owens.

Mr Owens: Mr Tilson has referred to four consultants. In my understanding, there have only been two actuarial studies.

Mr Tilson: That's not a point of order.

Mr Mancini: That's not a point of order, Mr Chair.

Mr Tilson: Tell him to sit down.

The Chair: Carry on, Mr Tilson.

Mr Tilson: The fact of the matter is that there are four reports; the latest one of course is Mercer. That's based on this current proposal of Bill 164. Professor Carr, listening to your $7,500 proposal, what effect would that have as far as increasing rates?

Dr Jack Carr: We haven't gone and examined exactly how much more that would cost, but if you do that, it will in fact cost more; there's no doubt if you give more benefits to people. But that's a question and a basic fact this committee has to understand: One of the ways the Ontario motorist protection plan at least prevented rates from going up and put huge profits in the pocket of the insurance industry is that it reduced benefits by almost half. You can get rates down to nothing if you have benefits down to nothing, and that's okay as long as you don't have an accident. You always need to have a balance. If you put more benefits in the system, it's clearly going to cost, but you want a system that is fair. You don't want to take out the serious claims, and that's the problem here.

Ms Christel Haeck (St Catharines-Brock): Thank you for your comments. Obviously, I don't agree with a lot of them.

Mr Mancini: Which ones?

Ms Haeck: They were very clear where they stood, and I felt I should be clear with the same.

The Chair: Ms Haeck, through the Chair.

Ms Haeck: I have a document here. It's called Database Reports, which in fact is from the Insurance Information Institute, and it's dated May 1992. On page 6 of that, partway down the page, it says, "Under the traditional system, claimants with minor injuries tend to receive compensation that averages two to three times their economic loss, while those who are severely injured receive much less, just over half on average." Any comments on that?

Dr Jack Carr: There are a number of studies of tort, and there are a number of claims like that. You have to understand that the insurance industry would, if it had its choice, go to pure no-fault and lower benefits, because in fact if it doesn't pay out benefits, things are fine.

I don't know how you get two to three times your economic loss. I don't know why an insurer would pay it, because if you went to court, the court only gives you your full economic loss. It doesn't give you double or triple compensation. I don't know from where you're reading. Well, I know from where you're reading, but there were cases of double recovery when you could collect both from your disability insurer and from your automobile accident insurer. That's been changed, and we're in favour of that, that there's no double recovery.

Ms Haeck: What you're proposing with this additional policy, this option to top up basically for economic loss: I think you were saying to Mr Tilson you haven't done any particular study as to the financial impacts or economic impacts, so there's really no way of costing that out either.

Dr Jack Carr: No, no, but I should say—

The Chair: I'm sorry—

Mr Harnick: Let him answer the question.

The Chair: I can't hear what the member's saying.

Dr Jack Carr: If the NDP is right, if they covered most of the cracks, that very few people fall through the cracks and most people are covered—

Ms Haeck: Which is over 90%.

The Chair: I'm sorry, Miss Haeck, let him answer.

Dr Jack Carr: —then this is only recovery for excess loss, for over and above. It's only the difference of what your economic loss is and what your accident benefits are. If the claim is right that you're getting most of your benefits anyway, the coverage should come fairly cheaply, and since it's an option, people can decide whether to buy it or not.

Ms Haeck: Well—

The Chair: I'm sorry, Miss Haeck. Time has run out. I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee.

PROGRESSIVE CASUALTY INSURANCE CO OF CANADA

The Chair: The next group we're to hear from is the Progressive Casualty Insurance Co of Canada. Would the two gentlemen come forward, please? I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. You'll have half an hour. In that half an hour, if you could leave some time at the end for questions—you can see the members try to get as many in as possible. Identify yourselves for the purposes of Hansard also. Do you have a brief there? Okay. Go ahead.

Mr Andy Rogacki: Good morning. My name's Andy Rogacki and I'm president of Progressive Canada. With me is Chip Conner, who's also a Progressive executive.

Let me begin by thanking you for the opportunity to express our views regarding Bill 164. Bill 164 was introduced some six months before the minister tabled his review of the performance of the OMPP. Clearly, the legislative cart was in front of the analytic horse.

When Minister Charlton introduced Ontario's strategy for automobile insurance reform, he described a five-part strategy to give Ontario's motorists another insurance system that is affordable, accessible and, above all, fair.

The reason for our presence here today is that after our careful review of Bill 164 and of the revised draft regulation which accompanies the bill, we believe that the affordability will be adversely affected, that accessibility will be in no way enhanced and that, above all, fairness is not served. The proposed system is not consistent with the minister's policy objective and it will not work. The legislation and regulation have not been put together in a way that properly balances the interests of all parties.

First, let me talk about Bill 164 and the legislative amendments. Over the last few years the Ontario automobile insurance system has been in constant turmoil. As you know, insurers can sell any product, but the public must be willing to pay the cost. The trick is to balance the cost of the insurance product with people's ability and willingness to pay.

OMPP has worked well and consumer satisfaction is high. But costs are escalating rapidly because there are few cost controls, a failing which also afflicts the proposed system. The industry recognized that the OMPP needs change and has proposed a number of amendments.

However, the government has chosen to build a new system rather than to amend the OMPP. The government is missing a historic opportunity to learn from the experience obtained under OMPP and to craft in Bill 164 a system that is fair and that would provide a more stable insurance cost.

Under Bill 164 all Ontario motorists would be covered by the highest level of accident benefits in North America irrespective of fault. In addition, those Ontario motorists who are not at fault in an automobile accident would also have an opportunity to recover their non-economic losses through use of the tort system. In effect, this design means that all drivers must pay more, both for higher basic benefit levels and for the higher transaction costs associated with the tort system.

The unfairness of this design is that even the seriously injured who are awarded compensation under the tort system have their compensable damages reduced by the deductible under Bill 164; therefore, compensation will no longer reflect the full value of the loss. At the same time, compensation for economic damages for those most seriously injured is also reduced. The deductible is simply an attempt to control the high cost of tort.

This is extremely unattractive public policy and bad insurance. The biggest winners will be at-fault claimants entitled to richer accident benefits and lawyers.

Let me deal more specifically with some elements in the bill. The withdrawal provisions should be made more reasonable by means of the following two changes:

(1) In the course of day-to-day business a company take actions which, according to the language within the bill, could be construed as withdrawal, even though no withdrawal is contemplated. A threshold percentage needs to be defined below which cancellations or broker terminations do not constitute withdrawal from the marketplace. We suggest at least a 25% threshold.

(2) When a company applies for withdrawal, it should be permitted to stop writing new business effective immediately. The applying company would still have to offer renewals for the period stipulated in the legislation, after which the company would simply run off its business.

These two provisions would permit flexibility for insurers, impose no hardship on consumers and do not adversely affect availability.

The deductible: Much has been said about the application of a deductible to tort awards. From a fairness standpoint, we oppose the deductible and believe that the current verbal threshold works much better. If the government were, however, to impose a deductible, it can be made to work with the following modifications:

(1) A specific cap for non-economic damage awards should be provided. The existing trilogy cap is contingent upon the full recovery of economic loss. While Bill 164 attempts to address this issue, since such a cap is critical to the quantum of benefits and their cost, we believe that it should be addressed clearly and explicitly in the legislation by setting a maximum amount for pain and suffering awards. Alternatively, the government could seek a judicial ruling from the Court of Appeal before Bill 164 receives third reading.

(2) Pain and suffering awards should be scaled relative to severity so that even if there is a cap in place for serious injury awards, awards for minor injuries do not escalate out of proportion. One solution is a schedule of awards which would assign a value to each injury or combination of injuries.

(3) We are concerned about erosion of the $15,000 deductible. We believe that a combination of deductible, such as proposed in Bill 164, and a verbal threshold would do a markedly better job of preventing deductible erosion and consequent rapid cost escalation.

If the trilogy cap were not to hold or the deductible were not to work as intended, the public can expect enormous increases in costs and an insurance system that would be out of control.

Let me address graduated licensing. An important piece of auto insurance reform is simply not contained in Bill 164, and that piece is graduated licensing. To reduce the senseless tragedy and human trauma associated with automobile accidents involving new drivers, graduated licensing is needed urgently. Also, graduated licensing will have a positive impact on the cost of insurance by reducing the number of accidents. There is absolutely no excuse for not implementing graduated licensing immediately.

Let me now turn to my colleague, Chip, to address the draft regulations.

Mr William J. Conner: In its present form, the draft regulation will lead to significant cost increases and ultimately to a failure of the auto insurance system. There's simply not time in this forum today to highlight with sufficient detail the many concerns we have regarding the draft regulation, so I will simply address a few of the more glaring problems.

Medical and rehabilitation expenses: We applaud the government's recent initiative to create a committee to deal with cost control in the rehabilitation, medical and long-term care areas. This development is long overdue. We hope the expertise of this new group will be incorporated into the final design of the regulation. In addition to this, the following areas need to be addressed:

(1) The regulation does not contain any restrictions on medical or rehabilitation expenses such as limitations upon who may treat, how long they may treat and by what means they may treat accident victims. La Société d'assurance automobile du Québec has demonstrated that such controls are highly effective and reduce the cost to the insurance system. Unless there are very rigorous, objective controls in place, we will witness the birth of an entire new industry of paramedical practitioners preying upon innocent accident victims and doing so at the public's insurance dollar expense.

(2) The regulation creates for insurers unlimited financial exposure to catastrophic claims. We do not believe that seriously injured people should be denied access to adequate resources to permit their recovery, but we do believe that because such catastrophic losses are much less predictable, have extremely long payout times and are unusually susceptible to technological change and the winds of politics, the only suitable way to address catastrophic injuries is through a catastrophic claims fund. This type of fund exists in several North American jurisdictions and could be implemented also in Ontario. We suggest that a catastrophic claims fund be created and operated by the industry with mandatory participation by all Ontario automobile insurers. So far there's no enabling legislation for it.

In the area of income replacement, we view this as the area that probably needs the most work within the draft regulation:

(1) The definition of "activities of daily living" is imprecise and will contribute to overcompensation relative to economic losses. As an example, consider that a very minor event could be an activity of daily living in accordance with the definition. The disability test makes even a game of chess an activity of daily living because of its requirement for cognitive skills. We suggest that activities of daily living be redefined to refer to "activities of independent living."

(2) Extrapolations of gross annual income lead to the highest possible payments rather than to compensation which is fair and commensurate with the loss. For example, seasonal workers could receive a benefit based upon the extrapolation of four weeks of seasonal income into an annual salary. We suggest that income should be calculated solely on the basis of a single, objective metric; for example, the last consecutive 12 months of income immediately preceding the accident.

The loss of earning capacity benefit is especially susceptible to abuse:

(1) The reassessment provisions in their present form are absurdly loose. Reassessment after three years, after eight years and subsequently almost on demand guarantee that costs will escalate rapidly over time, that loss adjustment expense will be high and that an insurer can never close a claim once and for all. This long-term uncertainty will affect the cost of insurance to consumers.

(2) Establishing assessment centres which are the only organizations permitted to assess certain injuries, recommend treatment regimens and evaluate earnings opportunities is unnecessary and redundant. There are practitioners already in place who could deliver these services without creating any new infrastructure. It would be more efficient simply to regulate practitioners and to stipulate the qualifications for them to practise.

Completely missing from the draft regulation is any reference to loss transfer. Without loss transfer, the cost of motorcycle insurance is destined to skyrocket as a result of the newly enriched accident benefits, while the cost of insurance for heavy commercial vehicles would decrease. Absent loss transfer motorcycle insurance will be less readily available, and even with loss transfer the cost of motorcycle insurance will increase even more significantly than it will for private passenger automobiles. Loss transfer should be introduced. It should operate from the first dollar of loss rather than from above $2,000 and it should be subject to a time limitation on the transference demand.

Let me also address the concept of entitlement versus indemnity which is embodied in the draft regulation.

The proposed draft regulation structures compensation in the form of entitlements through extensive categorization of claimants. The result of this approach is frequent overcompensation with respect to actual losses, particularly with respect to relatively minor injuries. A fundamental principle of insurance, of matching compensation to loss, is abandoned in favour of the principle of entitlement. It would appear that the crafters of the draft regulation adhered to a very simple philosophy in making the various determinations which give rise to the regulation: When in doubt, pay it out.

The resulting bias for overcompensation will in turn result in socially unbeneficial illness behaviour and will incent some people to take unfair advantage of the insurance system. This will result in all Ontario drivers paying for these undesirable behaviours. The solution, particularly for seriously injured claimants, includes moving away from a categorization-based system and towards individual assessment rather than compensation by formula. Our position is that accident victims are entitled to be compensated fully for everything that they lost, no more and no less.

Let me also talk about complexity. The draft regulation is very complex and it spans some 60 pages. It is almost unintelligible to anyone, even to a seasoned claims adjuster. The public is not likely to understand the proposed accident benefits regardless of the number of pamphlets or other attempts made by insurers or the government to explain them.

Lastly, and in some ways as important as anything else, I'd like to address cost. The government's own actuarial report on the cost of Bill 164, notwithstanding the fact that it uses some old outside-of-Ontario data and a variety of problematic assumptions in deriving its estimate, indicates that the bill and its draft regulations would drive up the cost of auto insurance.

The Insurance Bureau of Canada commissioned an actuarial analysis using more relevant data and assumptions, and the IBC's study indicates that the incremental cost of Bill 164 is closer to 13%, and that increase is over and above any increase needed to bring the current OMPP product to price adequacy.

In fairness, I should state that all of these cost estimates are very imprecise as both the legislation and the attendant regulations are not yet in final form. But it is clearly creating a potential for very significant cost increases which would be onerous to consumers. No one really knows what this bill is going to cost.

Mr Rogacki: In conclusion, until the government demonstrates its ability to create a workable, cost-effective regulation that implements the automobile insurance compensation system created by Bill 164, Bill 164 should be withheld from further consideration. At a minimum, Bill 164 should be amended to increase confidence in the number and cost of tort cases by adopting a verbal threshold together with the deductible; improve the withdrawal provisions so as not to unintentionally penalize ordinary business operations; and integrate road safety, in particular graduated licensing, into the package of reforms. The draft regulations need to be overhauled to provide for better cost control and ease of implementation. Without addressing these critical components of the draft regulations, it will be impossible to guarantee an affordable, accessible and, most importantly, fair insurance product. Thank you, and we'll be glad to answer any questions you may have.

The Chair: We'll start off with Mr Tilson first. You've got four minutes.

Mr Tilson: One of the major issues, of course, for the consumer is the issue of costs. You have commented as to what Mercer says and what FAIR says. The fact of the matter is that rates will go up, no question about it, at a time when we're still not out of this recession. Notwithstanding what the government is saying, this government's broke, jobs are being lost, we're all having more and more costs, and now we're going to have more rates simply because the NDP wants to be different from the Liberals. That appears to be the sole reason for this particular bill. There's no other logical reason.

In your experience in the insurance industry, in your view, if the average citizen goes out and buys the minimum amount of coverage, what do you believe his rates will increase by with the implementation of Bill 164? This is notwithstanding the uncertainties that you've talked about, and you're quite right, with the regulations, who knows what it's really going to cost us when we suddenly realize and start understanding the effect of some of these regulations and the benefits? But at this particular point in time, you must have some idea, speaking in general terms, as to what you believe the rates will go to for that minimum coverage.

Mr Rogacki: Again, it's very difficult to price it because the regulations are really not well defined and the regulations are really the hidden cost driver behind the legislation, so until the regulations are very well put in place and very well defined, it's almost impossible to precisely say what the coverage will cost. With that caveat, if you were to take Bill 164 and implement it, it would cost us roughly in the neighbourhood of 10% to 15% above fully priced OMPP.

Mr Harnick: On page 9 of your brief, I'm captivated by what you say. I think it's probably why you're described as the Progressive Casualty. You state: "The solution, particularly for seriously injured claimants, includes moving away from a categorization-based system and towards individual assessment rather than compensation by formula. Our position is that accident victims are entitled to be compensated, fully, for everything that they lost, no more and no less."

I think that shows you're a whole lot more progressive than the NDP government, because what that says to me is that if somebody suffers an economic loss beyond what the government wants to pay them under its categorization system, they should be able to do that, so that no one is suffering an economic loss and no one is out of pocket their actual losses. Correct?

Mr Conner: That would make for a better system design, in my view.

Mr Ward: I'd like to thank you gentlemen for coming out this morning and giving your views on Bill 164.

Shortly after our election as the government—it was common knowledge we disagreed with the Liberal OMPP plan in its form—when we realized that it was a bad time for public auto, the insurance industry met with myself and my colleagues and said: “Look, you can modify the existing plan to change it, to improve it. You don’t need public auto.” We said, “It’s bad timing for public auto,” so we moved ahead with Bill 164.

It’s my understanding that over the last two years there’s been approximately $1.3 billion in profits garnered by the auto insurance companies in Ontario. We recognize, as a government, that to make things fairer, to improve the benefits, there’s a cost to that and the Mercer actuarial study that was done for our government estimates that cost to be around 4%.

There are approximately 150 companies in Ontario which shared in that $1.3-billion profit. My understanding is that cost is going to be directly flowed through to the driving public in higher premiums. Is there not a competitive nature in the insurance industry in Ontario? Perhaps one company is going to say, “Sure, we’re going to have to absorb a little bit of that cost and perhaps not all of that cost will go into our premium, but we may lower some of our profit levels of that $1.3 billion.” Is there not a competitive edge in the insurance industry in Ontario?

Mr Rogacki: First, let’s address the $1.3 billion a little bit, and that is, it’s irrelevant. It’s apples and oranges to what we’re trying to talk about.

Historical profits are no more than tombstones, and actuarial rate-making looks at what an insurance company will need to charge now to be able to pay for claims later. The actuarial studies that were done simply say that in order to be able to pay for the cost of loss, its administrative expenses and some profit, the insurance system—not any particular company—must charge approximately 10% to 15%—13%, if you wish—above its fully priced OMPP rates. You’re right: Some companies may choose to charge less and some companies may choose to charge more.

Mr Ward: Depending on business decisions.

Mr Rogacki: Depending on business decisions. However, the cost of the system, as a whole, will increase by approximately 10% to 15%.

Mr Ward: Or 4%. That’s still debatable.

Mr Rogacki: As I said before, that’s debatable because of the caveats and the rules.

Mr Ward: One last question: The IBC, the Insurance Bureau of Canada, supports the creation of a task force to look at the rehab and long-term care. As a member of the IBC, do you support that initiative?

Mr Rogacki: Looking at the rehab and long-term care? Absolutely, it’s a great idea.

Mr Mancini: Mr Rogacki, I made about seven points for questions, but with the very limited time, I’ll narrow my questions down to two. First of all, I’d like to ask you about the draft regulations. You said on page 9 of your brief that the draft regs are “almost unintelligible to anyone, even a seasoned claims adjuster.” The Ontario motorist protection plan contained all its draft regs on 18 pages. The NDP government’s draft regs on Bill 164 are 68 pages of gobbledegook that not even people like yourself are able to understand, let alone the buying public.

I made the allegation in yesterday’s committee hearings that the draft regulations are going to turn the Ontario Insurance Commission into a new Workers’ Compensation Board, and I’d like your opinion on that.

Mr Conner: In principle, I see two responses to that. The first one is to say yes, it creates more mechanical complexity and steps and procedures and follow-ups to procedures, so it becomes a very much more systematized, bureaucratic approach to handling what are fundamentally human, personal, variable situations.

The other response is to say that the draft regulation, because of its design, almost has to have all these little rabbit warrens into which to stick a case, because of the categorization-based approach that’s been taken to paying for claims. It’s a necessary fallout from the system. That’s part of what leads us to the conclusion that, because the draft regulation is in such poor condition at this late stage in the legislative life of the bill, it’s imprudent to proceed with the bill until we can demonstrate that the draft regulation can be made such that it will support the legislation out in the real world.

Mr Mancini: Are you aware that the chairperson of the Ontario Insurance Commission has asked the government for $5 million and 100 more staff persons?

Mr Conner: I read that in this morning’s paper.

Mr Mancini: My second question is in regard to your comments on page 10 of your brief, where you emphasize the point I made yesterday, that the government’s own actuarial report used old, extrajurisdictional data, mainly from Quebec; I made the allegation yesterday. You further go on to say that these data are problematic. I’m assuming you mean that the 4.4% increase that Mercer and the government want to impose on the people could be significantly higher. You further go on to say that your own figures indicate that it could be 13%.

At 4.4%, the Ontario public will pay nearly $200 million more in insurance rates because of Bill 164. If we believe you instead of the government, and there’s great reason why we should, then that $200-million figure is very, very low. It could go up to $400 million. If we believe the Coopers and Lybrand people, it could go as high as 20%, meaning a $565-million increase from the Ontario public for its insurance rates.

I want to ask you, sir, do you think the people of Ontario are getting a bargain when they’re being asked to pay $565 million more, over and above what they’re actually paying for Bill 164, which strips people of the opportunity to regain economic loss?

Mr Conner: My customers would generally rather pay less than pay more, and it’s difficult to see how, with the exception of people who are at fault or people who are at very high earning levels, anyone’s going to do much better under this bill.

The Chair: Thank you for appearing before this committee. The time has run out.

MOTHERS AGAINST DRUNK DRIVING

The Chair: The next group we've got coming forward is Mothers Against Drunk Driving, MADD. We have Mr John Bates. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. You have one half-hour. In that half-hour, please leave some time at the end for the members of the committee to ask questions on your presentation. We'll be starting off with questioning from the government side first, after your brief.

Mr John Bates: I certainly welcome the opportunity. First of all, let me make one thing perfectly clear. We're the end users of insurance. We're not in the lawyers' camp, we're not in the insurance camp or the government's camp or anybody else. It's our contention that the only people who really know if an insurance system works or not are the end users: the victims of automobile crashes. If insurance doesn't work when you need it, if it doesn't work for the victims, then it doesn't work, period. If victims don't get fair, adequate and fast compensation, then something is radically wrong.

Our position on no-fault is well known. It hasn't changed one bit since then. The main objection we had to Bill 68 applies to Bill 164 in equal measure. While it's probably academic to talk about this at this point, we still believe the right to sue, the right to have full access to the courts, is a very basic right. It should be the very underpinning of our insurance system. It's the only way we can ensure that justice is done for all. That's what courts are for.

No-fault insurance discriminates against one class of victims, and one class only. Why is it, as Professor Carr said, that if you're hit by a boat in the water you can sue, but if you're hit by an automobile on the road you can't? Why? Can anybody answer that? I'd just love to have it. In fact, if you're hit by anything other than a car—a snowmobile, a tractor, an aircraft, even a power lawnmower or anything else—you can seek redress in the courts. Crash victims alone are denied that very basic right, and it doesn't make sense. It just doesn't.

This government promised to reinstate their right to sue with Bill 164, and in one sense, it did keep that promise by allowing car crash victims to sue for pain and suffering. But at the same time, it eliminated the real reason people were going to court in the first place, and that was for lost income.

At least Bill 68 allowed us access to the courts if the threshold was satisfied. Now even that's been taken away. Can somebody tell me why there is a $15,000 deductible for pain and suffering? Why a deductible at all? How on earth can anyone with less than the wisdom of Solomon himself decide if a person has had $15,000 worth of pain and suffering? Think about that for a minute. The very concept's just plain silly. You go to court and you say: "No, you've had $14,500 worth of pain and suffering. You can't sue. You've had $15,500. You can sue for $500." It's crazy. It's certainly, from the victim's point of view, absurd.

And how does the government propose to determine that a lost leg is worth $1,000 a week tops, and only then if you're making something like $60,000 or $70,000 a year?

Again, that's just blue-skying something. Surely we should have a two-tiered system, if the government insists on going ahead with this, to allow people access, to allow them to sue for that amount they don't get over their regular payment schedules.

But I don't really want to get into all the intricacies of the insurance thing, as I'm not qualified to do so. All I want to do is make sure the victims are taken care of.

Let me focus on what we're really talking about here and what these consultations are really about: It's about keeping costs down. However, forgotten in all the rhetoric about thresholds, deductibles and tort, in the end there is now, and always has been, one significant way of reducing premiums, and that's to reduce the number of crashes. Insurance premiums are a function of the crash rate, not the type of insurance. That's such an obvious statement, it seems silly to say it out loud.

There are some 980,000 automobile crashes in Ontario every year, which costs the insurance companies about $3 billion. It's elementary to point out that if we prevent just 10% of the crashes, we would save $300 million a year. The major saving to be made has little, if anything, to do with diddling around endlessly with the kind of insurance system, until we have come to grips with the underlying problem, which this government flatly refuses to do.

The attitude of this government seems to be that the high costs are the result of inefficiencies in the system. It's like saying the huge cost of health care is a result of inefficiency in the health care system, when the real cause is because people get sick. But we seem to be unable to transfer that logic to automobile insurance, because this government has done less than nothing to reduce the crash rate. I'll get into that later, on how they have done less than nothing.

For example, even though we know that the only effective deterrent to the tragedy of impaired driving is the roadside sobriety spot check, this government has withdrawn funding to the degree that the RIDE program is no longer effective. In fact, it doesn't even exist in smaller centres any more. It is not there, so impaired drivers have pretty much a free rein. It's been drastically cut back in Toronto: It's only about half the size it was a few years ago. It's no wonder insurance costs are going up.

There is only one way to reduce insurance premiums significantly, and that is to implement measures that will make certain that only those people who will drive safely in this province are allowed to drive at all. I'd like to drill that in, because there are people driving cars in this province on our roads and highways right now who ought not to be driving anything, anywhere, let alone a car; they shouldn't even be driving a bicycle.

MADD, previously known as PRIDE, has made endless proposals to governments on initiatives that will dramatically reduce the crash rate, but all to no avail. Many of these proposals have been put into effect in other jurisdictions with positive results, but this province remains mired in the backwaters of highway safety; it really is. I get embarrassed when I speak out west and so forth and hear what they're doing out there.

Some of these proposals are:

(1) Raise the legal drinking age to 21. While time does not permit me to go into the full rationale for raising the drinking age, the fact remains that it is the key to winning the battle against substance abuse and the battle against impaired driving. Inexperienced drinkers and inexperienced drivers have proven to be a deadly and tragic combination. Incidentally, the insurance bureau does back us up on this one. Obviously, if we can delay the onset of drinking, we also delay the onset of impaired driving. If alcohol is more difficult to obtain, then driving after drinking is more difficult to accomplish.

We should note that moving to 21 is supported by virtually every highway safety group, parents' group and health care agency in North America. The US has taken the move and experienced positive effects, a some 17% drop in crash rates. That's what they did. The young people in the US did not become unhinged because they did it.

All we are asking is that the government form a task force to study the possibility. The government's refusal to even form a task force to examine the question simply means it is more afraid of the light than the dark. All we are asking is that the government look at this tragedy of endless killing of our young people on our highways. Think about it: The automobile kills more of our young people than all other causes of death combined. A full 40% of the people killed on our roads and highways in this province are under the age of 25. As a compassionate society, we have to do something about that. But what are we going to do? What? Don't we care? It's madness to allow this to go on. It's a little bit like the bishops who refused to look through Galileo's telescope because they were afraid he might be right. That's why we can't get a task force.

We have to take some draconian measures to get insurance rates down and start saving lives.

(2) The graduated licence: We first made our presentation to Ed Fulton, who was then Minister of Transportation, in November 1986, and to every Minister of Transportation since that time. I first wrote about it many years ago when I was editor of a transportation magazine for Maclean Hunter. It works because we know that an inexperienced driver of any age is far more likely to get into a crash than any seasoned driver is.

At present, for example, it is possible or even likely to get a driver's licence in this province without ever having driven on a road. A relative or a friend can teach you how to stop and start in a parking lot somewhere, drive you to the local testing area where you do a three-point turn and parallel park—and hardly anybody gets killed parallel parking as far as I know—answer a few questions, get a licence on the spot and then drive a high-powered car on a superhighway in rush hour. That is madness. No wonder so many kids, who make up the majority of new drivers, get killed every year.

Wringing our hands and viewing with alarm won't help these kids. A graduated licence would allow new drivers to gain experience in an atmosphere of greatly reduced risk. It would limit the number of passengers, and that would avoid kids piling a bunch of others into a car and slamming into the side of a train in Milton, which happens all too often. It would limit them only to daylight hours, and they would have a zero BAC, blood-alcohol concentration, limit. As they develop their confidence and driving skills, they would proceed to the next level and so forth, until they've earned full driving privileges.

I'll leave a presentation we made to the government in 1986. Its reasoning still stands, and please don't tell me the government is looking at it, because one level or one form of government down here's been looking at it for seven years now and does nothing. Seven years mired in some bureaucratic ooze somewhere and they have done nothing about it and people are dying.

(3) Increase roadside sobriety spot checks: As mentioned, it doesn't matter what else you do to reduce the carnage caused by impaired driving. Nothing, absolutely nothing, will result in a decrease in the incidence of impaired driving crashes unless you have a well-publicized spot check program. However, this government has a policy of fewer spot checks, not more, and there are a lot of people in convalescent homes and hospitals and funeral homes who want to know why. So do I.

(4) Administrative licence suspension: When a driver has a BAC of over 0.08 following a properly administered breath test, his licence should be revoked on the spot. At present drivers retain their licence until they come to trial. Often they run up their second and third offence while awaiting trial for their first offence. All too often they kill somebody in that period.

Such a program is in effect in Manitoba, and it's gone all the way up to the Supreme Court and proven to be perfectly constitutional, and at least 29 states in the United States.

Manitoba's taken the step of suspending the licence of impaired drivers for 90 days—that's when they blew in a Borkenstein breathalyser—and reported a 50% drop in impaired driving offences in the first six months. Right there is the 10% drop you're looking for, in that one thing. Why not?

It also experienced a reduction in the court case load because more drivers are pleading guilty because they want their case to come to trial quickly.

This suggestion, incidentally, is simply an extension of the Ontario 12-hour suspension for drivers who blow over 0.05 on a roadside screening device, the little orange breathalyser the police use.

(5) A permanent licence suspension on a second offence: It's a sticky point. Anyone who would chance a mandatory two-year suspension and a 14-day jail term obviously has a drinking problem. Further, we know that most of the serious injuries and killings are done by drivers who have a BAC of 0.165. That's more than double the legal limit. These people have had a case of beer before they got behind the wheel of a car. This is the hard-core drinking driver who will not respond to reason. They are the ones who are most likely to cause serious injury or fatal crashes. If somebody kills you on the road this weekend, it's likely to be somebody who's been in the system before. It's somebody we should have taken out of the system a long time ago.

If these people can prove after two years or so that they no longer are a menace on our roads, then they can get a probationary licence back again. But if they do it again, if they trip up once more, then they no longer have the privilege of driving an automobile anywhere in this province, period.

So how do we stop them from driving while they're under suspension? Easy.

(6) Automobile confiscation: Anyone caught driving while under suspension should have their car seized by the crown and sold at auction, regardless of who owns the car. Whether it's a rental car or their Aunt Minnie's car or whoever's, they lose the car right there on the spot. We'd have to phase this thing in, but we'd be awfully careful who we lent our car to. In other words, you'd make it illegal to lend your car to an unlicensed driver, knowing full well your car would be forfeited if that unlicensed driver was caught driving it. It's a pretty simple thing to do.

(7) Licence endorsements: The insurance history and the serious crash rate of the so-called muscle cars clearly demonstrate that drivers should have special training and a special endorsement to own and drive one. I'm talking about cars like the Taurus SHO, which has an incredible torque on its front-wheel drive, and you know what happens when its wheels spin; it shoots the car into the other traffic lane. The Corvette, the LX7, the five-litre Mustang and similar overpowered cars have proven to be deadly in the wrong hands.

Not only are these cars inherently dangerous in inexperienced hands, but only too often the people who purchase them are exactly the ones who shouldn't. Probably some people around here own Corvettes or something, and I don't think much of them.

The Chair: We know one.

Mr Bates: There's one guy who talked about insurance a lot who has a red one, I understand. A big tall guy with cowboy boots.

A quick look at the insurance stats on these cars will prove the point. In fact, we should seriously question the logic of even producing these cars for general use on our roads. I mean, there's no reason people should be driving a five-litre Mustang. The place for that thing's on the Indianapolis Speedway.

(8) Leaving the scene: The penalty for failing to remain at the scene of a serious crash should be the same as it would be if the person had been convicted. In other words, right now it's more advantageous to flee because you'll get a slap on the wrist, rather than stay and chance a second offence. So when you catch them finally, you simply nail them for something a lot more stringent than it is now.

Unless and until you are prepared to take some very strong measures to make our highways safer for all road users, it's futile and probably hypocritical to even talk about lowering premiums by fine-tuning the insurance system.

The much-touted Ontario Road Safety Corp is yet another example of organization of style over substance. It allows the government to look like it is actually doing something, when in fact it's doing nothing at all. Just why it's being considered escapes me completely. There are a number of non-governmental groups like the Traffic Injury

Research Foundation that have been doing this work for years at no cost to the taxpayers. Just what this new organization can contribute to the well of knowledge in this field is rather obscure.

All the aforementioned initiatives can be implemented within the MOT without reference to another level of government spending. As I said before, we're already slugging through some bureaucratic ooze trying to get some of these things before government, and let's not let another level set in.

In summary, we would ask the government to withdraw consideration of Bill 164 until you've addressed the real, underlying problem, and that is quite clearly to implement measures which will lower the crash rate and start saving lives. We've waited long enough. Someone once said that what MADD does with victims is that we help them to survive, to start living, and to dare to dream again. We aren't going to do that with no-fault insurance. We've waited long enough. We're tired of answering our phones to the anguished cries of victims asking us to answer unanswerable questions.

You don't refuse to raise the drinking age because you think it's politically unpopular; you raise it because it's morally correct. You don't delay bringing in the graduated licence because it might be unpopular; you bring it in because it will save lives. You don't turn your back on the police RIDE program because you think there are more important priorities; you maintain it because it stops the killing—and it does.

And mostly, you implement these safety measures because you believe that the people of Ontario have a right to use their roads and highways in safety. Do you know, when you're driving up to your cottage some night, one out of every eight drivers has been drinking that you meet in the road? What are you going to do about it? You won't get the insurance premiums down until you've done all in your power to make sure that only those who drive safely can drive at all. This is, and must be, this government's first and most pressing priority. You owe that much to the people of Ontario.

Thank you. If I sound angry, I am.

The Chair: I think a lot has to do with the drivers and the way they drive and pass on the right. I was driving in Europe on the autobahn at about 180 kilometres an hour, but it depends on the other drivers and how well they drive, and you never pass on the right in Europe.

Mr Bates: That's right, you don't.

Mr Phillips: Except in England.

The Chair: Well, yes, okay. That's different. We'll go to Mr Dadamo. You have four minutes each.

Mr Dadamo: Mr Bates, thank you very much. I wanted to say in the onset that I spent a couple of years in transportation as parliamentary assistant and we spent much time talking about graduated licensing, ad nauseam at times—

Mr Harnick: Talking.

Mr Dadamo: Thank you. I can hear you.

You've said it verbally and I can see it's written all over your face that you're very sceptical on graduated licensing and the idea, but I believe the time has come to implement. The Minister of Transportation certainly is committed to seeing this through.

But there are some problems in legislating anything, sir, and one that the government seems to have a problem with is with northern Ontario. Some people in that part of this province argue that they should be treated differently under a graduated licensing system. For example, they would say that given the lack of public transit there should be a different set of rules for people in northern Ontario and rural Ontario. Could you comment on that idea?

Mr Bates: The whole idea of a graduated licence and the various kinds of graduated licensing are not etched in stone. For example, we say that people should not be allowed to drive on high-speed roads. What about somebody whose driveway backs out on to a 100-kilometre road? All he could do is drive up and down his driveway. So obviously you have to have that kind of thing built into the system. It would not apply throughout the entire province. For example, students or somebody may require their car to drive at night to go to work. That's okay. They get an endorsement on their licences saying it's okay for them to drive from here to here. The same thing would apply to northern Ontario. You could set a line north of Minaki, where, say, different rules apply. That's perfectly logical. The whole thing is not engraved in stone. It varies, and it would be up to the local MOT person to do that.

Mr Klopp: That was basically my question, too. I think you've given a very good brief. I understand where you're coming from. In fact, I've talked to students, because they're the ones—you talk about the political realities and I guess I've come around. I think I like to try to work on things because they're right and then work back. If it's right to me, I'll take the political hit. I've been around here for 10 years and it doesn't bother me that much.

One of the things you've talked about: You've been involved with MTO on these discussions since—

Mr Bates: Since 1986, that's right, and I wrote about it—I used to be the editor and publisher of Bus and Truck Transport. I used to have Arthur Hailey's old job.

Mr Klopp: Okay. I do know, because I've been pushing some of these things. I talked to students and hit them head-on with this question. You joke about it when you run into them at the corner store in town: "I hope you guys don't do this; I'm going to be 16 next month and I want to get my licence." But I've come to realize the numbers, and on other committees—in fact I think I've been on a committee where you've come before—and it does sober you up, and there is a bigger picture. I would just like to say that the students—there were about 75 in the room—I didn't pull any punches with them and I was surprised. I heard after from their parents, because they were here in this building, that they were quite impressed and they thought it was something that it is more and more to do. Unfortunately, we've had a couple of bad accidents in our area and of course, like anything—we're all guilty of it—when it hits home then you see the other side so very clearly. So I commend you for that work.

Mr Bates: What it does is put a very important tool in the hands of the parents. They can say, "No, you have a night-time endorsement on your licence; therefore, no, you can't have the car." I can think of several hundred young lives that that one endorsement would have saved because their parents said, "No, it's not me; you don't have the licence to do it."

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the presentation. You can be helpful, I think, to the committee just in terms of helping us a little bit, perhaps, on the financial side of things, because I think your brief may raise some opportunities for us. The bill we have before us right now is going to represent, for the people of Ontario, about a $200-million increase in insurance premiums. That's the minimum. That's the lowest estimate we've had. The lowest is $200 million, going up to $500 million. The government just this morning announced that the social assistance rates will go up about $60 million. That's all that can be afforded, 1%. But we're going to ask the people of Ontario to fork over another minimum $200 million, perhaps up to $500 million, for increased insurance premiums, just because of the bill, in addition to any other rate increases. My question to you really is, have you any feeling on what might happen if we implemented your recommendations? You've got an estimate of 10% in here, I think.

Mr Bates: It's not an estimate. If it did that I think we'd get far greater than that; I think it'd be far more than 10%. For example, the States got a 17% reduction in impaired driving crashes among teenagers when they put in the age 21 alone.

You see, there's one group of people who are causing all the trouble. It's 10%, basically, of the so-called alcohol abusers. The people who abuse alcohol—I won't get into all this—abuse alcohol largely because they're carrying a lot of bad baggage. They're very aggressive people. They transfer their aggression to their cars. They're people who are socially immobile, but put some alcohol into them and they're deadly. If we can put in a system we'll simply pull those people out of the system like the graduated licence will and the permanent licence suspension/confiscation of automobiles will do. Ultimately, we'll get these people out. The roads will be a heck of a lot safer; we'll save a lot more than 10%; a lot more.

The Chair: You've got two minutes left, Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: In terms of the graduated licence, would you see that for all people applying for the first time for a licence in Ontario, so that if you moved here from the States and applied for a licence you would see that?

Mr Bates: You'd have to start right back at the beginning, but at the discretion of the examiner; he would decide what level you'd reached. The graduated licence has another great example. For example, we now take licences away from people when they get to be advanced seniors, but with the graduated licence you take them back down again so they can still drive to the doctor, still drive to the bridge game, still drive to the store, but they can't drive on super-highways at night.

Mr Phillips: Right, and in terms of the RIDE program, again, I'm just trying to get a feeling of what savings—I hate to put this in financial terms because it's the human side we're more worried about, but just what savings might you see as a result of that stepped-up RIDE program?

Mr Bates: They would be huge. When the RIDE program goes into effect at the end of the year, the crash rate just goes down like so because of the perception of it. Out in rural Ontario, the perception doesn't exist because it doesn't; there is no such thing.

Mr Phillips: So there are statistics where you show that in the last two weeks in December?

Mr Bates: Absolutely.

Mr Tilson: Thank you very much for your thoughts, Mr Bates. I think you've put your finger on the real issue. I've got the impression from this government that it's saying, "Our proposal is better than the OMPP, and that's that." That's what they're doing. We've listened to the statistics they've been putting forward, which are very minimal, and if anything, rates are going to go up. In other words, they're putting forward a plan that's going to give us fewer rights, but it's going to cost us more.

I think the statement that jumped out from your presentation was, "Unless and until you are prepared to take some very strong measures to make our highways safer for all road users, it is futile and probably hypocritical to even talk about lowering premiums by fine-tuning the insurance system." In other words, the real issue in this whole exercise is, how are we going to stop accidents? How are we going to stop the carnage?

Mr Bates: That is the issue.

Mr Tilson: We've been pushing the graduated licensing proposal since this government came into office. We've gone through different Transportation ministers. For the life of me, it's baffling why they can't put it forward, because as you say, you did start to talk about it many years ago.

My question, Mr Bates, is with respect to the threshold test. I know we've all heard it and I'm going to read it out again, and it will be read over many times, Bob Rae said when he was opposition leader and when he was appearing before the Osborne commission:

"Nor do we consider it necessary or appropriate to impose any kind of 'threshold' requirement, limiting the right to sue to those whose loss exceeds a specified dollar amount or stated degree of injury.

"New Democrats are opposed to the loss of individual legal rights entailed by such thresholds."

It's a rather astounding position that we're in.

Mr Bates: I stood right beside Bob Rae on platforms. What has happened here now is they're picking on the weakest members of society and taking the rights away from the crash victims, people lying in hospital beds and so forth. I just wish some of these people could come and answer our phones just for a day and try to answer the unanswerable questions we try to answer.

Mr Tilson: The very people the NDP people over here are trying to protect—I don't know what they're receiving, but I'll tell you about the letters and criticisms I'm receiving already about the existing system, the OMPP. Whether you're for or against it is one thing, but this system is far worse. I appreciate your comment that the real issue is how we're going to stop the carnage.

Mr Bates: We're apolitical. I don't care what government's in.

The Chair: A few minutes, Mr Harnick.

Mr Harnick: Mr Bates, does it grate on you that someone who is at fault for causing an accident ends up, under this scheme and under the OMPP, basically receiving the same amount as the innocent accident victim?

Mr Bates: What do you mean "the same as"? Take someone like me. I don't get a nickel for doing what I do. I'm a total volunteer. I don't have any salary coming in at all. I live on a pension. If a high-priced lawyer hits me, he gets all sorts of money and I get $165 a week. What do you mean "the same as"? It infuriates me about that.

Mr Harnick: In terms of a determination of fault, why is that something that is so important to you as the person who looks after Mothers Against Drunk Driving and also PRIDE, People to Reduce Impaired Driving Everywhere?

Mr Bates: Victims have no rights; impaired drivers have all kinds of rights. The victim is going to be thrown out of court if the defence thinks it may jeopardize the case. Victims don't have any rights. The only chance they ever have of gaining any rights at all is in effect to take their tormentors before a court and get some kind of retribution. That's the basic thing that's so angering about no-fault.

The Chair: Mr Harnick, your time has run out. Mr Owens, you have a comment?

Mr Owens: In terms of a statement of fact that was made by Mr Harnick that an impaired person who is the cause of an accident gets the same benefits as the injured, that is not true. A person who is convicted of impaired driving gets absolutely no weekly benefits.

Mr Harnick: If he's convicted. What about the person who's drinking and isn't convicted? What about the person who speeds? What about the person who's charged with careless driving because he made an improper left-hand turn and didn't look? What about the person who deliberately speeds? As parliamentary assistant, I think you better go back to the drawing board and learn what this is all about, because you absolutely have no clue about what happens in a motor vehicle accident. Your ignorance is appalling.

Mr Owens: I think, sir, that you should go back to law school to learn decorum, because if you pulled this kind of stuff in a courtroom, you'd be summarily tossed out on your head.

Mr Harnick: I beg your pardon? I'll go to court any time with you, any day, any week, anyplace, and I'll tell you, you'll be the one tossed out of court, not me.

The Chair: Mr Harnick—

Mr Owens: I don't think so.

The Chair: Mr Bates, I'm sorry for this outburst. I thought we were all gentlemen in here.

Mr Bates: I am anyway.

The Chair: Thanks, Mr Bates. It's a pleasure having you here. Thank you for presenting. I know you don't get paid, as you said, but you're out there for everybody's interest.

MARKEL INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA

The Chair: The next group is the Markel Insurance Co of Canada. Would you come forward please. Mr William Grant, president, I presume?

Mr William Grant: That's right.

The Chair: Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. Do you have some associates with you?

Mr Grant: Yes, I do.

The Chair: Come forward and take a seat. We're studying Bill 164. I believe you've got a brief to present. If you don't mind starting, we have one half-hour. Before you get going, would you mind identifying yourself and your colleagues for the purposes of Hansard. You may begin.

Mr Grant: My name is William Grant. I'm president of Markel Insurance Co. On my right is David Gaskin, who is one of our loss prevention consultants, and Nora Hillyer, who is our underwriting manager.

By way of introduction, Markel Insurance Co is a Canadian-owned and operated insurance company which has specialized in providing trucking insurance since 1951 and I think is widely recognized as the expert in this field. Indeed, I think we're the only insurance company that specializes totally in trucking insurance.

Not only are we in the insurance business, but part of that business we feel is a partnership with the trucking industry and a partnership in safety. Markel has long been known for its commitment to safety and loss prevention.

Currently, we have a staff of five loss prevention experts who do a variety of functions which are listed in a paper attached to the back of the report. These functions vary between developing and evaluating safety programs for our fleet operators. We visit our clients at least every 90 days. We conduct facility audits in accordance with the National Safety Code and the US federal motor carrier safety regulations.

We conduct seminars for management personnel and conduct driver seminars on safe driving techniques, log-book-keeping, hours-of-service compliance, air brake systems, load security and handling and transportation of dangerous and hazardous goods. We assist with safety meetings with our insureds and participate in the Markel Safe Driver Awards program, which consists of annual presentations of yearly safe-driver pins for accident-free driving. We also make available our driver evaluation and upgrading and road tests for pre- and post-employment at our school of transport training.

In 1988, we created a transport training school or truck driver training school in Guelph, Ontario, to elevate the level of transport driver training in Ontario. This was brought about basically from our insureds, who told us that while there were lots of drivers out there with class A licences, they were not qualified drivers, ie, the level of training was not adequate. We established the school to improve on the level of expertise in the driving area.

We work closely with government and industry groups on matters of safety. Our staff wrote the air brake handbook for the Ministry of Transportation. We have been pro-active on the issue of drug testing for transport training and are currently working with the Ministry of Transportation on the system it is looking at of evaluating the safety levels of various fleet operators in Ontario.

We're active members of the Ontario Trucking Association, the Ontario Safety League, the Transportation Safety Association and the Canada Safety Council.

In terms of the trucking industry, unlike most other businesses, insurance costs are very significant for the trucking business. They represent about 3% to 4% of the cost of a trucking operation, which is very significant compared to most other industries.

Trucking employs over 200,000 people directly in Ontario and represents 4% of the gross provincial product. Much of the trucking business is the independent small business that our economy needs to encourage.

The trucking business is in trouble trying to compete. I think we're all aware of the protests etc over the last few years by the trucking industry as it tries to deal with the issues of deregulation and free trade. Surprisingly enough, as has been noted by the OTA, insurance is one area where we have been competitive. Obviously, we want to protect that system.

A trucking business cannot operate without insurance, and significant insurance facilities have gone from the market. United Canada went into receivership in the mid-1980s. Transit Insurance Co withdrew last year. We feel reasonable insurance rates stem from stable claims costs and a stable market. This exists today, but Bill 164 could change this. The OMPP overlooked the problems of the trucking industry and added to the problems. We ask that you don't do it again.

In general, we want to state that we share the concerns of the remainder of the insurance industry over the issue of the deductible, which we think will also be difficult or expensive to administer in that we will now have to investigate every claim because we will not be sure whether it will exceed the deductible at the time we reported the loss. So our internal claims-handling costs will increase significantly.

We believe complex and very expensive first-party benefits will increase the costs, again in accordance with the Insurance Bureau of Canada. This impact will also be directly on the trucking insurance industry and it will pass the costs through.

We are happy to see the motions to amend the bill with respect to withdrawal and other issues presented by the minister.

We refer to specific problems for Markel, the trucking industry—I should say the other insurers who provide trucking insurance—and ultimately consumers and the people who depend on the trucking industry. We must remember that it's the consumer who ultimately pays in commercial trucking insurance if costs go up. They pay increased costs for their consumer goods. Or if the company cannot compete and goes out of business, the people who work there lose their jobs.

One issue that was part of the OMPP was the issue of loss transfer. Section 275 of the Insurance Act prescribes a procedure of transfer of losses from "such class or classes of automobiles as may be named in the regulations." The insurer of a prescribed class of vehicle is required to indemnify the insurer of the victim of the accident for no-fault benefits paid based on fault. A regulation has been issued which applies this section to vehicles with a weight of more than 4,500 kilograms.

Notwithstanding the importance of the trucking industry and our role in the support of that industry, we are unable to offer any rationale for this provision, and we were not consulted in the first place. Basically, the OTA and ourselves believe this is a strictly discriminatory view of the trucking industry, which is viewed as the bad guy on the road. We think statistics show that in actual fact the truck driver is the safer man on the road.

The effect of the provisions is to require trucking insurers to provide no-fault benefits—statutory accident benefits—and to pay huge tort losses as well. Trucking insurers are required to operate in two systems and do not see the benefits of any tradeoffs to offset the increased accident benefits. There are no reciprocal provisions that would allow recovery of the accident benefits paid to a trucker from the insurer of a private passenger vehicle. In essence, the transfers are one-sided.

Also, the potential for a large catastrophic claim is much greater under this loss transfer provision with the enhanced benefits of Bill 164. Essentially, the scenario can be given where a truck could be involved in an accident involving a bus or multiple cars, all of which transfer the loss back to the truck operator and his insurer, who has really no protection from policy limits, because they're all accident benefits.

That exposure is virtually unlimited. It requires us as an insurance company to carry significantly large reinsurance protection, but even then we are unsure at what level to buy this protection. These costs again are transferred into the trucking sector.

The issue of inverse property damage: Section 263 of the Insurance Act provides for direct compensation for property damage. This means that each insurer pays for its policyholder's physical damage when the vehicle is in an accident and is damaged by someone else's negligent conduct.

This is a reversal of traditional liability. For private passenger insurers, this seems to be a satisfactory system. The additional amounts they pay for damage to policyholder vehicles is offset by the amounts they don't have to pay for damage to other vehicles involved in accidents with the policyholder.

For truckers and their insurers, this balance doesn't exist. The costs for damage to trucks is very much greater than the loss to private passenger trucks. This change was imported by the OMPP and didn't take into account the special needs of the trucking industry.

With specific reference to the draft regulations, they contain many provisions that are of particular concern to the trucking industry and its insurers.

The definition in section 1 of the regulations includes as insured persons "any person specified in the policy." We are uncertain as to the meaning or intent of this provision. However, commercial automobile insurance does consider that insured automobiles will be operated by many people, and often those people are identified for underwriting and other purposes. If they are all specified, then the insurer of the business vehicle becomes the insurer of these persons, their spouses and the dependants of either. We often have schedules of drivers attached to a policy or part of the application.

The insurer of the truck will be providing an expensive coverage for a large number of people. While most of these individuals will have personal policies to approach in the case of loss, we cannot know that at the time of underwriting and we cannot predict which policy will be selected by the individuals for a claim. A commercial trucking policy is potentially converted to broad personal, portable coverage for a very large number of people. Again, we don't think the trucking industry was considered when this provision was put in. In essence, cost is added, but there are no perceptible benefits resulting.

Section 69 of the regulations provides that a person for whom "an automobile is made available for...regular use" is treated as if a named insured. This section entails providing the additional coverage for the spouse and dependents as well. The concept of regular use is difficult. This will multiply costs with respect to vehicles that have many regular users. No additional benefit is provided in exchange for these costs. The individuals involved will continue to have full coverage under their personal vehicles.

Section 56 of the regulations offers a claimant an option of receiving statutory accident benefits instead of workers' compensation simply by filing a form with the Workers' Compensation Board. The drafters seem to contemplate this option for victims who are pursuing tort remedies, but do not provide any safeguard against nominal elections that are pursued or that result in a dismissal of a tort claim. The claimant appears to be entitled to artificially opt out of workers' compensation. This will add costs to the insurance system and we don't think a great deal of savings for workers' compensation towards insureds.

Our recommendations:

Alterations to the automobile insurance system must take into account the ramifications for the trucking industry and the insurers of that industry. It should not undertake fundamental changes without regard to the brutal impact on a fragile sector of this economy.

In addition to the concerns of the other sectors of the insurance industry, we urge government to dampen the adverse effect on the trucking industry by the following measures:

(a) preclude loss transfer against heavy commercial vehicles under section 275 of the act;

(b) exempt accidents involving heavy commercial vehicles from inverse property damage by amending section 263 of the act, or enact a regulation to allow subrogation for these losses pursuant to clause 263(5)(b) of the act;

(c) revive the draft regulations as follows:

— Eliminate the reference in section 1 of the regulations to “specified persons.” Alternatively, restrict this extension of coverage to private passenger automobiles.

— Eliminate the extension of coverage in section 69. Alternatively, restrict the extension to private passenger vehicles provided for the person’s regular use.

— Eliminate the option of automobile accident benefits for individuals injured during the course of employment. Alternatively, allow recourse to accident benefits only where a tort remedy is actively and successfully pursued. In other cases, the workers’ compensation scheme should deal with the case, provide benefits to the worker and reimburse the automobile insurer.

As we have shown, Markel has made a commitment and investment in loss prevention and safety in the trucking industry through our loss prevention department and driver training school. We know it works to reduce losses and save lives, and we are extremely disappointed that Bill 164 will add to the cost of insurance but that road safety is not addressed. Along with the Ontario Trucking Association, we urge that safety issues be made a major focus of this government.

Bill 164 as it presently stands will have a very negative impact on the trucking industry. We urge the government to listen to the concerns expressed by the Ontario Trucking Association and ourselves. The OTA has provided a letter to Mr Brian Charlton. I’d like to read that, if I may. This is from David Bradley, the president of the OTA.

“Dear Minister:

“During each of the past few rounds of insurance reform, the focus has been upon private automobiles. This is also true of Bill 164. However, a significant commercial automobile insurance market also exists, which must be taken fully into account. The trucking industry is a major consumer of commercial automobile insurance and is, as a result, interested in the impacts which Bill 164 could visit upon our industry.

“Bill 164 has, in places, either not addressed some of the concerns that exist in trucking over the present act, or it raises the prospect of unintentionally impacting upon the industry, where certain measures designed to address the private automobile sector are applied to commercial trucking.

“Moreover, we are very concerned that the changes to the threshold provisions contained in the bill will lead to a return to the costly litigious environment which had existed prior to the introduction of no-fault insurance. We fear this will unnecessarily put upward pressure on premiums once again.

“The Ontario trucking industry is an essential component of the Ontario manufacturing process. It is Ontario’s most preferred mode of freight transportation. Trucks haul 80% to 90% of all consumer products and foodstuffs produced and consumed in the province. It is also an industry that crosses borders. Trucks haul 75% of Ontario’s exports to the United States and deliver 80% of the province’s imports from the United States. The industry,” as mentioned, “employs approximately 200,000 people.

“To survive, our industry must be competitive. Insurance costs—both claims and coverage—can represent 3% to 4% of total costs. Consequently, we are concerned over any measures which could raise the costs of the Ontario trucking industry, further impairing our ability to compete. Commercial insurance has been one area of cost where Ontario carriers have been competitive with US carriers. Obviously, we want and need to sustain that situation.

“The Ontario trucking industry also has an enviable safety record. This often does not appear to be clearly recognized by the public and policymakers. Data for 1990, compiled in the Ministry of Transportation’s road safety annual report, show that tractor/semi-trailer units were involved in only about 1.5% of all highway accidents. In terms of the type of accident, these units were involved in 1.6% of all accidents where there was property damage, 1.1% of personal injury accidents, and 7% of fatal accidents.

“Moreover, the above numbers reflect the proportion of these trucks involved in accidents, not whether the truck was at fault or not. But, the same Ontario road safety report also shows that trucks are not at fault most of the time. The data indicate that for fatal accidents involving trucks, drivers with a class A licence—the kind needed to drive a tractor-trailer unit—were driving properly in 76.8% of the accidents. The incidence of alcohol as a factor in fatal accidents was 4% among class A drivers, compared to 19% for all drivers (including truck drivers).

“While the industry constantly works to improve its record even further—safety is good business—I believe these numbers are often a surprise to many people who have, for whatever reason, developed a misconception of the industry and its safety record.

“The industry’s safety record certainly indicates that it is not a loss causer, as implied by the loss transfer provisions contained in section 275 of the Insurance Act. Under the loss transfer provisions,” as we mentioned, “automobile insurers can subrogate no-fault payments in excess of $2,000 from a truck insurer, where an accident between a car and a truck has occurred and the truck has been found to be at fault. No similar right to subrogate is available to the truck insurer. And the cost of a truck is significantly higher than that of an automobile.

“This is blatantly discriminatory. The decision by the former government to introduce the loss transfer provision was not founded on sound actuarial analysis. The perception of trucks as loss causers is at best perceived, but more likely erroneous.

“In our view, Bill 164 should address this issue by deleting the loss transfer provisions as they relate to trucks, unless and until any inequities arise in the system that are revealed through actual claims experience.

“OTA has long been concerned over the potential impact upon a carrier’s workers’ compensation experience rating for benefits paid to a truck driver injured in an accident, but not at fault. We have proposed that the Workers’ Compensation Board be allowed to subrogate from at-fault third parties.

"We do not feel that the option proposed under section 56 of the draft regulations resolves this problem appropriately. Providing a choice between WCB benefits and statutory accident benefits does not remove the WCB experience rating impacts and merely transfers the costs to the insurer. In the end, it all comes out of the same pocket, as companies would have to pay either higher insurance premiums or higher WCB assessment rates.

"We are also concerned that sections 1(a) (insured persons) and 69 (regular use/company automobiles) of the draft regulations may have some unintended consequences for purchasers of commercial insurance. Our concern is that these regulations might be interpreted in such a broad way that a truck driver might be able to claim for family members or other regular drivers of his/her personal vehicle—for which he/she has personal coverage—under the commercial policy of his/her employer. We need either an assurance that our interpretation of what may be possible under the above sections is wrong, or a specific exemption/amendment for commercial trucks.

"Finally, it is our opinion that the persistent focus on premiums that seems to dominate policy initiatives and discussions relating to automobile insurance is not necessarily the most effective approach. It is our belief that the key to lower insurance premiums is improved safety.

"The trucking industry invests in safety and is also subject to a significant degree of government regulation (eg, mandatory vehicle inspections, maintenance programs, driver retesting, hours of service, regulations etc). We are seeking continuous improvement in our safety performance, and often feel that if the average motorist were subjected to some of the same type of vehicle and driver requirements that the trucking industry is, our roads and highways would be much safer. Moreover, we have long advocated a mandatory reduction in the allowable level of blood alcohol content, but have yet to find a government that is prepared to give this proposal serious consideration. These are just suggestions, but we feel there would be merit in your exploring them further."

Again, I would make the point that I think ourselves and the OTA feel that the truck drivers are either forgotten or perceived as the bad guy on the road when these insurance regulations are redrafted, and we would ask again that our considerations be taken into account and that safety be a focus for this.

The Chair: We know Mr Bradley quite well. He's appeared before this committee on budget consultations, and Mr Phillips knows him quite well too. I think for many years we saw him there. Mr Phillips, you're on first, for about three minutes.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the presentation. I have a general question for you, to do with costs. Based on everything we've heard to date, the minimum that this new bill will cost the people of Ontario is $200 million. That's going to be the minimum increase in premiums. That will be on top of the normal increases. Just by passing the bill, the increased costs will be $200 million. That's what the government estimates. I think other people in the insurance industry feel it could be as high as $500 million.

We've questioned the priorities of the government saying, "We're prepared to put a burden of $200 million to $500 million on the taxpayers to fund this, but we can't afford to do a whole bunch of other things." It's just a question of priorities.

Knowing the trucking industry as well as you do and having a fair idea of this bill, I have two questions. One is, do you have any estimates yourselves of by what the premiums might go up? And if the insurance premiums were to go up by these 5% up to 20% increases on top of your regular ones, do you have any feeling of the impact that might have on our Ontario trucking industry?

Mr Grant: Again, it's difficult to judge this, but we tend to support the IBC view of the increased costs, and we think they are going to tend to be higher for the trucking industry as opposed to private passenger because of loss transfer. We cannot put a dollar figure on it, but I would certainly think that if the IBC is looking at 20%, then we should be looking at something in excess of that.

As you may be aware, when you come to the rating of commercial trucking vehicles, they're not like private passenger vehicles, on a fleet-rated basis. They're usually judged or rated on their experience. So whatever the costs go up is what we will see in our claims, and that's reflected automatically as we develop those.

Mr Tilson: I have two questions. The message you have expressed, which certainly concerns me, is something I think the committee needs to look at. Given that there are increases in insurance, you're warning us that the trucking business, which is probably on a very fine thread as it is, particularly since this government has taken office, the concerns you've had in dealing with competition in the United States and firms going out of business and loss of jobs—how serious is that fear, if these rates go up, as being predicted by such groups as the IBC?

Mr Grant: I can only comment that we visit many of our insureds—maybe I'll ask David to make his comment, because he's closer with the industry directly, but many of them are on the edge. A number of these companies have gone out of business in the last number of years. Unfortunately, I didn't get a chance to get the details of the number, but we certainly have seen the loss of jobs, the loss of small businesses in the trucking sector, and companies tell me they're really on the edge. I would think a slight push is going to hurt a number of these companies. If availability of insurance becomes difficult, it could be—David, do you have anything?

Mr David Gaskin: Some of the standard figures that are being used in the industry in assessing the profitability or the viability of the trucking industry are something in the neighbourhood of 98%-plus for an operating ratio, so profits of under 2%. If insurance costs go up another 1% of revenue, that means these companies literally are operating with no margin. Consequently, any upward movement in insurance costs is going to have a dramatic effect on the trucking industry, and the trucking industry literally is the connecting link that enables all our employers to operate efficiently.

Mr Tilson: I have one further question in your capacity as an insurance company, aside from your comments with respect to the trucking industry. I'd like you to respond to the minister's comments that were reported in the press, in this morning's papers at least, where he simply said the insurance companies are making all kinds of money, that notwithstanding the fact that costs are going to be going up substantially, you people are making all kinds of money and rates simply will not go up.

Just as an example from the Toronto Sun, he reiterated his indication that in fact the government really supports a government-run system, which is kind of scary. However, he then continues by saying:

"He said insurance companies make enough profit to absorb any increase resulting from the proposed NDP overhaul. The province will get tough"—the iron fist is going to come down on you people, according to the minister, at least—"with any insurance company which tries to pass on unjustified premium hikes, he said. He dismissed insurance industry studies which indicate that rates will jump an average $200 under the NDP plan."

What's your reaction to those comments?

Mr Grant: My reaction is twofold. One, a major writer, especially a writer of trucking insurance, was the Transit Insurance Co. They ceased writing business in the middle of last year, so if they're making tons of profit, it certainly didn't get to them.

Ourselves, we are operating on an underwrite loss position. It produced profit, but that's fine: We're entitled to a profit. The fact that the OTA states that its insurance rates are competitive is I think an interesting factor, where the buyer of the insurance product is actually saying he's satisfied with the insurance environment that exists. So we don't have a case where the consumer, in this case the trucking industry, is complaining about the cost of insurance. They're saying the cost of insurance is adequate and reasonable and makes them competitive against their US competitors. So if your customer isn't complaining, I don't know—

The Chair: I'm going to go to Mr Phillips again. I cut him off a little short. That's why he was looking at this watch. You have another minute, Mr Phillips, for a question.

Mr Tilson: Did you cut me off too, Mr Chair?

The Chair: No, I gave you an extra minute.

Mr Phillips: I'd just pursue those comments, because I'm preoccupied, almost, with the financial problems of all this. I do believe that the economy continues to struggle very much. As I said earlier, it's really strange to me that the government's prepared to increase the premiums to the taxpayers in Ontario by at least $200 million to $500 million and then today, for example, it can't find any more money for social assistance. It's just a strange priority.

But I want to get to your point on the trucking industry, that the industry feels this is one area where, currently at least, it's satisfied. Why in the world would a government then want to impose another cost? Mr Tilson's right. It'll increase the cost to you by about 20% on your premiums.

You're saying here that 4% of your expenses go to insurance. The companies are making perhaps, at best, 2% before taxes. It's going to wipe out their profits, essentially. I think that's what you're saying here. What is driving the government to head in this direction, in your opinion?

Mr Grant: I think the government has not considered the trucking industry whatsoever in this legislation. I don't think it has addressed it and thought about it.

Mr Ward: Thank you for coming forth and giving your views on Bill 164 as it pertains to your particular company. You may not have heard some of the proceedings, but it's my impression that the Conservative Party feels that the pre-no-fault insurance system for motor vehicles was the preferable one, which had an open-ended right to sue. The Liberals, who brought in the OMPP, are now saying that there should be the ability to sue for economic loss.

In the letter from the Ontario Trucking Association, it states, "A return to the costly litigious environment...will unnecessarily put upward pressure on premiums once again." Do you agree with that point of view that the OTA has expressed?

Mr Grant: Yes. We do not wish to return to, as you say, an open-ended litigious situation. We think that's not fruitful for anyone. I'm not here to speak on behalf of the OTA, but I think it's been stated on public record that it's in favour of full no-fault insurance. We basically are supporters of that position.

Mr Ward: Which in essence takes away the ability to sue.

Mr Grant: We are quite happy, and so is the industry, living with the present OMPP.

Mr Ward: You also mention that you support the views of the Insurance Bureau of Canada. I believe you stated they perceive a 20% increase. I'd just like to correct you that their actuary report, conducted by Wyatt, estimated around a 13%, 14% increase. Beyond that, the large portion of their cost concern is with the long-term care, rehab part of insurance.

Now that the government has created the task force to examine that particular issue and look at costs and cost containment, the IBC yesterday said that because of this, until this task force can evaluate, it doesn't even think the Wyatt report and the percentage increase can be fairly accurately stated because of the uncertainties. Do you share that view of the IBC? You said on record you support them.

Mr Grant: All I'm saying with IBC is that we support its position that claims will be higher. Actuaries will get together, hopefully, and put a number on this, but I'm saying we feel it will have a greater impact on the trucking industry.

The Chair: I'm sorry, Mr Ward, I'm going to have to cut you off.

Mr Ward: Mr Phillips got longer than I did, Mr Chair.

The Chair: No, I've been watching real close.

Mr Grant, I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee. This is something new, because we've heard from Mr Bradley quite a few times, and it was fuel, road taxes, roads and depreciation. This is a new one. Thanks for coming before this committee.

Mr Ward: Before we adjourn, I have a question for legislative research. Mr Tilson made reference to four reports based on costs of Bill 164. I know of two actuaries, Mercer, which is the government, Wyatt, which was commissioned by IBC, and a study that's not actually an actuarial report, by Coopers and Lybrand on behalf of either State Farm or Allstate. But I don't know what the fourth one is. Could legislative research obtain a copy and let us know what that fourth report is?

The Chair: I think there was an article in the paper that stated four. I think that's where some people are getting the information. This will be available to the whole committee?

Mr Nishman: Yes.

The Chair: I've got good news. We'll be back here in room 151 at 2 o'clock sharp.

Ms Haeck: With more heat, hopefully.

The Chair: Some of the members want a little more heat in here. This committee is recessed until 2 o'clock sharp.

The committee recessed at 1244.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1401.

The Chair: We're going to resume the hearings on the standing committee of finance and economic affairs on Bill 164, An Act to amend the Insurance Act and certain other Acts in respect of Automobile Insurance and other Insurance Matters. This is the second day, the afternoon of our hearings.

ACTUARIAL CONSULTANTS OF CANADA

The Chair: The first gentleman coming forward at 2 o'clock here is from the Actuarial Consultants of Canada. Mr Patterson, welcome to the committee. We have until 2:30. In that period of time, when you make your presentation, please leave some time at the end for questions from the committee. You may begin.

Mr J. B. Patterson: I'm a life insurance actuary, by the way. It is important for everyone to be aware of the potential risk of insolvency under certain circumstances once Bill 164 becomes law and to take appropriate action to avoid the potential pitfalls before serious problems develop.

My main submission is in two parts. There's a 30-page submission to the Automotive Insurance Review that I sent a few months ago, and there's a four-page article to appear in the next issue of the Canadian Underwriter. I have highlighted both of these and made a summary, and this brief presentation—and it's on the pink set of papers so you can distinguish them from the rest. I hope I can stimulate your interest to read the others, but I'm only going to cover the five pink pages.

Let us examine some of the possible, serious repercussions. What new problems are the automobile insurers about to face? Under the old adversarial system, claims incurred in a given year were paid by lump sum mostly in that year or, at most, over the next few years. Under the no-fault system, most of the premiums received each year are held in reserve to provide annual claim payments for many years in the future. For the first time, automobile insurers will develop large portfolios of investments. A typical insurer's assets might grow in time to $100 million. Automobile insurers aren't used to large portfolios.

It is important for this committee to have input from life insurance actuaries and other life executives as automobile insurers have no experience with the problems created by large-asset portfolios. What problems will these large-asset portfolios produce? The automobile insurers are being asked to tread in an entirely new direction. To my knowledge, no insurer in Canada has ever been involved with a product fully indexed for inflation. This will create new, uncharted problems for which there is no experience.

For example, automobile insurers cannot afford to invest in long-term securities of 10, 15 and 20 years. If inflation and related interest rates were to suddenly grow rapidly, large capital losses would be experienced, converting long-term, low-interest securities to required high-interest-bearing securities. Therefore, it will be essential to confine investments to short-term securities. This is a new concept altogether for the insurance industry.

What is the source of money that is going to provide for future full inflation indexing of claims? Obviously, we must depend on the interest yield being in excess of inflation. A typical investor would not invest funds in securities which yielded only enough to cover inflation. Investors insist on earning a real interest rate of 2.5% more than inflation in order to increase their purchasing power. Real interest rates in Canada have been very close to 2.5% for most of the time such rates have been recorded.

Under the adversarial system, awards were calculated on the assumption that the claimant would only earn 2.5% real interest, the rest of his investment yield on his portfolio being needed to cover inflation. Under the no-fault system, if we could depend on maintaining 2.5% real interest every year in the future, the initial reserves to be held for future claim payments would be equal to the old lump sum payments under the adversarial system.

An actuary must be retained to establish a level of actuarial reserves for future claim payments and certify that they are adequate to avoid any risk of potential insolvency. Remember that the reserve is the only source of money to pay future claims.

Can we depend on earning 2.5% every year in the future? In the case of short-term securities issued in 1972 to 1975, yields to maturity were 2.5% less than inflation, rather than 2.5% more than inflation. In 1971 to 1978, yields were less than inflation for issues of the entire eight years.

If an insurer's investment return were 5% short—that's the excess of 2.5% over minus 2.5%—each year for four years, it could suffer losses of 20% of $100 million or $20 million. With four further years still 2.5% short, the loss in an eight-year period could grow to $30 million or more.

Such losses would exceed the entire surplus funds of many automobile insurers. Since there is no certainty that this history will not be repeated in the future, the actuary is forced to establish claim reserves at a significantly higher level than lump sum payments under the old adversarial system.

Will this affect premium rates? In my opinion, with fully indexed, no-fault claim payments, it will probably be necessary to raise automobile insurance premiums by 20% to 25%. A full development of the required rate increases can be found in the main submission to the automobile insurance review that we prepared. This is in opposition to one of the main reasons for adopting no-fault originally, which was to cut insurance premiums.

Are there any investments which can solve these problems? Recently, the Canadian government issued $700 million of special bonds maturing in 30 years, December 2021, but with the principal at maturity adjusted by full indexing for inflation and with 4.5% coupons in the meantime. This issue was completely sold, so there are no further bonds to be sold by the government. To handle further trading of these bonds, a secondary market has developed, because the government is not prepared to redeem them until after 30 years.

Some automobile insurers with no experience in handling asset portfolios have embraced the idea that these bonds will solve the problem of indexing for inflation. However, this reasoning is fallacious for two reasons. Firstly, since the bulk of the principal and the inflationary effect are deferred for 30 years, the current cash flow arising from the 4.5% coupons will be inadequate to meet the required claim payments each year.

Secondly, if all automobile insurers wanted to acquire such bonds, the large demand would temporarily force bond prices up, perhaps by 50%. Then, as they found the necessity to sell these bonds to meet cash flow requirements, the prices would likely fall, leading to significant capital losses.

How are profits from insurance company annuities taxed? Revenue Canada has a history of accelerating taxes on life annuity products by requiring tax reserves to be set at a lower level than statutory reserves, thus creating higher taxable profits. This is in regulations 1401 and 1403 of the Income Tax Act. However, this prematurely taxes part of the full investment income. For annuity products fully indexed with inflation, the insurer can only afford taxation of the small real investment return as the inflationary aspects of the investment return are required to meet the demands of annual indexing for inflation.

The automobile insurers must negotiate new regulations appropriate to fully indexed annuities; otherwise, the resulting taxes could be devastating. If this is not done prior to the introduction of Bill 164, premiums must be increased still further to meet the uncertain tax atmosphere.

How does all this affect the general public? For starters, widows losing spouses in fatal automobile accidents will receive much lower claims. The $200,000 limit to the widow of the at-fault driver will be a boon to her. However, the adversarial system, which will still be applicable to accidents other than automobile, attempts to restore the widow to the same standard of living enjoyed prior to the accident, and this involves claims usually of $400,000 and more, compared to the $200,000 that will be available to the widow whose husband died in an automobile accident. Also, pain and suffering benefits have been reduced to such a level that they will not be applicable for 97% of the claims.

If a child runs between two parked cars directly into an oncoming car and becomes disabled as a result, the adversarial system would usually find that child to be largely responsible for the accident, and very little, if anything, would be assessed against the driver. Under the no-fault system, the child will receive the scheduled benefits. In a situation such as this, no-fault is the choice to be recommended. It would be hard to find anyone who would disagree with this.

However, if a car stopped at an intersection for a red light is hit in the rear by an intoxicated driver with previous driving convictions who was driving well in excess of the speed limit, and if as a result both drivers receive serious spinal injuries, the public would find it abhorrent if both the innocent driver and the at-fault driver were to receive the same level of benefits, the initial reserve for which would be $2 million for each driver.

Suppose the average man in the street were asked if he agreed that benefits should be paid without any consideration of fault, regardless of the circumstances, even though it meant that his automobile insurance premiums were going to increase 20%, that he would probably forfeit all pain and suffering benefits, and further that if he happened to die in a fatal automobile accident, his widow would receive only 50% or less of the benefit that would be paid to a widow whose husband had died in another fatal accident not involving an automobile. Such a man in the street would probably be repelled at the idea of giving up so much in order to pay substantial claims to a person who could've easily avoided the accident in the first place.

In the Report of Inquiry into Motor Vehicle Accident Compensation in Ontario, the Honourable Mr Justice Coulter A. Osborne stated on page 545:

"The idea that both the innocent and the drunken driver should be compensated equally tends to offend many people's sense of justice. The moral issue raised by this example becomes even more difficult when no-fault benefits are increased. Cases of this kind are few in number, but they do serve to emphasize the importance of the idea of fairness in our society's system of values.

"It is the public's sense of fairness which has caused the no-fault movement in the United States to stall, if not stop."

I now have three suggestions to ease the initial burden on the automobile insurers and to reduce or eliminate the need for increases in premiums.

First, delay the introduction of Bill 164 until actuarial reserve standards have been adopted by the Canadian Institute of Actuaries and the automobile insurers have reached a satisfactory agreement with Revenue Canada on appropriate tax levels for this product. This will reduce the need for conservatism and the potential increase in premium rates.

Second, consider a modified definition of no-fault, with the compensation varying with the type of fault and with lower benefits for the at-fault driver who could clearly have avoided the accident. This is developed more fully at page 26 of our submission to the automotive review.

Finally, introduce Bill 164 in two stages and continue the right to sue for serious, permanent physical injury, disfigurement or death for two years, until the system is functioning smoothly for less serious cases. These claims tend to magnify the difference between the no-fault approach for automobile claims and the adversarial approach applicable to other types of claims. There are relatively few cases of this severity, and since they will all involve pain and suffering in excess of the $15,000 deductible, reference to the adversarial tort system will be made anyway.

In the enormous changeover to fully inflated claim payments, many problems will have to be solved. It might be better to tackle the 94% of cases that are relatively simple and solve all these problems before attempting the far more complex problems of the remaining 6%.

Health care professionals will tend to recommend extensive rehabilitation procedures designed to restore enjoyment of life even though there is no hope of a return to the workforce.

Technology in the field of rehabilitation is developing rapidly. It is now customary, in the case of serious spinal cord injuries, for the rehabilitation professional to strongly recommend voice-activated computer and environment control equipment. A few years ago, such equipment did not exist. As such technology develops in all areas of disability, greater and greater demands will be placed on the insurers by the rehabilitation industry, creating future costs for disabilities arising from automobile accidents that would never have applied in similar disabilities from non-automobile accidents settled by lump sum payments.

No-fault insurance is an open invitation for the development of innovative technology in the rehabilitation field. This of course is a boon to the disabled person, but a significant proportion of the cost will be borne by the automobile insurers.

Such development will also lead to the possibility of incurring more costs for strongly contested assessment and arbitration proceedings to settle on the necessity of adopting these techniques.

As well as the fact that these cases will have a disproportional effect on automobile insurance costs, it is also a fact that they are the ones which receive the greatest publicity. The practice of making lifetime provision for a person who created his own disability by impaired driving will be open to scrutiny and debate in the press. The comparison between a widow from an automobile accident and a widow from another type of accident is also bound to be reported.

It might be prudent to apply the no-fault legislation first to the simpler disability cases and develop smoothing systems before tackling the more complex disabilities, where there is not only a risk of substantially increasing the insurer's liability in the case of some types of disabilities but also of leaving claimants with other types of disabilities, such as those in comas, in hopeless situations.

That's the end of my presentation. I'll be glad to answer any questions you might have.

The Chair: We'll start off with Mr Harnick. Four minutes per caucus.

Mr Harnick: I'm interested in your comment on page 4, where you state, "It is the public's sense of fairness which has caused the no-fault movement in the United States to stall, if not stop." My research into US jurisdictions indicates that, to a very large degree, no-fault schemes and threshold schemes in the United States have not been, in the long run, money savers for the insurance industry or for the premiums people have to pay. Do you have any comment to make about that?

Mr Patterson: I didn't study the US situation myself. I did get a copy of this Report of Inquiry into Motor Vehicle Accident Compensation in Ontario, from 1988. This is a summary, and there are two volumes of main report. I just simply quoted Mr Justice Coulter Osborne.

Mr Harnick: You see, on page 11 in your longer report you state, "Once additional costs to the automobile insurers created by the statutory accident benefits schedule become known, it may well be found that such costs are in excess of the savings in court and other legal costs."

Mr Patterson: I'm talking about administrative costs there.

Mr Harnick: Exactly. The cost of processing a claim, correct?

Mr Patterson: Yes. In this brief presentation, I didn't have a point to cover it.

Mr Harnick: I know that Mr Justice Osborne stated that as far as he was concerned, over the long term the administrative costs in a no-fault system would be greater than the administrative costs in a tort-based system.

Mr Patterson: I think greater than all the legal costs.

Mr Harnick: Yes, and that would be your conclusion as well.

Mr Patterson: Nobody can be sure until you try it and you put it into effect and see how it works.

Mr Harnick: But as an actuary, and based on your experience—and I know of your reputation in this field for a long time—would that be a conclusion that would be an unreasonable conclusion to make at this time?

Mr Patterson: No, I don't think so. I think it's reasonable to assume that it's going to be very expensive to administer.

Mr Harnick: Yes, particularly when we get into a scheme of very much enhanced benefits between the OMPP and Bill 164. Would you agree with that?

Mr Patterson: Yes. Also, the schedule has various stages of income replacement: It isn't set for life; it's reviewed from time to time.

Mr Harnick: Yes, so the costs are going to continue, under Bill 164, to escalate rapidly. Would you agree with that?

Mr Patterson: Yes. I don't know for sure until we have actual experience, though.

Mr Harnick: But ultimately the premium costs under Bill 164 are going to go up.

Mr Patterson: In my opinion, yes.

Mr Harnick: And the rights that innocent victims have are going to accordingly become less and less, because innocent victims are essentially paying for the wrongdoers as well. Correct?

Mr Patterson: Yes. You're going to double the number of claims because you're bringing the at-fault drivers in with the not-at-fault drivers.

Mr Harnick: There's just one other issue I want to deal with, just so we all understand this. In terms of the tort-based system, reserves are set and carried by the insurers from year to year, and then ultimately the payout is made.

Mr Patterson: Yes, but that's just a few years after the year of the premium.

Mr Harnick: Exactly. But under this scheme, particularly when we're talking about Bill 164 and the enhanced benefits that might be payable, that is something that administratively, an insurance company is going to have to reserve from year to year, and in some cases for ever.

Mr Patterson: Yes.

Mr Harnick: And the administrative cost, I would think, of insurers carrying on their books these kinds of claims indefinitely would be very costly. Am I right in that?

Mr Patterson: They will be costly. I think the actual payment of the claims will be equally costly.

Mr Harnick: In a sense, by going to an enhanced benefit system such as we're going to, it would seem to me that from an insurer's point of view, these cases never end, do they, some of them?

Mr Patterson: They end.

Mr Harnick: But the payments continue.

Mr Patterson: They go down when the person reaches age 65.

The Chair: Mr Harnick, I've got to go on to Mr Owens.

Mr Owens: I'd like to thank you for your presentation, Mr Patterson. I have a couple of questions for you.

Mr Harnick referenced a comment on page 4 with respect to the public's sense of fairness. I don't read that in isolation. Above that, you talk about the issue around the innocent being hit by a drunken driver and that the public's sense of fairness is offended by the fact that there appears to be a payment for the intoxicated driver. I'm wondering if you're aware that under our proposed accident benefit regulation, a person who's convicted of drinking and driving and any other indictable offence will not be eligible for income benefits.

Mr Harnick: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: You know, I thought I made myself clear this morning.

Mr Owens: That's not a point of order.

Mr Harnick: Well, no, it is a point of order.

The Chair: Wait a minute. I just want to hear him out.

Mr Harnick: You're misstating what was said. What I said—and if the member is going to quote me, as he is doing, he'd better be accurate. The fact of the matter is, what I said was that people will drink and they will drive and they will cause accidents, but they may not be convicted, for a myriad—

The Chair: That's not really a point of order.

Mr Harnick: Well, it is a point of order, because he's misquoting me. The fact of the matter is, people can still have alcohol in their blood and be the cause of accidents without being convicted—

The Chair: I'm sorry. It's not a point of order. Mr Owens.

Mr Harnick: —and for some reason, Mr Owens doesn't want to accept that, because it points out a major defect in Bill 164.

The Chair: It's a difference of opinion. I'm sorry, Mr Harnick. Mr Owens.

Mr Owens: Just in terms of your report, it doesn't appear to be a complete actuarial study in the manner that was conducted by Mercer for the auto insurance review. You have formed an opinion that there's going to be an increase in premiums as a result of Bill 164 being instituted.

On page 5, you talk about "No-fault insurance is an open invitation for the development of innovative technology in the rehabilitation field." I'm wondering if you could express your view on the task force that was announced by our minister, Brian Charlton; how it's going to affect your opinion in terms of price increase when standards are set for rehabilitation and standards of care. Do you see that as having a positive effect in terms of controlling cost?

Mr Patterson: As I read the schedule, there's a great deal of decision-making left up to rehabilitation experts and doctors. They will be listened to and their opinion will have some weight in paying claims. The rehabilitation people are, of course, interested in maximum rehabilitation, and the technology is going to increase. They're going to try to introduce that technology, and I think it might increase claims.

Mr Owens: We agree that at this point there's cause for some concern, which is why the task force was set up in terms of developing standards to look at exactly what kind of attendant care is required for the person. I think that demonstrates very clearly that we've listened to the concerns of people like yourself, the Insurance Bureau of Canada and other intervenors in this process.

The Chair: Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the presentation. What I'm interested in is what this is going to cost the people of Ontario because, in effect, whatever costs are associated with this, they'll have to bear, as they have to carry the coverage. Based on what we've heard so far from the government testimony, the minimum this is going to cost is $200 million. That's what's going to result in increased cost to the people of Ontario. Your estimates are considerably higher than that: Your estimates, I think, would take it up to probably $500 million.

The reason I raise this is that the government earlier this morning said: "We're sorry, but the social assistance people in this province will not get the 2% we promised them. We can't afford it." That saved the taxpayers $60 million, but the bill we're dealing with this afternoon will cost the people of Ontario 10 times that amount of money, if your numbers are correct. In my opinion, it's a strange set of priorities that the government's pursuing and saying, "We're going to pursue this, that will every year take out of the people of Ontario anywhere from $200 million to"—your estimate I think would be $500 million to $600 million.

You and your document, I think, suggest premiums could go up as much as 20%. What would be your most conservative estimate of the increase? That's your most accurate one, but what would be your most conservative estimate of the increased cost?

Mr Patterson: There are two kinds of actuaries. There are life insurance actuaries and there are casualty actuaries. What I've attempted to do is interject into this picture certain questions and points which the life actuary would introduce, to do with portfolios of assets and taxation and so on. But when it comes to actually formulating the premium rates, once the reserves that the life actuary would require are known, the casualty actuary is far more qualified to answer than I am. I explained my reason for 20% in my paper, but I'm not a casualty actuary.

Mr Phillips: But it's helpful to have your numbers on the record; I appreciate it. Thank you.

The Chair: Mr Mancini.

Mr Mancini: Sir, on page 20 of your brief you state that rates may increase "by amounts ranging upwards from at least"—and I underline "at least"—"22.5%." Is that correct?

Mr Patterson: That's in my opinion.

Mr Mancini: On page 6, you state that the total loss of income and future care claims for bodily injury will at least double in cost. Is that correct?

1430

Mr Patterson: On page 6? Which paragraph?

Mr Mancini: You stated, "The total loss of income and future care claims for bodily injury would double," in cost.

Mr Patterson: What paragraph are you in?

Mr Mancini: I made notations. I don't have the document in front of me now.

Mr Patterson: I think the point I was trying to make is that we're adding all the at-fault drivers to the no-fault drivers. That's all I was saying.

Mr Mancini: I appreciate that. We're just trying to re-establish the fact that Bill 164 is going to cause greater administration, greater cost and is going to in fact punish many people because it takes away the right to tort for economic loss.

Mr Patterson: Yes.

Mr Mancini: Would you agree that the $15,000 deductible for pain and suffering does not eliminate the insurer's cost of investigating and handling potential claims, as this system has no historical or actuarial precedent?

Mr Patterson: If the bill is passed, all the economic losses will be eliminated from the tort system, and there will only be the pain and suffering left.

Mr Mancini: Exactly what I said.

Mr Patterson: If there's a $15,000 deductible, I think most insurance companies, without any investigation whatsoever, will recognize that most of the cases will just not fall in that limit.

Mr Mancini: But don't you believe that they will have to investigate these claims none the less?

The Chair: I've got to cut off here. Mr Patterson, I appreciate you coming before this committee with the information you've given. As you see, the members had a lot of questions. I imagine we could spend another half hour or so. Thank you very much.

MEL SWART

The Chair: The next presenter we have is Mr Mel Swart. I'd like to recognize Thelma in the audience also. Do you need your right-hand person to give you a hand? I bet she's done a lot of filing and picked up a lot of telephone calls for you in her day. Mel Swart, the former MPP for Welland-Thorold. Welcome, Mel. I think you know some of the rules around here.

Mr Mel Swart: I'd just say to you, Mr Chairman and members here, that Thelma thought it was a pretty tough life being the wife of an MPP, but once she had me home all the time, she found it was worse.

The Chair: Welcome, Mel, to the committee. You may begin. We have 20 minutes.

Mr Swart: Thank you. Just a few preliminary remarks, if I may, Mr Chairman. First of all, I want to thank the subcommittee for adjusting time so that I could be here this afternoon.

Second, I want to say a friendly hello to some of the colleagues I sat with here at Queen's Park and some of the people I've met on various trips across the province.

I also want to say that I won't be reading from the brief, because it will be too long. I'll be reading from a summary of the brief, but I think you'll be able to follow it okay in the brief. But the brief is the important document. It provides elaboration, it provides explanation, it provides documentation on where the figures came from.

I want to admit immediately that there are certain improvements under Bill 164, such as indexing, removing caps, improved rehabilitation etc, but I must say that on balance, Bill 164 is little more than a costly and a counterfeited imitation of the real thing promised to the people of Ontario on that public auto insurance.

Technically, I'm presenting this brief on my own behalf, but in reality, I'm representing the great majority of the 35,000 NDP members in this province who are upset and disillusioned with Premier Rae for discarding public auto insurance. Some 90% of the delegates at a 1992 convention in Hamilton rebuked him by voting in support of a resolution declaring that public auto insurance was still NDP policy and calling on him and his government to introduce it at the earliest appropriate time.

In addition, I am speaking for hundreds of thousands of motorists in the province who voted for the NDP to get lower premiums and fairer treatment under the promised public non-profit auto insurance system.

Everyone here knows that for more than six years, and particularly in the last two general elections, the Ontario NDP made public auto insurance the overriding issue and promised its implementation when we came to power in this province. Hansard is full of comments by our NDP leader, Mr Rae, promoting public auto insurance and ridiculing Liberals and Conservatives for proposing Band-Aid alternatives instead of introducing a public plan such as they have in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia.

I have here more than 100 pages of questions and comments the Honourable Bob Rae made when he was Leader of the Opposition. I think I'll take time to quote one. This is from Hansard, January 17, 1986. It's part of a question Mr Rae asked Mr Kwinter, who was then the minister.

"Why has he not recognized that there is better service, better value for the dollar, better value for the consumer and better protection for car drivers in those provinces that have public insurance plans than there is in Ontario? Why does he not have the courage to stand up to the insurance companies in this province and say to the people of this province, 'You are being ripped off'?"

That's from Hansard, and that's the kind of thing that was said in this House for five or six years.

As everyone knows, just one year after forming a government, that same leader, as Premier, announced that he wasn't proceeding with a public system, and said, "We don't intend to revisit this question or return to it or relive it, believe me, over time." That decision to kill rather than postpone the public plan was made by Premier Rae alone, without discussion with or approval of the NDP, his caucus or even his cabinet. Simply, it was a personal and massive breaking of faith with the New Democratic Party and the public of this province, and the reasons he gave for doing it won't stand up under any in-depth scrutiny.

All of the NDP governments in the western provinces, since first coming to power, have meticulously kept their pre-election promises and other promises they made while they've been in power. Unlike them, the current Premier of this province, through auto insurance and other subsequent reversals, has broken an array of substantive promises to a degree unacceptable by any responsible political standards.

I raise this issue right at the beginning because I'm concerned that it has not only damaged NDP credibility but has heightened public cynicism towards politicians. I say this not as a platitude; I say this with real concern. There may well be a problem for any party to govern if the level of cynicism among the public continues to increase. I think we must recognize that democracy is fragile. We certainly see that around the world.

I want to come to Bill 164 now. I see three main faults in Bill 164. There are other things I'd like to talk on, but time doesn't permit.

(1) The first is with the proposal to eliminate the right to sue for economic damages but permit suit for pain and suffering. Incidentally, I should preface that by saying that over and over again the minister said three times as many people are going to be able to sue; they are, but the pot the money comes out of is going to be smaller than it was under the former legislation we had.

According to the consultant to the government, William Mercer, this new NDP legislation will reduce total court awards, to the few injured persons who can sue, by another 15%. To provide fairness, the right to sue needs to be expanded, not further restricted. In my view, it is wholly inappropriate for guilty drivers to get as much or even more than the innocent victims in claim settlements. Determination of compensation for both serious residual physical injury and major ongoing pain and suffering are the very minimum conditions where tort action should be permitted. I recommend that Bill 164 or its regulations be expanded accordingly.

(2) The main result of abolishing the right to sue for 95% of accident victims, or 85% under the Liberal legislation of 1990, was to reduce—and this was the main result; it cannot be denied—the claims paid out to accident victims, in 1991, by $323 million and increase the profits to the insurers by $454 million. That was the net result.

Now the insurance companies say they will require another 19% increase in premiums, $100 to $200 per car, due to the provisions of Bill 164. And they will get it. I've heard the minister say that there won't be any increase or only a minor increase. I suggest that's not what will happen, from experience.

Shortly after Premier Rae said he was killing public auto insurance, the minister in charge, Brian Charlton, said the private insurers were cooperating and that premiums would be reduced by 10%. It didn't happen, and that angered the minister. According to the Toronto Star, he said on March 26, 1992, that the province may resurrect public insurance if companies didn't give drivers a break on benefits and premiums. Specifically, he was quoted as saying, "Either they're going to play ball with us to make a fair and affordable system work in the private sector or they're going to end up talking about their own funeral."

But the Honourable Bob Rae quickly pulled the rug out from under the minister on that threat. The next day, the Premier went public and said, "His government has no plans to resurrect public auto insurance." The minister backed off with these words. "It was an analogy that I was making which has nothing to do with what I'm promoting." The government, he said, "has taken public auto insurance off the agenda."

I ask you, does anyone really believe that this government is going to legislate or fight on behalf of the motorists, against the insurance industry, when the Premier has lost the will to do so and has in fact disarmed his own minister? Simply, motorists are going to pay increases based on what the insurance companies want.

(3) The third main fault I find in Bill 164 is that this NDP legislation provides that no-fault income replacements and death benefits be tied to income. A person making $90,000 a year can get his total net income replaced the same as someone making $25,000 a year. The death benefits for the high-income earner would be $200,000, compared to $50,000 for the low-income earner. The availability of these higher limits may be desirable in themselves, though I really question whether the life of one person is worth four times the life of another person.

But the real question is, who is going to pay for it? The two persons in the above example, with the same car, the same driving record and in the same area, will pay the same insurance premiums. Thus, in a very substantial way, the low-income earners will be subsidizing the high-income earners. That proposal of the Rae government has to be the most unjust policy that any social democratic government could design. Surely the reasonable way to deal with this situation would be to leave those no-fault benefits at the medium-income level and offer an optional purchase of higher benefits for the high-income earners. That seems to be a sensible way to go.

Yes, I say highway robbery is alive and well in Ontario, and will continue to be under the Rae government's Bill 164. Simply, Bill 164 is a grotesque perversion of what the NDP have long advocated and what the party stands for.

Now I want to talk a little bit about the benefits of public auto insurance. Saskatchewan, Manitoba and British Columbia have had public auto insurance plans initiated by the NDP government for from two to more than four decades. The 1991 average insurance rates were: Saskatchewan, $368; Manitoba, $412; British Columbia, $624. By contrast, Ontario drivers paid an average of $735. That is research done for the Honourable Mr Peter Kormos by the legislative research branch of this Legislature.

The BC system offers the best overall comparison with Ontario's, even though its premiums are lower, its payouts are higher, its benefits are better and it has eliminated the great unfairness and discriminatory practices of the Ontario system. Higher payouts by the Insurance Corp of British Columbia are documented here. There's full right of suit, which gives a higher payout. They pay 4% premium tax and pay hospital costs to the BC government. Here, the right to sue is and will be almost non-existent, and insurance companies pay nothing towards hospital costs and only 3% tax to the government.

Also, the rates of accidents, injuries and death in BC—which has, of course, an almost 100% urban population—are substantially higher than Ontario's; of course this requires payout of benefits proportionally to more people.

There is no secret why BC settlements are higher and their rates are cheaper. ICBC is far more efficient and operates on a non-profit basis. Their total brokers' commissions and administrative expenses in 1991 were 10.5% of total revenue; that's premium plus interest on investment. In Ontario, with private insurers, it was 17.3%, almost 70% higher. ICBC skimmed off nothing in profits. The private insurers here skimmed off 14.6%. Put another way, BC paid out 79 cents of every revenue dollar received in claims for accident victims. Ontario insurers paid out only 58%. That's in 1991, the last year for which you can get figures.

Simply, if ICBC—and this is the significance of what I'm saying—had been operating Ontario's benefit system in 1991, the savings would have been $335 million in expenses and $705 million in profits, for a total of $1.04 billion in savings in one year. With total premiums of $4.222 billion, the Ontario motorists would have realized savings of almost 25%. I say to you that the only real difference in the situation between now and the time that Premier Rae and I coauthored Highway Robbery in 1987 is that then he fought for the motorists' interests; now he appeases the insurance industry.

Unlike the system in BC, Bill 164 keeps most of the old injustices and discriminations here intact. In BC, higher rates are charged only for bad driving records and are assessed against the driver, not the car. In Ontario, age, sex, marital and family status have a major bearing on rates regardless of driving record; there are charts in the brief to show this. In Toronto, an 18-year-old male pays four times as much and an 18-year-old female pays twice as much as a 38-year-old, whether male or female, all of them having a clear driving record. New drivers of any age are charged excessive premiums. If there is a break in coverage for a year or two, rates rise, and on and on and on.

Under Ontario's system, there are, according to best estimates, 200,000 or more people driving without insurance; as a study was done in 1984 shows, they are young people generally. There's a loss of at least $200 million in premiums and a real danger to society. This doesn't happen in BC, because no one can buy plates or stickers for their automobile without buying their insurance at the same time. The two are sold as an indivisible package, in force for the same length of time.

The minister has indicated that down the road he intends to use a permitting section of Bill 164 to eliminate discriminatory rate-setting practices. I say it won't happen, for several reasons. First, if he is really serious about it, that kind of stuff would be in the bill or in the draft regulations. Second, the insurance companies are vigorously opposed to this, as everyone knows. Third, Bill 164 will substantially increase rates. Dramatically lowering premiums for good young drivers and eliminating other discriminations under the private system will cause another increase in rates for other drivers; I think that's very natural. The only way the elimination of discrimination can be effected without passing more costs on to other drivers is through the great savings of a public system.

I say again, the ICBC type of plan was what the Honourable Bob Rae promised. The abysmal Bill 164 is what he delivered. I say, for shame, for shame.

Similar to our public health system, public auto insurance was first initiated by an NDP government in Saskatchewan many decades ago. Despite great opposition, it was undertaken and implemented by persons with great vision and courage, like Tommy Douglas. Later it was put in place in Manitoba and BC when the NDP won those provinces. Again, there was great opposition from the insurance industry, the Liberals and the Conservatives, but the NDP went ahead.

As with health insurance, those public auto insurance plans have been so successful that no Liberal, Conservative or Social Credit government dared dismantle them. Even the brokers in British Columbia, who receive less commission than Ontario brokers, find the system so much simpler and better for the public that four years ago 94% of them registered their opposition to a $1-million bid by Ontario-based private insurers to have ICBC dismantled and the auto insurance given back to the private sector. Poll after poll in all provinces demonstrate that the public feels the same way.

However, the Honourable Bob Rae has arbitrarily declared that the NDP will never provide the people of Ontario with a public plan, not because it's not good for them but because he hasn't the will to proceed. I want to say that's not NDP policy and it cannot be accepted.

I'll just interrupt myself here to say that I notice in today's paper that the Honourable Brian Charlton, perhaps in sincerity, says that the public plan isn't off the NDP programs yet. I want to say, with all due respect to Mr Charlton, that it is Mr Rae who speaks for the NDP government of this province, and Mr Rae has said that it will never be.

I conclude by saying, recognizing that this all-party committee is dominated by NDP members, I urge you to recommend that Bill 164 not be reported but instead be replaced by the public auto insurance system promised so often and so sincerely by the Ontario NDP.

Thank you, Mr Chairman. Glad to answer any questions if I'm able to.

The Chair: We've only time for one question from each caucus. Mr Owens.

Mr Owens: I feel a little like an adolescent about to question his father's authority for the first time. In terms of some of the comments you made with respect to the bill, I'm pleased that you don't hate it totally. You do mention that there have been some improvements over the gift the Liberals gave to the insurance industry.

I'd like to ask you a question, especially around the right for individuals to sue for pain and suffering, those who were left out of the OMPP plan, those with psychological or cognitive injuries. Do you not feel that's an appropriate route to take to allow those individuals access to the courts?

Mr Swart: Yes, I do, Mr Owens. If you followed my brief, you would know that I suggested that the compensation for lost income, as already in the OMPP, be retained and that this be added to it. That's the minimum, I suggest, that should be done.

The Chair: Mr Mancini.

Mr Mancini: First of all, I would like to welcome Mr Swart back to the Legislative Building, where he served with great distinction for many, many years and had great public support from the people of Welland-Thorold and elsewhere across the province.

As I said yesterday, I may have disagreed with Mr Swart philosophically on whether or not government-owned automobile insurance was the right way to go, but what you heard from Mr Swart was certainly what you got.

I am surprised, actually, that many of the things you have said today have in fact been said earlier by a wide variety of groups. You've chastised Mr Rae for his broken promises. You've mentioned very clearly that the proposals in Bill 164 will cost the Ontario public a great deal of money, and they may in fact be getting less money because, as you said, the pie is smaller. Other people have said that. You've agreed that disruption is being caused in the industry. You've also given us a new bit of information that I wasn't aware of.

The Chair: Mr Mancini, could you get to the question?

Mr Mancini: From reading public reports, I thought Bob Rae and the NDP government broke their promise on government-owned automobile insurance after a cabinet meeting at the Honey Harbour retreat, but you tell us today that this promise was broken without consultation with members of the caucus or the cabinet, so that's a new bit of information.

Mr Owens: That's a question?

Mr Mancini: Are you the Chair, or is Mr Hansen the Chair?

The Chair: Just ask the question, please.

Mr Mancini: Is he your sidekick, or what's going on here?

The Chair: He's the parliamentary assistant; that's it.

Mr Mancini: We have been maintaining, Mr Swart, that it is possible for Bill 164 to cost the Ontario public anywhere from almost $200 million to upwards of $565 million to implement; that money coming right from the hardworking taxpayers of this province. I want to know from you, Mr Swart, whether or not, in your opinion, we are better off with the Ontario motorist protection plan as compared to Bill 164 and its 68 unintelligible pages of regulations.

The Chair: Okay, that's the question. Let Mr Swart answer it.

Mr Swart: I think perhaps I covered that in the brief. I believe that, on balance, there are benefits in Bill 164 which don't exist under the OMPP; there are some things, of course, which I feel detract from the OMPP. On balance, I doubt that the improvements in Bill 164 are going to be worth the money it's going to cost the taxpayers.

Mr Mancini: Did the Chair hear the answer?

The Chair: Yes. Mr Tilson, one question.

Mr Tilson: Mr Swart, thank you very much for coming to the committee and giving your thoughts. As a new member to this Legislature and as critic for the Progressive Conservative Party, I must say that whenever the subject of auto insurance comes to the House, your name somehow seems to be mentioned. You obviously have a great deal of respect from all three parties, so it's a pleasure to see you coming to his committee.

I must say, sir, that I obviously do not agree with some of your thoughts and I agree with other of your thoughts. I'm sure you can appreciate that. The one thing that shocks me is the new piece of information you have brought to us today. We realize that when a man of your stature, a member of this House for so many years, has come to this committee, obviously in frustration after listening to what Mr Rae has been given through instructions by his party and possibly even his caucus—we don't know what goes on in that place. The way you're speaking, I suspect it is a one-man show. That arrogance you have painted of the Premier of this province—you have painted a very serious picture, an undemocratic picture, of a Premier of this province concerning the whole subject of auto insurance and the philosophy of the New Democratic Party.

The Chair: Have you got a question?

Mr Tilson: Well, if you give me a chance. I know you people are nervous about this, but give me a chance. The fact that you have come to this committee and have painted this picture of the Premier: Are these facts serious enough that the Premier should resign?

Mr Swart: I don't think it's up to me to answer that question. As you know, I have some very strong reservations about his performance to date. I'm not sure it was arrogance that made him make that statement. I want to make it perfectly clear that I am not here saying that the decision to postpone or the decision not to bring in auto insurance now wasn't approved by cabinet. What I am saying is that his statement that it would never be revisited was made by him and him alone.

Mr Tilson: He is the Premier.

The Chair: Mr Swart, we're out of time; we've actually gone over. We'd like to thank you for coming before this committee.

1500

Mr Harnick: I see that the next item on the agenda is recess. Can I ask for unanimous consent that we forgo our recess and maybe have some extra questions for Mr Swart, if he doesn't mind staying?

The Chair: That's no problem. I've got no problem with that, but we're right at 3 o'clock now. We went through recess. You didn't realize that?

Mr Harnick: I wouldn't mind staying for another half an hour, then, if we could have unanimous consent, because it's not often we get someone of Mr Swart's knowledge and stature to have the opportunity to question on an issue so important as this.

The Chair: I'm sorry.

Mr Harnick: Wait. Just hear me out, because I'm entitled, as a member, to bring a point of order forward. What I would like to ask for is the unanimous consent of my colleagues here to maybe spend a few more minutes so that we all might have an opportunity to go around the table again and ask Mr Swart some questions. I would like to ask for unanimous consent, if that's possible.

Interjections: Agreed.

The Chair: Is it unanimous?

Interjections: No.

The Chair: It's not unanimous. Sorry.

Mr Harnick: Could we have a recorded vote? I would like a recorded vote.

Mr Tilson: Mr Chairman, I would make a motion, as worded by Mr Harnick.

The Chair: You want a recorded vote? The motion made by Mr Tilson, how many in favour?

Ayes

Harnick, Mancini, Phillips, Tilson.

The Chair: Opposed?

Nays

Dadamo, Haeck, Johnson, Klopp, Owens, Ward.

The Chair: Thank you for coming before the committee, Mel.

Interjections.

The Chair: I would say that Mel will be out in the hallway and will answer a lot of questions there.

ONTARIO PSYCHIATRIC ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Would the Ontario Psychiatric Association come forward, please? Dr Hector, I believe? We have a half-hour, until 3:30. In that half-hour, could you make your presentation and leave some time at the end? As you can see, the members get very excited if they can't ask more than one question. You may begin.

Dr R.I. Hector: Thank you very much indeed. With respect, I doubt that I shall generate the enthusiasm or excitement of the former member, but I do represent the Ontario Psychiatric Association, and perhaps I could just introduce myself.

The Chair: Maybe we should just wait 30 seconds until everybody's out the door. Sir, do you have a brief?

Dr Hector: No, I don't.

The Chair: That's fine. I just wanted to know.

Dr Hector: We have a short submission.

The Chair: Fine. I'm a little hard of hearing, so if you can speak up a little, it would help me.

Dr Hector: I will do my best. Perhaps I might introduce myself, simply to state my own background in respect to this—

Mr Johnson: On a point of order: I think it would be appropriate, Mr Chair, if we wait until there is a semblance of order in this room so we don't offend this presenter. I think what he has to say is as important as anyone who comes before this committee.

The Chair: Okay, it's quiet now. Dr Hector, carry on.

Dr Hector: Thank you. Perhaps I might just introduce myself. I am representing the Ontario Psychiatric Association. I am a psychiatrist in private practice now in Toronto. I was, for 23 years, the senior staff psychiatrist at the Wellesley Hospital and for 11 years its psychiatrist in chief. I was, during that time, associate professor with the department of psychiatry at the University of Toronto and had, as a result of that, cross-appointments to the Clarke Institute of Psychiatry and to the Princess Margaret Hospital. I have been president of the Ontario Psychiatric Association and of the Medico-Legal Society of Toronto. With that background, I'd like to express our thoughts about Bill 164.

First of all, I would like to and we would like to applaud the government for recognizing what we too felt was a serious injustice with respect to the psychologically injured person under the previous insurance plan. We think that permitting the individual suffering pain and suffering psychological injury to sue for damages is an appropriate and proper introduction under the new act.

However, we still have two concerns about the act as it's currently written. The first has to do a bit with the history of psychiatry as a medical specialty. In a sense, and for practical purposes, psychiatry came into its own during the Second World War, when it was recognized broadly that psychological and social issues were significant issues in terms of wartime disability and the assessment of wartime injury. Psychiatry gained recognition as a medical specialty during those years and in the years subsequent to the Second World War. It's ironic, I think, that it was in the context of that assessment of the injured soldier that psychiatry gained a respect and a credibility within medicine as a whole.

One concern with this bill is that it appears to retreat from that integration of psychological medicine and general medicine, if you will, into a situation where physical injury will be recognized, but we're concerned that the psychological aspects of injury and the disability resolving from that will not be recognized.

After all, physicians are basically in the business of assisting their patients. What we're concerned about is that physicians, recognizing the fact that physical injury is a compensable benefit, potentially, but that psychological injury is not, may tend to overrepresent physical injury in their patterns of diagnosis and therefore underrepresent the recognition of psychiatric, psychological and social issues, both in the assessment of the injury and in the assessment of the disability, which, after all, is a social issue, not a medical issue, in respect to those injuries.

If they do that, then of course our capacity to participate in the care of the patient will be appreciably diminished, because we do recognize the fact that a psychiatric diagnosis does carry, in spite of all of the awareness of psychological medicine today, its own stigma. So we would like to suggest that you review or rethink the issue of the exclusion of psychiatric diagnosis in respect of the assessment of the injured person.

Second, we have a concern that a relatively large group of individuals who do not have the resources to pursue legal action, who do not have the capacity to enlist the services of a lawyer to pursue action before the courts, will not be recognized. At the Medico-Legal Society, I recall very strongly one member once putting forward the position that the great burden of the old tort system was that commonly a lawyer was required to give the individual the advice that whatever benefit might arise from the action, it would not be sufficient to cover the costs of that action, and he would therefore advise the individual not to pursue that particular matter. That situation appears to exist under the current writing of Bill 164. It is obvious that, in relative terms, the psychiatrically disabled population might well be much less able to afford the costs of initiating such an action and so not receive benefits in the context of injury in motor vehicle accidents.

It also overlooks the reality of discrete psychiatric diagnosis. That is, I presume and we presume that the exclusion of psychiatric illness from consideration under the act has to do with the difficulty in validly and reliably forming a psychiatric diagnosis. Recognizing that, we still think there are a number of syndromes, such as the post-traumatic stress disorder or major depression, that can be defined with appropriate validity, both in terms of common clinical criteria, and that these do represent illnesses that are appropriately compensable under any system of compensation for injury.

Indeed, the Workers' Compensation Board, as you know, has set up a task force that is examining the whole assessment of stress and stress-related illness because it does recognize that psychological and social stress is an important origin of illness and of disability. I don't see why we can't take that same initiative and apply it in the context of the assessment of the patient injured in a motor vehicle accident.

In summary, I think we applaud the introduction of the opportunity to recover damages through action before the courts as it is contained in this act, but we do have these two concerns: the potential split, again, between physical and psychological medicine, and second, that large group of patients who may well not have the resources to pursue a private action to recover damages.

The Acting Chair (Mr George Dadamo): Thank you very much. We'd like to start off this round of questioning with the Liberal Party. According to the clock, we have about six and a half minutes per party; we'll start with Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: I look at this in a slightly broader context perhaps; that is, that we in Ontario are faced with an enormous fiscal challenge. I know this isn't exactly your field, but I think it is relevant here. The bill, as we see it, is going to put a fairly substantial burden on the people of Ontario in terms of extra costs.

The reason I raise this is that I think there's a completely changed feeling in the Ontario public now that they are really up against it financially; they just are struggling. What I find with the government is that it has two messages. One is that this is a period of restraint and therefore we can't afford to give the hospitals any increase. Hospitals will get 0% increase this year, 0% next year. You see that in your hospital field, I'm sure. There's a one-time-only grant that's clawed back next year. Zero grant, nothing, they live with the same dollars, which means, with inflation, lower levels of service. I understand why the government says that. They feel they're up against it, and they can't afford the $140 million that would be required to provide the hospitals what was promised them, a 2% increase.

But we see here a plan that, even using the government's figures, is going to cost the people of Ontario a minimum—minimum—$170 million a year. If you believe, as Mr Swart believes, that the cost is going to be substantially higher, it's going to cost the taxpayers of Ontario, the public of Ontario, perhaps $600 million.

So we have this strange set of priorities. We can't afford to fund the health care system, as had been promised by the government, but we can afford to tell the taxpayers of Ontario, "You're going to have to fork out another minimum $160 million, perhaps up to $500 million, for increased premiums."

Do you have any sense of the priorities of that? As I say, you are commenting on the auto bill but you have the perspective also of the health care field. Where should the government be putting its priorities? Is this the place to spend three times as much money as it would have cost to fund the hospitals as they had promised?

Dr Hector: That's a very interesting question. After my years with the Wellesley Hospital, particularly as chief of the department of psychiatry there, I'm moved to say that clearly the priority must be hospital support and hospital resources.

The problem is that I've been a consultant practising in psychiatry for a long time, and because of my position with the Medico-Legal Society, obviously I have had an interest in the injured person and in medical-legal issues concerning the relationship between physicians and solicitors and so on. In all of that, I've become keenly aware of the issue of illness and of disability following injury, and very much aware of the sustained burden, symptom impairment and impaired function because of that. So I'm moved to respond with the affirmative in the second case. The problem is that there really is an end to our public resource. Someone has to draw a line.

I suppose I can only speak from the interest of what I necessarily must view as my primary objective, and that is my patient. Certainly, I want to see the psychiatrically disabled person advantaged as much as the physically disabled person. I wouldn't like to say one is more important than the other, but I would like to see them share in the benefits of this particular plan or any similar plan.

Mr Phillips: The reason I raise this is that this is the choice, in many respects, because if you are a driver in Ontario, you have to purchase this level of insurance. It isn't as if, if they don't want it, they don't have to do it. Everybody out there, all those people who are at home watching this right now, have to be aware that the government is sending out one message with the money that it has to have the authority to directly tax and spend—there isn't any—but then it's saying to the people of Ontario, "We're sorry, but we're going to pass a bill that is going to at least $160 million take out of the people of Ontario." As I say, if you take the figures that the government itself uses, and it's about the only one who agrees with those numbers, it's at least $160 million, more than the hospitals have been promised this year and will not get.

I'm just saying to people like yourself—you're in a unique position—for the hard-pressed people of Ontario, I think the government has to get its act together and cannot be saying two messages. We're quite prepared to take the price of your insurance. By the way, when we talk about this, there's the normal increase that has to take place. This is just the extra increase over and above the normal premiums that would take place. I realize you're in a bit of difficult spot because you can't be saying, "Well, it should be one or the other."

I want to share with you the dilemma that at least we in the opposition find ourselves in. There's no magical pot of money out there. People don't have all sorts of money to throw around. The government's choosing, right at this time, to take a minimum of $160 million, and up to $500 million, out of the pockets of the people of Ontario. If it's $500 million, that's like raising the retail sales tax from 8% to almost 9%; that's what we're talking about. That's the amount of money we're taking out with this bill. I think all the people who are watching this, and people like yourself who are influential, have to realize it.

The Chair: Could you wrap up there?

Mr Phillips: The challenge for our witness is that I think he's in a difficult spot to try to pick and choose. I wanted to share with him the challenge we're facing.

The Chair: I didn't hear a question there.

Mr Phillips: I think he answered the question.

Mr Tilson: Dr Hector, thank you for your thoughts. You mentioned the Workers' Compensation Board. If I understand correctly what you're saying, you know what compensation people received pre-OMPP. We now are moving into certainly an interesting no-fault type of—I was going to say "adventure," but it's far from that; it's a tragedy.

You did mention the Workers' Compensation Board. I don't know how much experience you've had with that. The consultant that the government appears to be relying on for all of this, which recently just surfaced, certainly after the bill came into being, was, as you know, William M. Mercer Ltd, also known as the Mercer report. Mercer puts out a bulletin called the Mercer Bulletin. An interesting bulletin came out in December 1992 by William M. Mercer Ltd. I guess it gets into the whole issue that Bill 164 may create another Workers' Compensation Board and the problems that resulted from it.

This bulletin concludes that a similar expansion of the benefits for Workers' Compensation Board is to blame for a deficit of about $11 billion, and the liabilities are understated, according to Mercer, by as much as 30% to 50%. Mercer suggests benefit reductions such as a freeze on indexing—that could save $1 billion—reducing the level of wage compensation, tightening the conditions for entitlement, and says, "The expansion of benefits in the 1980s has caused serious financial deterioration of the programs of Ontario." I'm going to read one other paragraph and then ask for your comment:

"For workers' compensation programs there's a lack of direct fiscal responsibility by governments. There was no lack of political input during the 1980s in the liberalization of benefits. Now governments seem much less inclined to take corrective action when the changes legislated in the past simply do not work in the intended manner and create instead serious financial problems."

It is interesting, of course, watching what Mercer is saying about the WCB and then the company has the gall to come to this government and this committee and simply say that a similar expansion of benefits would increase costs by only 4.4%. Of course, the question is, how can Mercer conclude one thing for the Workers' Compensation Board and the complete opposite on Bill 164?

My question to you, Dr Hector, is that knowing what your patients or people you've assisted prior to OMPP received, and what they appear to be going to receive or not receive under this particular piece of legislation, what are your real fears?

Dr Hector: Certainly, as I take a look at my own notes and the triangle I've created to describe it, the large portion of the triangle that we're suggesting benefits be provided for under the act would be very costly.

Mr Tilson: Probably couldn't be done.

Dr Hector: I have no idea whether it could be done, but it would mean, certainly, considerable costs and I suppose necessarily considerable reduction in the overall mean benefits, however they might be provided. We're keenly aware of the issue of cost and yet of course we're speaking of a population that we do think are genuine, are disabled in a real medical sense and who are as entitled to recognition for that as any other group of individuals might be.

But the Workers' Compensation Board has become—again, I'm aware that the introduction of stress-related illness and some consideration of benefits for those purposes significantly increases costs, potentially greatly increases costs, particularly during times of social stress, economic recession and so on, all of those issues. Every time we turn around we have seen larger and larger dollars being spoken about in terms of the costs of these programs.

Mr Tilson: One other area which really hasn't come forward to the committee—and I don't know whether you're in a position to comment on it—is that with this Bill 164, the pressures are going to be put on OHIP, and there is the fear that OHIP as an institution might completely erode as a result of the unbelievable burden it will bear as the result of the requirements of the benefits of Bill 164. Have you analysed that issue at all and are you able to inform the committee of any thoughts on that area?

Dr Hector: There's no doubt that in the common convention of practice, where you're seeing a person for purposes of maintaining a medical record for purposes of ensuring continuance of disability income from whatever source, government or private or whatever, you do see your patient both more regularly and probably more frequently, because of the necessity of maintaining that record and of completing and submitting the appropriate forms. So I have no doubt that that patient population would be relatively more frequently medically serviced than the population at large.

Mr Tilson: Would it be—

The Chair: I'm sorry; I've got to go on to Mr Johnson.

Mr Johnson: Thank you, Dr Hector, for your presentation today. I've got to say I'm somewhat perplexed by your comments. You indicated that you thought the changes in Bill 164, the proposal, made it somewhat fairer than what the OMPP was with regard to some of the problems you mentioned. I just want to comment that the accident benefits schedule fully recognizes—and I repeat, fully recognizes—mental and psychological injuries just as for physical injuries. As well, the discrimination present in the OMPP threshold has been removed. I was just wondering if you could elaborate on what exactly your concerns are with regard to that.

Dr Hector: I hope I have not read and misunderstood the act in terms of our reading of it, but as I have read it, the issue of compensable benefit has to do with very strictly defined physical illness and that issues of pain and suffering and psychological injury have been assigned the other route of action before the court. Is that not correct?

Mr Johnson: I think it's just clear that they're both fully recognized and that they're both compensable. I think that has to be stated. I think yesterday the member for Wilson Heights stated it so clearly when he said that we could have absolutely the best—this is taken out of context but this is what he meant, I'm sure, given that—

Mr Mancini: How do you know if he took it out of context?

Interjection: That's what he really meant.

Mr Mancini: That's NDP policy.

Mr Johnson: I can't quote what Mr Kwinter said. He did indicate that if we wanted to pay as much as we could conceivably pay, we could have without a doubt the best insurance system, in Ontario. What we in fact have is a cost-benefit relationship, and I think what we're trying to do with this bill is maximize the return for the cost of the product.

My colleagues on the other side would suggest, in fact they have suggested that the OMPP is fine as it is with regard to the concerns you've raised. I want to know if you could suggest, by comparison, that in fact there are improvements for your clients with regard to the changes in Bill 164.

Dr Hector: As I said in my introduction, I do think Bill 164 is a very substantial improvement in respect to the psychologically injured person.

Mr Johnson: Okay. Thank you very much.

The Chair: No more questions. Doctor, I would like to thank you for coming before this committee today.

Dr Hector: Thank you very much for your attention.

The Chair: Could Rob, the researcher here, make a report.

Mr Nishman: My name's Rob Nishman, from the legislative research service. Between sessions this morning, I attempted to find out more about a fourth report on the cost of Bill 164. I phoned Stan Griffin, vice-president of the Ontario division of the Insurance Bureau of Canada. He was aware of a Mercer study, a Wyatt study and a Coopers and Lybrand study, but he was not aware of a fourth study on this particular topic.

I also phoned Rob Pegoraro, the senior policy analyst with the automobile insurance review of the Ministry of Financial Institutions. He basically gave me the same answer as Mr Griffin. I also phoned State Farm and I was referred to a person named Sharon. She mentioned that there was no fourth report that she was aware of. She wouldn't give me her last name and she hung up on me, so if anyone has any extra information—

Mr Mancini: How would you know that piece of information?

The Chair: I guess Mr Ward was asking for it.

Mr Ward: I'm curious. The Conservative Party made reference to a fourth report. Perhaps they could advise this committee of where and what it is.

Mr Phillips: It was probably a summary of the other three.

Mr Harnick: I think it's probably by inadvertence that a fourth report was referred to. There are so many and they're coming so fast and furiously. I think probably you're concerned about the fourth report because that's the level of paranoia that's set in.

Mr Ward: No. I just make reference to it.

The Chair: That's your opinion. Okay.

Mr Phillips: The case is closed.

Mr Ward: There is no fourth report.

Mr Phillips: Exactly.

The Chair: There is no fourth one.

Interjections.

The Chair: It might have been Mr Phillips's fourth one.

REINSURANCE RESEARCH COUNCIL

The Chair: We'll carry on with the next group, the Reinsurance Research Council. Would you come forward, please? I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. We have half an hour for the presentation. In that half-hour, as you can see at the very end, all the members are very eager to ask questions on your brief. So if you don't mind identifying yourselves for the purposes of Hansard, you may begin.

Mr Angus H. Ross: Angus Ross, president of the Reinsurance Research Council. Thank you for the opportunity to address the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. We are speaking on behalf of the Reinsurance Research Council, an organization representing the majority of professional property and casualty reinsurers registered in Canada, and writing over $1 billion in Canadian reinsurance premium each year.

Reinsurers are very much a part of the Canadian insurance industry, and to the extent that we share in the premiums and exposures of Ontario automobile insurance, we also share the concerns expressed by insurance companies and industry organizations such as the Insurance Bureau of Canada.

However, the greatest contribution of reinsurers to Ontario automobile insurance is not sharing at all, but rather assuming the financial responsibility for the largest losses, the shock losses and the catastrophic losses that rise above the normal day-to-day loss experience of insurers. The accident benefits proposed by Bill 164 will have a profound effect on these larger automobile losses, and for that reason we wish to address concerns unique to, or with a disproportionate impact on, reinsurers.

Excess-of-loss reinsurance is widespread. Most, if not all, automobile business written in Ontario is protected by excess reinsurance which does not reflect the experience of the primary insurance company. Rather, the excess-of-loss reinsurer assumes only liability for the amount by which large losses exceed an agreed insurer retention. To put this in a Canadian perspective, the majority of Canadian insurers tend to retain something like the first $500,000 to $2 million of larger losses depending on their financial strength. The bulk of Ontario automobile business is reinsured above a retention of about $1 million.

Reinsurers play an important role in the protection of Ontario residents and businesses. Excess reinsurance provides capacity and spread of experience. It allows smaller, niche insurers to compete for business and to offer other important lines of personal and commercial insurance to Ontario residents and business people. Most important, it extends the "spread of risk" function of insurance by assuming the infrequent but large shock losses and spreading their cost among all insurers. Even the largest Canadian insurers seek excess protection from very large claims or from a frequency of large losses. In turn, reinsurance is a competitive business and reinsurance capacity comes not only from Canada, but from many other parts of the world as well.

Under OMPP, and to a much greater extent under the accident benefit proposals of Bill 164, excess-of-loss reinsurers find it increasingly difficult to measure their exposures and their costs. Reinsurers face unique concerns resulting from the extended periods of care, rehabilitation and disability income that are likely to stretch 20, 40 or even 60 or more years into the future. For your information, we attach a copy of an article on workers' compensation claims in the United States which highlights the long-term problems faced by reinsurers of coverages such as proposed under Bill 164.

We are obliged to raise the concerns of reinsurers with you. The cost of reinsurance claims experience must ultimately be passed back to the insurer, and thus to the insured. If reinsurers cannot measure their costs or cannot satisfy themselves that these costs are controllable, they will charge considerably more money for the unknown, try to direct the more intangible exposures back to the insurer, or withdraw from the market and allow other less knowledgeable and less stable reinsurers to take their place.

Here it is important to note that excess-of-loss automobile insurance is not written in isolation. This same reinsurance community protects home owners' property and liability, commercial property and other commercial exposures such as products liability, machinery breakdown and business interruption. If Ontario automobile insurance disrupts the Canadian reinsurance market, then it may also disrupt that market's capacity to support other lines of personal and commercial insurance.

The chief concerns of reinsurers relate to those proposals contained in Bill 164 as they will affect losses of the 1990s that will remain active throughout the first half of the 21st century and beyond. These concerns can be summarized as the absence of cost controls, the unchecked influence of inflation and the exposure to changing social expectations and political expedients.

Looking at these in order, control of costs: We are pleased to note that a task force is being set up to review cost containment and we view this as a very positive move. Nevertheless, we have specific concerns over the absence of controls and the blurring of benefits as claims of the 1990s continue into the coming decades.

The absence of specific controls over the degree and duration of care, medical and rehabilitation procedures may make Ontario automobile insurance prohibitively expensive. We are told that controls, such as those applied to the Quebec automobile plan, will be put in place as experience dictates. This philosophy may be acceptable for the vast majority of claims that can be resolved in a matter of months. Problems or abuses can be corrected and premiums adjusted within a relatively harmless period of time. But for larger losses, any shortcomings in the new auto insurance plan will have to be borne by reinsurers for decades.

Normally, reinsurers set a price for a full year's exposure in respect of accidents occurring during that year. They then have no opportunity to review, reprice or terminate that business until the end of the year. Therefore, claims developments 20 or 40 years down the road must be paid by reinsurers without the possibility of correction or future repricing. Nor can reinsurers roll the problems of one year into the pricing of the next, as several years will have passed before the impact of broadly defined benefits becomes clear.

Therefore, we ask that you urgently address the need for clearly defined standards of medical and rehabilitation care and duration, such as those applied in the province of Quebec.

We ask that the proposed benefits address and clearly define "medical" and "rehabilitation" so that 10 years down the road we do not find unlimited rehabilitation expenses spilling over to replace or supplement limited care expenses.

We ask that the intent of certain benefits be set out in such a way as to preclude reinterpretation of coverage some time in the future. For example, as the population ages, there will be very thin lines between accident-related degeneration and the natural onset of age-related disabilities. Without clear definitions, we fear that the auto policy will be called on to act as a long-term care provider for age-related, not accident-related, infirmity.

We ask that greater control be placed on the open-ended opportunity of accident victims to review earning capacity. For example, will some future changes in the economy prompt hundreds of claimants to reopen their benefits?

Any system with benefits as generous as those proposed for Ontario will become a target for fraud. Of particular concern would be expenses incurred by injured parties after their return to their own country, where medical certificates can easily be bought or forged and where follow-ups are expensive. It is noted that under the definition of "accidents" in Quebec there is a limitation that it applies solely to persons legally in Canada. We ask that this apply to all accidents in Canada.

Indexation: You have indicated an indexation factor for certain quantified benefits such as income replacement and long-term care. We have a minor concern regarding the linkage to CPI. If accident benefits are to be tied to CPI, there must be the possibility for deflation as well as inflation. The alternative can create a situation where the increase in benefits substantially outstrips the CPI. An example of this is attached to our brief. At the very least, should deflation occur and then be followed by inflation, the indexed benefit should only rise when the CPI-adjusted benefit exceeds the benefit currently available.

Our major concern involves the true inflation of certain costs at a rate unrelated to the CPI and well above the real rate of return available to reinsurers on any investment instruments. We have grave misgivings on the ability to predict this inflation over long periods of time, particularly when it is limited to a few specific components. Examples of these are medical and drug costs—with the unknown of Bill C-91—rehabilitation and renovation, and advances in prosthetic devices and treatment.

Without some form of limitation or cap, this inflation must be viewed as an open-ended exposure of unlimited potential. Such an exposure cannot be priced. We ask that a finite amount, which can be indexed at CPI, be attached to the headings of medical and rehabilitation expenses as has already been done for long-term care, where the government acknowledged the unacceptable economic impact of unlimited costs.

Legislative: We have concerns at the prospect of limits and benefits being handled by regulation and not by legislation. If there is no retroactivity or change on existing claims envisioned in Bill 164, our concerns would be lessened, but we nevertheless are disturbed by the possibility of short-term political imperatives creating economically unsound conditions for reinsurers of Ontario automobile reinsurance. We simply cannot price against the possibility of claims from the 1990s being increased by regulation some time in the 21st century.

We also wish to express concern at the impact of possible future changes to OHIP on the cost of medical and rehabilitation claims. As OHIP seeks to reduce costs, we fear that many of them will fall under automobile policies. This cannot be envisioned in reinsurers' current rates, nor is there any opportunity for retroactive rating adjustments should this occur. In order to provide for rate stability, there must be some form of guarantee of continuing OHIP participation at existing levels.

Conclusion: We appreciate that it is your intention to develop an Ontario automobile insurance plan that is both comprehensive and affordable. However, in your deliberations, we urge you to address the long-term implications of each accident benefit. Our concerns are the absence of cost controls, unchecked inflation, and exposure to changing social factors and political imperatives. Without these being addressed, we may end up with a plan that is comprehensive but unaffordable by private insurers, by government, and most importantly, by the insuring public.

Mr Tilson: You've alarmed me even more after your presentation, specifically with the issue of cost. We have heard evidence in this committee as to what the immediate cost would be. Some of those facts are some distance apart, but the fact is that rates are going to go up immediately.

I think the facts you are now putting to us are saying there's going to be inflation and perhaps when the regulations are better understood—you've used the words "changing social expectations" and "political expedience"—rates will increase even more beyond that.

The minister has said many times in the House, and as recently as yesterday, that rates are not going to go up, that they are just simply not going to go up, and that the insurance companies are making lots of money. There was a press story this morning, of course, that said much the same thing, and he's given the people of this province a guarantee that rates are not going to go up.

We hear all these facts coming forward that say that, with the issue of costs, with the issue of benefits, the uncertainty of things, costs are going to go up. If costs are going to go up, someone's got to pay for it.

I guess we're getting to the real question. I've indicated in this committee that my observation is that he has two choices: He can put a puppet or puppets on the insurance commission who will simply say, "That's it," or he can do this provision that's in the bill, that by cabinet decree will say rates will not go up. I don't know. Maybe you can shed some light as to your theories on that, but that's what he's going to do.

Having listened to what you've said, and when we've heard what the minister has said, as described in the press this morning and since this whole issue has developed, that rates are not going to go up, what's going to happen? What's going to happen to the insurance industry? Are we being led down the path, that really Mr Swart is going to get his way and there is going to be public auto insurance in this province? Do you foresee that that's the plan of this group of people?

Mr David Wilmot: David Wilmot, chairman of the technical underwriting committee of the Reinsurance Research Council. I have to repeat something that was said at the beginning of this presentation: that we are, as excess loss reinsurers, concerned with only the largest losses; in fact, it is often determined that we will assume liability just above the normal loss expectation that the companies have had to date. So if you see something like a bit of inflation or further development in losses and how losses are settled, then that could shoot up into our area of responsibility.

After all, if we're in excess of $1 million, and you have a $1.1-million claim that inflates by another 10%, that is not a 10% inflation to us; that is, I believe, about 110% inflation for our involvement. That is the nature of excess reinsurance, to sit above what has happened in the past. I've done one study of my own, but I'd rather defer to the IAO study, which seems to be in the same line as our figures. For a layer in excess of that $1 million, we're looking at an increase of maybe 1000%.

Mr Tilson: The question is, what's going to happen to reinsurance companies?

Mr Wilmot: Reinsurers will do their own numbers and decide whether or not they can afford to continue in the Canadian market. Some will decide not to. Others, using those same numbers, will put their price forward. I would have to say that if the cost of reinsurance goes up by 1000%, we only have a small share of the premium initially, but that becomes a significant amount. That would have to flow back through the cost of insurance to individual insureds.

Mr Tilson: Notwithstanding the proposed amendment of the NDP, Mr Charlton isn't going to let you out. He won't let you stop.

Mr Wilmot: There is indeed a question whether the reinsurers are intended to be included within that fold.

Mr Tilson: I wish you luck.

One more question: the issue of OHIP. There has been some expression, and I'd like to get some thought from you as well; I've been asking this of a number of delegations. You indicate, on page 6 of your brief, that you wish some form of guarantee continuing OHIP participation at existing levels. If OHIP is being obliged to pay for more and more of these benefits that may or may not be expanded, then the question is, of course, the survival of OHIP, and that issue has been raised. Having heard that, what are your thoughts?

Mr Ross: The question really boils down to whose pocket the money comes from. Whether it comes from OHIP or whether it comes from insurance companies, it comes out of the same pocket: It comes out of the public pocket. If both sides are sharing in the costs of medical and rehabilitation and the share of one party goes down, then it's a simple economic fact that the share of the other party has to go up. If the costs overall go up, then either one or both of the parties have to increase their costs. We cannot get away from that.

It boils down to the fact that the public will either pay through the increased costs which come back, once the employer health tax works its way through the system to go to the consumer, or they pay in their automobile insurance premiums. Somewhere it has to be balanced, otherwise you have a deficit on the public side with OHIP, which is not acceptable under current government desires, or on the private side under the insurance companies, which is also not acceptable, because we are not charitable organizations.

The Chair: I'm going to go on to Mr Klopp.

Mr Klopp: Thank you very much for bringing your brief here today. It's something we are always concerned about too. You mentioned OHIP and the balance, and I think that is important. That's something that we as a government are coming to grips with, and indeed I think you tie in with this, and our committee needs to hear this.

There has been a problem with caps under the present OMPP system for accident victims. We've seen that. People have told us. That's one of the reasons we've looked at a bill such as 164.

You've mentioned the task force. We appreciate that you feel it is a good sign that this government does want to get serious about what we can find. That's why we set up this task force, because we believe we can get guidelines that strike that balance. I just want to have your comments on anything regarding that, on these benefits and where the task force should be going.

Mr Wilmot: I think you want reasonable settlement for injured parties. If they're reasonable, if they are measured in today's standards and those standards, although indexed, flow into the future unchanged, then this is a priceable product: We can come up with a price and deal with it at face value. If we don't know what the rules are down the road, if we can have a claim next year but then have the rules change on us in the year 2005 for the subsequent 30 years of somebody's life, we can't price that. Our solution to being unable to price that is to charge an extra loading, if you will, for the risk of the unknown. If you can clarify these matters, then we do not have to charge the additional loading needed for the unknown.

We're very aware of what's happened with workers' compensation in the United States. The awards that some of these people are receiving now are very fair. They're very out of line with the numbers that were contemplated in the 1930s and the 1940s, but that is fine as long as the standards and measurements can be guaranteed into the future.

For example, you use the expression "reasonable" medical cost, "reasonable" rehabilitation. Can you define the public's view of what is reasonable in the year 2015, the year 2040? We don't know what those are, but we do know that if you had internal caps that were themselves indexed, then it would be pitched so that it would deal fairly with people in 1993 and, theoretically, if indexed, should deal fairly with them in the year 2020.

Mr Klopp: That's why the minister asked all the major players to sit on this task force. I'm sure you will be giving your input in that. I certainly want that to happen. You and I may get hit by a car tomorrow; under the present plan, I would not want to get into an accident tomorrow and be caught with a $25,000 cap or whatever. I think we can resolve those issues, because any one of us might get into an accident tomorrow.

The Chair: Mr Mancini.

Mr Mancini: I have to say that your presentation to this committee has probably been the most frightening in that it clearly shows the potential for the entire system to break down. We know how upset consumers were in the late 1980s when large numbers of consumers were put in the Facility Association, some unfairly, and premiums, the rates they had to pay, went through the roof. I'm afraid, based on the information you've provided to the committee, that you foresee some type of extraordinary event, whether it's economic or political, which might put all of us in something like the Facility Association. Am I reading too much into what you've told us, or should I be as worried as I think I am?

Mr Wilmot: I'd like to answer that. The pricing and the structure, as it's been discussed up to this point, deals with the 93% of accident victims who can resolve their injuries and difficulties in a short period of time. Again, we're only looking at a very thin slice, where we are dramatically impacted by the changes proposed.

The role of excess reinsurance, of course—the spreading of risk, allowing smaller companies to compete with the large companies, or to provide protection in a niche market—we think is very important. If the reinsurers found it uneconomic to provide those layers of coverage or they had to provide something quite different—for example, they all had to move up to, say, excess of $2 million—this would hurt the competitiveness of some of the smaller companies. The opportunity to control costs on the efficiencies of some of the smaller niche insurers would disappear because of the lack of reinsurance. The large companies I'm sure would find a way to continue and insurance would remain available.

Mr Mancini: Are you familiar with the 68 pages of draft regulations that accompany Bill 164?

Mr Wilmot: Yes.

Mr Mancini: Does it remind you of the Workers' Compensation Board system of settlement?

Mr Wilmot: Very much so.

Mr Mancini: The government's own actuaries, the Mercer group, came to this committee only a day or two ago to defend their report and defend their assessment that rates would only go up 4.5%, meaning that just under $200 million being taken out of the pocketbooks of Ontario residents because of Bill 164. At the same time, the same consultants and experts giving the government advice on everything to do with automobile insurance were sending out a bulletin dated December 1992 in which they're railing against the government about the lack of cost control at the Workers' Compensation Board and they make some recommendations such as perhaps freezing the indexing of benefits for a few years to save $1 billion etc. Do you find that somewhat surprising?

Mr Wilmot: I'm not familiar with the Workers' Compensation Bulletin you have in your hands, but I do have a great deal of difficulty with the suggested percentage increase of—

Mr Mancini: So you don't buy Mercer's 4.5% increase?

Mr Wilmot: I'm afraid I do not.

Mrs Caplan: Could I have one question? Earlier this morning, we heard from some people who were looking at the impact of the removal of the ability to sue for economic loss. From your experience, I'd like to know whether you agree with them that the effect of this bill, by removing the ability of those most vulnerable to sue for economic loss, the removal of that component and allowing in its place a greater number to sue for pain and suffering with a threshold, that the impact of that really shifts from support for the lowest income and most in need to those who perhaps are higher income. In your experience as reinsurers, is that something you've had any contact with evaluating?

Mr Ross: The impact on reinsurers of that change is not particularly great. Our main concern in this bill, as we have addressed in our brief, are the unquantifiable costs and future costs of medical rehabilitation and the other areas where there is no monetary limit and where the inflationary aspects are not tied to CPI but are free to run wild.

Mrs Caplan: So it's that uncertainty.

Mr Ross: It is the uncertainty within those areas. As far as the economic loss goes, although we don't know how much it is going to be, it is a quantifiable amount. Under tort, when you've paid the claim, you've paid the claim; if circumstances change for the better or the worse, that's it, it's paid. Under the medical and rehabilitation, you've paid the claim, and you pay the claim and you pay the claim and you just keep on paying for 50 or 60 years.

Mrs Caplan: Could I have one small question, Mr Chairman? No?

The Chair: Gentlemen, I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee. I know the conversation has just got going well. Mrs Caplan, they'll be out in the hall for a few minutes if there's something you'd like to talk to them about. I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee.

Mr Tilson: Mr Chairman, I'd like to speak to you with respect to a point of order. We have had, on a number of occasions, as recently as Mr Klopp's comments—and the parliamentary assistant, of course, has referred to this task force. The government has made great boasts that this is something the government is going to get into to review this whole subject.

The whole thought occurs to me, and it arose while I was listening to Mr Klopp ask questions of this delegation: Is this committee premature in its deliberations, in its investigations, when we're going to have a government task force review, presumably, many of the matters coming forward to this committee? If I am correct, it would seem to me to be more appropriate that these proceedings should be delayed until after the task force has submitted its report.

The Chair: I might have the parliamentary assistant respond to that.

Mr Owens: Just to respond to Mr Tilson, it is Bill 164, the piece of legislation before this committee, and not the regulation. The accident benefits will be set out under the regulation, and standards of care that will be developed as a result of this task force will be set out in the regulation.

Mr Tilson: The regulations are part of the bill, and we have every right to deal with that. If the task force is going to be dealing with those regulations—

Mr Owens: It's not part of the bill, sir.

Mr Tilson: The regulations are part of the bill. Every bill has regulations, and we have every right to know what those regulations are. Some of those regulations have come to us; presumably there are going to be more. Mr Mancini and I have been spending a great deal of time showing how incomprehensible they are to understand, and you have the gall to say they're not part of the bill. If they're part of the bill—and they are part of the bill—and you in turn are having a task force to study those regulations, then the proceedings of this committee are premature. There's no reason we should be wasting the taxpayers' money to proceed with all of this matter when the government is going ahead on a task force that's going to be duplicating all the work we're doing.

The Chair: Can I go on to Mr Mancini? You had a point of order?

Mr Mancini: Well, I want to speak to Mr Tilson's point—

The Chair: Or just a clarification.

Mr Mancini: No, there's no clarification needed. Mr Tilson has raised a point of order, and I want to speak to Mr Tilson's point of order because I find what he says to make good sense. We have for the last number of days been hearing testimony in regard to Bill 164. Bill 164 is accompanied by 68 pages of unintelligible, unreadable regulations.

The Chair: That's a difference of opinion. I'm sorry.

Mr Mancini: No, I haven't finished my point yet. We have heard from the government members that there are going to be some type of government hearings in regard to some of these regulations or other regulations after 164 is passed. That is doing the government's business in reverse. It is important, Mr Chair—

The Chair: I'm not going to make a judgement, Mr Mancini, but usually some task forces are ongoing; they're always looking at better ways to do things. I'm not familiar in that particular area—

Mr Tilson: The picture that has been painted by the parliamentary assistant and other members of this committee is a new venture. It was only put forward—

The Chair: I'm sorry, but we've got another group coming on and I would like to get them on. Maybe some of these things can be addressed tomorrow.

Mr Tilson: Mr Chairman, if you're going to go away and reserve on the comment, that's fine, but I'm simply saying that these hearings are very expensive to the taxpayer, very expensive to the people who are appearing before us. Yet the government is boasting of this wonderful task force it has just called. I will say to you that it's duplication. It's a high sign of a bureaucratic plan that this government—

The Chair: I think a lot of it isn't a point of order but a difference of opinion.

Ms Haeck: On a point of order, Mr Chair: I would just like to get on with the agenda. We do have other deputants here.

Mr Mancini: The government members never care about process or policy or rules or anything. All they want to do is shove whatever they table down everybody's throat. That's the point we've reached.

The Chair: I'm sorry. The next group is here and they're ready to go. I think they've been waiting for over an hour to come before this committee.

ONTARIO CHIROPRACTIC ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Would the Ontario Chiropractic Association come forward. I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on Bill 164. I see most of you aren't strangers here. I'd like to note that my friend from Fonthill, Dr Lloyd Taylor, is here also. We have a half-hour; in that half-hour, can you make your presentation and leave some time at the end for questions? As you can see, the members of the committee are sitting on the edge of their chairs just waiting to ask questions. You may begin, but first, please identify yourselves for the purposes of Hansard.

Dr Robert Haig: My name is Bob Haig; I'm a board member and a past president of the Ontario Chiropractic Association. Dr Lloyd Taylor is our representative to Queen's Park; Dr Kopansky-Giles is a member of our board and practises in a multi-disciplinary setting; Mr David Chapman-Smith is our general counsel, and Mr Peter Waite is the association's executive director.

The Ontario Chiropractic Association represents members who see the auto insurance system from two different perspectives. First of all, they are drivers seeking insurance with reasonable benefits and costs and, second, they are health care providers who see the practicalities of the system on a day-to-day basis.

The present automobile system in Ontario has major problems, both in principle and in practice. This association supports the proposed reform in Bill 164 and the draft statutory accidents benefit schedule as producing a fairer and comprehensive system of compensation. Appropriate balances have been drawn between compensation and cost and between the rights of insurers and those insured.

With respect to some general principles, the association particularly supports a uniform and fairer rating system for drivers; the emphasis on safety and prevention through a new road safety agency; appropriate recognition of the importance of and compensation for non-economic loss; the amendment to the threshold for resort to the courts found in the current OMPP; the continuation of the existing private insurance industry.

I am at this point reading from the executive summary, which is the second page in. The rest of the executive summary is dealt with in more detail in the main body of the brief. I'm going to skip to the third page in, which is part A, the introduction.

The Ontario Chiropractic Association has about 1,400 members. There are over 1,500 chiropractors licensed to practise in Ontario, and approximately 50,000 in North America.

There is legislation recognizing and regulating the practice of chiropractic in every province in Canada. The profession plays a major role in the treatment of accident victims, because its scope of practice focuses on soft-tissue injuries, including joint and muscle disorders in the neck, low back and extremities.

For many reasons, there has been dramatic new acceptance and growth of the chiropractic profession, both internationally and here in Ontario, during the last 10 years. In Ontario, for example:

(a) A 1990 survey from the faculty of medicine at the University of Toronto reported that a majority of medical family doctors in Ontario, 63%, now refer patients to chiropractors; in fact, one in 10 doctors are themselves chiropractic patients.

(b) WCB records show that over the last few years, the number of injured workers with back sprain/strain types of injuries that choose or are referred to a chiropractor has risen from 33% up to 50%.

(c) Under the new Regulated Health Professions Act, 1991, and the Chiropractic Act, 1991, chiropractors are one of the five health care professions recognized as having the ability, right and duty to perform a diagnosis and use the title "doctor." Those five professions—chiropractic, dentistry, medicine, optometry and psychology—are therefore the ones authorized to provide certificates under Bill 164.

The new spirit of cooperation between chiropractors, medical doctors and other health professionals, which is greatly in the interest of the patients and which also promotes an efficient auto accident benefits program, will be enhanced by the new legislation.

In the brief time the association has today, we wish to focus on the scheme for the provision of supplementary and medical rehabilitation benefits found in the schedule. This is the area where the association and its members have expertise and can provide the most informed comment on the improvements found in the legislation.

First of all, with respect to disability certificates: For over 50 years in Ontario, the workers' compensation law has allowed patients to choose chiropractic or medical care and have all of their claim and disability certificates signed by their chosen practitioner. However, when chiropractic services were brought under the standard auto policy in 1979, the right to certify disability for disability payment benefit purposes was still restricted to medical doctors. That situation provided unbelievable conflict and unbelievable difficulty for many accident victims who chose to attend a chiropractor, who elected chiropractic care.

The OCA placed many graphic examples of these difficulties before the Osborne inquiry into motor vehicle accident compensation, and that inquiry expressly ruled, in its 1988 report, that in order to avoid unacceptable delay, expense and patient inconvenience, chiropractors should be able to provide disability certificates for their patients. The relevant parts of that report are attached as appendix A.

The previous reform of the auto insurance law failed to adopt the Osborne inquiry's recommendations, and there are major problems that still continue. I am going to give you two specific examples here. I'm on page 2; this is point 3(a).

In June 1992, Miss C. of Waterloo had an auto accident and chose chiropractic care, but was told by her insurer that she had to have her medical authorization completed by a family physician. The OCA discussed it with Alpina, failed to get it to take a reasonable approach and resolved the issue only through the insistence of the Ontario Insurance Commission. This patient was put under great stress and difficulty at a time when she was in great pain from an auto accident injury. Alpina's response was conditioned by the confusing legal picture for the insurance industry. The law says a chiropractor can treat and certify what amounts to reasonable and necessary treatment, but a certificate as to the cause and nature of the injury and disability can only be given by a medical doctor. It's an incredibly confusing situation.

The second example is that of Mr P. of Kitchener, who had an injury just in September 1992. He elected chiropractic care and did very well, but the adjuster in the company in this case challenged his right to see a chiropractor and pressured him to be examined in a medical doctor's office in order to have payment for his chiropractic expenses.

I'm going to ask you to turn for a minute to appendix C, which is the documentation relative to that. Appendix C-1 is the letter the association received from its member. This is a member writing to the association and saying, "This patient is undergoing blatant harassment, and is there anything that you can do about it?"

The second letter, which is C-2, is the letter the patient received from the insurer and you can scan the underlined parts there, "We were informed...you simply went to this chiropractor on the suggestion of a fellow employee." Well, that's not inherently a bad thing. It is demanding that he be assessed by his family physician in order that the payment be made. The lack of clarity in the legislation allowed this insurer to use it inappropriately to restrict this patient's ability to access chiropractic services.

Section 44 of the proposed standard accidents benefit schedule will finally resolve this long-standing problem for patients, not just of chiropractors but of dentists, optometrists and psychologists. The top of page 3 is the provisions of subsection 44(1), and you can see clearly that the certification of disability is permitted by all of those five professions which, under the Regulated Health Professions Act, have the right and duty to diagnose.

Secondly, with respect to rehabilitation benefits: Section 33 of the schedule—now, this brief says it's attached as Appendix D; I apologize that it is not. I assume you all will have it, but if you don't, we have copies. This section comprises an important reform with a major new emphasis on rehabilitation. It's worthwhile if we can pause for a minute to summarize the clinical and scientific background to this reform.

One factor that has led to the greater use of chiropractic and multidisciplinary services in soft tissue injuries to the spine, the kinds of injuries which are most common in whiplash and other automobile accidents, is a radical change in the understanding and management of these kinds of injuries.

Health professionals and researchers acknowledge that it is currently impossible to provide a precise diagnosis of the source of pain in most neck and back soft tissue injuries. They also agree that the traditional approach to management, passive care consisting of medication, immobilization, bed rest, physical therapy modalities—it's acknowledged that this passive care approach is inappropriate, that it promotes deconditioning, psychological overlay and disability.

These kinds of injuries require early active care: physical treatment such as mobilization and manipulation to restore muscle and joint function combined with the earliest possible return to activities of daily living and entry into rehab programs involving education, counselling, exercise and work hardening in order to empower the patient.

With neck pain, no standard medical treatment—immobilization, use of a collar, injections, medications—none of these has scientific evidence of effectiveness. The only treatment approach with acceptable scientific support is manual treatment aimed at muscle and joint function: mobilization, manipulation, trigger point therapy.

With back pain, the treatment approach with the most scientific evidence of effectiveness is joint manipulation as used in chiropractic practice. It's important to understand that with both neck and back soft tissue injuries, early aggressive intervention, the type of intervention that's traditional in sports medicine and in chiropractic practices, is the key. This must include exercise, patient education and responsibility, counselling and work simulation.

Very often there needs to be multidisciplinary assessment and management at the outset. Currently, patients will frequently go from a trial of this therapy to a trial of that therapy to a trial of this therapy, without an overall management of their problem and it may take many months before they get appropriate treatment.

Section 33, which provides a legislative basis for early effective rehab programs, is an important reform. Clause 33(3)(c) contemplates professional case management and we can predict with some confidence that it will result in reduced levels of chronic injury and disability.

Section III on page 4 addresses the appropriate controls and balances that are in place here. I'm going to leave that part for now. If there are specific questions on that, we'll be happy to go to it. But I want to deal with the one minor recommendation for amendment we have on page 5, and that's with respect to attendant care benefits.

As previously mentioned, five primary independent health care professions—chiropractic, dentistry, medicine, optometry and psychology—are recognized by the Regulated Health Professions Act as having the right and duty to perform and communicate a diagnosis. An important practical principle found in Bill 164 and in the schedule is that an insured who elects to see any of these professionals may receive any certificate he or she may require from them. Of course, this is appropriately, and as recommended by the Osborne inquiry, subject to the insurer's right to obtain a second opinion from another health professional.

Section 34 deals with attendant care benefits. This relates to the costs or losses of those assisting a disabled person, and there are two categories of this. There's the cost of qualified attendants and/or long-term care facilities, and there is the cost of lay persons, such as a spouse, who lose income because of the need to care for the insured. The former is not really relevant to chiropractic practice, but the latter is.

As drafted, all attendant care benefits require a certificate from the insured's physician or psychologist. Chiropractors should be able to certify for lay persons. Point 10 on page 5 is our recommendation that a new subsection 34(6) should be inserted, reading:

"In respect of benefits under subsection (4) a certificate required under subsection (5) may be from a chiropractor if the injury is one that a chiropractor is qualified to treat."

That wording is consistent with the provisions for other certificates.

For consistency and in principle, such an amendment should also apply for dentists and optometrists, but this association is unsure of whether or not that is a practical problem for them and whether that needs to take place.

That concludes the remarks we wish to make to the committee and we're happy to answer any questions you might have.

The Chair: Okay. We have five minutes per caucus, and we will start off with Mr Owens.

Mr Owens: Thank you for your presentation this afternoon. We appreciate your suggested amendment and we will certainly take that into consideration.

I'd like to read a quote from yesterday's Hansard by the member for Windsor and Essex that talks about the Liberal legislation. He says, "This Liberal legislation is fair and has stood the test of time." I'd like to ask your association how it views the current legislation, and in terms of how the current legislation doesn't take care of those who are psychologically injured and doesn't recognize the—

Mr Tilson: Mr Chair, on a point of order: The legislation this committee is reviewing is not the OMPP or Bill 68; the issue before us is Bill 164. I think it's a completely irrelevant—

The Chair: He's wasting his time asking that particular question then. Let him—

Interjections.

Mr Tilson: Is it a valid issue or not? It has nothing to do with Bill 164.

The Chair: Sometimes it happens it comes the same way.

Mr Tilson: I'm asking the Chair to rule that out of order and let's proceed on another question.

The Chair: He's taking up his five minutes.

Mr Owens: And you're taking up my time.

Mr Tilson: He can ask anything under the sun. Is that what your position is?

The Chair: Correct. Go ahead, Mr Owens.

Mr Owens: Just to complete my question, again, how does your association view the current legislation and its impact on your patients?

Mr David Chapman-Smith: I've had quite a lot to do with the current legislation and was involved during the last legislative round. There was, I think, an honest attempt then made to improve the situation and there was something done as to certificates, but basically the problem wasn't solved because it wasn't dealt with comprehensively.

To move on to the element of your question which deals with psychological problems, a point made in the current presentation quite strongly is that a lot of this develops from an inappropriate treatment regime where, instead of things being dealt with in a timely fashion and in an interdisciplinary manner, under a system which really doesn't foster interdisciplinary cooperation you get disability and you get a delay in recovery, which leads to psychological overlay and psychological problems. A system which facilitates all the relevant services getting to an accident victim straight away and dealing with something in a timely fashion and empowering him to act certainly will have an impact on that.

Mr Owens: So again, moving from the political to the practical, your association would view Bill 164 and its implementation as being helpful from a practical perspective in terms of getting an accident victim back on his or her feet and back into the workplace.

Mr Chapman-Smith: I think that's so and we've given some evidence of the patient difficulties today, but the real body of evidence, including signed statements on the issue, was given to the Osborne inquiry some years ago, which went in some depth into the fact that this is a major problem for patients. So it's good to see that cleaned up.

The Chair: Any other time over here? Anybody have other questions?

Mr Owens: We'll hold our minute.

The Chair: Mr Mancini.

Mr Mancini: I'd like to ask the solicitor a question. Do you agree that people should have the right to sue for economic loss?

Mr Chapman-Smith: The right to sue for economic loss?

Mr Mancini: Yes.

Mr Chapman-Smith: As a solicitor, I'd like for them to have the right to sue for most things.

The Chair: There's your answer.

Mr Mancini: I appreciate that, but I want to be clear on the record and I would like a clear answer. We heard testimony this morning from the Fair Action Insurance Reform Committee, FAIR, and when they reaffirmed some of the things we had heard as to what effects losing the right to sue for economic loss has on families, I don't think it's very funny. My question to you is, do you think people should have the right to sue for economic loss?

Mr Chapman-Smith: Well, I'm going to be obliged to pass on that because I'm here representing the association.

Mr Mancini: You're here speaking to Bill 164?

Mr Chapman-Smith: Yes.

Mr Mancini: Bill 164 takes away the right to sue for economic loss, and I ask you again, do you believe that people should lose the right to sue for economic loss?

Mr Chapman-Smith: I've got a personal view on that, but I don't feel at liberty to express that here.

The Chair: I think maybe that's an inappropriate question to this particular group. In other words, they're here—

Mr Mancini: Are you kidding?

Mr Tilson: Some questions are appropriate and some questions are inappropriate.

The Chair: Criticize the parliamentary assistant for the kind of question—we left it right open.

Interjections.

Mr Mancini: Are you serious, Ronnie?

The Chair: They most likely haven't taken a stand on that.

Mr Mancini: They're here making a presentation on Bill 164. Bill 164 takes away the right to sue for economic loss. What's the association's view?

Dr Haig: We have strong views on the part of this legislation that we understand the best. If this legislation is going to result in a system that fairly compensates people, then it's a good idea.

Mr Mancini: With all due respect—

Dr Haig: The part of it that we know the most about is the rehabilitative and the medical expenses part.

Mr Mancini: With all due respect, all groups that have come before us have spoken to the bill in its entirety and have tried to answer questions on the entire scope that the bill is dealing with. I understand where you're coming from and why you zeroed in on the area you did. However, you did say at the beginning of your statement, "The Ontario Chiropractic Association represents 1,400 members who see the automobile insurance system from two perspectives—they are drivers seeking insurance with reasonable benefits and cost." "Benefits and cost" were your own words. Your members are losing the benefits that they would have been able to undertake under the existing legislation that's being changed, and you have no comment to make on that. It's very surprising.

The other point I want to make is as follows. You are now limited by the Ontario government, present and past, as to how much you could—there's a cap on your billings; let me put it briefly. Is that correct?

Dr Haig: Yes, that's right.

1630

Mr Mancini: What is the cap?

Dr Haig: There is a cap per patient through OHIP.

Mr Mancini: What is the cap per patient through OHIP?

Dr Haig: Right now it's $220.

Mr Mancini: It's $220. Over and above $220 the patient has to pay. Is that correct?

Dr Haig: It's more complicated than that, but yes.

Mr Mancini: If the patient is not insured, if the patient has not been referred to you by any other agency, if the patient walks in off the street—I come to your office tomorrow, I have a bad back, I can't claim it against anyone, I want to see you for six months and after my $220 is expired, I've got to reach into my pocketbook and pay you, correct?

Dr Haig: Essentially, yes.

Mr Mancini: Thank you. Now, this legislation, by the government's own admission, is going to raise the cost to Ontario drivers by just under $200 million.

Mr Owens: That's not an admission.

Mr Mancini: It's the Mercer admission.

The Chair: I'm sorry that he interfered in your question.

Mr Mancini: Is he saying that Mercer is off?

The Chair: Don't listen, Mr Mancini. Just carry on with the question over there.

Mr Harnick: Nobody listens to him anyway, Remo.

Mr Mancini: I just want to make sure that our guests here have the facts. Mercer, hired by the government, said in these committee hearings in front of the committee that rates will go up 4.5% across the province. You factor that out; that's almost $200 million.

Last year, or this year, as my colleague has been saying, hospitals in this province will not get $200 million. Don't you think it's a little bit ironic that we don't have money to give to chiropractors who would give me and millions of other people services that we might need without having to reach into our own pockets, but are willing to change the automobile insurance system where we as a group have to pay a minimum of $200 million more and the possibility of paying up to $565 million more? Doesn't that concern you?

Dr Haig: We know that there have been a variety of estimates as to the cost.

Mr Mancini: Let's use the government's estimates.

The Chair: Mr Mancini, can you let him answer, because we're ready to go on to the next one as soon as he gives the answer.

Ms Haeck: Just be nice to my constituent.

Dr Haig: This is fine. Mr Mancini, I really wish that I could give you an answer that would keep you happy.

Mr Mancini: You don't have to keep me happy. Keep the viewing public happy that has to pay all this money. Not all of them are NDP ministers, you know.

Mr Phillips: Through regressive tax.

Dr Haig: I can assure you that this association has things to say about the financing of the health care system as a separate issue. Of course there's concern relative to the costs to the system of anything. I simply go back to the point that our members deal with a lot of individual people on a day-to-day basis who have individual problems. We're quite convinced that the parts of this legislation we've addressed are going to be of major benefit to them.

Mr Mancini: It's obvious you don't want to answer any questions other than when they pertain to your own industry.

The Chair: Mr Harnick, go ahead.

Mr Harnick: Is this five minutes?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Harnick: Sir, just to help you out with what Mr Mancini was asking you, let's assume that you as a chiropractor were involved in a car accident yourself. You make a certain amount of income, and under Bill 164 you're going to get compensation for a portion of your income. But let's assume that you're going to lose something beyond what the accident benefits are going to pay you. Do you think that, if you're the innocent victim of the accident, it's right for you to have your right to sue for that differential taken away?

Mrs Caplan: Especially if you can never work again.

Mr Harnick: What I'm saying is that the benefits pay you a certain amount of money, your income was really more and Bill 164 says you can't claim for that differential. Really, I think what Mr Mancini was asking you was, do you think it's right to have your economic rights taken away from you if you are the innocent victim?

Mrs Caplan: And you could never work again.

Dr Haig: I do understand what you're saying.

Mr Harnick: I don't want to pressure you to hurry up but my time is fleeing.

The Chair: Put the question a little bit differently, Mr Harnick.

Dr Haig: We'll eat up your five minutes here.

Mr Harnick: And you don't know how much that upsets me.

Mrs Caplan: I think it's fair to point out that deputants are permitted to take a couple of minutes and think about the answer.

Dr Haig: I'm not really trying to eat up your five minutes, but—

Mr Harnick: No, I know, because I have a better question for you next. I was just trying to bail you out.

Dr Haig: With respect to chiropractors, the reality is that all chiropractors have disability insurance as well.

Mr Harnick: Let me jump in here. Disability insurance is your first insurer. Auto insurance tops you up. There's still a differential at the end of the day, and all I'm saying is, do you think it's right to lose the opportunity to sue for that differential as an individual?

Dr Haig: The association hasn't for sure arrived at a conclusion to that.

Mr Harnick: Okay, that's fine.

Dr Haig: That's the reality of it.

Mr Harnick: I was just pursuing Mr Mancini's line, but the question I really wanted to ask you deals with neck injuries. From my experience of seeing numerous individuals who have been involved in car accidents, I have learned over the last many years that neck injuries can be very serious injuries and can have a very devastating effect on an individual and that injuries to the neck, and perhaps to the low back often don't get better or they last for several years and gradually people learn to live with the pain.

Under this bill, people will be permitted to sue for pain and suffering but there's a $15,000 deductible. My experience says if you've had an injury or you've had a neck pain for three or four years, you finally learn to live with the pain and carry on and do most of the daily things you want to do even though you still have some residual pain.

Your claim might be worth $15,000 to $20,000. Under Bill 164 there's a $15,000 deductible, which essentially, for a person who has had an injury for three or four years and still has some residual pain, renders the claim absolutely valueless, because the deductible is set at a high level.

The deputy minister yesterday said—

The Chair: I'm sorry, Mr Harnick. Can you get to the question, because your time has run out.

Mr Harnick: I'm getting to the question.

The Chair: Yes, but we're not going to have a history story.

Mr Harnick: The deputy minister yesterday said he wanted to eliminate small claims. Unfortunately, in my eyes anyway, a person who's had pain and suffering for three or four years and his claim is worth $15,000 and has it eliminated by a deductible of $15,000 is eliminating more than a small claim. What I want you to do for my friends across the way is explain to them, if you can and if you agree with my proposition, what pain and suffering a person goes through when he or she has a soft-tissue injury: whether those injuries are real and whether they're significant.

Dr Haig: How long do we have here?

Mr Harnick: Take all the time you need, because it's a very serious matter when people are going to lose their right to claim.

Dr Deborah Kopansky-Giles: I can maybe help answer that question. As I understand it, what you're asking is to clarify that soft-tissue injuries, first of all, can be significantly disabling injuries, and yes, in fact they can be very disabling. Even though we don't have our concrete signs and symptoms, like a fracture on an X-ray or a dislocation, soft-tissue injuries can be very disabling in many ways.

The way we've looked at it, and as we commented in our brief here, is that we are confident that the new bill will help improve the patient's access to rehabilitation and expedite recovery so that many patients who do have relatively minor soft-tissue injuries may not have the pain and suffering for three years, which would take care of those patients and those $15,000 claims that won't receive anything because of the deductible. We won't run into that longevity of symptoms. People who go beyond that usually settle for a significantly larger claim, so maybe their considerations would be addressed.

The Chair: Mr Owens, one minute. That's all you've got left. You didn't use it all up at the beginning.

Mr Owens: I just ask you to quickly comment on your views of our proposal with respect to immediate rehabilitation benefits after a one-week waiting period, indexed income levels, versus the potential of no benefits and no rehabilitation under the tort system.

Mr Chapman-Smith: I think it's partially covered in our brief. Whether you're talking about an auto accident system or workers' compensation or general treatment, as was mentioned in the submission, there has been a major understanding which is reflected in the science and in practice worldwide in recent years that in traditional practice, with the sort of injuries you get, certainly in whiplash and soft-tissue spinal strain injuries, the chief evil has been that it has actually created disability. You can describe that by saying for every day you lie in bed, there is definitive demineralization of bone, weakening of muscles etc, and at a physical and psychological level, you deteriorate rapidly from day one.

Therefore, the major new emphasis is to early multidisciplinary management, and luckily there are a lot of external things which are making that feasible in the 1990s. What that means in the current context is a system that encourages and allows someone to get into early multidisciplinary management with the best rehab services available. Dr Kopansky-Giles and her partner run a major clinic in Toronto which has psychologists, physiotherapists and all of these people who should be brought in at week one rather than one at a time over a period of 18 months.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you and your association for appearing before this committee. Thank you.

INSURANCE BROKERS ASSOCIATION OF ONTARIO

The Chair: The next group is the Insurance Brokers Association of Ontario. I'd like to explain to the committee that they were scheduled for Tuesday. Our meeting for the presenters was cancelled on Tuesday; they were rescheduled and they were able to make it today to present because of another cancellation. I'd like to thank you, gentlemen, that you've been able to make it here tonight. I know we're 10 minutes behind.

Welcome. If you don't mind introducing yourselves for the purposes of Hansard and the audience here in Ontario so they know who you are, you may proceed. We have one half-hour and please leave some time at the end. As you can see, the question part seems to be a very important part of this consultation.

Mr Bob Carter: Thank you. My name is Bob Carter. I'm the executive director of the Insurance Brokers Association of Ontario.

Mr Frank Sytsma: I'm Frank Sytsma, president of the Insurance Brokers Association of Ontario.

Mr Bob Stuart: I'm Bob Stuart, president-elect of the Insurance Brokers Association of Ontario.

Mr Bob Carter: What we'd like to do is briefly tell you a little bit about ourselves, where we come from, our association and what our interests are in your hearings.

Briefly, the role of the independent insurance broker in Ontario and the role of our association: Insurance brokers act on behalf of their clients, the insurance consumers of Ontario. Brokers purchase insurance protection for their clients from various insurance companies. Here we're pointing out the distinction between an insurance agent and an insurance broker: Insurance agents act for one company; we act for several.

The Insurance Brokers Association of Ontario: More than 12,000 active individual insurance brokers currently distribute property and casualty insurance products in the large and small communities of Ontario. The Insurance Brokers Association of Ontario represents over 7,400 insurance brokers employed in approximately 1,300 offices contributing to the province's economy. In that number, we're only dealing with the licensed personnel. We also have secretaries, accountants and people like that in those offices.

Our members, as small independent business people, are the first to hear from consumers when an insurance product is not working. Therefore, we look at the design and content of an insurance product primarily in relation to its impact on the insurance consumers. Whether an automobile product is no-fault, tort or a combination of the two does not really concern us, unless the consumer will be adversely affected. We are therefore here today to express our views on how Bill 164 will affect our clients: the insurance consumer.

Since the introduction of the Ontario motorist protection plan, consumer complaints in connection with both claims and premiums have dropped dramatically. We agree that improvements are needed and we note that Bill 164 takes some positive steps towards further protecting and enhancing the interests of our clients. However, in the areas where we believe the consumer will be adversely affected, we will suggest some viable alternatives.

We strongly believe that Bill 164 should be considered in the broader context of the initiatives proposed in The Road Ahead: Ontario's Strategy for Automobile Insurance Reform. The Road Ahead document placed significant emphasis on the need for safer roads as a key to containing both monetary and social costs.

As we all know, affordability is an important concern for Ontario consumers. The cost of the auto insurance product is based, for the most part, on the cost of claims. The cost of claims in turn is driven by the level of benefits the policy provides and the frequency and severity of accidents. The implementation of a graduated licensing scheme is one lifesaving measure that could contribute to road safety and help control insurance costs.

One of the goals of the road safety agency created by Bill 39 is to influence public opinion to convince motorists that it is no longer socially acceptable to drive in a dangerous manner. We believe that a road safety agency could be a very successful instrument of social policy. After all, this approach has already proven successful in changing attitudes on drinking and driving, a campaign in which the Insurance Brokers Association of Ontario played an active role.

It appears to us that the road safety corporation has been delayed. We have provided a list of volunteers from our membership to serve on both the board and the five subcommittees. To date, it is our understanding that only two of the committees are active and the board has not been struck. This is a source of serious concern to us.

As we mentioned, the price of the automobile insurance product is important to the consumer. While we are not able to evaluate Bill 164's proposed changes in specific actuarial terms, we do have serious concerns about the affordability of this new product.

When improvements are made to benefits, the average cost per claim rises. Bill 164 also raises the possibility of increased adjustment costs because a higher percentage of accidents involving bodily injury will be investigated now that there will be increased access to the courts. We further believe that the potential exists for increased costs as wording changes are tested in the courts.

One must never lose sight of the fact that the cost of insurance is directly related to the cost of claims, and any improvement in benefits must be weighed very carefully against these increased costs. We sincerely believe that the Ontario consumer will protest strongly if the proposed reforms lead to anything more than modest premium increases. We must be wary of consumer backlash directed at both the insurance industry and the government.

As affordability is a major concern, so too is the question of availability. Since the mid-1980s, the automobile insurance market has been under political scrutiny. It has been the subject of many inquiries, legislation and change. If market forces are not allowed to operate and if competition is not fostered, then the consumer will suffer. The current legislative climate has resulted in the withdrawal from the Ontario market of one major automobile insurer, the cancellation of significant expansion plans of another insurer and uncertainty for the rest.

We agree that there must be regulations in place to protect the interests of the consumer. Market forces and good business practices and principles must be also be permitted and encouraged.

I'll skip over the next part. What we deal with there really is that on the original withdrawal provisions we were very concerned. You've addressed them to a certain extent and we hope that will minimize the impact on market disruption.

We have serious concern that Bill 164 gives excessive powers to the cabinet. The insurance industry is a multi-billion-dollar business and employs thousands of hardworking Ontario residents. While no one questions the rights of the elected representatives to govern and to regulate, we are concerned that by moving this power from the Ontario Insurance Commission to cabinet, auto insurance will become more of a political issue as opposed to a business issue.

Auto insurance is a highly technical product that should be kept out of the political arena. Technical expertise exists at the Ontario Insurance Commission, and we believe that the consumer's needs are best served by regulation, on a consultative basis, by the OIC.

There are proposed changes to the classification system, and we believe that the implementation of a uniform rating system will limit competition among the insurance companies. The insurers use the rating grid to implement a series of highly specialized discounts. These discounts benefit a variety of consumers. A number of them are especially beneficial to Ontario's seniors, and we comment on that throughout our presentation.

The situation on tort: Bill 164 restores the right to sue for pain and suffering, subject to the $15,000 deductible, or $5,000 under the Family Law Reform Act. We believe there should be adequate compensation for pain and suffering. We also believe that Ontario's consumers would be disadvantaged if they had the right to sue completely removed. However, we must not lose sight of the fact that generous increases in no-fault accident benefits under the original OMPP were introduced as a measure to control claims costs by reducing access to courts and still providing compensation to all accident victims, regardless of fault. Bill 164 further enhances these no-fault benefits.

Earlier, we expressed our concern on the issue of affordability. Anything that affects claims costs ultimately affects insurance premiums. We believe that the $15,000—$5,000 under the Family Law Reform Act—threshold, while increasing consumer access to the courts, will not necessarily increase claims payments to the consumers. It will, however, increase claims costs and ultimately premiums, as insurers will once again have to fully investigate all claims in order to prove fault or protect their position; I think that's a key element in that low threshold. We cannot emphasize too strongly that Ontario's consumers will not accept anything more than a very modest premium adjustment.

The statutory accident benefits are another issue. Our comments are based on a thorough review of the draft regulations dated March 1992, but a more limited review of the revised regulations released January 18, 1993, due to obvious time constraints. When we originally reviewed the March 1992 regulations, we had some concerns regarding "the activities of daily living," and under the January 1993 revised draft regulations, many of these have been addressed. It is our feeling, however, that some of the definitions may be too vague and, once again, may require legal interpretation. Under the section headed "insured person," our original concerns regarding non-dependent family members have been addressed in the revisions.

We feel that the inclusion of temporary supplemental benefits to protect those who are legitimately trying to get back into the workforce, but are temporarily unable to do so or do so at reduced earnings, is a very positive step towards assisting the rehabilitation of those who have been injured.

On income replacement, part II, we notice there's been a change in the qualifications applying to a person claiming weekly benefits under which the existing subparagraph (ii), "on temporary layoff" has been replaced by subparagraph 6(1)4i, reading, "to be recalled" to an employment "pursuant to a collective agreement." It would appear that this may be too limiting in that not all layoffs apply only to those under collective agreements. We recommend that the proposed new clause be extended to include the previously mentioned wording.

We believe that unemployment insurance benefits should be included in calculating the amount of benefits, thereby treating, from an income point of view, employed and unemployed persons equally. Under section 8, we remain confused as to the methodology proposed on when unemployment insurance is included or excluded and its impact on benefits payable to consumers.

While we appreciate the need to be fair with respect to the benefits, we are concerned that in current economic conditions a benefit could be calculated based partly on employment which may have ceased three years prior to the accident. This section appears to ignore the reality that the province's economy has changed to the point that some positions have disappeared with no likelihood of reappearing in the future. One solution might be to use the Ontario average industrial wage, as referred to within the regulations.

Many Ontario workers who have been displaced under the current worldwide economic restructuring have unfortunately been faced with reduced incomes compared to one, two or three years previous. We do not believe the silent majority of automobile insurance consumers in Ontario should have to pay for income benefits which exceed current and future income expectations and realities.

Part III: The introduction of yearly benefits for loss of an academic year is, in our opinion, quite worthwhile. We have a concern, however, that if the accident were to occur in the final year of a student's education, the need to stay in school for an additional year, with the resulting lack of income, could well be worth more than $8,000. Perhaps a more equitable solution in this situation would be replacing the benefit of $8,000 with payment for actual tuition costs plus the benefits set out in subsection 14(4).

With respect to the benefit payable to care givers, we feel that going back three years within the employment history again does not reflect today's conditions.

We refer to previously stated concerns that interpretations of "activities of daily living" may result in insureds and insurers being unable to reach consensus, especially with respect to part II, clauses (b), (c) and (d).

Other disability benefits: This section is a catch-all to pick up those who do not fit in any of the previous categories. We are not bothered or troubled by the concept; however, we feel it important to point out that many of those who would be covered under this section are retired persons. It should be noted that for those persons who are retired, the limit on benefits is $185 per week, not indexed.

There is currently no provision within the rating structure of the accident benefits section to reflect this obvious limitation of benefit. It seems inequitable that seniors are required to pay premiums based on a limit of $1,000 per week but are themselves limited to receiving only $185 per week. We suggest that this be addressed in the rating of the section and that a discount be allowed to reflect the reduced exposure under clause (b) benefits for those persons who are retired.

With respect to loss-of-earning-capacity benefits, we agree with the provision that insurers must make a formal offer to pay benefits after 104 weeks of disability.

In connection with the assessment provisions, care will need to be taken that the assessment facility has local representation from the area where the claimant resides.

There is a further potential problem with factors involving wages for those who have been receiving an education benefit. We suggest that this section be reviewed to take into account students who may have been involved in a recognized apprenticeship program. Students in their final year of apprenticeship could reasonably expect to reach the full wage rate applied to their trades significantly before the age of 30. We recommend that in such cases they receive full benefits from the date they would have completed the apprenticeship.

The conditions regarding mandatory review of benefits and deterioration in condition are positive and give both parties an opportunity to adjust to changing circumstances.

Supplementary medical benefits and rehabilitation benefits: We're pleased to note that the caps on these important coverages have been removed. It is our feeling that those who have been seriously injured in an automobile accident should not have to be concerned about the possibility of their benefit running out while they still need either medical or rehabilitation benefits.

On part IX, attendant care benefits, we're concerned that the $3,000 monthly limit may not be adequate for those who have been seriously injured. The establishment, however, of the minister's task force on rehabilitation and long-term care benefits is a positive initiative to clarify benefits for the protection of the consumer.

We are in agreement with the increase in death benefits and revised definition of spouse.

We are concerned that the maximum amount stated under funeral benefits is actually a reduction in amount for most insured persons. The current policy permits an increase from the $3,000 base to $7,500 for funeral benefits, and most policies written through the 1,300 independent broker offices we represent automatically reflect this higher limit. We recommend that this increased amount be carried forward under the new proposal to avoid coverage reductions.

Other pecuniary loss: Changes here reflect today's society by permitting visitation expenses for a person who was living with the insured, in addition to the traditional family members.

The extension for dependent care to wage earners and the increase for non-wage-earners further reflect the reality of today's society.

Payment for housekeeping and home maintenance expense reflects a realistic approach to actual loss by the insured person. Damage to personal items further reflects actual loss, which is not recoverable under the current plan.

Under exclusions, clause 2 recognizes that some consumers have been unaware of licence suspensions due to unpaid fines and therefore, under the previous plan, have been operating their automobiles without insurance protection. This has been one of the major problems with OMPP since its inception. We cannot understand, however, why this improvement has been made only to the statutory accident benefits and not to Bill 164 so that it can apply to all coverages. We believe this change should be made so that the many motorists who are unaware of suspensions for unpaid fines will continue to receive the full benefit of their policy. What we've found is that, if you haven't paid a ticket or something, the notice does not get to the consumer for a number of months and he or she is technically unlicensed. We believe, under the "procedure" section, that this is a solid attempt to clarify the rights and responsibilities of the insured and the insurer.

We believe the responsibility to participate in rehabilitation is a positive initiative and will encourage participation.

We believe that social assistance payments should be treated as income in the calculation of benefits to avoid excess benefit payments.

Removing the onus to provide a certificate, unless waived by the insurer, will allow insurers to show compassion for seriously injured persons. The tying of psychologists, dentists and chiropractors to their specialized areas removes potential areas of misunderstanding.

Under the reduction or stoppage of benefits: This addition clearly establishes the condition under which insured persons must be notified. It establishes the mechanism to reinstate the benefits.

With respect to repayment to insurers: The amendments in this section clarify responsibility for repayment and set out fair treatment of the consumer in establishing repayment terms.

The inclusion of "wilful misrepresentation" again clarifies the intent and limits the rights of those who should not have received a benefit.

We are concerned that the minimum benefits are not indexed. This section, especially for seniors, should be indexed.

In conclusion, Bill 164, when considered in the context of The Road Ahead initiatives, contains some very positive changes for our clients, Ontario's automobile insurance consumers.

We believe that Bill 39 must be implemented along with Bill 164 in order to bring in graduated licensing and other initiatives from The Road Ahead which offer concrete and proven methods of containing insurance costs which ultimately control insurance premiums.

May we suggest that another area that is not adequately addressed in OMPP, and subsequently in Bill 164, is arbitration to settle disputes for direct property damage or collision total loss. These amendments should be made to this bill.

In part VI, loss of earning capacity benefits, reference is made to apprenticeship. We believe that apprenticeship should include other professional training programs which, when completed in the business world, result in increased income, as happens in the trades.

We have attempted to assist you by outlining our concerns in connection with affordability, availability, the classification system, tort and statutory accident benefits. Our volunteer group has put many hours into this review.

The complexity of the statutory accident benefits schedule leaves us with concerns over future interpretation, implementation and costs to the Ontario motorist. We recognize that improvements we have suggested in this presentation may have to be tempered due to cost factors. We reiterate that the Ontario insurance consumer is not prepared to accept substantial increases in automobile premiums.

We commend you for your revisions in the regulations that were published on January 18, but as previously noted, it's been extremely difficult to conduct the same in-depth review that we had completed on the original draft regulations.

We, the Insurance Brokers Association of Ontario, remain committed to serving the Ontario insurance consumer and to working with your ministry in simplifying, streamlining and controlling the costs of automobile insurance.

Thank you very much.

The Chair: We haven't got too much time, but one question from each caucus. Mr Phillips?

Mr Mancini: Can we have two, since this is the end of the day?

The Chair: It's not Christmas. Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: My colleague has a question as well. I'll ask mine quickly.

The Chair: We'll see if we can get around to it.

Mr Phillips: Okay. Our concern is heavily around what this is going to do to the people of Ontario in terms of costs. We've heard estimates of up to $200 per driver as incremental costs. Even the government says it's going to cost a minimum of about $190 million extra, almost like a tax, if you will, a regressive tax, because no matter how much money you make, you've got to buy the insurance. So even if you are low income or not working at all, you've got to buy this. You've got to pay the extra premium. You have no choice.

I guess you people are as close to the consumer on this as anybody. If the costs were up to $200 of premium, and I'm talking about incremental costs, because the regular costs are going to go up—this is just for the extra benefits provided in this bill—if they were $200 per driver, would your response still be the same? Is this worth $200 per driver and is it worth, to the people in Ontario, spending more money on this? The government says, "We can't afford to give the hospitals anything but we can afford to tax the taxpayers of this province somewhere near, depending on what estimates you use, either $190 million or $500 million." That's the range. Is this package worth $200 a driver, in your mind?

Mr Stuart: I think our clients are very interested in bottom-line costs. In many cases, the benefits they would like to receive they're not able to afford. We have tried to put this through our submission here that many of the ideas expressed are worthwhile, but the question is, will the insuring public accept the increase in cost?

Mr Phillips: They have no choice. If it goes through, they've got to. This is zero choice.

The Chair: I'm sorry. Mr Tilson.

Mr Tilson: I've a brief question, as has Mr Harnick. The issue is with respect to the regulations. We've had complaints from almost every group as to the myriad of regulations and how we're going to understand them. There's going to be, in my view, considerable cost in educating the public, in educating brokers, in educating the claims adjusters, in educating, I suppose, everyone, in educating the politicians, because they're going to be coming to our office, just like they do for workers' compensation.

My question to you is, has your group sat down and given any estimate as to what it might cost to spend money to educate the brokers of this province to properly understand how this system's going to work, because it's very, very complicated, even understanding words.

Mr Bob Carter: I'll take that one. I can tell you, based on the hours we've spent going through it, we are still not up to speed, and any change will cost money. We will be able to deal with our members, and we represent about 55% to 60% of the insurance brokers in Ontario. We are unable to deal with non-members, and this type of change takes a long time to go out. I can tell you right now there are people in this province who aren't fully up to speed on Bill 68, the original one. We still run training sessions on them now.

The Chair: Mr Dadamo.

Mr Dadamo: Thank you, Mr Chair.

Interjections.

The Chair: I'm sorry, Mr Dadamo's got the floor.

Mr Tilson: To be fair, Mr Chair, our time has not gone as far as the previous Liberals, and surely we're allowed the same amount of time.

Mr Harnick: Don't we get five minutes for questions? That couldn't have taken more than a minute and a half.

Mr Tilson: I tried to make my question very brief.

The Chair: If you're going to waste time—

Mr Tilson: You're just ignoring us.

Mr Harnick: I thought there was going to be—

The Chair: Five minutes every 15, plus what was it, 25 minutes for the presentation?

Mr Tilson: How are you adding, Mr Chairman? The fact is that our time was not the same as the Liberals, and we're entitled to equal time.

The Chair: I said one question from each caucus. We had time. I know Mr Mancini had his hand up. He had a 10-second question, short, sweet and quick, and I was going to go back to see if we had enough time. But if we argue about it, we're not going to have much time left. Okay, Mr Dadamo.

Mr Dadamo: It's unfortunate that the opposition is never happy.

My geographical friend Mr Mancini claims continually throughout these hearings that OMPP is a great system and needs absolutely no changes at all. Your organization has criticized the OMPP's exclusion of the head-injured, the psychologically injured, the lack of adequate benefits for students and also the self-employed. You've also been very vocal on the need for indexation. The previous government chose to ignore your concerns. To address the issue of cost, the government has now established a task force on rehabilitation and long-term care. Would you agree with Mr Mancini's assertion that the current OMPP system is a wonderful system and does not need to be changed?

Mr Harnick: Did Mr Endicott write this question? Where is Mr Endicott?

Interjections.

The Chair: Would you let them answer.

Mr Bob Carter: I think in our statement we said very clearly that OMPP was much better than the previous system and there are a number of additions in here that we agree with, if the public can afford them.

The Chair: Mr Mancini, 10-second question, okay?

Mr Mancini: First of all, I want to thank the association for what I consider to be a well-thought-out brief. You've touched on many aspects of the legislation. I can tell you spent a lot of time.

Being front-line workers and preparing other brokers and other people in offices and all these people to give a product to the customer, of course you're going to be the first group to hear as to whether or not people are either happy with the product or can afford the product. You mentioned it in the brief, but could you give me your assessment as to how many complaints per month or per year or however you calculated them you were receiving on the OMPP prior to the introduction of Bill 164, or around the time of the introduction of 164? If you don't have specific numbers, were they a lot or a few?

Mr Stuart: I can comment. In my own office, we have had one problem, which we note has been addressed, and that was in the area of definition of "insured person" where you have someone who is not a dependent but a family member.

The Chair: Okay, Mr Harnick, a quick one.

Mr Harnick: We have heard from a number of groups, very diverse in nature: the ARCH group—the Advocacy Resource Centre for the Handicapped—the Insurance Bureau of Canada, Progressive Casualty, FAIR, the Advocates' Society. One of the things they all note is the fact that you're not able, under Bill 164, to claim your economic loss beyond what the accident benefits might pay you. Each of those groups was very critical of that particular omission.

It has been suggested that the act be amended so people have the option to purchase supplementary or, by way of endorsement, some form of income protection to pay them the difference between what accident benefits pay and what their actual loss might be. As brokers, do you envision anything wrong with selling that kind of a product to ensure that people, at the end of the day, are at least receiving their actual loss of income?

Mr Sytsma: Are you talking as an add-on to the existing policy?

Mr Harnick: Exactly.

Mr Sytsma: The experience of the brokers' association and its members has been, though, that under the current OMPP you had the option to increase your coverage from $600 to $1,050 and it wasn't being done.

Mr Harnick: What I'm saying is, if people had the option to protect their income, just as they have the option to purchase underinsured coverage, is that a product you would have a problem selling or would object to selling for any principled reason?

Mr Sytsma: We wouldn't have any objection to selling it, but would they buy it and what price would it be? We get back to cost.

Mr Harnick: Depends how the insurers market it, right?

Mr Ward: Just a quick question, and I guess we're allowed. I understand from your brief and your presentation that generally you feel the expanded benefits we're bringing forth in Bill 164—you generally support them in that they bring in people who perhaps were excluded out of the present OMPP. You're aware also that, as the benefits are expanded, there's a cost to the system. We recognize that as well and we think we've struck a fine balance. We can't satisfy everyone, but we think we've done a good juggling act.

When it comes to cost, there are 150 insurance companies in Ontario—around that number. Our actuary, Mercer associates, which did an actuarial report for the government, estimates the costs of these expanded benefits, which generally you support, will bring a cost to the industry of around 4%. Even that is in a state of flux because of this task force that has been formed that's going to look at long-term care and the costs of that aspect.

Interjections.

Mr Ward: If I may now, Mr Chair.

The Chair: Mr Ward, could you get to the question.

Mr Ward: You've been in the industry a long time. You have a wealth of experience. We're led to believe by the opposition that this cost—it could be around 4%—to the industry is simply going to flow through the insurance companies directly on to the premiums of the driving public. I find that hard to believe.

The Chair: Okay, Mr Ward, get to the question.

Mr Ward: My question is, would it be your experience that this would occur or in fact would the competitive nature of the insurance industry absorb some if not all of that cost?

Mr Bob Carter: From what we are aware at the present time, I do not believe the insurance industry would absorb it, because their claim is—and we're only the sales force—that with the drop in interest rates etc, they're running pretty close to the wire now. So I would think they would be forced to pass it on.

The Chair: Okay, thank you. Thank you, Mr Ward.

Mr Owens: On a point of order, Mr Chair: Maybe we can excuse the guests if they don't want to be delayed by this procedural point.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you. As I said at the very beginning, how flexible you were to come before this committee. Again, thanks for appearing.

Mr Owens, your point of order. Could you speak up a little louder?

Mr Owens: I wish I could grab this microphone and bring it closer.

In the interest of accuracy, I'd like to take the opportunity to correct the record in terms of a response or more appropriately an exchange that took place between Mr Griffin from the Insurance Bureau of Canada and Mr Mancini.

In response to—

Mr Tilson: You can only correct your own record.

Mr Mancini: You can't correct my record. On a point of order, Mr Chairman: Mr Owens has no privilege—

Mr Owens: May I finish my point? I have the floor.

Mr Mancini: You can't correct my record.

The Chair: Wait a minute, let him just finish.

Mr Tilson: I may want to correct your record.

Mr Owens: Mr Mancini indicated that the minister had, in fact, made a response—

Mr Mancini: On a point of order, Mr Chairman. I have a point of order. Mr Owens does not have the privilege to rise on a point of order to correct someone else's record. Mr Owens's point of order is out of order.

The Chair: I agree with you, Mr Mancini.

This committee will be adjourned and will resume hearings at 10 o'clock tomorrow morning and will be running till 10 o'clock tomorrow night in room 151.

The committee adjourned at 1717.

INSURANCE STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1993

LOI DE 1993 MODIFIANT LES LOIS CONCERNANT LES ASSURANCES

Consideration of Bill 164, An Act to amend the Insurance Act and certain other Acts in respect of Automobile Insurance and other Insurance matters / Loi modifiant la Loi sur les assurances et certaines autres lois en ce qui concerne l'assurance-automobile et d'autres questions d'assurance.

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): Good morning. This is the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. We're in day 3 of Bill 164, An Act to amend the Insurance Act and certain other Acts in respect of Automobile Insurance and other Insurance matters.

CANADIAN FEDERATION OF INDEPENDENT BUSINESS

The Chair: This morning the first group to come before the committee this morning is the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. I'd like to welcome you. We have half an hour, until 10:30. In that half-hour, could you leave some time at the end of your brief for questions from the three caucuses. If you don't mind, identify yourself for the purposes of Hansard and the people of Ontario. You may begin.

Ms Judith Andrew: Thank you, Mr Hansen. My name is Judith Andrew. I'm director of provincial policy with the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. I'm joined by Jim Bennett, who is our vice-president of legislative affairs at the federation.

We appreciate the opportunity to appear before the committee on behalf of our 40,000 small and medium-sized business members in the province of Ontario. Our members are interested in Bill 164, in auto insurance coverage, as both personal and business consumers of insurance products.

The committee should note that the total number of business enterprises in Ontario, including those of the self-employed, amounts to nearly 650,000 operations, of which 98% have fewer than 50 employees and 95% have fewer than 20 employees. Small business in fact is the predominant form of business enterprise in the province.

CFIB members determine direction for the organization, on the basis of their majority votes, on public policy issues contained in our publication Mandate. The most recent vote we've had dealing with auto insurance came in January 1991, when some 64% of our members opposed the concept of publicly owned and operated car insurance. A prior vote going back to 1986 measured our members' views on no-fault auto insurance. The question posed was, are you for or against a no-fault system for auto injury compensation? The result was 63% of our members in favour, 23% against, and some 14% undecided.

We have been gauging the calls and letters we've received recently, and I can say that there has been no widespread call from the small business community to modify greatly the Ontario motorist protection plan. There are many other problems facing the small business community, and this is not one we are contacted about often.

Nevertheless, as the government is about to amend the auto insurance legislation, we will comment on Bill 164 in light of our members' goals for auto insurance. Those are: fair and certain levels of compensation for loss of income; fast and efficient payments to accident victims; reasonable legal and administration costs; affordable premiums; and accountability for drivers' actions. I would say that these goals are not too divergent from the government's own goals for auto insurance.

Just dealing with key elements of Bill 164—the new tort restriction, the monetary deductible—we are of course interested in the predictions on this from the actuaries engaged by the government, William Mercer Ltd. We noted that the Mercer study estimates that the combined effect of the change in access to tort for non-economic damages and the elimination of the right to sue for economic damages is estimated to yield a 15% reduction in the cost of awards and settlements under Bill 64 from the levels of the current OMPP. Yet three times as many people will be able to seek redress from the courts; this means they will be able to seek redress for less.

We are also advised by knowledgeable participants in the insurance industry that the prospect of considerably more claims for pain and suffering will mean a significant increase in administration. This is because every accident now will have to be thoroughly investigated and statements will have to be taken from all those involved, in preparation for a potential tort action. Naturally, the three-fold increase in legal suits will also entail a much larger legal expense.

We would also note that there are many unanswered questions concerning how the new rules will play out in court decisions. There is the suggestion that the $15,000 deductible for pain-and-suffering suits will actually become a new floor for those types of claims. In fact, judges would be forced to award more than $15,000 if they intended to actually compensate someone for their pain and suffering. It's also possible that judges could attempt to characterize economic loss as non-economic loss in an effort to more fully recompense those people who cannot sue under the system.

In an overall way, we are very concerned about the lack of fairness in barring legal action for pecuniary loss in the most serious of cases while at the same time allowing many more claimants access to the courts for the less definitive non-economic losses they sustain. Our organization is also concerned about holding administration and legal expenses at reasonable levels, yet Bill 164 threatens to greatly increase those components.

Turning to the structured benefits for economic loss, we note that they are greatly enriched under Bill 164. Our organization has no fundamental objection to periodically reviewing and adjusting the auto insurance benefit structure. In fact, looking at benefit designs can aid in better meeting the needs of insureds within cost limits and impacts which are well understood and affordable.

I would note that there are significant parallels between the auto insurance benefit structure you're examining and that of the Workers' Compensation Board. This should make legislators all the more cautious as you approach the auto insurance benefit schedule in legislation, as the WCB is a prime example of no-fault insurance gone awry.

To digress a moment over the WCB difficulties, legislators will know that the WCB is struggling under an unfunded liability of some $11 billion currently, despite having the highest assessment rates in the country. Employers are the sole funders of this expensive insurance system that takes in some $2.5 billion per annum in premiums. There is an expenditure crisis at the WCB, and the combination of generous benefits, poor administration and the recession have resulted in claimants actually gravitating to the WCB and staying on for much longer periods than previously.

The Mercer study commissioned by the government on the auto insurance estimates that the increase in premiums resulting from the changes will be in the order of 13%. At the other end of the estimate spectrum is an increase of some 20% calculated by Wyatt Co for the insurance industry. Our comment would be that the WCB-esque benefit structure and the administration proposed under Bill 164 makes us very pessimistic on the cost projections.

Just as for WCB claimants, the proposed income replacement benefits at 90% of net income are non-taxable in the auto accident victim's hands. The weekly maximum under auto insurance will be $1,000, which actually exceeds the WCB maximum of $750. It is relatively simple for actuaries to show that replacing income at this high level on a non-taxable basis results in overcompensation where the claim is of less than one year's duration; in fact, overcompensation worsens at higher levels of income. In the case of WCB, some claimants actually receive between 110% and 130% of their pre-injury earnings. In the WCB context, this has emerged as a rather perverse financial disincentive to rehabilitation and return to productive work and living.

A cursory examination of the rules governing entitlement to benefits under the revised draft regulation just given out recently yields some striking parallels to WCB. Of particular interest is draft regulation section 26(4), which sets out the criteria for judging whether the person has made reasonable efforts to obtain employment. The section clarifies that the employment must be available in the area the insured person lives, the employment must be accessible to the person and it is reasonably possible that the person could obtain the employment, having regard to his or her personal characteristics. This very same approach at the WCB has resulted in that agency absorbing a share of general unemployment, as suitable work is not available for many Ontarians, whether or not they were injured. As the rehabilitation task contemplated under auto insurance appears to go beyond making the individual job-ready to actually placing him or her in a job, legislators can anticipate that significant excess costs will arise when unemployment rolls are high.

Accordingly, if the Bill 164 benefit proposals and administration proposals remain unchanged, CFIB would anticipate very significant pressure on auto insurance premiums, and this at a time when our small and medium-sized businesses can ill afford anything more than a nominal increase. We would strongly recommend that the income replacement benefit percentage be modified to take account of the tax effects, and you might want to ask your actuaries to actually look at the various levels of income and the effects on the replacement ratio of this particular benefit design. We would also recommend that the rules governing entitlement be revisited to ensure that the loss of earning capacity is clearly linked to the auto injury and not to the general state of the economy.

I'd just like to conclude with a few comments on the coverage gap for smaller businesses. With respect to the OMPP, CFIB was critical of that plan for failing to take account of the special circumstances of small business entrepreneurs.

We do note that the revised draft regulation issued January 1993 contemplates the situation of small business owner-operators. The definition of employment actually includes them. Section 62 of the regulation establishes a method for calculating income from self-employment, and section 63 permits the small business entrepreneur to actually contract in advance with the insurance company for a weekly income amount appropriate to the business situation.

The section 62 calculation of income is still deficient, in our view, as the entrepreneur actually needs an amount which approximates his or her business cash flow. If the business is to continue, all the usual expenses have to be paid, and naturally the banks and others won't forgo amounts owed to them. Calculating the benefits on adjusted net income unfairly assumes that the money to pay those business expenses will continue to flow in from somewhere. If the entrepreneur is actually pivotal to generating the cash flow to the business and he or she is unable to work, auto insurance benefits must make up the shortfall.

We do see the section 63 provision, which permits the entrepreneur to contract with the insurance company for a particular level of coverage in advance, as a positive step. We're keen to understand how this provision will actually be applied in practice by the insurance companies, and we would be pleased to consult further with the government and the industry on this particular matter.

In summary, while we find the recent draft regulations an improvement with regard to the treatment of the self-employed, we still have several serious concerns about Bill

164. Our members' goals for auto insurance are simply not met in terms of Bill 164. They don't even come close.

Specifically, the $15,000 monetary threshold for tort action seems to run the risk of becoming the floor for pain-and-suffering claims, as well as driving up premium costs and legal and administrative expenses. The enhanced structure of benefits for economic loss is simply too rich and likely to become as unsustainable as WCB benefits. In fact, our contacts in and about the WCB indicate that there has been major discussion in terms of the development of this particular benefit structure vis-à-vis the WCB, and that gives us great concern.

Finally, I would say that as there is no proactive demand for changes to the OMPP in the small business community, any new system which significantly increases auto insurance premiums will be met with strong resistance and will become another serious source of irritation between the provinces, government and owners of small firms.

The Chair: I know my wife will be listening this morning; she's a member of your association. She can be a bigger critic than Mr Mancini, and you're up.

Mr Remo Mancini (Essex South): You've said many of the things this morning that I've been saying all week long; that is, that the government has taken the 18 pages of regulations which were attached to the Ontario motorist protection plan, which were generally considered to be user-friendly, and turned them into 68 pages of unintelligible bureaucratese.

Interjection.

Mr Mancini: As you can see, the government has felt the wrath of many people this week, so they constantly interject when other members are making points. We'll just have to ignore them as we're going through this process.

The point about economic loss being taken away—a right being taken away from people—has also been made by other groups before this committee. I don't know what the average income of a small business owner is, but I can tell you this, and I'd like your opinion on it: If a small business owner supporting a family, earning approximately $35,000 a year, was killed in an automobile accident, his family would receive $120,000 and that's it, that would be the extent of it. Because the right to sue for economic loss has been taken away by the NDP, I believe the families of many, many thousands of small business owners may be put at great financial disadvantage. I was wondering if your association was aware of the effect of this change and how you feel about this change.

Ms Andrew: Yes. We said in our brief that we are concerned about the fact that people who sustain economic loss are not entitled to sue, and that would include the families of someone who's actually killed in an auto crash. That very serious situation is simply not going to be dealt with fairly; meanwhile, many other very small claims will go forward to the courts.

The average small business person, incidentally, earns something like $29,000; it's not a princely sum. But if anyone were earning more than the ceiling, his or her family would be left, no question.

Mr Jim Bennett: Mr Mancini, the difficulty we tried to point out in terms of section 62 and section 63 of the regulations, what was covered and what was not, is compounded by the fact that you can't sue for economic loss. So in the case of most of the small firms that you're talking about, that have significant bank loans, have equipment their estate would be lucky to get 10 cents on the dollar for if they had to liquidate, are not covered because they can't sue for economic loss and are not covered adequately under the provisions of section 62 and section 63. So there is a gap there, and that's one of the gaps that Judith was mentioning.

Mr Mancini: We're beginning to find out that possibly factory workers and small business owners are the ones who are going to be hurt the most by this legislation. They're going to be given the right to sue for non-economic loss, but the disadvantage of that is that they're losing the right to sue for economic loss, and the benefits there would be far greater, as all witnesses have stated on the record.

You're aware, I would think, probably more than anyone else in this room—including the government members, who know a great deal about things that are going on—how difficult this recession has been, not only on small business owners but on the employees of those firms. We have been told by Mercer, the government's hired consultants, that they foresee Bill 164 costing policyholders 4.5% more, minimum. If you factor that out through the Ontario economy, that's slightly less than $200 million. That's a $200-million regressive tax—

The Chair: Thirty seconds left.

Mr Mancini: —being placed on policyholders who have not asked for Bill 164. And that's the minimum; we're not talking about the maximum, which could be $600 million. Do you think that at this time the economy could sustain another $200-million to $600-million tax?

Ms Andrew: Absolutely not. We believe that the estimates are perhaps understated, given the WCB-esque benefit structure that's contemplated here. You can't over-emphasize what a dreadful financial situation the WCB is in, and it's dealing with the same kinds of rules; in fact, a slightly less generous benefit structure. When the economic times are difficult, it will be a situation where people can't find jobs and end up staying on auto insurance. The loss costs may in fact end up being more than the Mercer actuaries predicted, in which case that has to translate into premium increases that people simply can't afford to pay.

The Chair: Thank you. Mr Tilson.

Mr David Tilson (Dufferin-Peel): I appreciate you coming and giving your thoughts from the independent business position, because I think this legislation—and I hope it wasn't intentional, because much of the legislation that's gone on in this place since this government has taken power has been against business and has been against independent business, the small business person.

Many small business owners, as you know, them don't draw a very large salary. They put their money back into the capital of their firm, so their earnings form part of the capital of their firm. Therefore, the whole principle of compensation contemplated under this legislation really isn't fair to the small business person, because compensation is based solely on their drawings, which are minimal. They can't survive if they don't keep pouring money back into their businesses, so that compensation, as this bill has been designed—I'd be interested in hearing your thoughts on that—is really unfair, because a small business person simply can't take the salary that one who works for a large company would see. That's just not the way the system works. I think that's the problem with this government: It simply doesn't understand how the economics of this province work. Could you comment on that?

Ms Andrew: That's correct. There's absolutely no question that small business owners often don't draw a large salary. Either the business is new and they're busy plowing profits back into the business to help it grow, or they're in a period of reinvestment and simply aren't taking a large salary.

Section 62 specifies an adjusted profit calculation as the basis for the income benefits, but roughly half of business corporations in the province in any given year actually don't earn profits. That's not because they're not viable, ongoing businesses. It's quite simply that they're in a period of reinvestment and so on.

So the notion of calculating the benefits based on that adjusted profit base will not do the job. What the small business entrepreneur needs is something closer to the cash flow he or she was generating by being a pivotal, vital part of that business, actually bringing in that cash flow. If they're not able to work and that cash flow doesn't come in, they're going to be in very dire straits indeed.

Mr Tilson: I think the problem with this legislation, like so much of the NDP's legislation, is that we're all the same: We're all making the same or our abilities are the same; there's no chance for improvement. I mean, the entrepreneur is going to expand his business even if he's taking out a draw, but they're assuming that he or she is going to stay the same.

The other issue I'd like you comments on deals strictly with the independent entrepreneur. If that person is involved in an automobile accident and isn't able to carry on his or her business, there's no compensation. In other words, they simply go out of business. Hence, you could have that person plus his or her family on welfare and all the social services this government has lost complete control of.

Ms Andrew: That is a possible scenario. Mind you, section 63 does allow that pre-arranged contract with the insurance company, which is a beneficial step. But again, we still don't know what application procedures will be in place by the insurance companies, what rules they'll use to decide what level of coverage that individual can buy.

Mr Tilson: It's one more add-on cost to the entrepreneur.

Ms Andrew: And it's an add-on cost, absolutely.

Mr Tilson: The average person doesn't have that, but the entrepreneur does it, and it's more anti-business. I believe Mr Harnick has a question.

The Chair: I'm sorry, but you've run out of time. Mr Klopp.

Mr Paul Klopp (Huron): Thank you very much for coming today and bringing your brief. A couple of points: I think you hit it very well, that companies, individuals, independent business people don't really question their auto insurance very much until the day they have an accident. That is what we have found and why we have taken on reviewing the OMPP and going to Bill 164, because people, not only entrepreneurs, have found out they're not adequately covered under the present system. That's why over the last year and a half the minister has consulted with the Insurance Bureau of Canada and people like yourselves, asking individuals and companies to come forth and bring up ideas. This is part of the process today.

You mentioned section 63. That was put there especially because under the present system, if you get in an accident today and you're paying a premium, you'll find you're not adequately covered. Do you not think this is a far better step than the present system we're under right now?

Ms Andrew: We acknowledge that that is an improvement, no question. We have no fundamental objection to looking at the benefit structure and looking for gaps and dealing with those gaps, and that's what your government has done. But that's got to be done with an eye to affordability, legal and administration costs and all those other things.

The effect of adopting a WCB type of benefit structure, with the benefits non-taxable in the individual's hands, will actually yield overcompensation for some people. That's why we're recommending that you revisit the benefit structure and ask the actuaries to do some of these calculations on replacement ratios: to see whether that is an appropriate level of benefits to be recommending under Bill 164.

The small business issue has been somewhat covered, but the individual needs more in the line of cash flow replacement rather than net profit or income replacement. It's still not clear exactly what will be available to that individual, and obviously it's going to be an extra expense to have to purchase that coverage under section 63. Extra insurance costs are simply not absorbable in this climate. Small and medium-sized businesses have really had a struggle in the last couple of years, and they can't accept anything more than a nominal increase. So we need to look at the benefits structure in light of the costs that's going to entail.

Mr Klopp: The one point about the benefit if you're being paid if you get in an accident: 90% of net has been changed from 80% of gross. That was one of the things Mercer looked at. As you pointed out, every person's individual income tax is a bit of hindsight and putting into the future to a short extent. But for the short term, say I get in an accident tomorrow morning; this can be based on my income tax of last year. As I am an independent person, a farmer, this present system really put me in very bad straits. I really had to make sure I had other insurance, compared to even the old system if I won my tort case—if I won, that is. So for the short term, maybe the first year, you may get a little bit more than you would have if you'd been in the workforce. However, if you were unfortunate and stayed in the system longer and didn't get rehabilitated—which we hope you could—and get back into your business, then you will not be overcompensated, according to Mr Mercer. In fact, Mr Mercer looked at it.

The Chair: Do you want to wind it up?

Mr Klopp: I think a colleague said it was 4.4% of the loss cost. So these are things we have been looking at.

Ms Andrew: That's correct. The overcompensation takes place in the first year.

Mr Klopp: It may.

Ms Andrew: It does. It takes place in the first year, and it peaks at roughly the six-month point. The reason is that the individual's marginal tax rate is lower, because half of what they're getting is non-taxable.

The Chair: Jim, you were nodding there and agreeing, but the camera wasn't on you and Hansard doesn't pick you up. If you ever reply again, always say yes or no, okay?

Mr Mancini: Or maybe.

The Chair: Or maybe. Did you want to say something, Jim?

Mr Bennett: I'd just like to have one final word, if I could. For the benefit of some of the members who weren't here in 1986, this province faced, at that point, a liability insurance crisis, where premiums were soaring and businesses could not get insurance. We think the benefit level is generous to the point where you're going to face something similar. Insurance costs are one more element that businesses look at when they're making decisions on where they locate. We already are at a significant disadvantage in terms of tax rates, in terms of some of the other neighbouring jurisdictions. Be careful what you do here, that you don't make it so rich that it's another reason to locate part or all of your business outside the province.

The Chair: Thank you, Jim and Judith, for coming before this committee.

Ms Andrew: Thank you. We appreciate the opportunity.

ONTARIO FEDERATION OF LABOUR

The Chair: The next group we have is the Ontario Federation of Labour. Would you come forward, please. I'd like to welcome you before the standing committee on finance and economics. You can get a glass of water. We've got ice cubes back in today; yesterday, it was so cold in here, we took the ice cubes out to keep warm.

We have one half-hour, until 11 o'clock. In that time, could you leave some time at the end for questions from the three caucuses? We'll start off with the Conservative caucus, with Mr Tilson, as soon as you're done.

Mr Ken Signoretti: My name is Ken Signoretti, executive vice-president, and Duncan MacDonald is the programs coordinator. I guess you have our brief, and rather than just sitting and reading it, I'd like to just make some specific comments to some issues.

First of all, I would like to say that the Ontario Federation of Labour, and the labour movement as a whole, has been in favour of public automobile insurance for some time. As a matter of fact, our policy was struck at the 1961 convention. Our membership has supported that, continued to support that and still does support it. The Ontario Federation of Labour would at some point in time like to see public automobile insurance.

Having said that, there are a couple of other things we see within Bill 164 that were in Bill 68 and have not been removed that give us great concern. The biggest one, I suppose, is the issue of collateral benefits. If you looked at our brief in 1990 on Bill 68, we had a great deal of concern about the issue of collateral benefits, with the sick benefit plans and the long-term disability being the first payer as opposed to being the last payer.

The auto insurers, we believe, should not have the luxury of having that benefit with that policy. It does a couple of things. One—and we've outlined a number of numbers in our brief—is that it puts added pressure when a union goes into negotiations, and I suppose it puts added pressure on people even within the small business community, who don't have a union, because these plans were primarily designed for sickness and health, these plans were designed for long-term disability, and by having them pay first as opposed to the auto insurers, it really distorts the whole question.

I guess those are two of the biggest concerns we have as a federation. But having said that, if you look at the draft legislation as it is, we are in support of a number of things. We are in support primarily because, first of all, what it actually does is that I believe 98% as opposed to 91% are now being covered under the plan, and the maximum is now raised to $1,000 as opposed to the $600 it was before under Bill 68. These are all positive plans and these are all positive positions, and we support that.

It's extremely important for workers. I just want to allude to something the CFIB mentioned when it talked about the difficulty in the bill for small business and small employers. Workers have a great many problems too; small business people are not the only ones who are struggling. The problem is that workers are struggling, and I think this plan really extends the coverage and gives us something in terms of workers, in terms of how they do things. We believe it's really important that Bill 164 goes through. We believe that it will be beneficial to the people we represent, in the main. With some of the faults, our position, we would like to say, is that we support Bill 164.

One thing I would like to add just in closing: I agree with the CFIB to a certain degree about the problems within workers' compensation. There are problems. Mind you, the problems we see are different from the problems they see, but collectively there is a problem. One of the things that has been happening in the last number of months, particularly when the committee went out on hearings about stress-related incidents, is that one of the things being more talked about, even within the employer community, is that there should be a royal commission with an all-encompassing structure which takes—well, it might even look at auto insurance.

I'm not suggesting for one moment that that's the answer, the panacea for everything. There are problems within that, but maybe collectively within all of those problems we might find some kind of solution. I just want to add that the briefs that were coming from the employer community were that they would probably welcome at least some discussion around the issue. I know there's been talk about a royal commission within that process, and maybe the time has come that we should look at all of these things in an encompassing way. Those are my remarks, Mr Chairman, and I welcome any questions, unless Duncan has anything to add.

The Chair: Mr Harnick.

Mr Charles Harnick (Willowdale): Sir, I'm a little bit confused, because I notice at the opening of your presentation, early on in your paper, you state that you were disappointed that the government didn't keep its promise and institute a public auto scheme. What I'm confused about is how, on that premise, you can support this bill.

Mr Signoretti: Because it increases some of the things we were looking at: increasing the minimum of $600 to $1,000, and there's a certain portion now of the right to sue. All of these things are an improvement within the bill. That's the reason we support it.

Mr Harnick: Let's deal with that, then. Do you know that if a 35-year-old worker who has two kids and a spouse is killed in an accident and happens to be making $35,000 a year, after he or she is dead and buried, the surviving spouse and children of the breadwinner who has been lost will receive the grand total of $117,000 for the rest of their lives? How can $117,000 support this family for ever? Can you possibly be in favour of a scheme that so blatantly hurts a worker's family and a worker's protection?

Mr Signoretti: But as I understand it—

Mr Harnick: Tell the 35-year-old union people out there who are watching how you like this bill now.

Mr Signoretti: That's why we're here. We support it. We think it's a bill that will go some way to addressing some of the problems that happened under Bill 68. I think that's the issue here.

Mr Harnick: May I tell you that under Bill 68 and under the previous auto legislation before that, this 35-year-old worker would have received $700,000? His family would have been supported instead of living at the poverty line.

Mr Signoretti: But we don't see that in here.

Mr Harnick: Are you going to tell me that you're sanctioning and telling—

The Chair: Mr Harnick—

Mr Harnick: Excuse me. Do you mind if I finish my question?

The Chair: Mr Harnick, can we use a different tone? He is not on trial.

Mr Harnick: I'll ask the question.

The Chair: Ask your question, but—

Interjections.

Mr Tilson: You can't say what tone he can use.

Mr Harnick: I'll ask the question any way I want, Mr Hansen. You can sit there and be quiet like everybody else in here should.

Mr Tilson: You're dead wrong. You have no right to say what his tone is or isn't.

Mr Harnick: Can I carry on, please?

The Chair: Go ahead, Mr Harnick.

Mr Harnick: Sir, are you sanctioning a plan that will provide for a family, after a fatality, what amounts to three years' protection, and that's all, and you're going to leave that family to the welfare rolls? Is that what you're sanctioning here, or are you are you prepared—

Mr Signoretti: We are sanctioning—

Mr Harnick: Let me finish. Or are you prepared to admit that this bill has some very serious deficiencies and it should be re-examined?

Mr Signoretti: Yes, we're prepared to admit that probably there should have been public automobile insurance in the first place, but we're also saying to you that this bill goes a great deal better than what Bill 68 was, and that's the importance for us.

Mr Harnick: Bill 68 would pay this family $700,000. Bill 164 goes to pay at $117,000.

Mr Signoretti: Just a moment. We can talk in abstract—

The Chair: Can I say—

Mr Signoretti: Now it's my turn.

The Chair: Okay, go ahead.

Mr Signoretti: We can talk in abstract about what it does and what it's supposed to do. I've negotiated a lot of collective agreements over my lifetime that were supposed to do a lot of things that they didn't do. I don't want to sit here and take a hypothetical situation of what might or might not happen. That's the problem we've got, Mr Harnick. The issue with this bill is that it addresses some of the issues that we're concerned with. It doesn't address all of them, and I'm saying that to you.

Mr Harnick: Let me tell you this: If you negotiated a contract on behalf of your union members that would pay a member this kind of money after a family's suffered an actual economic loss, I'll tell you, that union would have you out on your ass so fast, you wouldn't be able to blink.

Mr Signoretti: But I also don't want to go in front of the membership and say, "You're going to get a certain amount of money," when you know in fact that they may or may not get that money. That's the problem.

Mr Tilson: We know they're not going to get that money. That's the problem.

Mr Signoretti: They know they're not going to get the $700,000. That's the problem.

Mr Harnick: Pardon me? An innocent victim is not going to get the $700,000?

Mr Signoretti: You don't have to turn this into a shouting match. If you want to ask me a question, ask me a question.

The Chair: It's easier for Hansard if one person at a time is speaking, so we can get both conversations. Have you got a question, Mr Harnick?

Mr Harnick: Do I have any time left?

The Chair: You've got about two minutes.

Mr Harnick: Then I have a question. Are you going to tell me that the official position of the OFL is to sanction a scheme that is going to allow injured workers to suffer an economic loss beyond what accident benefits are going to pay them?

Mr Signoretti: No. What I'm saying to you is that the Ontario Federation of Labour is sanctioning a scheme that's better than what was before, but not as good as we'd like to have it.

Mr Harnick: Are you saying we can't go ahead and ask the government to make it even better?

Mr Signoretti: Sure, go ahead and do that.

Mr Harnick: Well, what I'm asking you—

Mr Signoretti: Ask them, if it's going to make it better. We have no problem with that.

Mr Harnick: What I'm asking you, if you'll listen to my question, is whether it's right that we have a scheme that pays people less than their actual economic loss. Are you saying the position of the federation of labour is to accept less than what your actual economic loss is if you're the innocent victim in an accident?

Mr Signoretti: And I'm saying to you that you don't know that that's going to happen.

Mr Harnick: Well, I sure hope they find somebody better to represent workers than your organization.

The Chair: That's his opinion.

Mr Signoretti: Well, there's an election in November. I might not be here. Who knows?

Mr Harnick: Well, I sure hope your members heard your answers today.

The Chair: We'll go on to Ms Haeck.

Ms Christel Haeck (St Catharines-Brock): Thank you, Mr Signoretti, and it's nice to see Duncan MacDonald again. Thank you, Charles, for your two cents worth.

I have to concur with you, from my personal experience in what's happened in my own constituency office and comments I've heard from accident victims. This is sort of a long preamble, but the situation is that one woman—she and her husband were facing loss of their home because the lawyers for the insurance company couldn't get together to figure out who really was at fault for the accident and who was going to be the payer as a result of this accident. Her husband was running out of his unemployment insurance and, because of the accident, she was also injured and not able to do the work that she previously had done. As I say, they were about to lose their home. Three years after the accident, and they'd seen nothing, hadn't even gotten to the discovery stage.

I hear the bombast from Mr Harnick with regard to $700,000 being given to a victim, and I think you and I would have to concur that the tort system is strictly a lottery and doesn't pay out these kinds of awards. In your experience, in your research, either one of you, have you actually seen these kinds of awards coming to workers?

Mr Signoretti: Not very many. There's a couple of things of here. First, the average worker can't afford to hire a lawyer—

Ms Haeck: Like Mr Harnick, who's still running his practice.

Mr Signoretti: —can't afford to hire a lawyer and get into long legal costs to fight it. That's the first thing. Second, my experience has been that it just does not happen. Duncan might have something to add to that.

Mr Duncan MacDonald: I think you mentioned, and it was in The Road Ahead as well, that it was a bit of shooting the dice, to quote a politician at another level. There may be some people who "win." What we're looking at is a system that is fair to the vast majority of people, that if there is a need, you get the benefit you deserve.

Ms Haeck: I come from a union background myself, which I know some people around this table might find offensive. The reality is that as workers working on behalf of workers, what we have tried to institute in this legislation is seeing rehabilitation recognized as something that is needed right at the onset in making sure that people actually do get back to work in a timely fashion and are productive members of society. I would suggest, from everything you've said and what I have been able to read in your presentation, that you would heartily concur with that.

Mr Signoretti: We do.

Mr David Winninger (London South): Do we have time for a supplementary question?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Winninger: Mr Harnick put forward perhaps one of the worst-case scenarios, where the 35-year old worker is killed. First of all, I don't believe that ordinary workers have been that well served by the tort system in the past. First of all, they may not have had the means and resources to retain counsel to pursue litigation. Second, during the four or five years it would take to bring litigation to a conclusion, often their wives and families would suffer the penalty of not having adequate benefits.

And let's say the 35-year old worker did have the resources to hire a lawyer and take it to court. If the accident victim happened to be at fault, then that award would be reduced: it might be 25%, it might be 50%, it might be 100%. Just because the deceased happened to make some fractional error in judgement and was found to be the perpetrator of the accident, it would mean his surviving family would be out in the cold completely. So I think you might agree with me that having a fairly adequate benefit package helps to avoid some of the pitfalls that ordinary workers found themselves in under the former tort system.

Mr Signoretti: One of the things we have found has been my experience over the years, or if you talk to most people who are active in the labour movement. I think that's really what workers look for, that kind of thing. The fact of the matter, as you said, Mr Winninger, is that most of them just can't afford lawyers to get into long legal costs, and when they do, they usually wind up being the loser in the whole thing.

Mr Winninger: And in the kind of case Mr Harnick cited, they might have life insurance available privately or through work and other death benefits.

Mr Signoretti: I've heard that one before too, about all these wonderful things they can have—that they usually don't get, though.

Mr Duncan MacDonald: There's just a slight point I wanted to make about that. In our brief we pointed out we have been long-term supporters of public car insurance. When the government made the decision we told them, "We think you're wrong," and, as with any government, it will suffer the political benefits or consequences of its actions.

We approach Bill 164 in that context. The government said, "We are putting forward these proposals." We do not believe this should be the final word on car insurance. There are some things in it that we think are an improvement to the present situation. It was in that same spirit that we made our presentation under the previous government with its Bill 68. We said, "Here are some of our concerns." You either say you're part of the process or not. The fact that we're here today is not that we're suggesting this is the best possible legislation in the entire world. That's why we're having these hearings and, hopefully, improvements will come out of it.

The minister, in his remarks in December when he introduced this, said it was the beginning of a process, not the end of the process, so it is in that spirit that we're here today. There are things in here that we think will improve the situation for the people of Ontario; there are other things we think the government should have looked at and would hope it looks at at a future time.

The Chair: One minute, Mr Owens. Quick.

Mr Stephen Owens (Scarborough Centre): Very quick. There have been some comments back and forth about the quality of representation that the OFL may be or may not be providing for its membership. In my view, in looking for representation, I would certainly be looking for a group that would be looking at my long-term needs to provide stabilized benefits. I don't think I would be looking for a representative, whether it's through the OFL or private counsel, a person who's still involved in the personal injury bar, to make a decision for me—

The Chair: Mr Owens, a question?

Mr Owens: —that I should get involved in litigation that may or may not give me $700,000. Is that the kind of representative you would choose as your counsel?

Mr Duncan MacDonald: No question.

The Chair: Mr Mancini, seven minutes.

Mr Mancini: Mr Signoretti, thank you for coming before the committee; I appreciate your brief. I also appreciate the criticisms you have made in your brief in regard to Bill 164.

I have some questions about benefits, economic loss, costs and a number of other things.

It has been established by the government consultant, Mercer associates, that Bill 164 will cost consumers more money. So we don't get into an argument or interruptions from government members, I want to deal only with the government's own statistics and the bill as it now stands.

You know and I know that Bill 164 removes the right to sue for economic loss. You know and I know that Mel Swart, the former MPP for Welland-Thorold, was here yesterday. He claimed in his brief to the committee that removing the right to sue for economic loss and replacing it with the right to sue for non-economic loss with the $15,000 deductible, according to Mr Swart's own words, in fact reduces benefits to accident victims by 15%. Those are all facts on the record.

We go back to Mr Mercer, who says rates will go up 4.5%. We extrapolate that across the province and that's nearly $200 million. Your members are suffering through one of the longest and most severe recessions we've had since the Great Depression. Many of them are out of work. They have to keep their automobiles so they can look for work, obtain work and go to work, even if times are tough. You're aware of that. These people will pay more for their automobile insurance. Mr Swart says, and we agree with Mr Swart, that they will get less in return. Do you think these modest changes giving access to tort for non-economic loss are worth the increase in premiums that your many thousands of members will have to pay, the almost $200 million, Mr Signoretti?

Mr Signoretti: First of all, let me say that I have a great deal of respect for Mr Swart, and that's all I can say. I'm not here to quarrel with him. The only thing I can say to you is what we are hearing from our people in terms of automobile insurance: One, you're absolutely correct, and Duncan alluded to it, is that everybody would have liked to have had public automobile insurance. It's not there, so what do you do?

One of the concerns they had was the amount of money they're getting now under the present plan. This will improve that. If it's a modest improvement, it's a modest improvement. I don't know what the word "modest" really means. All I know is that from our membership, they're content that there will be changes and that they will be better protected if in fact they get into an automobile accident.

On the question of rate increases, everybody is going to get mad at every rate increase that ever comes up. I don't know how you deal with that. All I know is what we hear, that, "We're not happy with the scheme as a whole, but yes, the changes basically are good for us, and we appreciate that."

Mr Mancini: Are your members aware that they will be receiving 15% less in benefits from that pie?

Mr Signoretti: But I don't know that.

Mr Mancini: I'm using Mr Swart's figures so that the government members can't accuse me of fabricating anything. I want to use figures that people who are respected are using, and I want to ask you these questions because your presence before this committee is important.

Ms Haeck: Mel said it was an improvement.

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): Mel said he wouldn't do it.

Mr Signoretti: I don't know what Mel said. Interjections.

The Chair: Mr Mancini has the floor. Sir, go right ahead.

Mr Signoretti: I don't know what Mel said.

Mr Mancini: I'll give you a copy.

Mr Signoretti: Fine. That doesn't help me now. I don't know what Mel said. All I'm saying to you is that if, over the lifetime, our workers get a better increase, that's what the issue is here. We can't deal with some hypothetical. You're trying to deal in the same way, Mr Mancini, with some hypothetical situation that Mr Harnick deals with: that way out there they're going to get this or they're going to get that. We can't deal with that.

Mr Mancini: Okay, Mr Signoretti, let's not deal with the hypothetical. Let's not deal with the facts that—Mr Signoretti: You're doing that.

Mr Mancini: Okay, let's try it another way. Let's put some more facts on the record. When the NDP were in opposition, it proposed government-owned automobile insurance with full tort rights. Is that correct?

Mr Signoretti: That's right.

Mr Mancini: To sue for both economic loss and non-economic loss.

Mr Signoretti: That's right; absolutely. That's my understanding, yes.

Mr Mancini: Those are facts. Today we hear from Ms Haeck, and I quote her exactly, "Suing for economic loss is strictly a lottery." Well, it wasn't a lottery before, but it's a lottery today. Mr Winninger says, and I quote his exact words, "not well served by tort."

I'm having great difficulty because, on the one hand, I remember many speeches saying, "We need government-owned automobile insurance with full rights to tort." It wasn't a lottery then; people were well served by it then. Now all of a sudden we're not going to be well served.

I'd like to know your opinion on tort. If you were able to convince the government to introduce government-owned automobile insurance, would your members like to have the full right to tort?

Mr Signoretti: I don't know that at this point. I really don't.

The Chair: Mr Mancini, time has run out.

Mr Mancini: Mr Chairman, time has not run out. I started at 10:58. It's not 11:05 yet.

Mr Klopp: Are you challenging the Chair?

Mr Mancini: Yes, I am.

The Chair: I have watched exactly, and it's 11 o'clock by my watch here. On your Mickey Mouse watch, maybe the arms are in a different spot. I'm sorry. I have the time right here, 11 o'clock, and I divided the time, seven minutes apiece.

Mr Mancini: Mr Chairman, on a point of order: I appreciate your timekeeping, and if your timekeeping is different than mine, then I will accept your ruling, but I don't think I have to accept any of the insults that you directed in my—

The Chair: I'm sorry I made that one statement.

Mr Mancini: Mr Chairman, I'm not finished. I'm surprised that you, of all people, would make such comments. I've been trying to elicit, from the guests we have here this morning, important facts, trying to establish a base for these facts. For you to make those comments is a slur on everything I've said this morning, and I resent it deeply.

The Chair: I have a good friend who paid over $300 for a Mickey Mouse watch, so it's a common watch around here.

Gentlemen, I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee and for your input into this bill. Thank you.

SOCIÉTÉ DE L'ASSURANCE AUTOMOBILE DU QUÉBEC

The Chair: The next group is the society of automobile insurance of Quebec. Would you come forward, please. I'd like to welcome you before the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. I'm sorry; I'm not bilingual. We do have interpreters here for any of the members who need them. I've asked Franco to leave these machines here because we've had some trouble hearing some of the presenters; maybe we'll leave them for the rest of the day. You can turn to channel 1 for the English translation. As I say, it's been a little noisy here, and that's why we need these. Go right ahead, and welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs.

M. Claude Gélinas : Monsieur le Président, mesdames et messieurs les députés, je me présente. Mon nom est Claude Gélinas. Je suis le secrétaire de la Société de l'assurance automobile du Québec et le directeur des services juridiques de la Société.

Je suis accompagné aujourd'hui de M. Camille Genest, qui est le directeur de la programmation et des opérations centrales à la vice-présidence des services aux accidentés à la Société, ainsi que de M. Martin Breton, qui est le chef du Service de l'actuariat à la vice-présidence aux finances et administration, toujours à la Société.

Je voudrais simplement faire comme remarque de départ que nous avons accepté l'invitation d'être ici ce matin pour vous fournir des renseignements et de l'information sur le fonctionnement, l'administration et le fondement même du Régime d'assurance automobile du Québec tel qu'il fonctionne, et que nos remarques ce matin se limiteront au fonctionnement du système tel qu'il existe au Québec.

Je donne la parole maintenant à M. Camille Genest.

M. Camille Genest : Monsieur le Président, à l'invitation du ministère ontarien des Institutions financières, la Société de l'assurance automobile du Québec est heureuse de pouvoir contribuer à la réflexion qu'effectuent les parlementaires de l'Assemblée législative au sujet de l'assurance-automobile.

Déjà, le 4 mai 1989, des représentants de la Société soumettaient à la Commission de l'assurance automobile de l'Ontario un mémoire décrivant le Régime d'assurance automobile du Québec. Aussi, un avis fut présenté par la Société de l'assurance automobile du Québec au Comité permanent de l'Assemblée législative de l'Ontario, le 7 février 1990. Cet avis contenait un historique du régime québécois, un exposé de la législation en vigueur, des données relatives à l'assurance sans égard à la faute et à la relation à établir avec le nombre d'accidents, ainsi qu'une réflexion sur la contribution de la réforme du système d'assurance-automobile du Québec à la prévention des accidents. Nous avons également eu le plaisir et l'honneur de recevoir un certain nombre de missions de fonctionnaires de l'Ontario chargées de préparer les réformes gouvernementales en matière d'assurance-automobile.

À titre de contribution à l'examen des questions d'assurance-automobile effectué par l'Assemblée législative de l'Ontario, nous vous proposons d'effectuer une revue de la couverture du Régime d'assurance automobile du Québec. Cette revue traitera de l'admissibilité, de l'indemnité de remplacement du revenu, de l'indemnité de décès, de l'indemnité pour dommages non pécuniaires, de la réadaptation et du remboursement de certains frais, y compris les frais généraux et ceux d'aide personnelle.

L'essentiel de la réforme québécoise : Au tournant des années 70, il était devenu évident que la situation de l'assurance-automobile au Québec nécessitait un virage important. Les coûts ne cessaient d'augmenter et de nombreuses victimes d'accidents de la route étaient sans protection. Face à cet état de fait, le gouvernement du Québec créait, le 5 mai 1971, le Comité d'étude relatif à l'assurance automobile, dont le mandat consistait à identifier les causes de la hausse des coûts de l'assurance et à proposer des moyens pour indemniser les victimes d'accidents au meilleur coût possible pour la collectivité. Le Comité déposait, en 1974, un document connu sous le nom de Rapport Gauvin, du nom de son auteur, qui critiquait sévèrement le système d'indemnisation alors en vigueur.

Ce rapport révélait notamment qu'au Québec, une personne blessée sur quatre, 28 %, ne touchait pas de compensation, et parmi celles qui étaient indemnisées, bon nombre ne l'étaient que partiellement. De fait, près de 40 % de la perte économique encourue par les victimes non responsables n'était pas compensée et les délais de paiement étaient très longs. Le quart des victimes de dommages corporels n'étaient pas encore indemnisées après 18 mois. En outre, plus le montant de la réclamation était élevé, plus le délai entre la date de l'accident et le règlement final s'allongeait.

L'application de la notion de faute pour les dommages corporels engendrait parfois de longues enquêtes pour démontrer la responsabilité des fautifs. Ce principe d'établissement de la responsabilité empêchait l'indemnisation totale ou partielle de plusieurs victimes. Celles-ci, en effet, pouvaient voir leur requête contestée devant les tribunaux par les supposés fautifs et subir de très lourds délais dans le jugement, en plus d'encourir des frais judiciaires importants. Dans tous les cas, les victimes tenues responsables n'étaient pas indemnisées ni, par conséquent, leurs personnes à charge. Pire encore, lorsque l'auteur de l'accident était inconnu ou insolvable, l'indemnisation de ses vic-times était compromise. Enfin, le montant de l'indemnisation, une fois fixé, ne pouvait plus être réévalué. L'indemnisation accordée pour le remplacement du revenu ne tenait pas compte de facteurs tels que l'inflation, l'augmentation du coût des biens et des services, les prélèvements fiscaux etc.

Devant un tel bilan, le gouvernement institua une commission parlementaire et procéda à une consultation populaire dans toutes les régions du Québec. Finalement, en 1977, la Loi constituant la Société de l'assurance automobile du Québec fut adoptée.

Selon son mandat, la Société de l'assurance automobile du Québec doit : indemniser toutes les victimes d'accidents d'automobile sans égard à la faute ; réduire le coût d'utilisation de l'assurance-automobile et retourner aux assurés une plus grande part de leurs contributions ; couvrir les pertes réelles, et cela en diminuant les délais d'indemnisation ; introduire la pleine revalorisation annuelle des indemnités. Ces objectifs n'auraient pu être atteints, du moins en partie, sans la création d'un régime public. Le gouvernement a opté pour la mise en place d'un tel régime afin de réaliser des économies d'échelle et pour s'assurer que tous les efforts en matière de réadaptation et de promotion de la sécurité routière seraient faits.

Par ailleurs, ce nouvel organisme ne pouvait compter sur les impôts payés par les citoyens pour assumer l'indemnisation des dommages corporels des victimes de la route. Au contraire, la Société est, depuis sa création, un organisme financièrement autonome qui a la responsabilité de percevoir ses propres revenus et d'assurer «une pleine capitalisation», c'est-à-dire de disposer en tout temps des fonds nécessaires au paiement de toutes les indemnités découlant des accidents d'automobile survenus jusqu'à ce jour. La totalité des sommes nécessaires à l'indemnisation de toutes les victimes d'accidents de la route survenus au cours de l'année provient, d'une part, des contributions versées par les titulaires de permis de conduire et les propriétaires de véhicules automobiles et, d'autre part, des revenus générés par les placements financiers effectués par la Société.

L'indemnisation sans égard à la faute : La grande nouveauté de la réforme de 1978 a été d'introduire le principe de l'indemnisation sans égard à la faute pour les dommages corporels. L'accident routier a, très souvent, de multiples causes, et l'établissement de la faute a toujours été un processus complexe et coûteux qui était abusivement défrayé par l'ensemble des assurés.

Le principe de l'indemnisation sans égard à la faute est apparu comme un moyen efficace de réduire les coûts et les délais. De fait, le nouveau régime a engendré des gains d'efficacité importants qui ont permis de diminuer le coût relatif de l'assurance, les longues enquêtes, les procès et les poursuites judiciaires n'ayant plus leur raison d'être.

Il n'y a cependant aucun lien entre l'application d'un tel principe et la nécessité de mettre en place un régime public universel. En effet, ce type de régime existe dans plusieurs pays et dans plusieurs États américains au sein d'un système privé d'assurance. Au Québec, les compagnies d'assurances ont même, par le biais d'ententes administratives, appliqué le principe de l'indemnisation sans égard à la faute aux dommages matériels. Mais l'indemnisation sans égard à la faute n'existe obligatoirement au Québec que pour les dommages corporels.

L'universalité du Régime : Il faut se rappeler qu'au Québec, avant la réforme de l'assurance-automobile, près du quart des victimes de dommages corporels causés par un accident d'automobile ne touchaient pas d'indemnités. Aujourd'hui, l'universalité du Régime assure le droit à l'indemnisation pour toutes les victimes d'accidents d'automobile indépendamment de leur âge ou de leur occupation. L'universalité du Régime touche également les contributions d'assurances qui sont obligatoires pour tous les titulaires de permis de conduire et tous les propriétaires de véhicules.

Les piétons et les cyclistes ne contribuent pas au financement du Régime puisque l'assurance s'adresse aux conducteurs et propriétaires de véhicules moteurs. Ainsi, les piétons ou les cyclistes ne peuvent faire appel à la Société s'ils heurtent un véhicule stationné sur la voie publique, un autre piéton ou un autre cycliste, ni s'ils font une chute sans qu'un véhicule automobile ne soit en cause.

Cependant, le conducteur ou le propriétaire d'un véhicule en mouvement est assuré pour les dommages corporels causés à un piéton ou à un cycliste sans qu'il ait à se défendre devant les tribunaux pour réduire les montants réclamés ou pour prouver la culpabilité du piéton ou du cycliste. À l'inverse, ceux-ci sont désormais assurés d'une indemnisation lors d'un accident avec un véhicule automobile en mouvement.

La couverture des pertes réelles : Le Régime d'assurance automobile repose avant tout sur l'indemnisation «des pertes économiques» attribuables à un accident de la route. Toutes les indemnités sont pleinement indexées annuellement au coût de la vie. Cette couverture est exceptionnelle puisque d'année en année, environ 85 % des Québécois sont assurés d'obtenir une pleine compensation de leur revenu perdu en raison d'un accident d'automobile. Quant aux citoyens dont les pertes de revenus seraient supérieures à la couverture maximale offerte par la Société, ils peuvent obtenir une protection additionnelle auprès de leur assureur privé.

Mieux encore, depuis la mise en place du Régime, les sommes retournées aux assurés se sont accrues, en dollars constants, de 35 % par rapport à l'ancien régime. Quant aux délais, ils n'ont aucune mesure commune avec ceux qui prévalaient avant l'existence du régime alors que les victimes pouvaient parfois attendre des années avant de recevoir une première indemnité, à cause des interminables batailles juridiques qui opposaient les parties.

L'admissibilité : Le Régime d'assurance automobile du Québec est fondé sur le principe de l'indemnisation sans égard à la faute. Il accorde une protection à l'ensemble des Québécois victimes d'un accident de la route survenu au Québec ou ailleurs dans le monde. Ainsi, les indemnités accordées par la Société de l'assurance automobile du Québec le sont, sans égard à la responsabilité de quiconque, pour l'ensemble des dommages corporels subis dans un accident d'automobile. Le résident du Québec bénéficie du Régime d'assurance automobile peu importe le lieu de l'accident. Il est protégé au Québec et à l'extérieur du Québec.

L'indemnisation a pour objet de compenser les dommages corporels causés par une automobile, une de ses pièces, son usage ou son chargement. Elle couvre tout dommage physique ou psychique subi par une victime, y compris le décès, ainsi que les dommages aux vêtements portés.

Le Régime d'assurance automobile du Québec n'indemnise pas dans les cas suivants : si l'accident est causé par un appareil susceptible de fonctionnement indépendant comme, par exemple, un treuil de dépanneuse ; si l'accident implique des véhicules en partie exclus comme, par exemple, un tracteur de ferme, et qu'il a lieu en dehors du chemin public ; si l'accident implique des véhicules totalement exclus du Régime, soit les motoneiges et les véhicules tout terrain ; si l'accident survient en raison d'une compétition, d'un spectacle ou d'une course automobile sur un terrain ou un parcours fermé. Le droit à une indemnité se prescrit par trois ans à compter de l'accident ou de la manifestation du dommage.

Lorsque l'accident a lieu au Québec, est considéré résider au Québec le propriétaire, le conducteur ou le passager d'une automobile immatriculée au Québec. Par conséquent, ces personnes ont droit aux indemnités prévues par la loi sans égard à leur responsabilité dans l'accident et sans que la Société ne puisse exercer contre elles de recours subrogatoires. Le non-résident du Québec, victime d'un accident au Québec dont la voiture n'est pas immatriculée au Québec, a droit à l'indemnisation prévue par la loi en proportion inverse de sa responsabilité dans l'accident. La responsabilité est alors déterminée par preuve prépondérante et selon les règles du droit commun.

Entente Québec-Ontario : La Société de l'assurance automobile du Québec et le gouvernement de l'Ontario ont conclu, en décembre 1978, une entente relative à l'indemnisation des résidents de l'Ontario victimes d'accidents d'automobile au Québec.

En vertu de cette entente, dans l'hypothèse d'un accident au Québec impliquant un résident de l'Ontario, le processus est le suivant : Si l'Ontarien est conducteur, passager ou propriétaire d'un véhicule immatriculé au Québec, il est considéré comme un résident du Québec et est pleinement indemnisé par la Société comme tout autre touriste dans la même situation. Si l'Ontarien est non assuré, donc non couvert par l'entente, et s'il n'est pas conducteur, passager ou propriétaire d'un véhicule immatriculé au Québec, il sera indemnisé par la Société, mais dans la proportion de sa part de responsabilité dans l'accident. Si le résident de l'Ontario est un assuré, selon l'entente, et qu'il n'est pas conducteur, passager ou propriétaire d'un véhicule immatriculé au Québec, la Société ne l'indemnise pas. Il doit s'adresser à son assureur, qui l'indemniserait selon les bénéfices prévus par la Loi sur l'assurance automobile.

Indemnité de remplacement du revenu : L'indemnité de remplacement du revenu que verse la Société vise à compenser la perte de revenu d'emploi subie par une personne qui devient incapable de travailler à la suite d'un accident d'automobile. L'indemnité est établie à partir de la perte réelle de revenus. Le droit à l'indemnité de remplacement du revenu et le montant de celle-ci dépendent de la situation de la victime au moment de l'accident. Une indemnité de remplacement du revenu est versée à la victime qui est privée de prestations d'assurance-chômage ou d'allocations de formation à la suite de l'accident. Cette indemnité est calculée sur la base des prestations ou allocations ainsi perdues. Une indemnité de remplacement du revenu est également versée à la victime qui ne travaillait pas au moment de l'accident mais qui était sur le point d'occuper un emploi. Dans un tel cas, la victime est indemnisée sur la base de cet emploi.

L'indemnité de remplacement du revenu est versée à la victime tant qu'elle est incapable de vaquer à ses occupations. Dans le cas d'une incapacité de plus de deux ans, et afin de faciliter la transition entre la période d'inactivité et le retour sur le marché du travail, le Régime prévoit la prolongation de l'indemnité de remplacement du revenu pour une période additionnelle d'un an après que la victime soit devenue capable d'exercer un emploi en fonction de ses capacités résiduelles de travail. Enfin, une prolongation de l'indemnité de remplacement du revenu est également accordée à la victime qui redevient capable d'exercer son emploi, si elle l'a perdu en raison de l'accident.

Victime exerçant un emploi à plein temps : La victime qui occupe un emploi à plein temps au moment de l'accident a droit à une indemnité de remplacement du revenu si, à la suite de cet accident, elle devient incapable d'exercer son emploi. La victime reçoit une indemnité de remplacement du revenu tant qu'elle demeure incapable d'exercer son emploi. Après deux ans d'incapacité, la Société peut réévaluer l'incapacité de la personne en fonction de ses capacités résiduelles de travail. Lorsqu'il s'agit d'un emploi salarié, l'indemnité est calculée à partir du revenu brut tiré d'un emploi. Si la victime est un travailleur autonome, l'indemnité est calculée à partir du revenu brut reçu par un salarié pour un emploi comparable. Toutefois, si le travailleur autonome tire de son emploi un revenu plus élevé que celui fixé par la Société, l'indemnité est alors calculée à partir de ce revenu.

Le montant de l'indemnité de remplacement du revenu correspond à 90 % du revenu net de la personne. Le revenu net de la victime est égal à son revenu brut annuel d'emploi moins un montant équivalant à l'impôt provincial, à l'impôt fédéral, à la cotisation d'assurance-chômage et à la cotisation du Régime des rentes du Québec. Le revenu brut annuel d'emploi considéré est celui de la victime jusqu'à concurrence d'un montant maximal annuel assurable, lequel est de 46 500 $ pour l'année 1993.

Victime exerçant un emploi temporaire ou à temps partiel : La victime qui occupe un emploi temporaire ou à temps partiel a droit à une indemnité de remplacement du revenu durant les premiers 180 jours suivant la date de l'accident, tant qu'elle demeure incapable d'exercer son emploi. L'indemnité de remplacement du revenu représente la perte réelle de revenu subie par la victime en raison de l'accident. À compter du 181^e jour suivant la date de l'accident, l'indemnisation s'effectue sur la base de la perte potentielle de revenu. L'indemnité de remplacement du revenu est établie à partir d'un emploi que la Société détermine à la victime et du revenu brut correspondant à cet emploi. Lorsque la Société détermine un emploi à la victime, elle doit tenir compte de sa formation, de son expérience et de ses capacités à la date de l'accident.

La victime qui occupe un emploi à temps partiel et prend soin d'une ou plusieurs personnes invalides ou âgées de moins de seize ans peut également recevoir une indemnité pour frais de garde si, en raison de l'accident, elle devient incapable de prendre soin de ces personnes.

Victime sans emploi capable de travailler : La victime qui n'exerce pas d'emploi au moment de l'accident n'a droit à aucune indemnité de remplacement du revenu durant les 180 premiers jours suivant la date de l'accident, l'indemnisation étant fondée sur la perte réelle de revenus durant cette période.

Si la période d'incapacité se prolonge au-delà de 180 jours, la Société réévalue l'incapacité de la victime en fonction de son potentiel de travail au moment de l'accident afin de compenser la perte de gains que cette dernière pourrait subir à moyen et à long terme. Dès ce moment, la victime est indemnisée pour la perte potentielle de revenus subie en raison de l'accident.

Ce dispositif contient toutefois deux exceptions donnant droit à une indemnité de remplacement du revenu durant les 180 premiers jours : lorsque la victime démontre qu'elle aurait exercé un emploi si l'accident n'avait pas eu lieu, et lorsqu'elle est privée de prestations d'assurance-chômage ou d'allocations de formation en raison de l'accident.

Aussi, la victime peut toujours, si la situation correspond aux conditions prescrites, recevoir une indemnité pour frais de garde. Dans ce cas, la victime peut choisir, au 181^e jour d'incapacité, de continuer de recevoir l'indemnité pour frais de garde ou d'être indemnisée sur la base d'un emploi potentiel correspondant à ses capacités.

Victime âgée de seize ans et plus qui fréquente à temps plein un établissement d'enseignement : L'étudiant âgé de seize ans et plus a droit à une indemnité aussi longtemps qu'il est incapable d'entreprendre ou de poursuivre ses études et que cette situation le retarde dans la réalisation de son programme scolaire. La loi vise à compenser le retard subi dans les études. Ainsi, aucune indemnité n'est payable à la victime qui, bien qu'ayant été incapable de poursuivre ses études, n'a par contre subi aucun retard dans celles-ci. C'est que l'indemnisation est fondée sur le principe de la perte économique réellement subie en raison de l'accident, et si la victime ne subit pas de retard dans ses études, elle ne devrait pas en subir dans son entrée sur le marché du travail. La victime a droit à cette indemnité jusqu'à la date prévue au moment de l'accident pour la fin des études en cours. Aussi, la victime qui travaille au moment de l'accident—

The Chair: Excuse me. We have five minutes left for your presentation. You can read all this into the record; it will go into the record. You should sum up if you want to give the committee members a chance, but it's up to you if you want to go right straight through until 11:30. It's your choice; you're the presenters. I just wanted to let you know.

M. Genest : Merci. Alors, je vais résumer durant les cinq prochaines minutes.

Donc, pour la victime âgée de seize ans et plus qui fréquente à plein temps un établissement d'enseignement, le dispositif est le paiement de forfaitaire qui correspond au retard pour l'entrée sur le marché du travail. Ce forfaitaire s'élève à 6 208 $ par année perdus au niveau secondaire et à 6 208 $ par session d'études ratée au niveau postsecondaire, jusqu'à concurrence de 12 417 $.

Pour les victimes âgées de moins de seize ans, la couverture est la même dans le sens que le système d'assurance-automobile du Québec compense le retard d'entrée sur le marché du travail, mais les montants forfaitaires sont accordés ainsi : au niveau primaire il est de 3 386 $, et pour les autres, secondaire et postsecondaire, ce sont les mêmes montants.

La victime âgée de 64 ans et plus : Lorsqu'à la date de l'accident, une victime est âgée de 64 ans et plus, l'indemnité de remplacement du revenu est réduite de 25 % à compter de la deuxième année, de 50 % à compter de la troisième année et de 75 % à compter de la quatrième. De la même façon, une victime qui avait 64 ans au moment de l'accident et qui reçoit une indemnité de remplacement du revenu voit une réduction dans le même ordre.

Une victime qui est invalide — c'est-à-dire, régulièrement incapable d'exercer tout emploi — ne reçoit aucune indemnité, puisqu'elle n'avait pas de revenus au moment de l'accident.

Les indemnités de décès : Les indemnités de décès sont accordées au conjoint survivant qui a droit de recevoir une indemnité qui varie entre 45 000 $ et 232 000 $, selon l'âge du conjoint au moment de l'accident et le revenu du conjoint au moment de l'accident.

Les personnes à charge autre que le conjoint ont droit à des indemnités également. Elles varient de 21 000 $ à 39 000 $, selon l'âge des personnes à charge, selon l'âge des enfants.

Quant à une personne qui n'a ni conjoint ni personne à charge, la Société paie aux parents ou aux personnes qui en tiennent lieu une indemnité forfaitaire de 16 900 $.

Nous versons également une indemnité pour frais funéraires.

La victime a droit à une indemnité pour dommages non pécuniaires qui est établie selon un barème qui représente la perte permanente d'intégrité physique ou psychique et qui est versée jusqu'à un maximum de 127 250 $. Le barème constitue une liste des atteintes physiques. Suite à une évaluation médicale, un pourcentage est fixé et ce pourcentage est multiplié par le maximum de 127 000 $.

Nous avons des programmes de réadaptation qui couvrent l'ensemble des besoins selon un plan de réadaptation, sans aucune limite de montant, et nous couvrons également tous les frais engagés par l'accident, quelle que soit leur nature et sans aucune limite.

En conclusion, nous avons, dans un document publié récemment par l'Organisation de coopération et de développement économiques, un commentaire qui souligne que les sommes versées au Québec pour dommages corporels représentent environ 135 % de celles versées avant le Régime. Une partie des indemnités versées sous l'ancien régime servait à acquitter les frais de perception et de ré-clamation et les frais juridiques. Ainsi, les sommes retournées directement aux assurés sont forcément plus élevées maintenant. Mais les gains réels pour les Québécois vont bien au-delà de ces montants, et ils résident surtout dans l'universalité du Régime, dans la pleine compensation de la perte économique.

Enfin, dit toujours l'OCDE, l'administration du Régime par une régie publique a permis des efforts considérables pour la réadaptation des victimes, réduisant ainsi la période d'inactivité et donc d'indemnisation, de même qu'une implication majeure dans des efforts de prévention routiers qui ne sont certes pas étrangers aux résultats positifs de ces dernières années.

Je vous remercie de votre attention. Je pense que je suis entré dans le temps des partis.

The Chair: Yes, all the time was used up. This was a lot of information you put out in half an hour. As I was listening to the interpreters, receiving this in English, there wasn't one period or comma because of the speed. There was quite a bit of information you got out, so I would appreciate it if you could give a telephone number to the committee members, or Franco could get a telephone number and an address. I think there might be some questions. Maybe they could give you a call and possibly you could get some answers back to them. As I say, there is quite a bit of information here. Does the committee agree with that?

Mr Tilson: Mr Chair, I have a point of order on this whole process. This group of people—and I respect what they've presented to us; it will be very useful to study it, and we may or may not have some questions. The problem I have is that this group of people were invited by the Ministry of Financial Institutions. I suspect the Ministry of Financial Institutions paid for their flight here from Quebec City, probably paid for their accommodation and their food. This ministry is relying on this group as an example of why this system should work for Bill 164.

I have no problem with the government doing that. I have a lot of problems with the fact that there's been no time allowed for us to ask questions of this group about the Quebec system. I can't believe you're saying: "We'll give you a phone call. Give us your phone number and we'll give you a call."

I also can't believe this wouldn't be put in a briefing session just like Mercer was. Mercer is an expert witness; these people are expert witnesses. This system is why the government is proceeding. They're using this as an example. This group normally would have been put forward at the time when Mercer and other experts were. I resent the fact that members of the public of this province have been excluded because the Ministry of Financial Institutions wants to put forward its pap.

Mr Owens: Mr Tilson has insinuated—not only insinuated, but has directly said that the Ministry of Financial Institutions has paid the fare and the freight to have the Société de l'assurance automobile du Québec come here this morning. That is in fact not correct, and Mr Tilson should withdraw his remarks immediately.

Mr Winninger: For shame.

Mr Tilson: Mr Chairman, I don't want to get into a debate on this subject. My point of order is on the whole fact of the procedure.

Mr Owens: You should withdraw your remarks.

Mr Tilson: I'm not withdrawing anything. There's nothing out of order. The Ministry of Financial Institutions invited these people to come. The more appropriate time to come would have been at the briefing session. The briefing session should have expanded. We had inadequate time to question Mr Tully; we had inadequate time to question the Mercer people, and we had no time to question these people.

The Chair: Mr Tilson, as I'm here as Chair, I have no prior knowledge of any—this is just another group appearing before this committee. That's what I'm telling you as the Chair. They had, I told them at the very beginning from 11 until 11:30.

Mr Tilson: Mr Chairman, I respect you. There's no criticism towards you. My criticism is directed towards Mr Owens and the Ministry of Financial Institutions for manipulating the time that's taken away from the members of the public of this province to come and speak their mind on this issue.

Mrs Elinor Caplan (Oriole): Mr Chairman, I think the concern is a legitimate one. People who have watched this very excellent and informative presentation are going to assume that these plans are identical, that the Quebec plan we heard about today and Bill 164 are identical. In fact they are not. They are very, very different, and not having an opportunity to raise those points and these questions has frustrated opposition members of the committee.

We're already hearing interchange and interjections from government members suggesting that in fact the plans that are proposed in Bill 164 and the presentation before us are similar; in fact, identical. That is upsetting and confusing.

I think Mr Tilson makes a good point, that it would have been better for everyone if we could have had this presentation during the initial briefing. Certainly on behalf of my constituents in the riding of Oriole and consumers who are going to pay more because of Bill 164, there are a number of questions I would have liked to have asked.

Having said that, I don't see the parliamentary assistant or the Ministry of Financial Institutions offering an alternative solution, and I don't think "just make a phone call" is a responsible response.

The Chair: I have to say that was my suggestion. That's why I broke in at 25 after. I thought I could say, "Let's stop here so everybody has a chance to ask a question."

Mr Owens was next on a point of privilege.

Mr Owens: Just to continue the correction of the record, the Société is here as a witness, not as an expert witness. For Ms Caplan's benefit and for the benefit of her constituents, let me give you a historical perspective on how this technical briefing was put together. First of all, your representative, as well as the representative of the third party, declined to have a technical briefing; they said it was not necessary to have a technical briefing.

Mr Tilson: That's not true.

Mr Mancini: That's not the issue at all.

Mr Owens: The issue is that Mr Harnick, then along with Mr Kormos, came and requested—

Mrs Caplan: I challenge, Mr Chairman, that this is not a point of privilege.

Interjections.

Mr Owens: You declined the offer of a technical briefing.

The Chair: I'm going to listen to this committee. Myself, I would not extend the time, but if I hear from this committee that they want to extend it, I believe the other group is late coming in. We get at least one question from each caucus?

Mr Mancini: Five minutes from each caucus.

The Chair: Five minutes?

Mr Owens: One question.

The Chair: Okay, five minutes or one question. Do I hear that the committee's in agreement with that?

Mr Owens: What are we agreeing to, Chair?

The Chair: Five minutes per caucus per question. With these people coming from Quebec, I think it's important that—

Mr Mancini: Five minutes, Mr Owens.

Mrs Caplan: That's reasonable.

The Chair: We start off with Ms Caplan, five minutes.

Mrs Caplan: Thank you very much, Mr Chairman.

Mr Owens: Just a second.

The Chair: I didn't hear anybody opposing.

Mrs Caplan: The question I have, and I want to thank the—

Mr Owens: Excuse me, Ms Caplan. The issue—

The Chair: I'm the Chair. I'm sorry, Mr Owens.

Mr Owens: The issue with respect to—

Mr Mancini: Will you stop pretending you're the committee Chair? Mr Ron Hansen is the committee Chair.

Mrs Caplan: This is embarrassing for our guests.

Interjections.

The Chair: Mrs Caplan, five minutes.

Mrs Caplan: I would like to ask if you have had an opportunity to review Bill 164 as compared to Ontario's existing plan, and if you've seen the Mercer report, and could tell us from your experience whether you believe that the premiums will go up for consumers in Ontario as a result of this plan?

Mr Gélinas: When we accepted to come here and give our comments on the Quebec administration of its public insurance policy, it was to describe how it functioned and not to make a comparison with the system that is proposed for Ontario as such.

Mrs Caplan: The point is that, as you understand it, the two plans are very different; they're not identical.

Mr Gélinas: I don't want to get into a discussion where we'll be comparing both systems. Our purpose here today is not to compare both systems. It's strictly to give you an explanation of how our system works. We don't want to go into any other discussion dealing with the proposed system in Ontario, because then we get into a debate that is of a more political nature.

Mrs Caplan: The concern I'm raising is that by your presence here this morning and our frustration in not being able to have a greater discussion with you is the suggestion that in some way the plans have been compared and are found to be identical. I appreciate you clarifying that that is not the purpose, that you were here to describe the Quebec plan, which is different from the Ontario plan, and you're not here to compare them. I'm going to yield to Mr Phillips.

The Chair: You've got two minutes.

Mr Phillips: Thank you. The thing that's preying on our minds is just what's going to happen to the people of Ontario in terms of cost, because I just happen to have before me the Quebec fiscal situation. Things are desperate there, and they're desperate here.

Based on the most conservative estimate, every single individual out there is going to be paying substantially more in automotive insurance premiums. This is a regressive situation, because regardless of your income, regardless of whether you have a job or not, you need automobile insurance and you have to buy it, and this bill, according to the government estimates, will take the premiums up by at least $200 million.

Yesterday we saw, as I said before, a government that couldn't afford $60 million for people who are on welfare in the province because it has no money, but can afford at least $200 million in incremental premiums. That's why you're helpful for us, because I'm anxious to know whether your premiums this year are being held below inflation—we're assuming, by the way, that the increase is on top of a normal increase—that you've been able to hold yours at below inflation. I realize you haven't had a chance to study in depth this bill, but would your judgement be that this increase will be in the 5% range?

Mr Gélinas: I think Mr Breton can give you an explanation of the financing of our own system in Quebec and how the cost of premium insurance for bodily injury has been treated from 1978 to today, because our financial situation as of now is an extremely good one. Mr Breton will give you an explanation of that.

Mr Martin Breton: Two things we can say about financial issues. I don't know how they apply here, but we know how they apply in Quebec. First of all, for each dollar paid in premium in Quebec with the no-fault system now, victims receive a higher percentage out of every dollar they pay in premium. That's the first thing. The other thing is that the premium for a normal car was $85 in 1978 and now it's $85 in 1993, but the $85 in 1993 includes a 9% tax. So it means it's lower now than it was in 1978.

The Chair: I'll have to go on to Mr Tilson.

Mr Tilson: I gather you haven't had an opportunity to study the bill this committee is looking at; you haven't had a chance to look at this bill.

Mr Gélinas: Personally, no.

Mr Tilson: Can you compare the Quebec legislation to any other jurisdiction either in Canada or the United States?

Mr Gélinas: Quebec, I think, is the only one to have what we call a pure no-fault system as such. I have been present at many conferences of the American Motor Vehicle Association of Administrators and we have spoken many times about how our system works. You have many systems in the States that are a combined system of no-fault and tort, and you also have other no-fault systems in Canada, but they apply as well to material damages and to bodily damages. They also are, in some jurisdictions, only a basic protection, while ours is what you could call a pure no-fault system.

Mr Tilson: I wanted to say, sir, just so you're certain that my outrage is not directed to you, that it's directed towards the government and the Ministry of Financial Institutions. I do appreciate your coming and giving this report. It's too bad that we don't have more time to ask further questions of you, but Mr Harnick has one more question from our party.

Mr Harnick: I note your comment that you describe Quebec as a pure no-fault system. Even in that pure no-fault system, on page 6 of your brief—and I'm referring to the English version—you state, "As for citizens whose loss of income would be more than the maximum coverage offered by our agency, they can seek additional coverage from their private insurer."

I'd like you to know that Ontario has the distinction under Bill 164 of being the only jurisdiction in North America that takes away the right to claim for actual economic loss. I'm interested that even in a pure no-fault system, you have not taken that right away but have given people the option to purchase economic loss insurance. Is that correct?

M. Genest : De fait, nous avons établi un maximum assurable de 46 500 $ en 1997 et, au-delà de ce maximum assurable, tout individu peut obtenir une protection additionnelle auprès d'un assureur privé. Mais, pour tous les dommages corporels couverts par le Régime d'assurance automobile, le droit à l'indemnité remplace totalement le droit de poursuite devant les tribunaux.

Mr Harnick: I appreciate that, but your brief indicates that an individual can protect himself by purchasing additional insurance. Is that correct?

Mr Gélinas: That is correct.

Mr Harnick: I appreciate that, because Ontario will be the only jurisdiction in North America that is so regressive as to take away that right for people to protect their economic losses. I'm glad you came here today to show that even in a pure no-fault jurisdiction, people still have economic rights. I thank you for being here today.

The Chair: That was perfect, Charles. You're right on.

Mr Harnick: And I'm glad you agree with the content as well, Mr Chair.

The Chair: I appreciate it, Mr Harnick. Mr Johnson.

Mr Paul R. Johnson (Prince Edward-Lennox-South Hastings): Thank you very much for being here today. I'd like to continue to pursue this in a somewhat similar vein to Mr Harnick. I understand there is no right to sue for economic loss in Quebec. Is that correct?

Mr Gélinas: That is correct.

Mr Johnson: Are people happy with this? Are the clients, the people who use the system, happy with that?

Mr Gélinas: We have made over the last 14 years certain surveys of persons who have received indemnities from the Société, and our satisfaction in that process is close to 80%, if I remember well. There is general satisfaction there.

Mr Johnson: That's very good to know. Mr Tilson asked a question earlier that I don't know if we had an answer to. I hope you may be able to answer. It's a question with regard to today, and not about insurance per se. Did the Ministry of Financial Institutions pay you to come here today?

Mr Gélinas: From what I know, we haven't even discussed it. We were just invited.

Mr Johnson: Just one further question: Has the provision of unlimited medical and rehabilitation resulted in a large escalation of costs for the Société?

Mr Gélinas: All our rehabilitation process is administered by our vice-president for accident victims. I think that M. Genest can give a complete picture of our rehabilitation procedures and financing of that also.

Mr Johnson: Thank you. I would appreciate that.

M. Genest : Les frais de réadaptation ne comportent pas de limite. Toutefois, le plan de réadaptation est établi par des professionnels qui, en collaboration avec les systèmes sociaux et sanitaires de la région et les organismes communautaires, établissent un plan sur une année, deux années, trois années selon les capacités résiduelles de la personne, sa formation, son expérience et son plan de carrière.

Ce plan de réadaptation est ensuite appliqué avec les ressources du milieu et conduit par les conseillers en réadaptation. Lorsque le plan est complété et que les évaluations sont complétées, la personne se voit déterminer un emploi et réintégrée sur le marché du travail par les soins du programme de réadaptation.

Nous n'avons pas de limite. Nous avons des programmes de réadaptation qui touchent l'aménagement résidentiel, l'aménagement des véhicules, la formation, les réadaptations cognitives, les traumatisés crâniens ou cérébraux... Cet investissement-là, selon nos études, permet un retour sur le marché du travail de l'ordre de 70 % des personnes visées par le programme.

Nous payons également les frais médicaux occasionnés par les accidents de la route au Fonds consolidé du revenu, qui représente à peu près 80 millions de dollars par année, lesquels sont indexés et sont révisés à tous les trois ans selon le nombre de journées d'hospitalisation et les frais qui sont engagés pour les services médicaux. Mais les frais ne sont pas payés à la pièce ; ils font partie d'un transfert global effectué au Fonds consolidé du revenu pour le ministère de la Santé.

Nous avons également un système de contrôle des coûts qui, globalement, est assuré par la formation des agents d'indemnisation, un système informatique très performant, et une étude approfondie de chaque dossier de réclamation.

The Chair: I would like to thank you for appearing before this committee, and I thank this committee for the direction it has given the Chair so it didn't put the Chair in a bad spot in having to make the decision; that you had an opportunity and the committee was able to ask questions.

The clerk has said to me that you had applied to come before this committee, so that was correct. I'm glad to welcome you to Ontario and I'm glad that you were able to be here. I hope we have the same reception and that you can bend the rules in Quebec for us if we ever come up. Thank you for appearing.

ONTARIO TEACHERS INSURANCE PLAN

The Chair: The next group we've got is the Ontario Teachers Insurance Plan. Could you come forward, please. I'm sorry for the slight delay, but sometimes everything isn't perfect in this process.

You have one half-hour; in that half-hour, as you can see, it would help if you could leave some time at the end for the members of the committee to ask questions. I don't want to go through the same exercise again for each group that comes forward. If you don't mind identifying yourself for the purposes of Hansard and the people of Ontario, you may begin.

Mr François Tisi: Thank you kindly. Our presentation is approximately 12 minutes, so there should be ample time for questions.

I'm François Tisi. I'm the chief executive officer of the Ontario Teachers Insurance Plan, and with me I have Randy McGlynn, who is the executive director of marketing and insurance.

The Ontario Teachers Insurance Plan, or Régime d'assurance des enseignantes et des enseignants de l'Ontario, is a non-profit trust established in 1977 by the five teacher affiliates of the Ontario Teachers' Federation. The board of trustees of OTIP is composed of two teachers appointed by each of the five teacher affiliates of the Ontario Teachers' Federation: L'Association des enseignantes et des enseignants franco-ontariens, the Federation of Women Teachers' Associations of Ontario, the Ontario English Catholic Teachers' Association, the Ontario Public School Teachers' Federation and the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation.

In 1991, OTIP managed more than $50 million on behalf of its members, while providing long-term disability insurance to approximately 70,000 employees of public and separate school boards across the province.

OTIP wishes to acknowledge the careful and thorough approach taken in the development of amendments to Bill 164.

We are pleased that the Minister of Financial Institutions is conducting public hearings and appreciate the opportunity to present to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs observations drawn from our experience in the automobile insurance and long-term disability fields.

In order to meet its objectives of product and service excellence, OTIP requires an environment that encourages communication, cooperation and partnership. By allowing us to present our concerns to the standing committee, we have begun this process. We ask, however, that you consider our concerns in the deliberation of new guidelines and policies affecting our members.

The main objective of OTIP from its inception has been to provide the best available insurance benefits at competitive rates for active and retired educational employees. We believe that with your help we can achieve this objective.

New risk classification system: OTIP is concerned that the new "uniform, non-discriminatory risk classification system" may mean substantial, unfair and prohibitive rate increases for young women and senior citizens. We are encouraged by the assurances regarding proposed section 413 that "the new plan will be phased in over several years through a process which minimizes rate dislocation for consumers." We note in this regard that the Lieutenant Governor in Council will prescribe by regulation a risk classification system and, furthermore, that there will be a regulation to limit rate changes. OTIP respectfully recommends that every consideration be given to limiting the rate increases on young women and senior citizen drivers so that the increases are introduced on a gradual basis.

Accident benefit reforms: In its submission to the standing committee on general government on Bill 68 in 1990, OTIP argued that auto insurers, not private disability insurers, should bear the costs of injury, long-term care and rehabilitation of persons injured through auto accidents. This recommendation was not placed in the current Insurance Act. We note that the position was considered in the amendment of the current legislation, but was later rejected. The Road Ahead states:

"This package of accident benefits was designed after careful balancing of two key objectives: adequate coverage and affordable auto insurance. Difficult tradeoffs were involved. For example, consideration was given to making auto insurance, rather than private disability plans, the primary payer of compensation for people involved in auto accidents. The large premium increases associated with such change made that proposal unworkable. The interface between auto insurance and other disability systems will be the subject of further review."

We agree that our proposal may increase premium rates, but it will do so fairly and not place an unfair burden on those who have private disability insurance.

OTIP recommends that auto insurance be the primary payer where disability is directly related to an automobile accident.

OTIP provides disability insurance to 70,000 educational employees through benefit packages negotiated by these employees and their school board employers. The negotiated benefit package is included in the collective agreement. The disability insurance plan incorporates, in various ways, the use of the individual's accumulated sick leave credits. Frequently, if the sick leave credits remain unused at the point of the employee's retirement, they are converted to gratuity and are part of the employee's retirement income.

OTIP believes that it is unfair to the employee who, while endeavouring to keep well, is injured in an auto accident and therefore required to use up these credits and to use his or her disability insurance. OTIP contends that the disability insurance plans should not be used to cover automobile accident injuries. Requiring private disability insurance plans to be the primary payer places the insured in the position of subsidizing lower rates in the entire auto insurance industry.

Employees who have prudently and wisely protected themselves at their own expense and discretion against unforeseen illness or injury should not be required to subsidize lower auto insurance rates for those who are not covered by private disability insurance. It requires those who do to pay twice.

OTIP recommends that if auto insurance is not the primary payer, rate adjustments be permitted for those who are covered by private disability insurance plans.

One-week waiting period: The current legislation requires an injured person to wait one week before benefits begin. As the loss of wage begins on the day of the accident, it is apparent that anxiety, as well as suffering, can only be prolonged by any delay in benefits. The sense of security that benefits provide the victim will most certainly aid in a speedy recovery. Benefits must not be seen as merely financial compensation but as an integral component of one's rehabilitation. The sooner benefits are delivered, the sooner rehabilitation can be achieved.

OTIP recommends that the one-week waiting period before benefits begin be eliminated.

Access to courts: OTIP supports granting innocent victims the right to sue for damages related to non-economic losses, that is, pain and suffering. We agree that those who suffer loss of enjoyment of life or life expectancy, through no fault of their own, ought to be able to establish in court that they were not at fault and that they are entitled to compensation. We are concerned that the requirement that an award of the court be subject to a mandatory deductible of $15,000 will, in our view, create an unnecessary floor of $15,000.

OTIP recommends that the award of the court, in cases of pain and suffering, not be influenced by the pre-set deductible.

Rehabilitation benefits: OTIP has earned an invaluable reputation not only as an effective and efficient long-term disability insurer but also as a provider of prudent and comprehensive rehabilitation services. These services have helped a great many educational employees, disabled through illness or accident, to return to full or partial employment in relatively short time. We are concerned about two aspects of the rehabilitation provisions proposed in Bill 164.

First, the tabled legislation proposes the repeal of subsection 268(1) and proposes in subsection (1.3) the requirement that all insurers "pay for reasonable measures to (a) reduce or eliminate the effects resulting from an injury; and (b) facilitate an injured person's reintegration into his or her family, the labour market and the rest of society."

OTIP supports the inclusion of this provision, but is concerned that there is no clear definition that constitutes "reasonable measures." While it is difficult to define "reasonable," it is possible to judge in a certain situation, by weighing the severity of the injury and the rehabilitation steps taken, whether the steps taken to rehabilitate the injured person have been reasonable.

We are of the view that some sort of appeal to an independent arbitrator or arbitration panel for review of the measures would be fair to the injured person. In the absence of such an appeal process, it is our fear that unnecessary litigation under section 267.1 will ensue.

OTIP recommends that an independent arbitration process be established to review the steps required of insurers as set out in the proposed subsection 268(1).

Our second concern under rehabilitation benefits arises from the fact that OTIP is required to provide its services to the injured person prior to the auto insurer being involved. Considering the fragility of rehabilitative efforts on the part of the insurer and the insured, it would appear reasonable and beneficial to the injured person that there be an integration framework governing the rehabilitation measures taken by OTIP and later by the auto insurer.

OTIP recommends that the regulation include guidelines governing the integration of the private disability insurer's rehabilitation program with that of the auto insurer.

Therefore, the OTIP recommendations are as follows:

- That rate increases, especially as they apply to young women and seniors, be phased in over a period of several years;

- That auto insurance be the primary payer where disability is directly related to an automobile accident;

- That if auto insurance is not the primary payer, rate adjustments be permitted for those who are covered by private disability insurance plans;

- That the one-week waiting period before benefits begin be eliminated;

- That the award of the court, in cases of pain and suffering, not be influenced by the pre-set deductible;

- That an independent arbitration process be established to review the steps required of insurers as set out in the proposed subsection 268(1);

- That the regulation include guidelines governing the integration of the private disability insurer's rehabilitation program with that of the auto insurer.

On behalf of OTIP, I would like to thank the standing committee for selecting us to make this presentation.

The Chair: Thank you. Mr Tilson.

Mr Tilson: Thank you for coming and giving us your presentation. I know our party will be studying many of your remarks for possible suggestions and amendments to this bill, when that time comes.

I know your interest is in teachers, but the other issue I'd like you to direct your thoughts to is students and infants. I know your sole interest is protecting teachers, but teachers do get involved with students. Students and infants don't have any income, or they have a very nominal income, and I don't believe they can purchase any disability insurance, the disability insurance you're speaking of, for protection of loss of income: economic loss. Any arbitrary rule, I hope you would agree, would be unfair to infants, would be unfair to students. Arbitrary rules simply can't properly assess the potential of those students or of those infants.

The other question is, what about students who are injured but can eventually participate in the labour force, but with a diminished income; they can't do many things? Who's going to decide what their loss is? Some arbitrary committee sitting somewhere, I suppose. Will the private insurers make those decisions?

I know you've directed your comments towards teachers, but teachers make their money from students, and I'd like to hear your thoughts about how students can be protected from your perspective.

Mr Tisi: On the first part, there's no doubt that we addressed our presentation based on the people we represent, who are the educational community. More specifically, the problem we see with regard to the rehabilitation—because we have rehabilitation personnel working for us—and to the long-term disability is the possibility of a conflict unless there is some integration. One agency or an insurer starts off with a rehabilitative program, the long-term disability comes in, here's another set of professionals who will be dealing—there should be some integration for the best of the injured person, and it's the integration portion that we referred to specifically.

With regard to the students, there's no question, Mr Tilson, that we did not address that portion in our presentation. There's probably some validity to what you're bringing forward.

Mr Tilson: Thank you. Mr Harnick has a question.

Mr Harnick: This Bill 164 takes away a person's right to claim for any economic loss beyond what their auto insurance blended with their private disability coverage might offer. In other words, someone can, at the end of the day, suffer loss beyond what all of their insurance benefits would pay them. Do you agree that after you've paid a premium for your disability benefits and a premium for your auto insurance benefits, you should still have the right to claim for any economic loss you might still be sustaining?

Mr Tisi: The one point I'd like to reiterate is that we insure over 70,000 educators for long-term disability and, according to the proposed legislation, once these individuals are eligible for long-term disability, the long-term disability becomes the primary payer. I know that the vast majority of educational employees in this province are insured for long-term disability. Our point with regard to that aspect was simply that it's not fair to them, because they are protected and they are paying the premium out of their own pockets because of the taxability of long-term disability. It's not fair that because they protect themselves then their long-term disability becomes the primary payer.

We're simply saying that the auto insurance should be the primary payer. If the long-term disability stays as proposed, there should be a reduction in their rate to compensate people who are adequately protected because of long-term disability.

Mr Harnick: What I'm driving at, though, is that there still may be a shortfall. If they're the innocent person involved in an accident, shouldn't they have the right to claim any economic loss they suffer, through no fault of their own, that has diminished their earnings from what they would be getting as a teacher if they were working full-time? It's a simple proposition: the right to claim economic loss.

Mr Randy McGlynn: It is an insurable risk, and the consumer does have the right to buy that coverage in the open marketplace.

Mr Harnick: No, they don't; not under this legislation. That right has been taken away from them.

Mr McGlynn: Not under 164, but to cover all disabilities—

Mr Harnick: Yes, but that only pays you your benefit on the day of the accident, depending on what you're making that day. What if you have a future ahead of you and you're going to make more 10 or 15 or 20 years down the road, when you go from being a teacher to a vice-principal or a vice-principal to a principal?

The Chair: Mr Harnick, I've got to carry on. Mr Dadamo.

Mr George Dadamo (Windsor-Sandwich): Thank you for your presentation. I wanted to direct your attention to page 1. You state, "In 1991 OTIP managed more than $50 million on behalf of its members while providing long-term disability insurance to approximately 70,000 employees" I know you're always on the search for good plans for the employees throughout the province of Ontario. You acquire many insurance coverages from other sources. Does Bill 164 enhance, at the end of the day, or are there some pitfalls? I need to know that.

Mr McGlynn: By and large, it enhances the coverage that the membership we represent would be protected for. We have some concerns, as we expressed, in terms of allocation of the premiums. We think it's double-dipping to charge for long-term disability then pay for the same benefit under the auto insurance and take it away through a contract provision. That was our concern in that area. Certainly the enhancements, including the adjustment for inflationary increases and the lifting of caps, together with the extra work in the area of rehabilitation that we understand has begun, will be of benefit to those people who are, unfortunately, injured in accidents.

Mr Dadamo: You also recommend that auto insurance be the primary payer where disability is directly related to an automobile accident. Can you explain what you mean by that?

Mr McGlynn: It goes back to my comment on double-dipping. You're paying for both long-term disability or an income replacement program, as well as automobile insurance; in both cases you're buying disability protection. Our concern is that you either allow for a discount in the long-term disability premiums by making the auto insurance the primary payer so the premium reduces for the long-term disability, or else you reduce the auto insurance premium to recognize the fact that somebody has gone out and looked after that through an all-encompassing program, which is what I was addressing with Mr Harnick.

Mr Tisi: On this issue, one important fact most people are probably aware of is that if the long-term disability premiums are paid by the employee, the benefit is non-taxable. Therefore, in Ontario, the majority of educational employees pay their own premium for long-term disability. Long-term disability is not a benefit that is cheap. It's not uncommon to see premiums of 1% of salary or more. So they're already paying for their own long-term disability benefit and they're paying for their auto insurance. On the other hand, because they're well protected, if they become disabled as a result of an auto accident, then their long-term disability kicks in. Obviously, the rates for long-term disability have a relationship to experience. That's what Randy was coming at with regard to the double-dipping.

Mr Mancini: I have one very short question and then I'm going to turn the floor over to my colleague. It deals with a question you think you may have already answered; that is, whether this bill is an enhancement for your members. We've heard testimony by other witnesses before the committee that this legislation will raise rates. The government has accepted that fact. Their own consultants say rates will go up by 4.5% minimum, worth $200 million if you extrapolate that across the province. Yesterday, we heard Mel Swart, a former member of the Legislature, say that while rates will be going up, benefits will be reduced by 15%.

Are your members the only ones who are not going to be affected by that reduction? Are you in a special category that won't be affected? How does that work? How is the pie going to shrink and you not be affected? That's the question.

Mr McGlynn: You have two points. One, you're looking at the premium that is going to be charged. When both actuaries from opposite sides determine that there's going to be a rate increase, I don't think there's any doubt that there's going to be a rate increase. I believe there is value for the additional premium, whatever it is. I believe it's some place between both, because assumptions are really the basis for what actuaries develop. They've both taken positions, and likely someplace between is the truth. When you weigh where that number is against the additional benefits we see outlined in the legislation, we think it represents value. We have to speak for the members we represent, but I would say that value likely extends beyond them as well.

Mr Mancini: I have more questions, but I'd like to turn it over to my colleague.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the comments, because each of your members, I gather, will face a premium increase of around $100 or thereabouts. That's midway between the two numbers we've seen. I think you're aware that the government said it will give 0% to the educational system this year and 0% next year; there's no more money going out to pay teachers' salaries. But your members say they're prepared, each of them, to fund this to the tune of at least $100 just for these benefits, plus any additional charges you would have. But you've made that determination, that it's worth $100. I appreciate that comment, because I deal often with teachers—

Mr Klopp: He didn't say that.

Mr Phillips: He did say that. My question really is around disability, where you've given us an interesting suggestion. I want to follow it up. As I understand it, you're saying that if one of the teachers is in an accident, you want this bill to cover long-term loss of income, not your current disability insurance. You'd like it to be covered under this bill.

Mr McGlynn: We don't care which way it goes. You either cover it under the bill or you give a premium reduction to acknowledge that—

Mr Phillips: Let me finish the question, just in case I don't get it. Sometimes the Chair cuts me off.

The Chair: You've got one minute.

Mr Phillips: Imagine for a moment that they are covered by auto insurance and not long-term disability. Imagine for a moment that we amended this to say that. Have you examined what that would mean in terms of teacher income for long-term disability? Would they be in any way impacted in terms of what they would get over the duration of the disability?

Mr Tisi: First of all, let's look at the first part of it. I'd also like to make some comments on the first part of what you said. Let's look at the question as such. We are saying that we represent a group of employees where probably 95%-plus are insured for long-term disability. That's very important, because if we were representing a group of employees who did not have long-term disability, then it wouldn't be that much of a concern. If they get into an accident and if they are disabled because of the auto accident, then the plan will pay.

But because we represent a group of employees where most of them have long-term disability coverage, then as soon as they are eligible for long-term disability, the plan they pay for will trigger. That's what we're saying.

If you look our proposal, there are two sections. The first one says we believe that the auto insurance should be the primary payer. We could have stayed and left it right at that. We realize there could be some substantial costs, if that's the route the government decides to go.

On the other hand, there's a second recommendation right after it that says that if it is not the primary payer as these people have a private plan, they should get a reduction in their auto rates. Otherwise, they are supplementing—

Mr Phillips: My question, though, was that if they were the primary payer, does it impact the settlement for your members?

Mr Tisi: If they were the primary payer, then the LTD, if it did kick in, would be an offset. So the LTD would pay whatever the contract says, less—

Mr Phillips: I see. So you'd want a supplement on top of that.

Mr Tisi: They're paying for it. We don't want a supplement. We're just saying that they're not going to get any more. Most of our people—I think as an example you would look at a 60% benefit, the majority. There's higher, but for most of them, the above-average long-term disability coverage is about 60%. All we're saying is that whatever that 60% is, they wouldn't get any more, but as it's an auto accident, automobile should be the primary payer. If it doesn't equal their 60%, then the insurer can top up to the 60%, and that would affect the insurance rate they are paying.

The Chair: I'm sorry, Mr Phillips. We're going to have to cut it off.

Mr Phillips: That's too bad. They're good witnesses.

The Chair: I know it's been a really good conversation back and forth.

Mr Tisi: I'd just like to make, if you'll allow me, one comment: First of all, we realize that the rates will probably go up. As Randy indicated, we have two firms of actuaries who have said they would be going up. We believe it'll be in between what has been brought forward. I don't think we mentioned that the 70,000 members we represent are willing to pay $100 more; if we did, we would be lying. On the other hand, if you look at the insurance industry as such, we are also believers that in a lot of cases there could be a reduction in rates, and that could compensate for some of the increase of what we're going to see with this new bill.

The Chair: Thanks a lot, gentlemen, for coming before this committee. I'm sorry there was a slight delay.

I've got another announcement to make: This committee, when it recesses now, will recess until 2:30. A group has cancelled and we weren't able to get another group in, so we'll be back here sharp at 2:30.

Mr Mancini: Mr Chairman, I have a request: Can we get the Ontario Insurance Commission to come in at 2 o'clock in place of the group that can't come in? I have some questions for them. Can I make a motion?

The Chair: It's a little bit short notice.

Mr Mancini: We can try. I didn't say we were going to force them; I said could we try. I'd like to make a motion that we ask the clerk—

The Chair: With the other subcommittee members, I'll leave it with them.

Mr Mancini: In front of the whole committee, I'd like to make a motion. On a point of order, I'd like to make a motion that the clerk respectfully request senior officials of the Ontario Insurance Commission to come in for a half-hour of questioning at 2 pm so that we don't lose that time, if it is possible.

Mr Owens: I can't support that motion.

Mr Mancini: Why not? All we want is information. Why can we not support the motion? I'd like to know from the parliamentary assistant.

The Chair: Let me just get the feeling of the rest. You see, I changed my schedule for an appointment, with the understanding that we wouldn't come back until 2:30. I will not be sitting in the chair between 2 and 2:30, I can tell you that right now. Maybe some other members also—

Mr Mancini: I appreciate that. Mr Dadamo has done a nice job substituting for you.

The Chair: Who's in favour?

Mr Mancini: I'd like a recorded vote, Mr Chairman.

The Chair: Okay. We get all these recorded votes.

Ayes

Dadamo, Mancini, Phillips, Tilson.

The Chair: That's four. Who's opposed? Oh, gee. Well, you know how I'm going to vote even beforehand.

Mr Mancini: No I don't.

The Chair: Who's opposed?

Nays

Haeck, Klopp, Owens, Ward.

The Chair: It's a tie? I'm going to break the tie.

Mr Phillips: I know that, but how?

The Chair: I'm voting opposed.

Mr Mancini: You're voting opposed? Mr Chair, with all due respect, you're breaking tradition. Chairpeople vote to carry motions, not to prevent motions from carrying.

The Chair: Well, I won't be here between 2 and 2:30. This committee is recessed until 2:30.

The committee recessed at 1223.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1433.

CANADIAN PARAPLEGIC
ASSOCIATION ONTARIO

The Chair: Good afternoon. This is the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. This is Bill 164, An Act to amend the Insurance Act and certain other Acts in respect of Automobile Insurance and other Insurance Matters. This is day 3 in the afternoon and we're starting at 2:30 with the Canadian—I'm tongue-tied; I'm sorry. Gentlemen, would you mind introducing yourselves for the purposes of Hansard and the people of Ontario.

Mr David Byers: Yes, thank you, Mr Chairman. My name is David Byers and I'm the executive director of the Canadian Paraplegic Association Ontario, and may I introduce Mr Peter Downs, who is a partner in the law firm of Lerner and Associates and is here as a volunteer. He will be presenting our submission to you, sir.

The Chair: Okay, fine. We have a half-hour. If you could start with your presentation and leave some time at the end for questions from the committee members, you may begin.

Mr Byers: Fine, thank you, Mr Chairman.

Perhaps it would be useful just for me to very briefly outline the services that our organization provides. We are in the rehabilitation service business and the bulk of our staff consists of professionally trained rehabilitation counsellors who typically have degrees in rehabilitation or social work.

We provide counselling services to paraplegics and quadriplegics, everything from financial and housing advice to vocational guidance, and attempt ultimately to find employment for our clients. We have an active case load of around 400, but a total case load of around 1,800 clients. They are typically evenly split between paraplegics and quadriplegics.

Now I turn the submission over to Mr Peter Downs.

Mr Peter Downs: Thank you, David. Before I discuss the views of the Canadian Paraplegic Association Ontario with respect to Bill 164, I'd like to set where the population that is served by the Canadian Paraplegic Association fits into the current system.

As you know, we have what I will term a threshold no-fault system now. The threshold no-fault system actually is a system that probably leaves the population served by the paraplegic association better off than the pre-existing tort system. Paraplegic injured victims would meet the threshold, would be able to sue. In addition to that, they would obviously have the enhanced no-fault benefits under the OMPP.

Bill 164 does not help at all the population served by the CPA. They get nothing from Bill 164 and they lose significantly with respect to Bill 164. The less seriously injured people regain the right to sue for non-economic loss, subject to the $15,000 deductible. The spinal-injured population maintain their right to sue for non-economic loss, pain and suffering. But they're subject to the same $15,000 deductible.

In Canada today, the courts have indicated that the maximum allowed for non-pecuniary general damages, damages for pain and suffering, is approximately $240,000. The limit was set by the Supreme Court of Canada in 1978. Indexed, it's now about $240,000. Under this proposed legislation the amount recoverable would be $225,000. There's a $15,000 deduction of the non-pecuniary general damages for the most seriously injured of our population.

That is not the most serious concern, however, for the CPA. The most serious concern for the CPA is in regard to the aspect of economic loss. Economic loss, broadly speaking, can be divided into two components: the loss of income and what I will term future care costs. The loss of income is of concern to the CPA, as it's a concern, I believe, shared by a number of groups representing a population which I will term the less seriously injured population. The focus of my talk or discussion today won't be on that aspect of it but rather on the other aspect of economic loss, which is the future care cost component.

Specifically, I want to address the issue of attendant care cost. As you are aware, the proposed statutory benefits schedule sets a limit for attendant care costs at $3,000 per month. What that means for the spinal-cord-injured population is that many of them will be institutionalized, because they cannot maintain a life in their own home on their own with attendant care of $3,000 per month. Quadriplegics very often require 24-hour attendant care.

Under the system we have now, the courts have long recognized that. The courts have recognized that the seriously injured, the spinal-cord-injured population, are entitled to be put, as far as money can do so, in the position they had prior to their accident, and that means giving them a quality of life that can best be provided in their own home and not in an institution.

I have attached to my material a schedule—it's at tab 2 of the material—which gives, hopefully, the committee members an indication of the amount the courts are assessing for the costs of future care or attendant care. If you look at appendix II, again at tab 2 of the materials, you will see a section entitled "Future Care Costs (Ongoing)." This is a case I was involved in. It happens to be an individual who suffered an injury resulting in C4-5 complete quadriplegia: no sensation, no movement from the neck down.

The court awarded 24-hour attendant care and assessed the cost of that attendant care at approximately $116,000 per year. Under Bill 164, that individual would receive $36,000 per year. The court determined that $116,000 per year was what was required for this individual to live safely in his own home. Under Bill 164, this individual would have to be confined to an institution because $36,000 a year would not be sufficient to allow him to remain safely in his own home.

The present value of the future care assessed under that case, which was under the tort system, was $3.176 million, whereas the present value of the attendant care provided for under Bill 164—this is for a 24-year life expectancy—would only be $652,000, a significant shortfall.

The point is that $36,000 a year will not provide adequate care for many of the spinal-cord-injured in this province and will require them to be institutionalized. Putting these individuals in an institution does not serve these individuals, obviously, and I understand it certainly wouldn't be in keeping with the goal of the Ontario government to reduce the degree of dependence on institutions.

The other feature of the fact that these individuals will be put in institutions rather than be able to live at home is that many of the other benefits that are provided for notionally under Bill 164, such as rehabilitation, equipment benefits, housing conversions and things like that, will in fact only be notional benefits, because what will happen is that the statutory schedule, we fear, will be interpreted by the insurance companies in such a way that these individuals will not be found to be reasonably requiring these extra benefits because they'll be in institutions. There'll be no need for providing benefits for home conversion, because the person cannot live in his own home because he won't have the required attendant care.

You'll see in appendix 2 where we have indicated the notional benefits under Bill 164 for each of these categories of ongoing care, and then there's a column "Amount Payable." You'll notice, for instance, under the tort system in this case that's presented here that the court assessed annual transportation costs of $4,500. Sure, Bill 164 gives "notionally available" $4,500, but one wonders, if the person is relegated to an institution, whether in fact they will be able to satisfy the insurers and the parties who decide these issues that it's reasonably required, since the person is in an institution.

Similarly with equipment, supplies and medical: Being in an institution, OHIP will cover those expenses and there won't be the necessity to purchase those necessities; vocational rehabilitation, similarly.

We can go on with respect to the other items on page 2 of the appendix. Converting accommodations: Again, notionally these are all available, but practically speaking they won't be paid because the spinal-cord-injured victim will not have the opportunity to safely live on his own with attendant care at a limit of $3,000 per month.

There are many recommendations that are made in this paper, but the most important recommendation that the CPA brings forth in its submissions is the recommendation that the limit of $3,000 per month be increased or the limit not be there. There's no limit on the rehab expenses, I understand, there's no limit on the medical expenses and there should be no limit on the attendant care. If it can be reasonably demonstrated that a person requires $6,000 or $7,000 a month of attendant care, then that person should have the opportunity to have that attendant care so he or she can live in his or her own environment.

The paper addresses other issues. I have alluded to the concerns about the prospect that full economic loss will not be recovered again. That will be addressed by other groups, and those are in my paper, but for the purposes of these submissions orally now I think I want to stress very clearly that the attendant care limit of $3,000 is not just, and in any caring and civilized society, I know of no jurisdiction where they have automobile insurance that provides for this type of limit for the most seriously injured of our population.

This is the point: We are increasing the rights by Bill 164 to the less seriously injured of our population, but we are taking away the rights to compensation for the most seriously injured of our population, and I think that is important to realize.

Those are all the comments I wish to make at this time.

The Chair: Okay, fine. We'll go to questions.

Mr Owens: I'd like to begin by thanking you for your presentation. Your organization represents, as you indicate, some of the most catastrophically injured in the province.

Just around some of your comments with respect to the caps, you did acknowledge that the cap that had been in place under OMPP has been lifted under the $500,000 long-term care. In terms of the $3,000-a-month cap that is currently in place, you're aware that there is a task force that has been announced by the minister to take a look at setting standards of care around attendant care, that currently there are no standards in place for attendant care.

My question to you is, in terms of the ability to sue under the OMPP, if one met the threshold, but the lack of immediacy in benefits, do you not think it's more important for a person to get immediate benefits and start on rehabilitation immediately after an accident or as soon as is physically possible for that individual?

Mr Downs: I think that's true, and that's why the current threshold system, as I stated in my opening remarks, was probably better than the previous tort system for the most seriously injured victims, but Bill 164 is a step backwards for the spinal-cord-injured population. I agree that it's important to provide these immediate benefits, especially to those people who make up our population, but you can do that in the present system, and why put this cap of $3,000 a month, which is contemplated in Bill 164, for attendant care?

Mr Owens: Just for the purposes of clarification, the cap, the $3,000 a month, was put on by the former government. We in fact have set up a task force to review that cap in terms of setting standards of care, which are currently not available within the industry. I think, if you chat with some of the folks from the insurance industry and the advocacy groups, there's agreement that standards of care need to be set in order to deliver the most efficacious care to your clients.

Mr Downs: All I can respond to that is that a judge recently, in this case that is presented here, carefully heard the evidence of both the plaintiff and the defence, who were obviously trying to show that this person could be provided for adequately at less cost, considered all that, and in his very comprehensive judgement of 212 pages, obviously not just on the attendant care issue, came to the conclusion that he required attendant care of approximately $116,000 per year. So there's $116,000 per year and Bill 164 is providing for $36,000 per year, a significant shortfall.

The Chair: Mr Winninger, a short question.

1450

Mr Winninger: It's a pleasure to hear from you again, Peter. We've had dealings in the past.

I think we need a little more empirical evidence on this question of rehabilitation and care. I know you've presented one scenario where the judge awarded $116,000. I would question how many cases fall into that category, what average monthly amount of care is required and how the amount required to care for accident victims varies, depending on whether the care giver at home has employment activities or may be of a suitable age to provide care or wants to provide 24-hour care to a spouse or a family member. Surely there are a lot of variables that impact on the cost per month of a case.

Mr Downs: Mr Byers probably has some information on the numbers of population the CPA serves who are quadriplegic. My experience is that by and large almost all, if not all, quadriplegics require if not 24-hour care then a substantial amount of care during the day. That may not be so with paraplegics.

As far as asking the spouse or the individual who happens to be living with the injured victim to provide care, that issue came up in a case I was involved in. The evidence of psychologists and others was that this changes the role of that individual from a spouse, a son or a daughter to a care giver, and it deteriorates that relationship significantly. They're not meant to be care givers; they're meant to be spouses or sons or daughters, and it's very draining on that individual to provide that care.

Mr Winninger: Perhaps you heard me wrong. I wasn't suggesting it should be forced on individuals, but where they volunteer and really want to do it, as opposed to inviting a stranger into the home to provide care, the cost would be lower.

Mr Downs: I think the number of people who would want to get up at 6 o'clock in the morning, administer a bowel routine to a quadriplegic, carry him into the shower and that type of thing would be few and far between. It's a very onerous task. I think if you asked those people who live with these individuals, they would like to maintain their relationship as any relationship in a family that is all able-bodied, and they can't do that in a situation where they're providing the care.

With respect to the figures, perhaps Mr Byers has some information on the number of quadriplegics versus paraplegics.

Mr Byers: I wouldn't argue. There is a variety of course, but the incidence of marriage breakdown, for example, following these accidents is extraordinarily high. Often in today's society, both partners in the situation live independent lives in terms of business and lifestyle, so our organization prefers not to rely on the family. Attendant care is something that's very, very important and that's the thrust. It's a well-known fact that motor vehicle accidents constitute the largest single denominator for paraplegia and quadriplegia.

Mr Mancini: For the record, let me say I was quite surprised by Mr Winninger's question, where he seemed to intimate that maybe the spouses of the victims should take on the role of government agencies, insurance companies or professional care givers. I've never heard that before from the NDP. That's something new. We hear something new every day here.

We also hear there are some hearings that are going to take place after these hearings that are going to solve all the questions and all the problems people have brought forward. I want to say for the record that we've heard that tune and that song before on other pieces of legislation. That's just a way for the government to slough off the tough questions and bury them under the carpet. I didn't think there was any more room under the carpet. They seem to be able to sweep something underneath that carpet every day, whether or not there's room. It's a pretty lumpy carpet indeed.

Let me say that I am aware of the work done by the Canadian Paraplegic Association and I'm impressed by your organization. I've had the opportunity to work with your organization in the past and have the highest regard for you as an organization, for what you do and how you do it.

I knew this legislation was going to be bad for paraplegics and quadriplegics, but I'm stunned by how bad you think it's going to be for these people.

I've been saying all along in these hearings that the right to sue for economic loss, which is being taken away under Bill 164 by the NDP government, is going to be harmful to most people. We've been trying to give examples during these committee hearings, and the retort from government members and some of the witnesses that we've had is: "That's all abstract. We're talking abstract and these things don't really happen."

You've given us a case that is not abstract. I was wondering, for the record, if you have any other specific cases you could talk about in regard to the loss of benefits that people will receive because of the passage of Bill 164. It is going to pass; they have the majority, they have all the numbers. I'd like some specific cases. If you cannot give us the specific cases today, I would respectfully request that when you have time you send them to the committee in care of the clerk and the Chair so that all the members could have those cases.

I would also like to know, while we're getting to the point of benefits and costs, whether you're aware of the fact that Bill 164 is going to drive up the cost of premiums for everybody, even paraplegics who drive, by a minimum of 4.5%, or almost $200 million a year. That's the government estimate. That's the low side. The high side is 22%, I believe.

We had a group of pretty professional people here today representing the teachers. They told us that they thought it would be somewhere in between, maybe 15%. So we're talking about the possibility of a $400-million to $450-million rate increase because of Bill 164 if we hit the medium range of rate hikes. I was wondering, first of all, if you could accede to my request and if you'd give me your opinions on whether or not Bill 164 is worth that rate hike that you and I and everybody else is going to feel.

Mr Downs: In respect to the first request, the cases, I hesitate to bring up any more cases without speaking to the individuals involved, but I'd be glad to accede to the request to provide more information to the clerk.

Mr Mancini: That's fine.

Mr Downs: With respect to the second issue, even if the premiums were not to increase, the position of the CPA is that this is a very regressive piece of legislation for the most seriously injured of our population. This takes away from them significantly.

I suspect that most of the presentations to this committee have dealt with economic loss in the sense of loss of income, but for the spinal-cord-injured, a bigger factor is economic loss in the sense of care costs. I can't stress enough that this $3,000 a month will put these people in institutions and will deteriorate significantly their quality of life. That's the point. Regardless of what it does to the premiums, this is a significant problem with this piece of legislation for the population we represent.

Mr Harnick: I had an interesting exchange the other day with Mr Endicott, who's the deputy minister who was in charge of really writing this generous piece of legislation. He disappeared from the room after we had our exchange, but the long and short of the exchange was to provide him with an example that if a young person, student age, was rendered a paraplegic, a quadriplegic or brain-damaged, under this piece of legislation at the age of 30 years that individual whose whole future was snuffed out, that innocent victim, would be relegated to earning $391 a week.

I'm accepting Mr Endicott's figure because he had some question about the Advocates' Society figure of $388 a week. When he calculated it for us on the record, it worked out to $391 a week. I think that was where he felt he was being pretty generous. That person is going to make less than $20,000 a year, indexed. "Indexed" means that he keeps up with inflation, but he's still below the poverty line.

What my friends across the way don't seem to understand is that the loss of economic rights, the loss of claiming for your actual economic loss is significant. They don't seem to understand that Ontario would be the unique jurisdiction in North America, the only place that's taken economic rights away so that people can't claim their actual out-of-pocket economic losses.

What's very important to me is to have you explain to my friends across the way how significant it is that a person be able to claim his actual economic loss so that he's not relegated to Mr Endicott's $20,000 a year indexed for the rest of his life.

Mr Downs: In the example I provided, the Mortimer decision, initially I put in the schedule the award for his future loss of income because I think it pointed out the inequity in Bill 164. Then on second thought I decided to leave it out because I wanted to focus on this one aspect of Bill 164, the attendant care, but since you've brought up this issue I'll address this concern in the context of this particular case.

This individual was injured in his second year of college, Fanshawe College in London, and he had one more year to complete to graduate from the course to become a certified general accountant. He would article or have a position in a firm. The judge accepted that he was doing well in school. The judge accepted that he would earn, I believe the first figure was $25,000 the first year, and then by the time he was 30 it would be $37,500, and in 15 years he would be up to $60,000 because this was the evidence.

Here's an individual who had a future income loss that was awarded at the present value of nine hundred and some thousand dollars, and it was accepted that he was going to be earning $37,500 by the time he was 30, and later up to $60,000.

Under Bill 164, of course, he would be relegated to 90% of the average weekly earnings, so obviously there's a real example of someone who would be significantly affected in the other aspect of economic loss, which is the loss of income. This case addresses that particular point.

Mr Harnick: Just to carry that one step further so that my good friends across the way can understand it—I know they don't want to understand it because the minister has told them his bill is the catch-all and everybody is reasonably looked after—when a person is entitled to claim and recover his actual economic loss when he's rendered a quadriplegic or a paraplegic or brain-damaged, what does that ability to have his income actually permit that person to do that he wouldn't otherwise be able to do?

Mr Downs: Obviously, the increased source of income will let them purchase greater amenities for themselves and increase their quality of life. It's all the more important for the more seriously injured of our population to have the greatest resources available to them, because obviously their quality of life is impaired significantly by their disability, and whatever they can obtain in other realms through increased resources will be a benefit to them.

It's particularly distressing for people like Stephen Mortimer or other spinal-cord-injured victims who have, through their efforts, been able to achieve a certain level of income, been innocent victims of an accident and have that taken away from them and not be compensated fully and not be able to purchase those amenities that will help them maintain a better quality of life.

Mr Harnick: Bill 164 essentially relegates that individual—

The Chair: Mr Harnick, I've got to cut you off there.

Mr Harnick: —to a bare subsistence, right?

Mr Downs: True.

Mr Harnick: Thank you.

The Chair: We've run out of time and we'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee.

STATE FARM MUTUAL AUTOMOBILE INSURANCE CO

The Chair: The next group coming forward is State Farm insurance, Mr Harry Brown, I believe, and colleagues. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. Take a seat. We have half an hour. In that half an hour, if you can leave some time at the end, as you can see, the members of the committee are anxious to ask you questions.

Mr Cliff Fraser: We look forward to it.

The Chair: If you don't mind identifying yourself and your colleagues, you may begin.

Mr Fraser: Good afternoon. My name is Cliff Fraser and I'm speaking on behalf of State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Co. In 1970, the Insurance Bureau of Canada set up a no-fault committee which I chaired. I have stayed close to the subject ever since that time and also served as an adviser to Justice Coulter Osborne during the government study on automobile insurance in 1988.

I have with me today Greg Hayward, our actuary responsible for our Canadian automobile business. Mr Hayward is a fellow of the Canadian Institute of Actuaries, and Mr Hayward has been active in Bill 164 consultations with both government and the Insurance Bureau of Canada actuarial committee. Also with me today is Ontario lawyer Harry Brown of the law firm Iacono, Brown.

Rather than read our written submission, which I hope you have, in its entirety, I will instead focus on the highlights of our concerns this afternoon to ensure there's adequate time for any questions the committee may have.

State Farm has been providing Ontario drivers with insurance since 1938. As of today, State Farm insures approximately 524,000 vehicles in Ontario. State Farm has over 300 agents in this province, who are supported by another 1,700 State Farm associates. Quite clearly, State Farm has a huge stake in the continued vitality of the automobile insurance marketplace in Ontario. Bill 164 threatens this vitality. Bill 164 substantially increases the cost of automobile insurance and thus takes a bigger bite out of the consumer's pocketbook.

Ontario automobile insurance consumers were subjected to significant increases in premiums until 1990. The introduction of a strong verbal no-fault threshold for personal injury claims plus a balanced system of first-party benefit payments allows the industry to provide the consumer with an automobile insurance product that is understandable and quick to provide compensation.

Auto insurance consumers in Ontario have clearly benefited from rate reductions and dividends. In fact, State Farm reduced auto insurance rates by an average of 8% in February 1991. This represents an annual saving of $25 million per year. Also, State Farm paid a dividend to its policyholders in December 1991 of $32.5 million. That's actual money we refunded to our customers. From the consumers' perspective, this turnaround in the auto insurance marketplace was from one of substantial rate increases to one where rates could be reduced and dividends paid. It certainly is worth preserving. Polls taken by COMPAS Research found that 76% of customers are satisfied with the current system.

Ontario Bill 164 will reverse the progress made over the last few years and impose new, additional cost burdens upon the consumer. If Ontario Bill 164 becomes law, the price of automobile insurance will go up substantially. Bill 164 would impose a very complex and difficult-to-administer auto insurance system upon the drivers of Ontario.

Everyone, including government, has agreed that Bill 164 would result in an increase in the cost of insurance in Ontario. There is no dispute regarding that fact. Various analyses have suggested different figures for a rate increase resulting from Bill 164, but all interested parties recognize that Bill 164 is more expensive than the current Ontario motorist protection plan. Polls taken by COMPAS Research found that 89% of consumers opposed Bill 164 if it would mean they must pay 15% more.

Exhibit 3 of our brief dramatically demonstrates that Bill 164 will cost more than the current system. It contains four actuarial studies, including the government's own Mercer study. The Mercer study shows Bill 164 increasing personal injury costs by 13.3%. Please note that about 20% of all drivers do not insure their cars for collision coverage, and they will receive the largest percentage increase. I might point out that a lot of those good folks are senior citizens who have paid off their car, they don't drive to work during the rush-hours and things of that nature and they take a chance on collision. Even by the government's own study, those good folks' rates are going to go up 13%.

Exhibit 4 shows the dollar magnitude of the increases for typical State Farm households in various cities in Ontario. They range from a high of $242 in Toronto to a low of $150 per year in Ottawa. There would also be substantial increases in Hamilton, Windsor and other such cities across this province. Surely no consumer-minded government would impose these kinds of increases on the consuming public.

State Farm did retain Coopers and Lybrand to analyse Bill 164. The first study was released by us last October and these were some of the brief conclusions: increased costs and hence premium increases by 20%, or $565 million per year across the province; it would make women and older drivers pay substantially more for automobile insurance due to reclassification of risks that will lead to unfair consumer cross-subsidization; it will eliminate choices for consumers; it will raise operating costs for companies, obviously, and result in employment reductions and possible bankruptcies of insurance organizations; increase access to tort and higher cost settlements, which will unduly increase costs; encourage capital flight as a result; this will send a signal to investors that the governments' freeze-and-squeeze regulatory framework makes Ontario an unattractive place for investment.

State Farm has also commissioned Coopers and Lybrand to do an actuarial analysis of the government Mercer report, and you should also have that exhibit. That analysis, entitled Evaluation of the Impact of The Road Ahead on Rate Levels for Private Passenger Automobiles, has been released to the public today. The Coopers and Lybrand analysis found the assumptions of the government's New York consultants to be seriously flawed. Coopers and Lybrand indicates the increase in personal injury costs to be closer to 33.3% rather than 13.3% and that increase for all coverages will be at least 15%, not the 4.4% Mercer states.

I repeat that for the 20% of drivers who don't carry collision and just carry the people coverage, that's going to increase their insurance rates by a third, according to our calculations, and even by the government's calculations by 13%. You can work out some mathematics and figure that the average premium across the province is around $800.

Mr Hayward, our actuary, will be happy to expand on the actuarial analysis of Bill 164 that we've just given you when I've finished speaking.

Even without going into further actuarial details, however, it should be obvious that doubling and tripling the following benefits will cost the consumers much more: tripling the number of people who can be sued and required to pay for pain and suffering awards; doubling the death and funeral benefits; increasing the wage-loss benefit by 70% so the working poor will subsidize high-income earners; expanding the benefits for students, the unemployed and the self-employed; continually increasing benefits by indexing them to the consumer price index; and, finally, lifting the caps on accident benefits coverage to provide lifetime benefits with no dollar limitation.

Not only will the increased benefits and the increased right to sue cost consumers more, but the government's proposed uniform rate classification system will drive premiums even higher. Under a uniform class plan, good drivers will subsidize bad drivers in a system which has no basis in sound actuarial practice.

Exhibit 5 provides a graphic illustration of the cost increase that will result from the proposed plan. Please note again that seniors, young women and young married couples will be the hardest hit. We estimate that at least 80% of State Farm policyholders across this province will pay more under the proposed system.

Our recommendation is that Bill 164 and the accompanying regulations should not proceed further in the legislative process. It is seriously flawed, primarily due to the increases in cost consumers must pay. Consumers have clearly voiced their satisfaction with the current system where rate reductions have occurred. Consumers have voiced their opposition to paying more for Bill 164.

Our written submission, Mr Chairman, expands on the concerns I've just voiced. Thank you for the opportunity to comment. State Farm wants to preserve an automobile insurance system that allows us to provide the best combination of coverage, service and price. We would be pleased to answer any questions.

The Chair: There was one item I wanted to straighten out. Mr Harnick had mentioned Mr Eric Endicott; he's actually senior legal counsel for the ministry. So we'll go on to Mr Mancini.

Mr Harnick: My humblest apologies.

Mr Mancini: Good. Now that we know Mr Endicott's appropriate title and whatever else he does, we all feel that much better.

I want to ask the officials who have taken time to be with us today whether or not they're aware that they've joined a long list of witnesses who have appeared before this committee. Witness after witness, organization after organization have come forward to tell the government members that Bill 164 will raise rates. I wonder if you're aware that you're not alone in this view.

Mr Fraser: Yes, Mr Mancini, I have been here quite a bit of the time. I've also watched it on the network. We ask ourselves many times who the constituency is, frankly, that this legislation is supposed to appeal to. We find NDP members don't like it. We find lawyers don't like it. We find insurance companies don't like it. We find the paraplegic group that just got off here doesn't like it. We know our policyholders don't like it. I'm not sure who that constituency is.

Mr Mancini: Today we found out something new. Every day on this committee we find out something new from the government members as to what their agenda is, and one of the government members—I believe it was Mr Johnson, if I'm correct—indicated today that there would be no premium rate increases to the consumers. He indicated today that the insurance industry would absorb the cost of Bill 164.

I'd like to know from you whether or not you believe that the industry can absorb the increase in cost because of Bill 164, and whether or not you've been told that by the minister or Mr Owens, the parliamentary assistant, or Mr Endicott, who seems to be the bureaucratic lightning rod for the government, if you've been told in any of your meetings that that is what's going to happen.

Mr Fraser: We have not been specifically told that. The Honourable Brian Charlton has inferred that there could be some kind of rate freeze at some point. Yes, we have made profits in the more recent years. I think it's very good that some industries in this province are profitable, are solid and still in business and not laying people off.

Mr Fraser: There's not many left, and if claims are presented to us, we want to be in a financial position to meet those obligations, and some of those obligations go on for decades. Next to banks, we are possibly the most controlled industry from a financial standpoint by Ottawa and the various provincial jurisdictions. If rates were artificially constrained, it would place hardship on insurance companies where their future obligations may be impaired and policyholders could find insolvencies occurring down the road. You definitely could not use up your surplus, which is there for growth, and with Canada's increased immigration and things like that, folks coming to Ontario, we have to write additional business, and you need a sound financial base to do that.

Mr Mancini: I've been saying to delegations and to members of the committee that the previous regulations, which were 18 pages, was a document that the industry and the brokers and everyone else associated with insurance could live with. I've also been telling everyone that the 68 pages of regulations that have been tabled along with Bill 164 are unintelligible to the average person, to the brokers. We've heard other groups come in who say that they are experts in the field and they cannot understand these regulations.

You've told us today that State Farm Insurance is the biggest insurer of automobiles in Ontario, so I would assume you have quite a bit of experience and a great deal of expertise in understanding regulations and I'd like your opinion on these 68 pages of regulations.

Mr Fraser: Just a correction, Mr Mancini. We are the third-largest auto insurer in Ontario. Frankly, the top three are within a decimal point apart. We are the largest auto insurance company in the world.

The regulations frankly are incredible. I've been in the business 40 years. I've read those regulations and the ones that preceded them, which were some 70-odd pages, late into the evenings. I do not understand them.

But I would like to ask our lawyer, which I am not, who makes a profession of reading that kind of complicated material, to comment on that. Mr Brown.

Mr Harry Brown: I'm in a conflict here. If I say I don't understand it, there won't be any more work available. But I guess the reality is that the new draft regulation, even the user-friendly version we've just seen, the 67-page one, is extremely complicated and lengthy and difficult to understand from anyone's perspective, and I'm talking even from my own legal perspective. The president of the Ontario trial lawyers' association has told me that he thought it read like the Income Tax Act. That was the previous 70-page document, not the 67-page document, but there isn't a dramatic difference. You contrast it with the present regulation, which isn't simple, but it's relatively simple to understand and deal with.

I think you've heard before you the problems of an injured person getting a 67-page document, plus the other portions of the policy when he has an accident, plus the accident benefits forms, and he's told, "Here, go make your claim." The problem is, the first thing you're going to do is say, "My goodness, I'd better get a lawyer." You're going to increase transaction costs on the injured consumer side to help walk them through this myriad. Then you're going to have the insurance adjuster saying, "I'm not sure where I should place this person." They could be at once a care giver, they could be working part-time, they could be going to school in a certain way. Where do they fit in? Which election do they make? Do they do a lump sum? Do they go through the three- and eight-year mandatory reassessment process? The adjuster gets legal counsel, and what you have is increasing transaction costs built up in the system, plus the frustrations.

That has to be understood in the context of what you're doing. If you're going to deal with the administrative efficiencies of amending this process, the better thing to do, in my respectful view, is to consider amending Bill 68 to provide for any new benefit coverage you think is appropriate, the reason being that you have this very complicated statutory accident benefits schedule to deal with in the context now of three different regimes of automobile insurance. You've got the tort plan, which is still having runoff of cases—and I've a 12-person law firm doing nothing but insurance, by the way, so we know this.

Mr Brad Ward (Brantford): Still going through the courts?

Mr Harry Brown: Still going. We have maybe 1,000 files in our office. The old tort system, including some of the old no-fault benefit cases, are still running off.

Mr Ward: They never get paid right away.

Mr Harry Brown: I didn't say it was a good system.

The Chair: I'm sorry. Talk to the Chair, please.

Mr Harry Brown: I'm sorry, sir. I'm just getting questions from your own members.

You have the OMPP system, then you have a totally new system, the Bill 164 system. So you have the problems of dealing with the very complicated document in the context of three systems, with the inevitable overlapping of claims. The result is going to be that you're going to have a very heavy transaction cost to the insured person, the consumer, who pays out of his or her own pocket to the insurance company, which simply pays it and seeks a rate increase to pay for it. So on the basis of an efficient system, which is defined as being the least transaction-oriented system, the least costly transaction-oriented, this is an administrative nightmare.

The Chair: Mr Harnick. Both of you should understand the questions and the answers then.

Mr Harnick: I never understand Harry.

Mr Fraser, I think one of the problems is that we have a government that's amending something, I think more for the sake of saying, "It's ours as opposed to theirs." It seems to me that, as people have indicated, this is going to be a nightmare for lawyers to deal with. It's going to be a nightmare for insurers to deal with. It's going to be absolutely deadly for consumers to deal with.

We also know that the costs, based on your studies and even based on the Mercer studies, are going up somewhere realistically between 20% and 30%. We see at the same time that the costs are going up, situations where in fatal accidents people aren't going to be properly provided for, and I'm sure you'd be the first to acknowledge that Bill 164 is downright miserly when it comes to looking after dependants, probably paying a fraction of what the OMPP would pay in a fatal accident.

We also saw that a student who would be rendered unable to work as a result of an accident would be living on the poverty line for the rest of his life, based on what Bill 164 would provide. Yet the major criticism of the OMPP was the high threshold and it's been suggested that we include psychological injury specifically as well.

What I want to know very briefly is, if the OMPP were amended to lower the threshold so the injury didn't have to be permanently serious, but only permanent or serious, would you agree with me that the increase in premium cost would be about 10.5%?

Mr Fraser: I'll ask Mr Hayward, our actuary, but first I want to speak in general terms as an insurance person. When the FAIR group was here, Professor Carr, I believe the name was, made the statement that the insurance industry supports pure no-fault, which would be the Quebec program. Forget the fact that it's run by government.

Now that is absolutely incorrect. The insurance industry supports a threshold no-fault system. State Farm particularly supports a threshold program where those catastrophic injuries—those people have traditional access to tort for economic loss and pain and suffering, where it has the compassion and the individualization of the judicial system to personalize the judgements. All we're talking about is where you draw that line and that's what you're coming to. I'd like Mr Hayward to—

1530

Mr Harnick: I don't want you to think that I'm setting you up here. I don't want to jump in and say, "Ah, you're wrong, I've got other information." The insurance bureau has indicated that it would cost about 10.5% more to provide coverage for psychological injuries on a lower-threshold basis. It seems to me that's about a third or a half—

The Chair: Mr Harnick, don't you want an answer?

Mr Harnick: Just let me finish the question.

The Chair: I don't hear a question.

Mr Harnick: That's about a third or a half of what the government's costs are going to be under Bill 164 to consumers, and we're going to get so much more.

The Chair: If I don't hear a question, I'll go on to the next.

Mr Harnick: Can you respond to that?

Mr Greg Hayward: Yes, I believe your statement is consistent. I have been heavily involved with the actuarial committee of the Insurance Bureau of Canada and I believe that is consistent. Basically, dropping the requirement that the injury be physical in nature is the key phrase that's in the threshold today, and I have—yes, you've handed me the analysis. So I think that is consistent.

Mr Harnick: It just seems to me that by doing that, the costs are going to go up by 10% versus 20% or 30% under Bill 164.

The Chair: Mr Harnick, I'm sorry. Mr Owens.

Mr Owens: Thank you, Chair.

Mr Harnick: Right, Cliff?

Mr Fraser: You just said it.

Mr Harnick: Thank you.

Mr Fraser: We agree.

Mr Owens: My first question is to Mr Hayward on the report that was presented today. When the analysis, this report, was prepared, did you or your committee go back to the original data and do an actuarial analysis, or did you look at the Mercer report and simply, as actuaries, do a report on an actuarial report?

Mr Hayward: We've been doing both. This legislation's been around for about 13 months now and—

Mr Owens: But in terms of this document.

Mr Hayward: Yes, I'd be happy to address that. In terms of this document, what we asked Coopers and Lybrand to do was to try to reconcile the differences between the numbers that we were coming up with and the numbers that Mercer was coming up with. With all due respect to Mercer, we came to the conclusion, and asked Coopers and Lybrand to study this independently, that there are some inappropriate assumptions in there.

For example, the road safety plan that is included in the Mercer study: They've assumed that the intended road safety programs—I say "intended"—will impact Bill 164 only and will not impact the current system, the OMPP. Any road safety programs would affect either system, not just Bill 164. That has an effect. It tends to underestimate the cost.

Also, another item: The use of Quebec data is very questionable, whether those should be used in any actuarial costing in Ontario. Clearly, Quebec is a different system, a different environment than Ontario. Mr Khury, in his statements to the committee, tended to downplay that by saying it only had a 2% impact in the overall cost, but that 2% amounts to about $70 million in increased premiums for Ontario consumers, so that's an important fact.

Further, Mercer assumed a July 1, 1992, effective date. We're now sitting here in January 1993. That assumption cannot be correct. That underestimates the trends, it underestimates the indexation clauses that are in Bill 164 and further underestimates the costs.

Lastly, one further item on what are the differences between Mercer and the other actuarial studies, and Mr Khury alluded to this when he was talking about the economic loss benefits. The Mercer study concludes that the economic loss benefits under Bill 164 will be less than the economic loss benefits that are under the current package. A doubling of benefits under the 67-page accident benefit schedule: they come to the conclusion that all of those increased economic losses will in fact be less than what is in the current system.

Mr Owens: In terms of your comments around the regulation, the Liberals contend that their 18 pages covered all victims, when in fact they substantially left out a large proportion. We talk about insurance programs having gaps; we're not talking about the kinds of gaps you can drive a truck through backwards in terms of those that don't quite meet the test of either being dead or permanently and seriously disabled.

I'd like to direct my next question to Mr Fraser. I'm pleased that you're profitable; $70 million, I believe, was the figure that you reported in a press conference. Is that correct?

Mr Fraser: I can comment on that. Our books aren't closed yet. Obviously, it's still January. They allow individuals till the end of April, and it takes a corporation a little bit of time. That would be investment income, between $70 million and $80 million for Canada. I cannot isolate investment income by province; it's spread all over the place. But that's not necessarily profit, because half of that goes in income tax.

Mr Owens: How do you reconcile the differences in position between yourself, as State Farm, and the Insurance Bureau of Canada, where the IBC has indicated that it has some difficulties with the legislation but is willing to sit down and is involved in the task force? How do you reconcile those differences? How can you be so far apart from the organization that represents insurance companies?

Mr Fraser: We are not far apart. I think you took a few liberties in indicating that they have a fairly soft position. I am a director of the Insurance Bureau of Canada, I have been a member of the steering committee and I've worked with government in every meeting, so I've been very much involved.

By nature, trade organizations from time to time take more of a generic kind of a position because they represent 150 different insurers, but the Insurance Bureau of Canada is dead set against this legislation. Their preferred position would be that it be withdrawn. If it cannot be withdrawn, naturally we want to work with government to try to improve it, and that's State Farm's position also.

The Chair: Okay, fine. Time has run out.

Mrs Caplan: I'd like to move that the parliamentary assistant, Mr Owens, have five more minutes to continue his line of questioning.

The Chair: Sorry, I'm going to overrule that because we're behind already.

Mrs Caplan: That's a motion.

The Chair: Okay. Unanimous consent? No? See, they understand the Chair.

Mr Phillips: Mr Chair, there may be an omission that I wonder if they could clear up for us, and that's on page 16 of this document. It indicates here that seniors over 65 years of age, many of whom live on fixed incomes, could face a 24% increase in their rates. Could that be the case, Greg? It's almost unbelievable.

The Chair: They'll be able to explain it to you out in the hallway, Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: So it is true? Okay.

The Chair: I'm sorry, time is up, and I know the chamber of commerce is just waiting. I see a good friend of mine, Don Eastman, sitting back there, so thank you.

Just before I go on to that, I have to have unanimous consent that Cam Jackson is substituting for David Tilson, who's gone home sick.

Mrs Caplan: You need unanimous consent?

The Chair: Agreed? Okay. Cam, welcome to the committee.

ONTARIO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The Chair: I'd like to welcome the Ontario Chamber of Commerce, Mr Don Eastman, vice-president, and Ms Linda Matthews, past president. Welcome to the committee. We have one half-hour. In that one half-hour, if you can leave some time at the end of your brief, as you can see, the members are anxious to ask questions. They'd love to ask questions for an hour here. Go ahead, please.

Mr Don Eastman: The Ontario Chamber of Commerce represents 65,000 businesses across the province. We're an association of 172 local chambers of commerce and boards of trade and we represent every type of business in the province from small, family-owned establishments to large international corporations. Our membership represents a majority of the private sector jobs in the province.

We're here to comment on this bill partly on behalf of our insurance industry members, but primarily on behalf of our other members who will be affected by this legislation. They'll be affected both in terms of direct insurance costs and in terms of how this bill affects the overall business climate in Ontario.

The Ontario chamber believes that there are issues surrounding this legislation that go beyond the effects they have on the insurance industry. We are eager to see that everyone's needs—business at large, the insurance industry, the public and accident victims—are properly considered and addressed. All of us want low-cost auto insurance that provides fair and prompt compensation to accident victims without having adverse outside impacts. Bill 164, as drafted, raises some disturbing questions for us.

A substantial portion of the total traffic and highway usage in the province relates directly to business activities. If transportation costs are increased through higher insurance fees, these will simply add to the cost burden that is already costing this province jobs.

The Ontario chamber agrees that changes to the Ontario motorist protection plan are warranted. The government should endeavour, in cooperation with the industry, to ensure that victims of auto accidents are treated with fairness and dignity, balanced with cost and affordability. However, we believe that Bill 164 does not achieve this.

We note with concern that a recent study estimated that the expanded benefits package proposed in Bill 164, along with increased administrative costs for the insurance industry, could drive premiums up for Ontario drivers by an average of 20%. We've heard numbers that start at 5% and most of them seem to escalate quickly to the 20% range. We believe, both as businesspersons and as private buyers of insurance, that such increases would be unacceptable.

The current system of auto insurance in Ontario seems to be working relatively well, with premiums having stabilized and claims being settled more quickly and efficiently. We're concerned that Bill 164 appears to take us away from that progress.

We feel that this legislation suffers from being pushed ahead, perhaps because of political considerations rather than any demonstrated economic need. It's imperative that the government allow careful study and time to judge the current system. It would greatly assure our members if the government could clearly show that our auto insurance costs are not at risk of skyrocketing due to Bill 164. We have not been reassured during these public hearings.

One component of the cost issue is the legislation's complexity. Legislation that is excessively complex may provide a comfortable haven for lawyers and bureaucrats, but for the rest of us it represents a substantial cost burden: wasted money when there is already too little for doing things of value. We understand that this complexity could translate into the need for perhaps an additional 100 civil servants and $5 million in additional annual administrative costs if implemented. None of us can afford legislated inefficiency.

Beyond our obvious concerns about the impact of the proposed legislation on the costs of auto insurance, we're also troubled by the signals that Bill 164 is sending the business community as a whole regarding this government's understanding of the province's business environment. We're in an era that requires governments to understand that they're part of a global economy. It doesn't take much of a look around the world to understand that governments that attempt to hide behind walls of protectionism and regulatory barriers are soon left behind.

Despite recent amendments to the withdrawal provisions of the bill, the bill that is in front of you still devotes much effort to restricting the ability of insurers to leave the marketplace. The concern is, is the government so concerned that Bill 164 may drive insurers out of the marketplace that it needs to restrict the right of insurers to make a purely economic decision?

This type of action does nothing to boost investor confidence in Ontario. It sends a strong message to investors and trading partners that there is a risk that the Ontario government will not allow them to control their own business affairs and make their own decisions, and that if an investor does choose to invest in Ontario, it faces a risk of having its investment held virtually hostage. It's important to learn from the experience of others. Both Massachusetts and New Jersey passed similar types of provisions on withdrawal. It's resulted in insurers leaving those states anyway, triggering costly legal battles. There are better ways to spend taxpayers' money.

The Ontario chamber is also concerned that Bill 164 would give the Ontario cabinet the regulatory power to initiate changes to the insurance class plan and rating methods. It's part of a disturbing trend we've seen in government to cut off public and parliamentary debate in areas of public concern.

In the case of auto insurance, we feel that the government needs to ensure the involvement of all concerned parties when making important decisions regarding changes to such items as the risk classification system. There's no question of the need for a regulatory path, but it needs to supplement the public policy arena, not supersede it.

Auto insurance is a complex and technical product. We're concerned that empowering the cabinet to make decisions on auto insurance will mean that auto insurance will turn into a political football. It's our opinion that regulatory powers should rest with the experts at the Ontario Insurance Commission, making full use of the technical knowledge base of the insurance industry.

The Ontario chamber urges the committee to look at Bill 164 in a broader context. We are very supportive of establishing a road safety agency, as proposed in Bill 39, that would concentrate on convincing motorists that driving in a dangerous manner is not socially acceptable. The best solution for our auto insurance problem is to reduce the number of accidents, reduce the number of victims. We need to use innovative social instruments to change attitudes regarding dangerous driving as a means of achieving low premiums on auto insurance and improving the capability of the system to respond to the needs of victims.

Establishment of a road safety agency could reduce the number and severity of auto accidents and lead to a decrease in insurance costs. We would like to offer the support of the Ontario Chamber of Commerce and our network of community chambers of commerce and boards of trade across Ontario to ensure that this initiative bears fruit.

In conclusion, we feel that Bill 164 does not address the fundamental need for reform to the Ontario motorist protection plan and it does pose an unreasonable risk of increased auto insurance costs to both our members as consumers and the insurance industry in Ontario.

The government should consider initiating such road safety measures as the graduated licensing system and stricter enforcement and penalties for drivers convicted of dangerous driving. It should work with the insurance industry to identify weaknesses in the present system and initiate improvements, without higher costs to Ontario's auto insurance consumers.

Thank you for this opportunity.

Mr Harnick: Seeing as you're a chamber of commerce and, I gather, represent a lot of small businesses in Ontario, I wonder whether you're aware of the fact that if a small business person is involved in an accident, he cannot claim his actual economic loss beyond what the prescribed benefits are going to pay him.

If his business shows that he's drawing very little income out of it, he gets a benefit based on whatever income he's drawing out, or a percentage of whatever income he's drawing out, and in the meantime, as he sits at home trying to recuperate and is starving, the business goes bankrupt. It's a business that you might be able to prove, based on accounting numbers, was growing and it was very close to the point where it was going to be prospering, so that the individual's income might be two, three, four, even five times what it was at the time of the accident, but all that person can get are those prescribed benefits.

What's your position in so far as the right of individuals to claim for their actual economic loss, beyond what the accident benefits pay, is concerned?

Ms Linda Matthews: Certainly, Mr Harnick, that's one of the areas where our members are concerned and one of the areas where the current OMPP product is lagging. It would be one of those areas that we believe could be improved under the current OMPP so that some additional consideration could be made for the cost of running that business while the self-employed person is disabled. There may be an opportunity or a need to charge that businessperson an additional premium for that coverage, but it's an area that could be addressed under OMPP.

Mr Harnick: You see, as this proposed bill reads, it will be against the law for anyone to claim for his actual economic loss. Even if the insurers wanted to offer additional coverage, they couldn't do that unless the bill was amended so that we could then go out and buy income protection—

Ms Matthews: That's right.

Mr Harnick: —which I suspect would be something the insurers might want to sell; it's another product. Those of us who want to protect our income would at least have the opportunity to do it. Is that something that you, as a chamber of commerce, would think would be to the benefit of all income earners who want the opportunity to protect their income?

Ms Matthews: It is definitely of concern to our members and something we feel is not provided under Bill 164.

Mr Cameron Jackson (Burlington South): Just a quick question: In your survey of all your member chambers in Ontario, in the process of formulating all your input, did you have any individual chambers come forward to indicate support for Bill 164?

Mr Eastman: We did not.

Ms Matthews: Not that I'm aware of, no.

Mr Jackson: Was there any element of the bill where there was a consensus of support on a provision of the bill?

Ms Matthews: Not that I'm aware of. We were sitting listening to some of the previous presenters as well, Mr Jackson. From our understanding, certainly our members are not happy with this piece of legislation. We've heard others say that their membership is not happy with it either.

Mr Jackson: One final question has to do with your referencing of the hijacking the transfer of capital and the movement of capital for any enterprise in our jurisdiction. Do you think this might be the beginning of activities that could include, for example, restrictions on the movement of your RRSP moneys and other pension benefits to other provinces and so on? Is that part of your concern? Can it lead to a whole series of non-portabilities of your equity?

Mr Eastman: If I can comment, there's an issue of principle here in terms of just what can be done and is appropriate to be done. Once the principle is breached, as this bill breaches it, it raises a real concern of, when is the next breach going to take place? What will happen next? What is the level of comfort you can be assured of?

Mr Klopp: Good afternoon. It's a pleasure to be here. I appreciate your comments.

On page 4, you made reference to provisions of the bill to hold up companies if they wish to get out of the insurance business in Ontario, or even out of an area. I don't know if you're aware of the amendments to the act that are taking place. In fact, the commission is only asking—and I think it's only fair—that a company wishing to get out give 180 days' notice. Further to that, when the commission reads it over it may ask for a further 90 days' delay, just for the people of Ontario, and especially for the people of insurance companies, but indeed not stopping them from leaving. I don't know if you're aware of that amendment.

Ms Matthews: We were aware that there had been amendments made, Mr Klopp, but there's still the philosophical issue of the rights of a business to make decisions based on economic factors and the interference in that process. There are still, I believe, penalties and fines. No? Then my information isn't right.

Mr Klopp: That comes, I think, from what you've talked about earlier, that this government is indeed consulting with the business community in this particular area plus in so many others. But also there are the people they do serve; ie, if I have insurance with a company I think it's in my right and I'm glad there's a provision that at least they give notice, to the public good of 180 days, at least, to know that I may or may not have insurance. They're going to leave, of course. So I just wanted to make that clarification on that.

Further, you made some comments earlier in the first part here. The chamber agrees that there should be changes to the motorist protection plan. I have chamber of commerce people I'm aware of, and like so many others, they're still individual people. A lot of us have insurance or lots of things that we buy and then we find out when we hit somebody—that's when we read the fine print. You made the statement that there should be changes made. Could you expand on where those changes should be?

Ms Matthews: We addressed one area of concern of our members earlier, and that's with respect to the small business persons and the ability to recover the cost of running their business as an ongoing entity even though they may be involved in an auto accident.

Mr Klopp: Which they can't in this.

Ms Matthews: I think certainly too that the OMPP itself could be improved with the indexation of benefits as an area that is addressed. But when you get into the area of things like unlimited liability by removing the caps on rehabilitation and home care and issues like that, you get into very expensive provisions under Bill 164 that are the very reasons that we are therefore concerned about the increase in the cost of that product. It seems to me that unlimited liability is not available in other types of accidents and provisions, and that it seems to be an area that would cause the product to almost be unpriceable because you no longer have control of what your potential costs may be.

Mr Klopp: That's a concern that we've been carrying through, even in our whole process of changing this. Groups have come in here already and said we haven't gone far enough. When we've had clients who have said, "You should even have more coverage for us," we've been trying to strike a balance.

Ms Matthews: Sure.

Mr Klopp: In dealing with groups that are in the business they said that yes, you can have everything, but it's going to cost X amount of dollars over here. Being in a business like myself, maybe if I can go back to my own business, I want the best tractor. I have to work—

Ms Matthews: Affordability.

Mr Klopp: —out what I need but I still need a tractor.

Ms Matthews: That's right.

Mr Klopp: I think that's where this balance has been working and it's an ongoing process. I appreciate your comments. Thank you.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate very much the chamber's perspective. I think you have your finger on the pulse of the economy, perhaps as well as anybody.

Everything I've heard so far on this bill—I think we can now feel fairly confident that it's going to cost the people in Ontario $500 million. That's what it's going to take out of the pockets of the people in Ontario.

We hear right now that the government cannot afford, and understandably, to give the schools any money—zero money. The schools will get no grants. The hospitals will get nothing. But for every single individual who drives a car in this province, rates are going to up dramatically. It is perhaps, in my opinion, one of the most regressive taxes because no matter what you earn, your rates are going to go up. It's going to take out of the pockets of the people of Ontario $500 million.

I don't think the NDP has any idea. It's sort of like this is all just coming out of nowhere. They don't understand that the people of Ontario are going to have to take out of their pockets—we saw today that the seniors living on fixed incomes, the people who phone my office and say, "We've had enough," their rates are going to go up 24%.

What I'm leading up to with the chamber is, what sort of environment are we facing out there right now and how much should we worry about taking $500 million out of the hands of the consuming public and the taxpaying public?

Ms Matthews: It's certainly a major concern with respect to an economic recovery in this province. It's money that certainly could be better spent on consumer goods and products and in other areas, so it's a concern on a dollars-and-cents basis. It's also a concern, as we mentioned in our brief, on a philosophical basis as to what it does to business confidence, consumer confidence given the fact that costs go up and up and yet they are faced with no job or frozen wages or fixed incomes or whatever. It's certainly a concern to confidence.

Mrs Caplan: My constituents in Oriole are concerned that this piece of legislation is going to cost them more and it's not going to mean that they're going to get anything, really, for that money. Many of them are worried about their jobs tomorrow, the uncertainty that you've spoken about.

What we've heard you say is that the present plan seems to be working well—that's what you said in your brief—and that your advice to the government would be to study that for a while. Do you think this bill should be withdrawn and nothing should happen, or that this bill should try to be amended? What do you think would be in the interest of my constituents in Oriole who are worried about having to pay more for auto insurance? There are a lot of seniors, a lot of working-class people who have to drive a car.

Mr Eastman: In our opinion, the best option would be to withdraw the bill and consider the appropriate changes to the Ontario motorist protection plan.

Mr Mancini: Good.

The Chair: One minute left.

Mr Mancini: I have a question. I'm quite concerned about the attitude the government members have towards profits. We are in the middle of a three- or four-year recession, the longest and the worst since the Great Depression. Any time anyone mentions the word "profits," we get interjections and cackling from the government members, as if they don't need companies to make profits so they can be taxed so they can help pay down their deficit. I was wondering, in your dealings with the government ministers and other senior officials in the government, do you still find that they are abrasive towards the attitude of private corporations making some profits in this province?

Mrs Caplan: They sort of think "profit" is a four-letter word, we think.

Mr Klopp: What it has to do with this bill I'll never know.

Mr Mancini: It has everything to do with it, because Mr Johnson was here yesterday, cackling about profits.

Mr Phillips: What has it to do with profits? You say that you're going to take another $500 million—

Interjections.

The Chair: Don, talk to the Chair. I'm shutting their mikes off on either side.

Mr Eastman: I think profit is a tremendously important concept.

Mr Klopp: So does our government. We agree with that, too.

Mr Mancini: Oh, go on. How come you're all laughing and cackling about it?

Mr Eastman: The profit concept is what really makes the difference between what permits our economy to work and the Soviet Union's experience of not working. How that fits with each of the individual members' understanding of the role of profits I would sooner not comment on.

The Chair: Okay, I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee. I think you've added a little bit of extra information that we didn't have before. Thank you.

Mr Eastman: Thank you.

ASSOCIATED CANADIAN CAR RENTAL OPERATORS

The Chair: The next group we've got coming forward is the Associated Canadian Car Rental Operators. Do you have any associates with you? Okay, fine. Would you mind identifying yourself for the purposes of Hansard and the people of Ontario.

Mr Sid Kenmir: My name is Sid Kenmir. I am the executive director of the Associated Canadian Car Rental Operators. Thank you for the opportunity to appear before the committee.

The Associated Canadian Car Rental Operators is the major industry association for car and truck rental operators. I speak on behalf of 65 daily rental companies in Ontario. Our members include both the largest and the smallest car and truck rental companies in Ontario.

The car and truck rental industry in Ontario currently employs about 7,000 people. It is one of the major purchasers of automobiles and trucks, buying and insuring approximately 50,000 vehicles annually. Our customers are tourists, travelling business people, Ontario residents who require replacement cars after accidents and/or while their cars are being repaired, and those who do not own cars but require one on an occasional basis for weekends and holidays.

Our industry supported Bill 68, known as the Ontario motorist protection plan, OMPP, during its legislative passage. We continue to support OMPP for several reasons, not the least of which is the new stability in automobile insurance premiums. As you recall, prior to its introduction, rates had been rising in response to dramatic increases in claims costs. OMPP was designed to control rising costs in order to cap rising premiums, while at the same time provide a fair level of benefits to those unfortunate individuals who were injured in accidents.

Our experience over the last 30 months suggests that OMPP represents a fair and reasonable tradeoff between premiums and benefit levels. And why not, after the extensive work which preceded its design? In addition to stabilizing premiums, we have observed the insurance industry develop a new service-oriented attitude in place of its adversarial attitude prior to OMPP. We have seen our claims handled in a much quicker and more efficient manner. Many of our firms have received premium reductions under OMPP; in turn, these savings have been passed on to our customers.

We are here today because the car and truck rental industry in Ontario believes that Bill 164 is a solution in search of a problem.

Our industry opposes Bill 164. We ask that the bill be withdrawn so that there can be opportunity for further review and consideration. I would like to take the next few minutes to make what I hope you will perceive to be a compelling case against this ill-conceived piece of legislation.

Let me say first that I recognize the challenges that this government faces. The challenges are many and they include unemployment, increasing taxes, rising provincial debt, technological change, global competition and enormous pressures on our social welfare and health care systems. Against this backdrop, I must state that surely this government must focus on what matters, which the Premier has said is the economy. I fail to see how the passage of Bill 164 will help the Premier, whom I have enormous respect for, achieve his goal of economic recovery for this province.

Voters understand that this is the first time the NDP has had the opportunity to govern and that it is through sheer misfortune that this opportunity presented itself at a time when Ontario faces so many formidable challenges. Voters will measure the performance of the government by its ability to help Ontario achieve economic recovery. Therefore, this government must focus on legislation and policy which will help Ontario achieve economic recovery and not be sidetracked by legislation designed to appease caucus members who believe that something must be done on auto insurance, whatever that something may be.

Not only will Bill 164 not encourage economic recovery, it will actually discourage economic recovery. It will do this because claims costs will rise significantly, which means premium increases. Our industry calculates that insurance costs will increase well in excess of the $200 per year cited by the industry, for two reasons. First, we believe significantly more than 18% of claimants will be able to sue for non-economic loss after application of the proposed deductible. Second, we believe the $15,000 will have an inflationary impact on awards, driving awards higher than they should be.

I would like to elaborate on how Bill 164 will discourage economic recovery. Increased premiums will mean that car and truck rentals will increase in price. This reflects the fact that car insurance is the biggest operating expense after the purchase of vehicles on our income statements. Since demand for car rentals is somewhat elastic, the price increase means there will be less demand and it is likely that some of our smaller operators will be put out of business. One of the reasons our industry was able to return prices to 1980s levels was the introduction of stable insurance premiums brought about by the Ontario motorist protection plan.

Not only will car rentals not be as affordable for Ontario consumers, they will also be less affordable for tourists who visit Ontario and rent cars. At a time when it is already acknowledged by tourism industry officials that Ontario is an expensive destination for American tourists, it does not make sense that public policy will add even more costs on the backs of tourists who vote, if you like, with their feet by not coming back to Ontario.

We applaud the government's decision to appoint a task force on rehabilitation and long-term care benefits for people injured in automobile accidents. This represents a first step towards what the industry hopes will be a decision to introduce enhancements to the current system in order to arrive at an even better balance between affordability, fairness and benefits.

We also hope that if the government has the political courage to embark on this route, it will return to the House with a bill that addresses the root of the problem: accident frequency and severity. Like others who have appeared before this committee, the car and truck rental industry is extremely disappointed by the bill's lack of road safety measures.

Although I am not a public policy expert, it baffles me that this government wants to proceed with comprehensive reform of the system without these measures. Surely Ontario can play a leadership role in the field of road safety by putting together a group of experts in this area to develop measures and incorporate them into a bill that will truly represent positive change of the auto insurance system.

In conclusion, the car and truck rental industry acknowledges that no system, including OMPP, is perfect. The current system can be improved with changes on a smaller scale than those proposed in Bill 164, changes that make better sense for our industry and for drivers and will keep insurance at an affordable price. Like others who have appeared before this committee, we ask that the government withdraw the bill and allow time for further review.

I appreciate the opportunity to appear before this committee and thank you for your consideration.

Mr Ward: Thank you for coming out this afternoon to give your fine presentation on behalf of the Associated Canadian Car Rental Operators.

I notice you have some concerns about Bill 164. I think you understand that as a government, after our election, we had serious concerns with the existing auto insurance plan. We felt it was inadequate for a number of reasons and it needed change. When we made the decision not to proceed with public auto insurance, we developed Bill 164, which we have before us today. With Bill 164, we tried to strike a balance between expanded and enhanced benefits for many innocent motor vehicle accident victims while still being concerned about the cost to the driving public through premiums.

If you can try to divest yourself of the cost aspect—and I know you can't; you have to realize that every benefit you increase is a cost to it—just say you could for a moment and just look at the benefits we've improved through Bill 164. Setting the cost aside, could you support those benefits that we've increased?

Mr Kenmir: No, a lot of those benefits I can't support. The $15,000 deductible from $600 to $1,000 a week, I just can't support all that stuff.

Mr Ward: Setting the cost aside, you couldn't support and your members couldn't support increasing the benefit from $600 to $1,000?

Mr Kenmir: I don't think so.

Mr Ward: Why not?

Mr Kenmir: They have said at meetings—I'm not an insurance expert myself, I'm a car rental person—that they don't want changes, and I'm here on behalf of them rather than drag 65 people in here today.

Mr Ward: You don't support any of those benefits?

Mr Kenmir: No.

Mr Ward: Not one, your organization, the Associated Canadian Car Rental Operators?

Mr Kenmir: The Ontario car and truck rental operators would like to leave everything just the way it is right now.

Mr Ward: So I understand. We set aside the cost aspect.

Mr Phillips: That, and you weren't in the real world.

Mr Ward: If we set aside the cost aspect.

Mr Harnick: Sort of like the government does every day.

Mr Ward: Mr Chair, we've got some interjections from the opposition across the way there.

The Chair: Address the Chair.

Mr Harnick: Do what the government does every day.

Mrs Caplan: Mr Ward knows you can't set aside the cost.

Mr Ward: Mr Chair, I believe it's my turn to question the witness.

The Chair: It is. I don't hear anybody on the other side.

Mr Ward: Why would the Associated Canadian Car Rental Operators want to leave the exemption for, say, head injury people? Why would they want to leave that out of the OMPP?

Mr Harnick: What exemption for a head injury? There's no exemption for a head injury person.

Mr Ward: Why would they not want to enhance the benefits to include them?

Mr Kenmir: I think that—

Mrs Caplan: They're worse off under your legislation.

Mr Harnick: They can't claim for their economic loss.

The Chair: I'm sorry. Mr Harnick, I don't think you want anybody—

Mr Harnick: On a point of order, Mr Chairman.

The Chair: What's your problem, Mr Harnick, or your point of order?

Mr Harnick: The question dealt with an exemption for head injury people under the Ontario motorist protection plan, I've got to tell you, Mr Chairman, there is no exemption for head injury people. There is a deletion or an elimination of those claiming for psychiatric loss under OMPP, which is a glaring mistake within the Ontario motorist protection plan, but when the witness is asked a question—

The Chair: I don't believe it's a point of order. I can't answer that and I think when it comes to your turn, you can use your nickel at that point to ask those questions or clarification.

Mr Harnick: I don't have a nickel.

The Chair: Well, your five minutes. Mr Ward, carry on, please.

Mr Ward: Thank you, Mr Chair. Why would the Associated Canadian Car Rental Operators be opposed to indexing some of the benefits?

Mr Kenmir: Most of the car rental companies deal very closely with their insurance carriers. Our premiums are always based on dollars in, dollars out.

Mr Ward: We set aside the cost, though.

Mr Kenmir: If Bill 164 makes one change, if we take that $600 a week up to $650, our premiums would go up a certain amount, and we don't want that.

Mr Ward: If I may, do I have—

The Chair: You've got time for another question.

Mr Ward: One more question.

The Chair: Yes, you've got two minutes left.

Mr Ward: What I was trying to get at, through the interjections of the opposition—which I don't do to them when they ask their questions, Mr Chair—is that we think that these enhanced benefits can be brought into operation through Bill 164 without undue pressure on increasing the premiums.

Mr Kenmir: We don't agree with that.

Mr Ward: If we can accomplish that, would you still be opposed to increasing the benefits and enhancing the benefit package for innocent accident victims in the province of Ontario?

Mr Kenmir: If this bill went through with no premium increase, the insurance companies would go right out of business and move out of the province and you could have what you wanted to start in the first place. That's all you could have. It just can't be done.

1620

Mr Ward: You don't think so?

Mr Kenmir: No.

Mr Phillips: I think we have our solution now, thanks to Mr Ward and others, and that is that the premise of this bill put forward by the government is that it will not increase premiums. If it were to increase premiums, I'm gathering now the government would withdraw the bill, because the whole assumption from the government is that premiums will not increase. I think now all we need to do is determine that, and if we can prove the premiums won't go up, then many of the concerns about the bill will disappear. But if the premiums are going to go up anywhere near what we've now heard from many, many witnesses, I gather the government will withdraw the bill.

I think what we need to focus on now is whether premiums will go up or not, because all the government members have said to us now the reason they're supporting the bill is because the premiums won't go up and the benefits will change as proposed. So we have the focus now, Mr Chairman, and I think over the next little while that's where we need to focus. At the end of the exercise, after we've gone through the Mercer report in more detail and after we've examined that, that's what we need to find.

I would hope the government, once those numbers are finally agreed upon, if it is shown that there will be a premium increase, would now agree to withdraw the bill. Perhaps we can have some comment from the parliamentary assistant on that.

Mr Owens: Your question is based on some false supposition that you've created in your own mind in terms of the other government. We have not stated that we would withdraw the bill if—

Mr Phillips: Mr Ward said you're proceeding with the bill because premiums won't go up. I assume that you wouldn't proceed if the premiums were going to go up.

Mr Owens: The ultimate decision with respect to premiums, as you're well aware, is up to the Ontario Insurance Commission.

Mr Harnick: Oh, they're going to be the bad guys. Now we're starting to understand.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the comments. I think we now have the basis on this bill for determining whether it will be withdrawn or not, because I think now if one were to look at the series of presentations we've had, an overwhelming number of them say, "Withdraw the bill, and if there are some minor improvements that need to be made, make them." That's your presentation. As I say, we've now narrowed the focus, and I appreciate your presentation because I think it's elicited from the government members the basis on which they would agree to withdraw the bill.

If it turns out that we are looking at $200 increases in the premiums, I assume the government would agree to withdraw the bill. So we need to focus, as I say, on that issue, because what I think the car people have indicated quite clearly to us is that, from their perspective, people are hurting out there. A $200 premium increase to your members would be extremely devastating, and actually your advice is you think the premiums may go up more than $200. So we've now narrowed it, Mr Chairman, and I appreciate the witness's presentation.

Have we any more time?

The Chair: Yes, you have.

Mr Phillips: In terms of the car rental business, how important are insurance premiums to your industry? I appreciate that you're saying you play a role in tourism, and I believe that. How important are insurance premiums to your industry?

Mr Kenmir: Insurance premiums would be 15% to 20% of our income; 15% to 20% would go out on insurance premiums. Car rentals are a little bit riskier than your own personal car. When I rent a car to someone, they're going to be in a strange car, they've never even driven that kind of a car before, they don't know anything about ABS brakes and they're liable to have an accident. Our rates would possibly increase $300 to $400 a year, we estimate.

Mr Phillips: That's helpful, sir.

Mrs Caplan: I'd like to pursue the line of questioning of my colleague, because I believe that's what the essence of this legislation is about and that's what my constituents are concerned about. They don't want premiums to increase. You've told us in a very clear way that if you increase the benefits, as this bill purports to do, if you make the kinds of changes that create the uncertainty that we know this bill is going to do, premiums will increase, that that's just common sense. Is that your—

Mr Kenmir: Oh, sure.

Mrs Caplan: Further, the stability and the certainty created for your industry by the plan in place now, called OMPP, allowed you to lower your rates in the car rental business, and this piece of legislation, Bill 164, as it is presented now, because of the uncertainty within the bill and because of the costs and premium increases, will force you to raise your rates and that will have a detrimental effect on the economy of Ontario. Is that what you're telling this committee?

Mr Kenmir: Definitely. This bill would bring us back somewhat towards the tort system.

Mrs Caplan: So you don't think this bill is in the interests of Ontarians individually, or business in Ontario?

Mr Kenmir: I don't think it is. I've even listened to radio stations where they've had polls and they said 70% don't want it.

The Chair: Okay, fine. We've got to go to Mr Harnick. Maybe he can straighten the record out now.

Mr Harnick: I don't think anybody can straighten a record out, Mr Chairman. I've been sitting here for three days now. I haven't heard anybody come in and say anything about this bill that's, in anybody's estimate, positive.

Mr Owens: How long have you actually been here?

Mr Harnick: I'm just wondering, now that we've been doing this for three days at the taxpayers' expense, bringing all these people in here. We haven't heard a single person say anything positive about this bill.

Mr Owens: That's not true.

Mr Harnick: I've just been reviewing the list and I haven't heard anybody saying anything good about this. I suspect the comment you make about polls and people saying good things about it strikes you as being kind of funny, that nobody seems to be supporting this bill except the government. Even most of the members of the NDP don't support this bill, just the members of the government who happened to remarkably get elected on September 6, 1990.

One of the things I want to talk to you about—and you've touched on it in your brief—is very interesting. There's nothing in this bill about road safety. We heard from Mr John Bates, the person who looks after PRIDE, People to Reduce Impaired Driving Everywhere, and MADD, Mothers Against Drunk Driving.

He made a presentation yesterday and told us that if the government would start listening to the things he's been asking them to do for the last couple of years, such as graduated licences and a number of other things—changing the drinking age and things of that nature—he thought serious accidents could be reduced by about 10%. You know that serious accidents are the bulk of the moneys put out by insurance companies to pay people for their damages, so if they could institute some kind of plan to reduce serious accidents, we could probably amend the existing bill so that everybody would be happy. Would you agree with that?

Mr Kenmir: I would agree.

Mr Harnick: Isn't it astounding that the government hasn't done anything in that regard? As a member of the public, don't you think that's a rather strange thing?

Mr Kenmir: That should be one of the priorities, really.

Mr Harnick: All right; thank you.

The Chair: Okay, fine. There are just a few comments. You know the Chair doesn't say too much too often, but there are some people down in the area of Lincoln who I represent: Arn Fee from Thrifty. I don't know if you know him or not.

Mr Kenmir: What's his name?

The Chair: Arn Fee, Thrifty rent-a-car and Peter Lumsden from Tilden.

Mr Kenmir: I know Peter, yes.

Mrs Caplan: Is this a commercial?

The Chair: No, it's not. I'm just wondering, because they're friends of mine and I know them quite well. I know one thing they were upset with was the tire tax that came in with the rental industry, but the other thing is, does the industry make any money selling insurance to renters?

Mr Kenmir: It very seldom gets done any more and it's not an insurance. It's called a loss-damage waiver. It doesn't get sold any more. Everybody's got credit cards or the insurance from their own car transferred to the rental car.

The Chair: But for a person walking off the street who didn't own a car and was going to rent one, that's part of the insurance you have to purchase.

Mr Kenmir: If he has a Gold American Express card, Gold Visa or Gold Mastercard, they cover the insurance, so very little of that is sold any more.

The Chair: Okay, fine. It was a few years ago.

Mr Kenmir: A few years ago it was really good.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee today. I think you were very informative to quite a few of the members here.

Mrs Caplan: Very helpful; thank you.

Mr Kenmir: Thank you for having me.

TORONTO TAXI CAB OWNERS AND OPERATORS ASSOCIATION

The Chair: We now have the Toronto Taxi Cab Owners and Operators Association. Would you come forward, please. I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economics. We have half an hour, till 5 o'clock. We'll be recessing until 7. You have half an hour's time to make your presentation. If you can, leave some time within that half an hour for questions after your brief. As you can see, the members are anxious to ask questions of you.

Mr Sikko Wiersma: Yes, I can see that.

The Chair: If you wouldn't mind, identify yourselves for the purposes of Hansard and the people of Ontario.

Mr Wiersma: My name is Mr Sikko Wiersma. I'm one of the directors of the Toronto Taxi Cab Owners and Operators Association. With me today is Mr Lawrence Eisenberg. He is the president of the same association. We've been in existence slightly over three years and we've attempting to be proactive in the various areas of our industry to serve the public better.

I've handed out some material. It's in point form. I've discovered in the past that when you hand out a lot of literature it tends to put people to sleep. Members in our industry falling sleep is not a good idea, because they're generally handling 3,000 to 4,000 pounds of steel and plastic on the road.

Mr Phillips: And your premiums go up.

Mr Wiersma: Well, they did go up at one time. Just to follow through on what the previous gentleman said with respect to the rental industry, the taxicab industry has a parallel problem. I was speaking to one of the MPPs here a couple of days ago, Mr Chris Stockwell, who is, I believe, in the car rental business. He confirmed to me that OMPP reduced his premiums in the last few years.

Interjections.

Mr Wiersma: Please, folks, can you cut the chatter? I find that very insulting and disturbing. I'm not a professional lobbyist. We're simple people in a very difficult business in a difficult time. I would appreciate some courtesy from our members of Parliament. Thank you.

The Chair: I have some problems as a Chair at times too. Ignore them. You're talking to me. I'm listening.

Mr Wiersma: I'm not an elected member, Mr Chair. We're simple businessmen. The economy has turned us from businessmen into beggars and we're here begging against this bill.

I must say, to follow through on what Mr Swart, a very highly respected member at one time of this particular government, said yesterday, that whoever designed this bill must have been smoking some old taxi claims and shredded taxi receipts, because this is an absolute piece of trash.

We also have very little respect for the insurance industry, but let's get back to the government's mandate. You people in the government can snicker, but the population out there took you very seriously.

Mr Dadamo: We'd appreciate it if you got to the point.

Mr Wiersma: I am.

The Chair: Mr Dadamo, the gentleman has half an hour. You will have your time when it comes.

Mr Dadamo: I believe he's out of line.

The Chair: No, he is not out of line.

Mr Dadamo: Yes, you've asked him to direct his comments to you. He's not doing so. Now, we'd like you to reinforce that.

The Chair: I didn't hear that; I was signing a piece of paper.

Mr Dadamo: We'd like you to reinforce and open your ears and listen.

Mr Phillips: The gentleman is expressing the view of his association. You may not like what you're hearing, and we may not like some of the things he says either, but he has the complete right to express the views of his organization. Mr Chairman, I think you have to bring them to order.

Mr Wiersma: We represent an industry which employs approximately 14,000 people in Metro Toronto. There are also 15 members of this government—we're sorry about the passing of one of the members last Friday—left within Metro and I would think that we should have the courtesy of a hearing. I would appreciate it.

Let me get back to my personal experience. When I went to Carleton University as a student, two of my professors belonged to your particular political party. One of them was Douglas Fisher and the other one was the late Pauline Jewett. I must say that when I studied political science and economics, I had the highest regard for these people. Even though philosophically I may not have agreed with them, I learned a lot from them. The tradition that was established by the CCF party, with Mr Woodsworth, Mr M. J. Coldwell, whom I met personally, a fine gentleman, and Mr Tommy Douglas, somewhere has been lost—what I referred to earlier—in your election mandate or your promise for public auto insurance.

Getting to Bill 164, Mr Kormos was quoted in a newspaper the other day as saying that the government is dancing in a fog. Our position within the taxicab industry is that the government is dancing in the financial red light district, that this bill, financially, is going nowhere. With the condition of our economy, even people who are unemployed still have vehicles that they require in many areas to go and hunt for jobs. If you increase their premiums, whether it's $20 or $200, what you're doing is you're taking away from disposable income that they don't even have, and this is a regressive measure.

The first priority of this bill should be to go back to your Bill 39, the Ontario Road Safety Corporation Act. The legacy of the automobile on this continent, the maiming and injuries and deaths that it has caused since the turn of the century, is approximately one million people who have lost their lives. In this country last year we lost the equivalent of a 747 planeload of passengers going down weekly.

That's the terrible legacy the automobile is leaving in this country. We have our share of accidents in this province. We feel that the emphasis should be on upgrading road safety and taking preventive measures to prevent accidents. This bill will not prevent one automobile accident and it will not save one life.

The insurance industry has record profits for the year 1992. You people have all the data and the figures. Not one dollar of those profits is being plowed back into road safety or public safety. What we advocate is that there should be a forced proportion of premium funds and profits plowed back into accident prevention.

Going on to the public safety factor, at one time there were governments in this province that took hard decisions with respect to public safety. For example, years ago the government of Premier Robarts reduced the speed limit on the 401 from 70 to 60 miles per hour. They also introduced the seatbelt legislation, and I was amazed at that time how that reduced fatalities and injuries on the roads; the statistical drop was phenomenal. I don't have all that data with me, because that tends to put people to sleep. But the principles were there.

The Ontario motorist protection plan, or this no-fault system, has some faults and it has some flaws, but it has reduced the insurance premiums, as I mentioned earlier, for the car rental industry, and it's also reduced the premiums for the taxicab industry. It's one of the few cost factors that we've been able to reduce in an industry that is financially hard-pressed.

We have 11,500 taxicab drivers in this city, approximately 4,500 full-time and the balance are part-time; 80% of those drivers are recent immigrants. When you impact on a category like insurance, which is our major cost factor next to the purchase of the automobile, then you're going to impact on the rates that the drivers are going to be paying, which will further shrink their disposable income. I spoke earlier about this type of proposal being regressive. What you're doing is you're hurting the people who can afford it the least. If you really boil it down, it's a discriminatory proposal for our industry.

When I became involved in the taxicab industry in Toronto in 1982, with respect to the insurance industry's treatment of the taxicab industry, we started off as a second-class citizen. I can assure you that this degenerated over a period of five or six years to about a fifth-class citizen. Our industry had insurance cancellations by carriers that were abominable. You have no idea what a horrendous experience it is to have $250,000 worth of rolling stock like I had and to be dancing with the devil, to have insurance being carried by three different brokers and insurance carriers because if there was a fatality or a loss with the one carrier, at least my whole business wouldn't go down the dumper. However, for one reason or another, the carriers eliminated us.

What I enclosed was some backup material under the old system, and what we particularly want to challenge in this bill, from a financial point of view, is this $15,000 deductible. I heard somebody whistling past the graveyard here yesterday, saying that should be reduced to $7,500.

I've enclosed two claims which involve non-accidents. When I'm speaking of non-accidents, they're both claim payouts. I've included some of the adjusting material and notated one as exhibit 1 and the second one as exhibit 2, where I paid out money in order not to have a loss on my premiums registered with my insurance company. I paid it out personally. This was under the old system, where the slightest scratch or the fear of an incident, as you can see by the material, if you have the time or take the time to read it, would cause a payout. The payouts were approximately $4,000 each.

I have higher payouts pending, but I can't comment on both of those issues because they're both before the courts and they're in the higher courts. So I can't discuss those particular incidents, but they also deal in an area that I would consider fraud.

Basically, in the old insurance system that we had, everybody was part of the fraud. There's no reflection on the current adjuster in these particular settlements—he did a fine job on my behalf—but whenever there was a collision, the tow-truck operators were on the take, the body shops were on the take, the adjusters and the appraisers, everybody took a piece of the action, and for virtually no damage, we were paying out thousands and thousands of dollars. In total in this province we were paying out millions, and for the insurance companies to pursue this kind of thing, the easy way out was to sock up the premiums. "Don't worry about these things, because you can always sock it back to the premium holders."

Ultimately, one of the best things the Liberal government did was introduce the Ontario motorist protection plan. It has faults, as you can see by exhibit 3. When I went through my old insurance claim files the night before last, a nice stack that high, I just wanted to put it in there for comic relief. I lost a car, the same car I paid out for under exhibit 1, $4,300 for no damage. It was sandwiched in a rear-ender and the car was a write-off. These things happen, but we were prepared to take those risks.

It had no impact on our insurance rates, and an industry, what I've shown on page 2 is an average. We have about 20 categories of ratings. What we've done is extrapolated the data and averaged it out for leased vehicles, that operate under leases, and separated out the owner-operated vehicles, because those are the two main categories. There was a tremendous difference in insurance rates for those. Without going into the reasons why, you can see that the taxi cab industry was subsidizing other categories in the automotive area.

In 1992, under OMPP, our premiums have been reduced. The profit doesn't look as high, but that's because a lot of the reserves the insurance companies set aside are still outstanding from the old system.

Now, this plan: I would like to address the government on this. I have a feeling of déjà vu in this committee room. You people went through a horrendous process, and Mr Owens knows this, on the MVA debate at the end of November, and you people took a decision; not just a political decision, but you took a decision that this was bad legislation. You bit the bullet and you went through it and I don't think you'll lose any political points. You won't lose one vote in the suburbs for people who are overtaxed, believe me, because their taxes should be lowered.

Let's get back to insurance. You won't lose one political point. Look, I'm not a politician and I don't have to be elected, but it stands to reason that if I'm at a point in the polls where I'm going to be out of a job in two years—the people who are lawyers will certainly benefit from this, because the rest of you will have to find other employment, like the rest of us struggling in the economy. But this bill will just reactivate the claims system, and $15,000, as I've shown you by my two examples under the old system of paying out approximately $4,000 for no accidents—there's no damage. Basically, it's fraud, and I'll call it fraud. If somebody would like to challenge me on that and sue me, welcome. We'd be willing to take up that challenge at any time.

What you're going to introduce is another system; it's just that the level's going to start a little higher. But for lawyers and doctors and psychiatrists and whoever else, to start at $15,000 is nothing. A judge is going to sit up on the bench and he's going to look at someone with a $20,000 lawsuit struggling up, and he's going to raise whatever the claim is to cover the legal cost, to cover the medical cost and say, "You're going to have a little bit left over," and he'll just sock the $15,000 on top, and there we are again. We'll be back to the same problem. We'll just be dealing with it at a higher level and everyone will pay.

How much time have I used, Mr Chairman?

The Chair: You've used up 15 minutes.

Mr Wiersma: Fifteen minutes? All right.

The Chair: And unprofessional and with no notes, you're doing real good.

Mr Wiersma: Look, we feel very strongly about this.

The Chair: Mr Wiersma, we hear from the heart, and one thing you have to understand, we're here to listen. This bill hasn't passed.

Mr Wiersma: I understand that.

The Chair: It's not too late. So what you're saying, the government and this committee are listening to.

Mr Wiersma: Are they? I hope so, because I must say—

The Chair: I know you sounded frustrated at the very beginning.

Mr Wiersma: I did because of the crosstalk.

The Chair: But the Chair is listening and most of the committee members are listening.

Mr Wiersma: Okay. We have a horrendous problem economically. I made that point in my notes on page 2: "Our gross revenue decline is 40% on the street." That's on the street. That's for our drivers. Our insurance premiums have only dropped about 20% or 25%, and that's only one cost factor. But to offset that, from 1989 to 1992, the category of licensing-to-our-industry costs has increased from $2.8 million to $4.8 million. We have a licensing commission, condoned by Metro council, the same people who were going to do it to us with MVA, who are doing it to the cab industry. They're going to expand the commission and triple the size. It just passed through management committee two days ago.

I'll just summarize what I want to say. It does come under the Ministry of Municipal Affairs, and someone in this government should have a very serious look at the problems that this industry is suffering at the Metropolitan Toronto Licensing Commission. It smells. The cost factors that we're faced with there are astronomical, and what's going on is a disgrace to this community.

Getting back to insurance, our industry recommends that we allow the OMPP to run another two years. If the government believes there will be no premium increases, put out a separate insurance package—put it out in the marketplace or have a government-run package—and put those benefits out separately. If you believe there's no premium increase, the insurance industry will pick that up separately, and it'll run with it. But I would doubt if you'll get one taker.

Let's get to the benefit changes and the deductible proposal. Whether it's in the public or private sector, it doesn't make much difference, I think. It appears to be an exercise in political futility. It's a financial disaster that's going to come, and everyone in this province who drives a vehicle is going to pay. What we recommend is that you scrap this Bill 164 and embark on a program of accident prevention. Let's prevent the accidents from happening. Let's get on to a program of road safety. You people have all the data; you don't have to re-examine your navels to do this. The material is there. The Ministry of Transportation has the material. With all this stuff that our tax money is paying, why don't you people use them? Make these bureaucrats accountable to you. We're paying the shot as taxpayers, but you people are responsible, as legislators, to do this in the interest of the community.

As the last thing, I don't think we can emphasize strongly enough that within Metro—I know it doesn't apply across the province—public and mass transportation has the best safety record. They don't have the accidents if we can get people out of the cars, on to mass transit and on to mass transportation—trains, buses, trolleys, whatever we can use, GO trains—get them out of the automobiles. The safety record of our GO system is phenomenal compared to Amtrak in the US. I think these people should be commended. That's the type of program this government should be busy with, instead of trying to reinvent the wheel. There has been six studies done in the last six years on insurance. How many times do you want to reinvent the same wheel?

That's all I have to say. Do you have any comments, Mr Eisenberg?

Mr Lawrence Eisenberg: Yes. Basically, what we're talking about is we delivered 30 copies of the bill and regulations to owners and drivers. We asked them to instruct us about what to do. Without fail, they returned the documents to us, each of them saying two different things: "What is this?" and, "We can't understand it." If a working-class person can't understand the legislation enough to tell us what he feels, how can you implement it? That's the bottom line.

The Chair: Mr Mancini, three minutes.

Mr Mancini: When the subcommittee decided to put the Toronto Taxi Cab Owners and Operators Association on the list of witnesses to be heard, we thought at that time that we would be hearing from an interesting group of people and hearing an interesting view on automobile insurance. You've more than lived up to our expectations. I think we've heard from you things that we have not heard from other witnesses, important things. For example, I don't think many of us knew—we maybe assumed—that rates were in fact out of control for you pre-OMPP. We knew that the OMPP had dropped your rates, but not as dramatically as you have shown us today.

The other thing I would like to comment on is the fact that you're willing to work with the government and allow changes to be made, but only after a necessary time period has elapsed and appropriate study has been done. Your suggestion that we allow the OMPP to work for a couple of years to see what other wrinkles might be in the bill that need to be ironed out or fixed up is, in my view, a very positive suggestion.

You've dramatically shown us in your statistics that people in the taxicab business have taken a big hit as far as income is concerned. One point I'd like to make is that this morning we had the Ontario Federation of Labour before us. I was mentioning to the gentlemen and to the committee that if we took only the government's opinion and studies and advice from their consultants, rates were going to go up a minimum of 4.5%. Other people said as high as 20%. I believe the answer was something like: "That's all abstract. We don't know if that's going to happen."

Mr Wiersma: It's not abstract to us.

Mr Mancini: That was going to be my question. You've studied the bill, you've looked at it. Do you think that Mercer's comment and conclusion that rates would go up 4.5% is abstract? Coopers and Lybrand's conclusion was that it might be, I think, 20%. I believe Wyatt was 13%. We go from a range of 4.5% all the way up to 20%. Do you think that's abstract and some kind of fairy tale?

Mr Wiersma: It's a fairy tale and voodoo financing because you cannot anticipate the litigation and the lawsuits that are going to result from this bill. The insurance companies, as soon as there's a frequency, they put a loss reserve aside. In my data you can see there are not necessarily losses. That money is in reserve, although as soon as you put a loss reserve aside, the insurance company hits the premium holders and they hit everyone, but they'll hit a specific category harder than others. I know that part of the proposal in the bill is to eliminate discrimination, but the taxicab industry has been discriminated against in premiums previously. The treatment of us by the insurance industry has been appalling. It's a separate issue.

Mr Mancini: So your conclusion is that rates are going to go up?

Mr Wiersma: Definitely, yes.

The Chair: Mr Mancini, I'm going to have to go on to Mr Harnick.

Mr Harnick: Sir, have you been a cab driver yourself?

Mr Wiersma: Yes, I've been on the street myself.

Mr Harnick: For many years, I'll bet.

Mr Wiersma: Approximately 10 years.

Mr Harnick: I note your comments that you like the OMPP, and I suspect that one of the reasons you like that is because it gets rid of a lot of what you perceive to be the small claims.

Mr Wiersma: The nuisance claims have been eliminated, and what I put in my exhibits, the fraudulent stuff, what we considered the old fraud, the money-wasters.

Mr Harnick: Just so I understand you, you don't believe there's anything wrong with an innocent person who's seriously injured having the right to make a claim. Is that correct?

Mr Wiersma: Of course.

Mr Harnick: That's trite, isn't it?

Mr Wiersma: It's not trite. A person who is seriously injured deserves to be recompensed for whatever his losses are, whether it's pain, suffering, physical disability, rehabilitation, loss of income, if it takes 20 years or 50 years or whatever. Definitely.

Mr Harnick: That's something that's obvious to one another as human beings, isn't it?

Mr Wiersma: Definitely.

Mr Harnick: I just don't know what your circumstances have been in terms of your driving a cab, but I gather you've seen the odd personal injury accident first hand.

Mr Wiersma: Quite frequently.

Mr Harnick: You may have even been involved in some of those yourself.

Mr Wiersma: No.

Mr Harnick: You've never been involved in a personal injury accident yourself?

Mr Wiersma: No, sir.

Mr Harnick: Or been injured yourself.

Mr Wiersma: No.

Mr Harnick: But you've seen what happens to people in car accidents.

Mr Wiersma: Yes. I have accident files for my taxicabs at home this deep.

Mr Harnick: And the ones where people suffer serious injuries are pretty significant claims, aren't they?

Mr Wiersma: Generally, yes.

Mr Harnick: People go through a lot of agony when it happens.

Mr Wiersma: Certainly.

Mr Harnick: You've seen cab drivers—because I know, I've acted for a number of cab drivers who have been seriously injured in accidents—who can't work. Correct?

Mr Wiersma: Certainly, yes.

Mr Harnick: You would agree with me that in terms of a good insurance bill, someone should be able to claim for his actual economic loss that his no-fault benefits don't pay.

Mr Wiersma: Unquestionably.

Mr Harnick: Sure. So you don't have a problem with that and it's the nuisance claims, the small, little claims that we're happy to get rid of, out of the system.

Mr Wiersma: That's right.

Mr Harnick: And that's in fact what the deputy minister said yesterday, that the purpose of the $15,000 deductible was to get rid of the small claims. Correct?

The Chair: Mr Harnick, I've got to go on to Mr Winninger.

Mr Harnick: All right, thanks.

Mr Winninger: I certainly travel public transit whenever I go back and forth to my riding, and I ride in a lot of cabs. I'm aware of the challenges that cab drivers face right now.

To come back to OMPP for a moment, I stopped practising law in September 1990 and I still get calls from old clients, constituents and other people complaining about the fact that they fell through the cracks of OMPP. There's a lot of bitterness out there surrounding it. I think there is, to come back to an earlier point, a constituency out there that would like to see improvements in the OMPP.

I'm aware of recent case law which has opened up the right to some extent to sue for serious and permanent injury, which would probably have some upward pressure on existing rates under the OMPP. I'll tell you quite frankly—and I'm approaching a fairly fundamental question here—in August 1991, 800 insurance agents, brokers and employees demonstrated outside my office in London and said they didn't want us to take over auto insurance and make it public because they could achieve better premiums, they could achieve better benefits and a better rating system if it were left to regulation by the ministry. Now we've made some modest changes to improve the benefits and to control premiums and to improve, hopefully, the rating system, and the insurance companies—

Mr Wiersma: Is there a question?

Mr Winninger: Yes. The insurance companies are saying that the rates will go up. Your concern seems to be with the cost of claims. I would ask you, what provision do you have for independent or employed taxi drivers that would ensure, whether they're at fault or not, that they'll be adequately provided for if they have the misfortune of a collision that causes fairly serious bodily injury?

Mr Wiersma: The OMPP has made provisions for the loss of income. I think that the $600 cap more than adequately covers the money that the cab drivers are making now. I don't want to go into those types of data at the present time, but let's backtrack to the old system and this carnage on the roads that I described before, when you would drive along and you would see the back of a bumper that said: "Go ahead, hit me. I need the money." That's a pretty disgusting thing to have on automobiles. As a matter of fact, you people should legislate that kind of levity off the roads, because there have been too many fatalities and there are too many paraplegics in our trauma centres. That kind of attitude is disgusting.

As far as the insurance brokers and the insurance people demonstrating, when I studied the economics of insurance at university, the first statement my professor made was, "Insurance, the definition: a lot of people pooling small amounts of money to offset a large loss." The insurance industry basically is a parasite industry. As far as I'm concerned, they're non-productive. They certainly don't measure up to lawyers.

Mrs Caplan: We know where the lawyers are.

Mr Winninger: I speak kindly of cab drivers.

Mr Harnick: You're not going to start picking on politicians, are you?

Mr Wiersma: Of course not. Look, we only do that at the time we mark the X, and that's basically why we're here today. Our drivers speak to, say, 20 passengers per day on a 10- to 20-minute, one-on-one basis, and politically they're generally fairly knowledgeable. Although they may be complacent at times, they do speak, in Metro, to about two million impressions a year. Some of them are tourists but we have no tourists left, so they're all the local people now. If you do something detrimental to the cab driver, believe me, I think it may have an adverse effect in the polls.

Getting back to the insurance brokers and the agents, I don't think that British Columbia fell apart under a public insurance system and I must commend—I'm not philosophically a socialist, but when I spoke to Councillor Moscoe the other day I said, "Could you come and confirm how bad our industry's problems are in this city?" because he's very familiar with them. He said: "Sikko, frankly, I don't want to go. I don't know anything about insurance." I admire an honest politician, and this bill proves to me that you people also know nothing about insurance.

Mr Winninger: That wasn't the answer I was looking for.

The Chair: I see the little beep up there. I see the little beep on the corner of the TV telling me that it's 5 o'clock, and the crew up there are telling me that the time is over until 7 o'clock. I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee. If anybody has said you didn't give a professional brief there, they're wrong, okay? Thanks for coming.

We'll resume the hearings at 7 o'clock tonight. This committee is recessed until 7 sharp.

The committee recessed at 1704.

EVENING SITTING

The committee resumed at 1859.

The Chair: Good evening. This is the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. We're on Bill 164, An Act to amend the Insurance Act and certain other Acts in respect of Automobile Insurance and other Insurance Matters. This is day 3, the evening session. We'll be here from 7 until 9:40 tonight.

UNITED SENIOR CITIZENS OF ONTARIO

The Chair: I'd like to welcome the first group, which is the United Senior Citizens of Ontario. You'll have half an hour. In that half an hour, try to save some time after your brief for questions from committee members here. They're usually anxious to ask questions. If you don't mind identifying yourself now for the purposes of Hansard and the people of Ontario, you may go ahead.

Mr Alex Mansfield: Mrs Jane Leitch is president of the United Senior Citizens of Ontario. Mr John Atto is our consultant from the auto association. I am Mr Alex Mansfield, past president of the United Senior Citizens of Ontario.

We wish to thank you for the opportunity to present our views to you on the proposed automobile insurance Bill 164. The United Senior Citizens of Ontario is an organization representing over 1,000 senior citizens clubs. The membership is estimated to be in excess of 300,000 retired persons. The mandate of the organization is to better the quality of life for senior citizens of Ontario. We have tried to be positive, constructive and realistic in the preparation of this brief.

Before getting into Bill 164 itself, we thought we should give the committee some background on the reaction of our members to the last changes in automobile insurance. Quite frankly, the reaction has been minimal. This supports our view that the current system offers significant benefits to seniors and should not be changed along the lines of the proposed legislation.

For example, we have received very few complaints about the present method of claims handling, either for bodily injury or property damage. Improved claims handling and efficient delivery of accident benefits appear to be direct results of the current legislation.

Another benefit to seniors has been premium stability. As you recall, premiums had been rising because of increasing claims prior to 1990. Obviously, our members have been pleased with the stability in the last two years. With this in mind, we certainly question the need for any change in automobile insurance. We suggest that, instead, this government undertake further review and replace this bill with a bill that offers a better balance between enhanced benefits and costs.

We will break down our comments into the following areas: indexing, retirement at 65, compensation for people close to 65, care givers, cost, the future and possible solutions.

Indexing: We note that Bill 164 allows for indexing of benefits for those who are employed at the time of an accident but not for those who are retired. We simply cannot understand how any government or bureaucracy can decide that inflation affects employed people but does not affect retired people.

Retirement at 65: Bill 164 seems to have unilaterally decided that the proper age for retirement from the workforce is 65. This is an issue that is presently the subject of much discussion, not only with the public in general but also our membership. While many arguments could be made pro and con on this subject, we do not feel this should be enshrined in Bill 164 or any other legislation until mandatory retirement has been dealt with on its own.

Compensation for people close to 65: Keeping in mind our objections to the arbitrary use of age 65, we would point out that there is an apparent contradiction in Bill 164, that being that people who are injured when they are one day less than 65 and working will receive substantially less benefits than those who are one day more than 65 and working.

For example, if a working person is injured one day before he turns 65, the bill assumes he will retire at 65 and therefore will be entitled to $185 per week. If the same person were injured two days later, when he was one day older than 65, if he were still working, he would be entitled to full benefits which would be scaled down over four years. We feel this is rather an easy thing to correct and would suggest you do so. Mr Chairman, I will turn this over now to our president, Mrs Leitch.

Mrs Jane Leitch: Care givers: When people grow older, unfortunately sometimes they change from healthy individuals to people who require daily care. This care is most often provided by their spouse. The problem with the care giver section in Bill 164 is that it simply does not recognize that an individual could be seriously injured in a car accident and then some time thereafter his spouse could require his assistance and no compensation would be available under the care giver section.

We appreciate the thought and effort that went into the care giver section, but would point out that drafters of legislation such as this must stop and think about the special needs of seniors. In this case, it is not good enough to simply look at the economic loss involved for people who are dependent on the injured individual, but you must also consider those who may be dependent on them in the future. We realize the many difficulties associated with the open-endedness of changing this provision, but would suggest that changes could be made with some reasonable sort of time limitations.

Cost: When looking at cost projections presented to us by various organizations, including the government of Ontario and the Insurance Bureau of Canada, it has become apparent that largely due to Bill 164, our members will see automobile rates increase between 4% and 20% next year. Regardless of who is right or what the final outcome will be, rate increases of 4% are totally out of the question. If in fact we have rate increases as high as 20%, we are sure we will go from situations where we receive very few complaints about automobile insurance to a point where this is the number one complaint from all our members.

Many times we hear from governments that an independent senior is a benefit to our society. Any form of increased costs to people on fixed incomes will force some of these people to change from being independent to being dependent.

Many organizations now rely on the high number of volunteers who are seniors to see that individuals they serve get the service they need at a reasonable cost. Most of these volunteers rely on their automobiles to function. We have heard in the past from such people as Meals on Wheels that automobile rate increases in excess of inflation will substantially reduce the number of volunteers they have. Quite simply put, we can't see the reason for, nor can we afford, the rate increases brought on by Bill 164.

The future: When Bill 164 was put together with The Road Ahead: Ontario's Strategy for Automobile Insurance Reform, we found ourselves extremely concerned about the direction that's being taken with automobile insurance. In the past, we have been faced by other governments with plans calling for uniform classifications, a fair rating system and the unfair use of age as a rating criteria. We note with disappointment that this government is once again going in this direction.

In the past, when the net result of these changes has been determined, our members would have been faced with rate increases as high as 45%. We see no reason why if we go down that same road we won't be ending up in the same place. As Albert Einstein said, "Those who repeat the same experiment expecting different results are doomed to failure."

To reiterate, it's our strong belief that Bill 164 and The Road Ahead will result in rate increases of 45%, or even higher, to our members. Once again, we're strongly stating our objections to this bill and are very concerned that the objections will fall on deaf ears.

Possible solutions: We can only see the following solutions to our present dilemma:

Do not implement Bill 164.

Reduce the benefits in Bill 164 in order that rate increases will not be necessary due to it.

Allow certain things, such as higher weekly indemnity limits, care givers' coverage, indexation etc to be optional at an increased premium. This would allow Ontario residents to purchase a basic product at the same price as they're paying today, and if they wish to then buy the additional frills, they can do so.

Our conclusion is, since we can find no benefits in Bill 164 for seniors in the province of Ontario and its implementation is going to result in substantial rate increases for our members, we have no choice but to strongly state to this committee that Bill 164 is a bad deal for the seniors of Ontario.

Again, on behalf of the United Senior Citizens of Ontario, I wish to thank you for this opportunity to participate in this very important discussion.

The Chair: Okay, Mr Jackson, you're up first.

Mr Jackson: Does that complete the deputants' presentation?

The Chair: I believe so. That was the conclusion.

Mr Jackson: Very good. First of all, Mrs Leitch, Mr Mansfield, welcome to Queen's Park. We're delighted to have you here today. As always, we appreciate your presentations.

At the outset, is there anything in this bill that you can agree with or that you find any merit in?

Mrs Leitch: I suppose there are always some benefits to us, Mr Jackson. They did add something about care givers that was something we asked for when we met the minister before, but it hasn't really gone far enough to cover our concerns, and he did tell us at that time he would look into that.

Mr Jackson: Had your legal counsel prepared any language of any amendments or any strengthening of that section that you recommended, any wording that could be helpful to the committee?

Mrs Leitch: Would you like to answer that, John, please?

Mr John Atto: Yes. I guess I'm insurance counsel, not the legal counsel. The situation would seem relatively simple to us in the question of the problem at 65 and what happens at that date, and that's simply words to the effect that you would get the greater of the two, because we do accept the fact that Bill 164 does restrict coverages in regard to people over 65 when that wasn't done before, but there is that problem.

In regard to the care giver section, the main problem we see is the length of time after the accident for someone else to find the problem. We would suggest it's just a simple question of putting a limitation in, like three years.

I don't think either one of them are legal problems. I think once the logic is there, the rest should be there.

Mr Jackson: Mr Chairman, has the government the benefit of any legal counsel on the questions raised by United Senior Citizens of Ontario? Essentially, they're raising legal questions.

The Chair: Is legal counsel here? Okay, what's the specific question?

Mr Jackson: The deputants have raised questions about the discriminatory nature of the 65 threshold and the presumption of retirement and the working/non-working component which is tied to age. Those are legal questions. There's been some recent court cases in Canada and in the US on this, and I just wonder if legal counsel has commented on the sections which the deputants have raised, because those are legal questions.

The Chair: Okay, Mr Owens.

Mr Owens: In a recent decision—if the member for Burlington South would like, I can get a definite date—the Supreme Court of Canada has ruled that 65 is constitutional with respect to retirement age.

In terms of what the member views as a discriminatory action against seniors, the auto insurance process is set up and designed to act as income replacement, and if the mandatory retirement age is pegged at 65, there's a fairly reasonable assumption that—

Mr Jackson: Mr Owens, without selling me on the concept, a member of your own caucus raised in private members' time—

Mr Owens: That's not the issue here.

Mr Jackson: —the removal of 65 as a mandatory age of retirement, which most members of the House—and I was present and participated in that debate—supported. So a majority of your own caucus members support the principle of not discriminating against seniors at age 65, yet your own government has now presented it in legislation and you're reiterating that as a position.

Mr Owens: The issue is not what caucus may or may not have agreed on and what may or may not have occurred during a private members' hour. The bill is based on what is currently in law, what has currently been ruled on by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr Jackson: So what you're saying is, when there's a private members' bill suggesting—and the majority of members of the House, of all three political parties, agree—that seniors should not be discriminated against on the basis of age, that you, your party and your Premier are going to extend that discrimination in spite of the voices of the majority of the members of the provincial Legislature, when we stated very clearly, in an open forum, in a democratic forum that we should not be discriminating against seniors. Your Premier is going to fly in the face of those kinds of public decisions that were made and suggested in private members' hour?

Mr Owens: Again, the issue under discussion here today is not whether, constitutionally or philosophically, I or the Premier agree that mandatory retirement age should be 65, or in fact whether we should have a mandatory retirement age. The issue that we're here to discuss today is Bill 164 and the enhanced benefits that will be provided under that legislation.

Mr Jackson: How much time do we have left?

The Chair: You've got about 30 seconds left now.

Mr Jackson: Mrs Leitch, earlier today State Farm Insurance tabled a document, and I would like to furnish you with a copy of it as well because it sets out its projected costs for Ontario's seniors. It's frightening. We're looking at a 24% increase for seniors in the Metro Toronto area and the greater Toronto area, where they incidentally pay a higher fee for their licences as well.

Have you had an opportunity to examine these numbers? You mentioned a higher number but these are actuarially accurate. We would assume around 24%, 25% for your average members on a fixed income, when the government is suggesting that seniors should live independently in their homes, rely on a family member as a care giver, usually of the same age. How are you going to survive if your automobile costs are so prohibitive by virtue of the insurance costs?

The Chair: I'm going to go to Ms Haeck.

Mr Jackson: You're not going to let the deputant respond, Mr Chair?

The Chair: I—

Mr Jackson: I'll respect the Chair. It's your practice to cut off—

The Chair: Okay, go ahead if you can make a short response and we'll go on to the next question. I think you were making a statement there more than anything.

Mrs Leitch: We have a position on this and I think Mr Atto will answer.

Mr Atto: There is no question that 4% is a problem, let alone 24%, and then I think we feel very strongly that the 24% is ultimately, when taken with The Road Ahead, too low. We feel strongly that the number is 45%. This was done five years ago, and when it was all said and done and we got to the final numbers that were produced actuarially, we were faced with increases between 42% and 47%. So obviously we can't handle 4%. How can we handle 24%?

The Chair: Okay. Ms Haeck.

Ms Haeck: Yes. Thank you very much, and I do appreciate your coming out and giving us your views. I did want to make mention of the fact and at least respond in some part to what Mr Jackson has raised. I think we have what's called the battle of the experts, because the range of actuarial costs they have provided us is still, shall we say, a wide range. When the plan really comes into effect we'll be able to determine what in fact the true cost is.

We had the Quebec plan here this morning. They indicated that really, the kinds of benefits they're offering and what we're proposing to offer—and they've had theirs now for about 14 years—the cost factors are not unwieldy, and in fact it is much more on the lower end of the scale than whatever the Wyatt and Coopers and Lybrand studies have suggested.

Are you aware that the current system is under some pressure, in fact, to see increases which at this point are undetermined, which would be far in excess of what the industry is projecting?

Mrs Leitch: Yes, I'm aware of them.

Ms Haeck: You are?

Mrs Leitch: Yes.

1920

Ms Haeck: Thank you. Are you aware that the government put something like $133 million into the home care budget during the fall to assist care givers in the homes so that with regard to disabilities there are additional home care services available to individuals like yourself?

Mrs Leitch: Yes, we're aware of that.

Ms Haeck: So that in fact some of your concerns related to the care giver sector might be allayed?

Mrs Leitch: It hasn't been indicated to us that they will pick up the difference there, that they would step in. I doubt it.

Ms Haeck: I believe if a doctor is prescribing home care, you would qualify.

Mrs Leitch: Well, that may be true. Do you want to comment?

Mr Atto: The problem that we're talking about in the care giver section is that to get care givers' benefits, at the time of the accident you must be taking care of someone. That we appreciate and that, I think, is a benefit. The problem we look at, and we know it can't be open-ended, is that when you're dealing with a husband and wife who are retired, quite often one of them gets ill and needs the help and that's the one we all expect to help them.

We are concerned that where one of the individuals is involved in an accident and at that moment the spouse is healthy and then, six months or a year later, they get ill and they're still claiming benefits under the policy, they would be the one that you would expect to help them, but they couldn't qualify for the care giver section. So all we're really asking for there is: This is something that could happen. Can we have something that says three years or five years, as long as the person who's injured in the accident is still collecting benefits? That's really the only problem we have with the care giver section.

Ms Haeck: I think that requires some more discussion and clarification and I appreciate that. You're happy with the kind of rehabilitation services that are being provided under this new bill?

Mrs Leitch: We haven't, at this point, received any complaints about that particular issue.

Ms Haeck: Since it basically kicks in almost immediately, it would really assist the person who is injured.

Mrs Leitch: Well, if it would come in, yes, definitely.

Ms Haeck: You've basically indicated in your brief that overall you felt that OMPP was generally satisfactory, but are you aware of any court cases that your members might have initiated and the kind of settlements or problems that may have arisen because of having to deal with the courts?

Mrs Leitch: We're stating in this document that we have not had a lot of complaints in the system as it exists now. We see some problems with the changes.

Ms Haeck: The fact that people could possibly be taking pain-and-suffering cases in a way that was not allowed under the original plan: Do you see that as an asset?

Mr Atto: I think that, to sort of answer both questions: Number one, the present system is bringing very few complaints from the members and not in the area that you're discussing. There are some benefits here. We're certainly not suggesting that there aren't benefits. The United Senior Citizens of Ontario last time supported the system because we felt that it would stabilize rates. Even though we didn't like the set of circumstances where the right to sue was being taken, the United Senior Citizens had decided that the overriding need, right at this time, for its members was to keep rates stable.

We're not suggesting that there are not some changes that could be made. We're not suggesting, to tell you the truth, that there aren't some changes that are benefiting it. It's just that it has to get back to the situation where the net result of this does not add to rate increases. We know we're going to be faced with rate increases of inflation whether we like it or not under any system, but we can't afford any more.

The Chair: We've got to go on to Mr Mancini.

Mr Mancini: Mr Mansfield, Mrs Leitch, thank you so much for coming before the committee to speak on behalf of the United Senior Citizens of Ontario. Have you been following the committee proceedings?

Mr Mansfield: To a point.

Mrs Leitch: Not all of it.

Mr Mancini: I want you to know that you've said many important things this evening. Some of the items you've emphasized have been touched on by other presenters, not in the same way, and I should say I believe you've left us with quite an impression, at least myself.

Members of the government started today for the first time to say that there might not be any rate increases. I was quite surprised to hear that, because their own consultant stated that rates would go up 4.5%. On your behalf, I'd like to ask the parliamentary assistant who is here representing the minister whether or not he could clarify that for the senior citizens of this province and whether the minister believes there will be rate increases as a direct result of Bill 164.

Mr Owens: To clarify both issues, first of all, members of the government did not say there would not be a rate increase.

Mr Mancini: Mr Johnson said it today.

Mr Owens: I'm surprised at Mr Johnson. Second, in terms of the determination of rate increases, as you are well aware—I've responded to you on this question earlier today—

The Chair: Excuse me. Can you hear what he's saying?

Mrs Leitch: Not very well.

The Chair: Have we got some of these interpreters? Have you got one in front of you?

Mr Mancini: Couldn't we just turn up the mikes?

The Chair: We're getting feedback.

Mr Mansfield: We have an awful lot of conversations going on that are sort of interfering, especially when the lady here was asking the questions. There are too many other people talking.

The Chair: I have the same problem. I put this ear-phone in because I have a hard time hearing at times. I can't put them all in corners.

Mr Owens: Testing, one, two, three: Is that any better?

The Chair: I can hardly hear him, and he's next to me.

Mr Owens: I don't like to shout at my colleagues. On the first issue with respect to your comments around the government claiming there'd be no rate increase, no member indicated that on the government side. Second, in terms of the premium increases, there are two issues involved. First, the Mercer report talks about a systemic cost, not a per-premium rate increase. Second, if in fact premiums are to be increased, they will be judged on a company by company, case by case basis. There will not be a blanket increase, if in fact there is an increase.

Mr Mancini: That's the exact point I'm trying to make. The parliamentary assistant ended by saying, "If in fact there is an increase." We've had a lot of other important questions asked by individuals and organizations, and the government responds by saying it's appointed some committee that's going to do some work later on. They keep trying to sweep everything under the rug.

I'm quite impressed by just how up to date you are on what's happening here, because you've got the numbers right down. You are accurate. The senior citizens of this province are going to be hammered financially because of Bill 164, and there isn't a government member sitting in this room who can give good justification why senior citizens will have to face what I consider to be a regressive tax just for having the privilege of driving. Senior citizens in Toronto will have a 24% increase in their insurance rates, in Sudbury it's going to be 21%, in Windsor it's going to be 23%, in Ottawa's it's going to be 22%.

Mr Johnson: Who says?

Mr Mancini: I predict that thousands—not hundreds but thousands—of your members will be calling you soon after this government proclaims Bill 164. Further, I'd like to state the following: You know and I know that this government has reduced the number of drugs available at no cost to senior citizens because it has no money to pay for them, and is making senior citizens pick up the cost of those drugs. At the same time, these people have the temerity to tax—

Mr Owens: Mr Chairman, this is not pertinent.

Mr Mancini: You see, this gentleman keeps interrupting me. Does the parliamentary assistant have a point of order?

Mr Owens: On a point of order, Mr Chair: The issue under discussion here, first of all, is Bill 164, auto insurance. It is not a discussion—

Mr Mancini: I don't need to be lectured by the parliamentary assistant.

1930

The Chair: I don't believe he's out of order if he wants to spend his time talking about everything else but the bill.

Mr Owens: I would ask the Chair to ask the member to keep his comments to—

Mr Mancini: I don't need to be lectured by the parliamentary assistant, who hasn't even been in the Legislature more than two years, about what's parliamentary and what's not parliamentary.

I want to know from the government what it's going to do to protect senior citizens who are living on fixed incomes, who are having their drugs declassified, no longer being paid by OHIP. When it doesn't have any money for that, I want to know from the government why it can hammer senior citizens another $200 to $400 a year just for the privilege of driving, with no added benefits. That's the question these people have come to hear. That's the question they want answered.

Ms Haeck: Would he like an answer?

The Chair: I'm sorry, but time is up. It's a pleasure having you here for the half-hour. There are different points of view, and if you watch a little longer, I think you'll find that everybody has a different opinion on this subject. I hope you'll be able to follow the rest of the hearings. Thank you for appearing before this committee.

Is Mrs Ann Dagleish here? No?

COALITION OF MOTORCYCLE ORGANIZATIONS

The Chair: I'd like to welcome the Coalition of Motorcycle Organizations. Would you mind identifying yourselves for the purpose of Hansard and for the citizens of Ontario. I know Mr Allan Johnson; introduce your colleagues.

Mr Allan Johnson: The coalition is a group formed as an umbrella council to provide input to government agencies and commissions on insurance. We've been active for the last six years. With me is Mr Bob Ramsay of the Motorcycle and Moped Industry Council, which is the trade organization for importers, manufacturers and distributors of motorcycles and equipment. Also with me is Mr John Cooper of Cycle Canada magazine, the largest publication of this nature in Canada; his subscription list is about 20,000 motorcyclists in Ontario. In the audience, too shy to appear, are representatives of the Canadian Motorcycle Association, the Ontario Road Riders Association and the Bikers' Rights of Ontario. They're also available to answer questions.

The Chair: We've got one more seat if one of them wants to come forward or if someone else has to come up. We're ready to go; we've got until 8 o'clock. If you can, leave some time at the end of your brief for questions from the committee members.

Mr Allan Johnson: The submission has been distributed, and there's a second submission from the Motorcycle and Moped Industry Council on the financial impact, as well as the combined brief on the complete situation. I will briefly go over a few of the important points, and then we'll take any questions you have.

Over the six years we've been active in dealing with the insurance question, all the way from the Osborne royal commission, through the Ontario Automobile Insurance Board hearings, through the no-fault hearings, through Bill 68 which brought in OMPP, through discussions with the Ontario Insurance Commission and the review project, several advances have been made in the provisions of motorcycle insurance for which we are certainly very grateful to all levels of government.

One in particular is the extension of accident benefits of the same level as for car drivers and passengers. This is not common, particularly in the United States, where motorcyclists are left without any accident benefits coverage in many states.

In order to make that extended accident benefits insurance cost bearable to motorcyclists, Justice Osborne proposed, the insurance board confirmed, and Bill 68 brought in the loss transfer clause. We understand that this has not been altered, although it is not clear from the draft regulations. It's section 9 of Ontario regulation 664; it's also dealt with in section 275 of the existing act. What it means is that in an accident where a motorcycle and a car collide, where fault is with the car, then any accident benefits over a $2,000 deductible are paid not by the motorcyclist's insurer but by the car insurer; in effect, it transfers the loss, the fault, to the at-fault vehicle.

This was Justice Osborne's concept to give motorcyclists a break, because they are very little likely to cause damage to anybody else in a collision. All our calculations on the cost impact, which I will get to in a moment, are on the basis that that loss transfer will continue; in fact, we do wish to see that $2,000 deductible dropped. That has made a substantial difference in the cost. We have discussed this with the actuaries of the insurance commission.

We have several amendments we are proposing. One is in the area of this accident benefits clause. We have done an estimate based on extrapolation from the Mercer study and the Wyatt study, one produced for the Ministry of Financial Institutions and one produced for the Insurance Bureau of Canada, as to the price impact. Those studies dealt with potential automobile increases. We've translated those to an impact on the motorcycle. Our best estimate, if you use the Wyatt estimates on the impact of the changes, is that under the proposed Bill 164 and the scale of benefits, the required premium increase for a basic motorcycle policy will be in the range of 21.6% to 28.4%. We quote a range, because there are several assumptions; we only have one and a half years of experience with the OMPP extended scale of benefits. If we look at the Mercer calculations, it looks like a required premium increase would be in the range of 12.9% to 19.3%. These are for the first full year of the new system and are based on the current level of transfer of accident benefits.

Either of these ranges are greater increases than we have had in any year since 1977; I went back that far. Increases have ranged from minus 0.1% to 12%, with an average over that 15-year period of 5.9%. Either of the ranges that appear to be going to occur would create considerable hardship in the current economic climate.

One of the things we would see is an increase in the number of motorcyclists who are riding without insurance. This has increased in recent years, according to figures supplied by the insurance commission to us just recently. In 1988, 6.9% of injured motorcyclists were not insured; in 1990 it was up to 9.4%. We would think it would be higher when premiums rose to that extent.

We do propose an amendment to remove the $2,000 deductible currently required by the Insurance Act, subsection 275(3). If that clause which reads, "No indemnity is available under subsection (2) in respect of the first $2,000 of no-fault benefits paid in respect of a person described in that subsection," were removed, it would reduce the required premium increase, according to our calculations, by about 5%. That's the price impact. That's still a higher price impact than the average increase we've had each year over the last few years. We think any further amelioration is in the government's hands as to changes in the scale of benefits or some other mechanism.

If price controls are considered, what we saw in the late 1980s, when price control was brought in while the system was being reformed, was that the insurance companies have several ways to deal with this limit to their price increases. Generally, they try to get out of the insurance business. They restrict their underwriting or they try to restrict the provision of benefits and become slow or absent payers. The third option, of course, is that they just simply eat the costs and live with them, but I don't think that's likely what's happened.

The next amendment we'd like to propose is concerning the issue of tied selling. We've had discussions with the insurance commission over the last two years on this business. Tied selling basically is when an individual walks into an insurance agent and asks for motorcycle insurance and he or she is told: "We have to have your car insurance or your house insurance as well. We won't write just motorcycle insurance." A variation on this is, "We'll write motorcycle insurance," but what they offer you is a Facility policy at about twice or more the rate of what you probably should be rated at if you have a good record.

While the proposed changes in the act do change slightly the wording of the clause under section 438 that makes this an unfair and therefore illegal practice, we think there should be an additional amendment to make the offering of a Facility policy an unfair practice as the person is not a high risk. The government has been trying to depopulate the Facility as far as automobiles are concerned. We think that many motorcyclists are now referred or threatened with a Facility policy in order to get other business from them. That shouldn't happen. We need a level playing field.

On our third amendment, often when you go in to buy motorcycle insurance you are rated not on the objective basis of your driving record or your claims history but on such things as make, model, size and type of motorcycle or even the visual profile of that motorcycle. Some people have been rated on what they're wearing or how they look. This is the kind of economic discrimination that has resulted in certain companies having what they call blacklists. Certain makes and models of machine will not be covered at all. Unfortunately, many of these machines are some of the safest machines made.

A classic example we brought to the attention of the insurance board a couple of years ago was the BMW K1 motorcycle. It had anti-lock braking, the first production motorcycle to have that, and yet Jevco, the largest underwriter, wouldn't touch it. Why? Because it had a fibreglass body or something, yet that machine was probably safer because of its anti-lock braking equipment. It looked like it might be a fast motorcycle. "Well, it has to have a big engine because it requires a large amount of electricity to drive that anti-lock braking system."

Occasionally, there's a different version of a blacklist. It's called a whitelist. In this case, the company will insure only certain makes and models that it predetermines, that it thinks are the cream, likely not to be in accidents. I believe you had appear before you earlier one company that writes motorcycle insurance that has a whitelist.

We would like to see an amendment to the basic third-party accident benefits policy that making use of the type, model, size, vehicle profile of a motorcycle is an unfair practice in rating. It should be on the driver and on the record of that driver.

There are several other issues I'll just touch on quickly. There's a lack of availability of insurance for off-road motorcycles that are licensed under the Off-Road Vehicles Act and trail-type motorcycles of limited use that are licensed under the Highway Traffic Act; similarly, a restriction in the availability of antique and classic motorcycle insurance. Only two firms in Ontario at the moment will write this kind of coverage.

We do think, and we've proposed this several times before, that there will be a lot of technical details, minor problems, whatever the final form of this act is, when it goes into force. We would like to see a motorcycle insurance advisory committee made up of government, the insurance commission, the insurance industry and motorcyclists to sort out some of these niggling details that legislation will never address. We're quite happy to sit down with groups of people. We've been sitting regularly with the insurance commission over details. It's been very helpful. We understand the system better. They understand our particular problems and we think progress in that may be best made in a friendly atmosphere.

We think there needs to be a public review of rate increases. Motorcycle insurance is essential, you have to have it, although some people certainly try to get away without. But we think we have to have a public mechanism, just the same for utility rates, that people can see what the cost requirements are. If your telephone rates are under scrutiny, your electricity rates, so should your insurance rates be under public scrutiny.

We need a standardized classification and rating system for motorcycles. We've been working with the insurance commission in regard to this in its work with the insurance advisory organization to get something like this. We'd like the committee to suggest that we move more rapidly on it. It would make comparison shopping easier. I think it would encourage small insurance companies that don't write insurance now into the market.

I just touch on motorcycle safety. There's been some criticism in advertisements on the radio that we've heard recently that this bill does not address road safety. Of course, that's under the new road safety agency act, I guess, that's coming up, but motorcyclists have been very active for a very long time in improving safety in motorcycles.

Data in this report we've given you show the great reduction in fatalities over the last few years. The industry provides a large number of motorcycles for training purposes. Two out of every three motorcyclists getting their full licence last year in Ontario had been trained through the community college system. We think this is one of the big factors in reducing accidents, injuries and fatalities, and we know that's the only way. Improved safety's the only way to try keeping insurance costs down, because while insurance may pick up the pieces, you always wish you never had the accident in the first place.

I will now shut up and take questions.

The Chair: Great, Al. Okay, we'll start off with Mr Mancini.

Mr Mancini: How much time do I have, Mr Chairman?

The Chair: We have a total of 12 minutes between the three parties.

Mr Mancini: Sir, you join a chorus of other groups and organizations and individuals who have come before this committee and told us that your rates are going to go up. I might as well get right to the point: Do you think that the benefits in Bill 164 are worth the increase in rates?

Mr Allan Johnson: It's going to be hard to convince the motorcycle industry of that. Do you want to discuss that, Bob?

Mr Robert Ramsay: I can touch on that very briefly. In our short little addendum to the overall submission we have tried to calculate what sort of impact this will have—yes, that particular one—on the industry as well as on motorcyclists. We estimate that the number of motorcyclists who have no insurance will actually increase. It's a trend that seems to be growing and it will mean about another 6,000 motorcyclists will operate their motorcycle without insurance.

Because motorcycling is not something that you have to do, it's something that people choose to do, and if they're only choosing to do it three or four months a year or five or six months a year, sometimes the costs can quickly outweigh the risk factor, or the perceived risk factor, of not having insurance. So we believe a very significant impact will be that some motorcyclists choose not to have insurance. This is a very negative thing for the social fabric of Ontario and we think that's not a very healthy thing. Affordability of insurance is key and vital to all Ontarians, and without affordability, then it's counterproductive.

Mr Mancini: So the first effect then, in your view, of Bill 164 is to pretty well negate the intent of the road safety agency.

Mr Robert Ramsay: I wouldn't say that precisely. What I would say is that some motorcyclists will benefit. Each person will make his decision on his own, but some people will choose to act outside of what is in the social best interests of all Ontarians.

Mr Mancini: But if we add another 3% or 4% of all motorcycle riders on top of the 6% or 7% who now don't buy insurance, I'm not sure what the road safety agency is going to do if on one hand it would make it impossible for people to buy insurance.

My other question, and I'd like to direct my question to the gentleman who made the presentation, is whether or not your association has received extensive criticism about the current legislation.

Mr Allan Johnson: I think the increased accident benefits are seen as a positive thing, because roughly 40% of motorcycle accidents are single-vehicle accidents where there's nobody to sue. This is the only consolation.

Mr Mancini: How do you people feel about the loss, or I should say the—

Mrs Caplan: Inability to sue for loss.

Mr Mancini: That's right, the inability to sue for economic loss?

Mr Allan Johnson: I don't think motorcyclists, being the independent sort, have ever taken lightly the idea that rights that have been entrenched since the days of the Saxons—the right to sue somebody, the right for compensation—have been taken away. On the other hand, I know of a number of cases where tort provided no consolation. I had a gentleman come to me just a few days ago. He's been four and a half years trying to get a resolution of a case where he was hit by a drunken uninsured driver. He's had $1,200 compensation in four and a half years.

Mr Mancini: My final comment—

The Chair: Wait a minute. Mr Harnick, you're on now. You've had your time there.

Mr Harnick: Sir, I have had the pleasure of acting for people who've been involved in motorcycle accidents, and the one thing that I find when I'm acting for people who have been involved in a motorcycle accident is that generally they are badly hurt after an accident, particularly when it's an accident with a car or with a truck. I'm sure you'll agree that this in fact is usually the case. Am I correct about that, that generally accidents can be very severe, dealing with motorcycles?

Mr Allan Johnson: They can be.

Mr Harnick: And often are.

Mr Allan Johnson: Although the Osborne report found that there were fewer incidents of head injuries among motorcyclists than among car and truck cases.

Mr Harnick: They wear their helmets, and fortunately their helmets work. But you often see bad fractures, bad internal injuries, facial injuries sometimes, if there's not a mask.

But what concerns me about this bill is that someone who might be badly injured or killed is not treated very well under Bill 164 in terms of being able to claim for his or her actual economic loss. If someone's making $35,000 and has two dependants and is an innocent victim of an accident and is killed, the most his or her family can get to support them for life is $120,000. I wonder if you can give us some comment.

Mr Allan Johnson: That doesn't include an option under the Family Law Reform Act, does it, to soothe the pain and suffering and loss of enjoyment and all that sort of thing for the surviving?

Mr Harnick: Let me tell you about that. The people who get to sue for their loss of guidance, care and companionship under the Family Law Reform Act have to kick in a $5,000 deductible; so after you've given up what really is a $700,000 loss of income, you're also giving up $5,000 per claimant under the Family Law Act. What I put to you is, is that fair for an innocent victim who, under this plan, will be paying an additional 20% to 30% in premiums?

Mr Allan Johnson: I'm not sure. We've had long discussions about the advantages of tort versus increased accident benefits. Generally, I think it's ended up coming down on the side that the increased accident benefits, if affordable under the loss transfer thing—everything is a compromise, and it might be the better way for motorcyclists. Certainly, they were losing out under the previous system.

Mr Harnick: Let me explain another thing. The OMPP—

The Chair: I'm sorry, Mr Harnick. We go over to Mr Klopp. Four minutes are up.

Mr Klopp: Good evening, gentlemen. I found your brief very interesting. One of the things with this whole business of the review of Bill 164 is trying to find that balance; telling people in my riding who are automobile drivers plus motorcycle drivers that they need to have better coverage. You've brought out a couple of examples. Yes, there are some where there's the hero, like winning the lottery, but there are a lot where it's a real crap-shoot. Where do you get the balance? My question about the increases and the number of issues you can take on—as you say, many times the motorcycle is a single-vehicle accident; it's you and the tree, and usually you can't sue the tree. You can maybe cut it down, but you can't do much else with it. On the whole, is this not a better system than what we've had before, keeping in mind that we want to keep the rates affordable?

Mr Allan Johnson: We'll soon know, I suppose. I think one of the great problems in this setting is that it was changed to an increased benefits system and there are literally 18 months of experience with it. That's what actuaries we've talked to are saying. You just can't tell how some of these are going to work out in the long run. That's why there's the uncertainty about it. We're not any more certain, have no clairvoyance, perhaps less than some other people would.

But your party has the majority and wants to see this, and we think there's going to be a cost impact. We've suggested one way to reduce it somewhat, but there may be other things that have to be done. We have no clear answer to that, except that if it is too high a price impact, the same thing might happen as happened in 1990: People were unhappy with the eventual system and voted for somebody else. If they vote for somebody else again, we're going to be back revising the system again, and there we go. It could well happen. We're just trying to get a system that we think motorcyclists can live with and can be economically affordable and will pick up the pieces better than it has in the past.

Mr Robert Ramsay: Mr Chairman, if I may make one quick comment on that particular question, I think that's the real crux of this whole issue, particularly as it applies to motorcycles. We don't have enough information and I think—this is my concern—the government and the opposition parties don't have enough information on how this is going to affect motorcyclists. Every study we've seen deals with automobiles; nothing, absolutely zero, zilch, zip, nothing deals with motorcyclists. So to sit here tonight and say, "Yes, we love this," or "No, we hate it," is inappropriate. What we have to do is get more information before an intelligent decision can be made. I would ask this committee to recommend that there be a study on motorcycle insurance, see the impact, and then we can all make an intelligent decision.

Mr Mancini: Why hasn't the government done one?

Mr Klopp: I guess that's why they have committees. When I first got here, I wondered why we needed to have committees and stuff like that. But that is exactly why and why we're here listening. You pointed out the view that, okay, we've increased benefits but that they have to be affordable; on the other hand, there's never been a whole lot of discussion about motorcycles. I certainly hope MFI is listening.

The Chair: How many licensed motorcycles are there in Ontario, and how many motorcycle-licensed riders? I know there's quite a difference. Just give the people of Ontario an idea.

Mr Allan Johnson: There were 109,865 motorcycles licensed in 1991. There are 460,000 people who have at some time or other passed a motorcycle test and would still be legally permitted to go out and buy a motorcycle, get on it and save gasoline and the rest. One thing I just might add is that motorcycle insurance, if you look at the figures on page 11, is continuing to be quite profitable with the insurance companies, so they do have some margin. These are the official 1991 figures given to us by the insurance commission. It has been a profitable line; these figures do not include investment income, of course.

The Chair: If I don't see you beforehand, we'll see you in the first week of May here at Queen's Park, out in front, okay?

Mr Allan Johnson: Thanks very much, Mr Hansen and committee.

ANN DAGLEISH

The Chair: Mrs Ann Dagleish, come forward, please. I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economics on Bill 164. We have 20 minutes.

Mrs Ann Dagleish: I'm sorry to be late.

The Chair: That's fine. It's cold out there. I'll bet your car didn't start.

Mrs Dagleish: No, the taxi driver got lost. It's not my fault.

The Chair: I can tell you, we ordered pizza from just two blocks away when we sat until midnight. We kept waiting for the pizza. It didn't show up; he didn't know where Queen's Park was. So a lot of people in Ontario don't know where we're at.

If you don't mind, in this 20 minutes, could you leave some time at the end for questions from the committee? They usually like asking questions of your presentation. You can have it for five minutes and 15 minutes for questions, or however you want to split it up; that's your 20 minutes.

Mrs Dagleish: Thank you for giving me the opportunity to tell you how I feel about the car insurance plan which you are considering for people like me. I am in a unique position to comment on the proposal, because I am the only person in Ontario who can say that the judge has considered my injuries and determined that they cross the threshold in the present car insurance system.

I am a 77-year-old widow and a grandmother, and I live alone in a small house in Collingwood. Until my accident in September 1990, I enjoyed excellent health and was able to cut my own grass, shovel my snow and drive-way and get my own groceries and all the necessary jobs around the home. I really enjoyed my independence.

I won't take the time to give you the details of my accident and the troubles after it happened. You should know that I was entirely innocent in the accident and that the injuries have changed my life drastically. My spleen was ruptured and removed. I now have a long scar on my tummy. My neck and my back have been such a problem that I no longer am able to do jobs at home as I used to. I experience almost constant discomfort.

Because I felt it was wrong that I should not recover compensation for my pain and suffering, I went to a lawyer. He told me about the threshold, and it sounded very unfair to me. I told him to sue anyway. I did it for other people as well as myself.

When the Meyer case was decided, my lawyer told me that the judge said an injury would have to be nearly catastrophic and much more serious than mine to cross the threshold. I thought that seemed very unfair to innocent people, and I told my lawyer to go ahead.

Then the insurance company asked the judge to decide if my injuries did not cross the threshold. The insurance company attempt backfired, because the judge decided that my injuries were serious. He said that I should not be penalized because I am a senior and don't have to live with the problems I have as long as a young person would.

My lawyer told me that neck and back problems, my scar and the loss of my spleen are probably worth $15,000 each. In other words, if there had been three people in my car who had each sustained these injuries, each person would have a claim for about $15,000. Under the proposed system, each of these people would have injuries which, according to the judge who decided in my case, would get $15,000 in compensation.

Under your proposal, each one of these claims would be reduced by the proposed deductible of $15,000. As a result, these people would get nothing. What could be fair about that?

When the NDP campaigned for office, it said it would restore the rights of innocent people. My case demonstrates that this new law breaks that campaign promise.

I would also like to say something about the way this proposal will hurt grandchildren. You are taking away the right of even the seriously disabled to sue for anything except for pain and suffering. What if one of my grandchildren were terribly injured? Under your proposal, my grandchildren cannot claim a penny of any of the cost of providing the care they deserve over and above what your chart allows. Under your proposal, my grandchildren are stuck with the average industrial wage in Ontario or their wages at the time of the accident. The right that was left to them under the present threshold scheme to recover wages based on what they might have become, is taken away. I cannot understand why you are doing that to innocent children.

I'm not able to answer tricky questions about the good and the bad things in your proposal. I'm sure there is some good. I can tell you what seems fair to me and other seniors like me, though there are some things about this that just don't seem fair. Thank you for listening to me.

The Acting Chair (Ms Christel Haeck): Thank you very much, Mrs Dagleish. We do appreciate your comments. I will turn to Mr Owens to begin the questioning.

Mr Owens: Thank you, Mrs Dagleish, for coming here this evening. I'm sure it's difficult to come to a committee and talk about a personal experience such as you've had.

I want to agree with you that the threshold under the current system is unfair. You've had some limited success, as I understand it from your presentation, in fighting that threshold to date. Is that correct?

Mrs Dagleish: Yes.

Mr Owens: And are you still in front of the court, at the court of appeal now?

Mrs Dagleish: No.

Mr Harnick: Do you want me to clarify?

Mr Owens: Are you the counsel?

Mr Harnick: Well, I've read the case. Do you want me to clarify so that everybody understands, or do you want me to sit here with my hand over my mouth?

Mr Owens: With your tort in your mouth? No, if you could clarify that.

Mr Harnick: If you think what happened to this lady is funny and you want to make jokes about it, go ahead. I don't think the loss of a spleen is very funny; you might think that's a very amusing thing. What's happened to this lady is that a preliminary motion has been brought to see if her claim makes the threshold. At that motion, the judge decided that, as of that day, her claim made the threshold. When she goes to trial, probably six months or a year from now—I don't know what stage the case is at—I suspect the defence lawyer will bring another motion at the opening of trial and again ask for consideration as to whether the claim meets the threshold. That's the situation she's in. I think the importance of this witness is that she extrapolates, based on what her lawyer tells her her case is worth, what she would get under the brilliant system now before us, which is Bill 164: For loss of a spleen, she gets zero.

The Acting Chair: We appreciate your legal interpretation. I will now turn the floor back to Mr Owens to continue.

Mr Owens: We've had presentations from insurance companies and legal counsel, and one of the suggestions that came out during a presentation from a company called Progressive Casualty was that we not have the kind of test that we have envisioned in our legislation, but that we have a verbal threshold as well as a monetary deductible. How would you feel about that, the increased lack of access you would have had? You're now two years after your accident and you're still going through the legal system. How does that make you feel?

Mrs Dagleish: It's such a long process; it doesn't make me feel too good.

The Acting Chair: I have to turn the floor over to Mr Mancini at this point.

Mr Mancini: Mrs Caplan has a number of questions she'd like to ask.

Mrs Caplan: I appreciate your coming today. It's important for us to hear from individuals how this is working. I know how disappointed you are with the NDP government, which promised it would have full tort for both pain and suffering and economic loss within a full government-run system. That was their campaign promise. Your coming here today and reminding them of that I think is very important, because Bill 164 is not what they promised. The concern I have is that you are going through the process of the existing legislation and—the United Senior Citizens of Ontario, which was here just a few minutes ago, had this to say on behalf of seniors:

"We have received very few complaints about the present method of claims handling, either for bodily injury or property damage. Improved claims handling and efficient delivery of accident benefits appear to be a direct result of the current legislation.

"Another benefit to seniors has been premium stability....our members have been pleased with the stability over the last two years."

They're very concerned because they believe, as the evidence has been put forward, that senior citizens in Ontario will see auto insurance rates increase between 4% and 20% next year.

You're going through a situation where you don't know how the existing bill is working, because you haven't finished your court case. We have heard people coming before the committee saying, "This bill makes the present system worse." They have said that the government should withdraw the bill and wait till we have the result of cases such as yours to see what improvements should be made. In fact, that was the recommendation of the senior citizens' alliance: "Why don't you just wait a little bit"—I'm paraphrasing now—"and give the present system a chance to be fully studied and reviewed?" so we can look at the results of cases such as yours.

What I wanted to ask you, given all the suffering you have had, is whether you think, before they rush ahead with amendments that are going to make it worse—particularly for your grandchildren and young people, because they can't go to courts even when they do meet the threshold requirement to sue for economic loss—that they should pull the bill, withdraw the bill and wait until they've had a little more experience.

Mrs Dagleish: I don't know.

Mrs Caplan: You don't know? Thank you.

The Chair: Mr Harnick.

Mr Harnick: Mrs Dagleish, these are pretty tough questions—I appreciate that—because what you’ve been asked is to compare Bill 164 to the Ontario motorist protection plan, which is what you’re dealing with, and they’re both pretty bad, aren’t they? You have to answer yes or no.

Mrs Dagleish: Yes.

Mr Harnick: What I want you to tell us is, how serious was your injury?

Mrs Dagleish: Serious enough. I had never had an operation in my life and then they took my spleen out, and I had two cracked ribs and I had a great big cyst on the side of my stomach which was very irritated and sore, and I was bringing up all the time. The doctor wanted to operate again on my cyst, but I didn’t want another operation. I thought, “Oh dear, not again.” But everything is sore enough, and then my neck is sore and my back is sore.

Mr Harnick: And those pains are continuing, I’ll bet.

Mrs Dagleish: Yes.

Mr Harnick: Tell me, how does it make you feel that under the previous scheme you could have got kicked out altogether and been told, “Sorry, it’s not serious enough,” and under the scheme the other side is proposing, the new bill, you have to give up $15,000, and all you’re going to get is maybe $15,000 or $20,000. How does that make you feel?

Mrs Dagleish: It makes me feel terrible.

Mr Harnick: Is it right?

Mrs Dagleish: No, it’s not right.

Mr Harnick: Tell these people why.

Mrs Dagleish: Why should I suffer? I was innocently hurt, and why should I suffer without any compensation?

Mr Harnick: If your lawyer does a really good job—I know who he is, and he will do a really good job—and you get up to $20,000, how does it make you feel at the end of the day, when you have $5,000 to show for it, because your $15,000 had to go to pay the insurance scheme to pay drivers who were at fault?

Mrs Dagleish: I don’t feel good about that at all. It’s not right.

Mr Harnick: Thanks, Mrs Dagleish. I appreciate that.

The Chair: I’d like to thank you for appearing before this committee. You did a real good job.

Mrs Dagleish: Thank you. I tried.

KEITH HARRIS

The Chair: The next presenter is Keith Harris. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. I guess you’ve been here since quarter to 7; I met you on the stairway outside. We have 20 minutes, and in that 20 minutes, would you leave a little time for questions at the end for the three parties? You may begin.

Mr Keith Harris: I’m here on behalf of myself, as an accident victim three days after the existing no-fault insurance act came into effect. I’m here to ask you, as people who are taking care of my life, before you even consider

Bill 164, to go back and clean house and make sure the original no-fault insurance is working, because it is not. I’m asking that you make amendments; that if you do go ahead with Bill 164, previous accidents under the existing no-fault system be included in that.

As of tonight, I’m in the hospital for back surgery tomorrow morning, resulting from the accident of 1990. I really don’t know what else to say. All I can say personally, as an injured victim, is that I have no rights to sue as of today. I would hope you people listen and go back and clean house and make sure the bill works properly before you go ahead and change it to something else. That’s all I really have to say.

The Chair: Can you elaborate a little more to give the committee a better idea? I know it’s right here. We’ve got your brief; I don’t know whether all the members have been able to go through it. You got hit? You’re a motorcycle rider.

Mr Keith Harris: I was. I will never ride one again.

The Chair: Has everyone had a chance to read the brief? Are you ready, Mr Harnick?

Mr Harnick: Oh, I think I can be.

The Chair: The thing is, though, that a lot of people in Ontario are watching this and they don’t have a copy of the brief. Maybe you could give a little bit of history.

Mr Keith Harris: To start with, I claimed benefits under the no-fault benefits act. They were paying me $600 a week. I’ve been off for over two and a half years, unable to work, due to the injuries from the accident. Out of the first 14 months, benefits were held up for six months; I went without pay for a period of six months within that 14 months. And as of just a little better than a year ago, I am totally cut off benefits due to their doctors stating that I am fine. Their doctors turned around and stated that I needed to have a CAT scan done and told me they would take care of it, and they never did anything. So I proceeded on my own to have a CAT scan done, and that is the result. I am in the hospital tomorrow morning for back surgery.

The Chair: Could you describe the accident you had?

Mr Keith Harris: I was going northbound, on an absolutely clear day, on the inside of a double-lane street and a lady was coming southbound and made a left-hand turn in front of me. I had no alternative other than to dump the bike or go directly into the side of her car. I chose to dump the bike.

The Chair: Were there any charges laid?

Mr Keith Harris: Yes, she was charged, but I was notified one day after her court case that I was subpoenaed to go and testify.

The Chair: That gives everybody a better idea. Mr Harnick.

Mr Harnick: How much time do I have?

The Chair: About five or six minutes.

Mr Harnick: There’s no question, sir, that you were the innocent victim in this accident, is that correct?

Mr Keith Harris: Yes.

Mr Harnick: And no one paid you your no-fault benefits without a fight, is that correct?

Mr Keith Harris: I've constantly fought for two and a half years.

Mr Harnick: Then you ultimately went to the auto insurance board and you got your money. Is that correct?

Mr Keith Harris: No. In reality, the Ontario Insurance Commission did 11 mediations with the insurance company. The insurance company refused to cooperate on 11 different occasions to give the information to the Ontario Insurance Commission. At that time, the mediator in the Ontario Insurance Commission deemed that mediation had failed; I don't have that paper with me. That is when they came up with the offer of less than what they owed me for my weekly benefits, and I had to sign a piece of paper stating that I received absolutely no more medical benefits from them.

Mr Harnick: Have you been able to claim for your pain and suffering as a result of this accident?

Mr Keith Harris: No. I haven't even got to court yet.

Mr Harnick: Why have you not been able to claim for pain and suffering?

Mr Keith Harris: There's nothing to sue for. There's no threshold been set.

Mr Harnick: Have you been told by a lawyer that you won't reach the threshold and therefore that your claim for pain and suffering is worth zero?

Mr Keith Harris: He does not know whether or not I'm going to be able to claim for passing the threshold.

Mr Harnick: Ah, so you have a lawyer acting for you and you're waiting to see if you're going to meet that threshold. Is that correct?

Mr Keith Harris: Yes, and the funny point is that when no-fault insurance came into effect, you were not supposed to need a lawyer to deal with your insurance problems.

Mr Harnick: Tell me, could you have dealt with that insurance company without a lawyer?

Mr Keith Harris: Absolutely not.

Mr Harnick: Otherwise they would have beat you up even worse, is that correct?

Mr Keith Harris: They already have beaten me up, even with a lawyer.

Mr Harnick: Tell me this: What kind of surgery are you having tomorrow?

Mr Keith Harris: I'm having a herniated disc operated on.

Mr Harnick: That case is probably worth around $20,000 or $25,000, in my experience.

Mr Keith Harris: I can't put a dollar figure on it.

Mr Harnick: How would you feel under this Bill 164, if your case was worth $20,000 or $25,000—and you've gone through the surgery a couple of years after. You couldn't settle the case before the surgery, correct?

Mr Keith Harris: Right.

Mr Harnick: So you're going to settle the case some time after the surgery. Under this Bill 164, if it had been the law when you had your accident and you were going to get $25,000 for your herniated disc, assuming the surgery is successful, they'd take $15,000 away from you.

Mr Keith Harris: Why? I already paid my deductible for my accident. I've already paid the deductible.

Mr Harnick: You see, under the new scheme that my friends across the way are proposing, they say that somebody with a herniated disc who will get $20,000 or $25,000 has to give back $15,000.

Mr Keith Harris: For what?

Mr Harnick: Well, you see, they're trying to get rid of the little, insignificant cases. Now, tell me, do you think that your herniated disc and your sore back are a little, insignificant case?

Mr Keith Harris: No, I don't.

Mr Harnick: I mean, it's not a little three-week or six-week or four-month or six-month whiplash case, is it?

Mr Keith Harris: No, it's been two and a half years now and it's going to be at least another year or two before I'm even trying to figure out if I'm going to be okay.

Mr Harnick: That's right, and under what these people—

Mr Keith Harris: With no benefits.

Mr Harnick: Under what these people are proposing in Bill 164, if you're lucky you'll get $10,000, because they'd take $15,000 away. Can you accept that?

Mr Keith Harris: No. I can't see how they can justify it.

Mr Harnick: Under the bill that we're working on now, you know that if the surgery is successful your injury won't be permanent and serious, because you'll be better, and you know what'll happen then?

Mr Keith Harris: What is permanent and serious—or "disfiguring" is the word I was looking for.

Mr Harnick: Let me explain something to you. If your surgery is successful and you're all better, your injury won't be permanent and serious, and you know what you'll get under the Liberal plan—

Mr Keith Harris: I have no idea.

Mr Harnick: —for your pain and suffering? You'll get zero. What do you think of that?

Mr Keith Harris: I don't like it at all.

Mr Harnick: So under that plan you get zero and under their plan you get $10,000, and you've had a herniated disc and major surgery. What do you think of these brilliant insurance schemes that the NDP and the Liberals came up with?

Mr Keith Harris: I have to be honest with you. I'm not interested in the final dollar figure; I'm interested in what's available to me right now as an injured party. I don't care about the lawsuit.

Mr Harnick: It might be zero.

Mr Keith Harris: It's zero what I'm getting right now.

Mr Harnick: And it might still be zero. What do you think of that?

Mr Keith Harris: I think it stinks.

Mr Harnick: Thank you.

The Chair: I've got to go on. Mr Johnson.

Mr Johnson: That's a very unfortunate circumstance you find yourself in, Mr Harris. You have my sympathy, believe me. Under the present system, the system that you're under, obviously you're having a lot of difficulty.

Mr Keith Harris: From day one.

Mr Johnson: You're not getting any satisfaction whatsoever.

Mr Keith Harris: No. All I know is I owe over $15,000 in legal fees.

Mr Johnson: Under the new system, the system that we're proposing, that is Bill 164, Mr Harnick has suggested that you will be able to sue for lost income. I think that there's no guarantee that you'll be able to recapture any of that lost income when you undertake litigation such as that. I think it's evident that the only thing we know for certain is that if you're going to have a lawyer and you're going to go and fight for what you think you are entitled to, if you don't get that by reason of some technicality in a court of law or for some other reason if you're not successful in your court case, the only person with any certainty we know for sure is going to get any money is going to be the lawyer, because lawyers always get—

Mr Keith Harris: And the insurance companies.

Mr Johnson: And the insurance companies; that's right.

Mr Keith Harris: They're collecting the policies and not paying anything out. They haven't paid one penny towards medical expenses for me whatsoever.

Mr Johnson: That's right. In fact the insurance companies have been making some very handsome profits in the last couple of years and that would be some of your contribution, no doubt, for sure.

Mr Keith Harris: Yes. I look at these figures here. They've made $7 million last year—profit.

Mr Johnson: Well, actually, they made a lot more than that.

Mr Keith Harris: That's just on motorcycle policies.

Mr Johnson: Okay. I just want to ask you some questions about changes that we propose. Under the new system, the system that we're proposing, Bill 164, we're going to make some improvements over the old system with regard to benefits for people who are in circumstances not unlike your own. Presently, there is a benefit of about $600 weekly. These are income replacement benefits for people who have a disability. At least temporarily, I would believe you've had a disability; in fact, you may still have a disability. I notice that you came in here with a limp. Is that right?

Mr Keith Harris: Obviously, if I'm on the operating table tomorrow at 12 o'clock, I have a disability.

Mr Johnson: So the new proposal offers a maximum of $1,000 weekly, but at least a minimum of $185 if you meet a disability test.

Mr Keith Harris: And who makes up this disability test? The insurance company doctors.

Mr Johnson: No, this would not be the case in this circumstance.

Mr Keith Harris: I've got it right here in front of me. The insurance company doctors are the ones who rule who gets what.

Mr Johnson: I just want to tell you, Mr Harris, that's under the system that you are being dealt with right now.

Mr Keith Harris: That's why I'm asking you, as the people who are running my life right now, to turn around and amend it to include me in what you're doing right now.

Mr Johnson: Okay. I think that we hear you loud and clear and I think that's what we're attempting to do in the changes to this particular—

The Chair: Mr Klopp, did I see your hand up?

Mr Klopp: No, it's fine.

The Chair: Mr Johnson, go ahead. I thought Mr Klopp had his hand up there.

Mr Johnson: Let's just talk about the insurance companies for a minute. While you're so concerned—

Mr Keith Harris: I'm so concerned that this insurance company is holding one of the biggest shares of the Ontario market and it's not even an Ontario company, and it is not paying Ontario citizens the benefits that they're entitled to.

Mr Johnson: It's a very fair point. I just want to ask you this question: Do you think that if we were to improve the benefits under the new system, when compared to the old system—

Mr Keith Harris: I personally think the benefits that are in place right now are pretty darned close to being fine, if you have a body that's willing to turn around and make sure they are given out properly.

Mr Johnson: Then obviously there's something wrong with the system.

Mr Keith Harris: Obviously.

Mr Johnson: If you can't access what you believe you deserve under the present system, then there's got to be something wrong with the system.

Mr Keith Harris: Under the present system, it states in the Ontario Insurance Act that after three years of a permanent disability, if you are permanently disabled, it turns into a pension. I've lost that; I've lost the total pension for the rest of my life because of this.

Mr Johnson: Someone's determined that you're not totally disabled.

Mr Keith Harris: I don't know how anybody—

Mr Johnson: Is that what they told you?

Mr Keith Harris: Yes. The insurance company's doctors have told me I'm not disabled, but I am presently collecting income security from the federal government, which has declared me permanently disabled. You tell me how that can work.

The Chair: I've got to go on to Mr Mancini.

Mr Mancini: Mr Harris, having had a number of years' experience dealing with the Workers' Compensation Board, the first thing I'd like to say is, in regard to the information you've made available to us and through the testimony that I've heard that you've given to my colleagues, yours is almost identical to dozens, if not hundreds, of workers' compensation cases that I've handled on behalf of injured workers over the last 18 years. When people in this room express surprise to you that there's a breakdown in the system, please don't believe them, because there are breakdowns in every system. If you ever had to deal with the Workers' Compensation Board, as everybody in this room sitting at this table has had to—

Mr Keith Harris: As a matter of fact I did, because this is one of the problems I have run up against. I have had two previous discs removed from a workers' compensation claim. I am working on my third disc removal right now.

Mr Mancini: So let's not be overwhelmed by a member of the Legislature saying: "There must be a breakdown in the system. It's all got to work perfectly." It's human beings who are handling all of this and yes, there are breakdowns. But I find some of this very curious and difficult to follow. I'd like to ask you a couple of questions. I'm sorry I don't know more about your case; I only know what I have in front of me.

Mr Keith Harris: I could only give what I have in front of me, because I only had three days' notice as it was, coming here.

Mr Mancini: That's fine, sir. I appreciate that. It says that you had the accident and you were taken to the Scarborough General Hospital by ambulance and that you were released the same day. How was that possible with the tremendous injuries that you sustained?

Mr Keith Harris: There we get into another whole different realm of situations that I'm negotiating with my lawyer right now.

Mr Mancini: Thank you. Then it says that you were admitted to the hospital thereafter and there were some tests done and some skin grafts, and there were some X-rays of your back area, but they were inconclusive. I just don't know how so many mistakes can be made on one person's accident claim. First, you were released the same day, after sustaining what I presume to be some terrible injuries, you had to go back for some tests and for some medical treatment, X-rays were taken and they were inconclusive. I find all of this very difficult to understand.

Mr Keith Harris: Me too. The next day, when I was readmitted to the hospital, I was put up in a room and left for 10 days. My doctor came back to me and said, "Keith, I am very sorry, but I missed the skin graft on the side of your leg." All he did was suture up two lacerations in my leg to repair a tendon that was cut to my big toe, which does still not work to this day. The actual injury for the skin graft was no more than an inch and a half away from the laceration that he sewed up for the other part.

Mr Mancini: My personal belief, based on the information that you have provided to us, is that certainly you have a serious disability and the present law will in fact compensate you.

Mr Keith Harris: I don't have any belief that will ever happen.

Mr Mancini: The thing that I find a little bit difficult to understand, particularly from the government members, is when they continue to say to people like yourself, who have suffered injuries, "The tort system isn't any good, it's a crap shoot and it's rolling the dice," because when they were running for office, the office which they now hold and asked for and won by telling people many of these things, they promised people government-owned insurance with full rights to tort. They didn't say anything about rolling dice and gambling and a crap shoot at that time; they wanted everybody to be able to sue for what they were entitled to.

Mr Harnick: Read what Bob Rae used to say: "Highway robbery."

Mr Mancini: However, that was then and this is now, so we have to put up with all these inconsistencies. I maintain that the Ontario motorist protection plan, with its faults, should be given an opportunity to in fact stand the test of time. I believe it has stood the test of time. I think we need more time to see how the system will play out for the people of this province. I believe that probably some changes should be made to the OMPP in the near future or in the medium future. I don't know why the entire system has to be turned upside down simply because the government has changed, and I don't know why we have to be the only jurisdiction in North America where people lose the right to sue for economic loss. That's the last question I wanted to ask you: whether or not you've had the opportunity to sue for economic loss.

Mr Keith Harris: I haven't had the opportunity to sue for anything.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you, sir, for coming before this committee.

ST MICHAEL'S HOSPITAL, HEAD INJURY TEAM

The Chair: If you want a glass of water, get yourself a glass of water. We're going to take that away because we want to see you. Every time the camera's going down there we're seeing you through the jug.

The next group is from the head injury team of St Michael's Hospital. The two ladies sitting in front of me, would you mind identifying yourselves for the purposes of Hansard and for the people of Ontario to know who you are. I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. We have 20 minutes; it should be a half-hour. The time seems to be wrong here. It only showed 20 minutes. That's what confused me. So the Chair says you've got a half-hour, okay? You may begin.

Ms Sheila MacDonald: I'm Sheila MacDonald. I'm a speech-language pathologist on the head injury team at St

Michael's Hospital. My colleague here is Irene Sullivan. Irene came down with laryngitis, so I'll be doing the speaking in the first part and she'll save her voice for some questions at the end.

On behalf of the head injury team of St Michael's Hospital, I'd like to thank you for the opportunity to present our concerns on some of the implications of the Insurance Statute Law Amendment Act. These concerns relate primarily to individuals with brain injuries.

As you know, insurance benefits can only be effective if the individuals who are entitled to them receive them in a timely manner. Tonight we'll present to you what is actually happening to individuals when they attempt to access the benefits that they are entitled to.

First I'll give you some background on the head injury team. The head injury team of St Michael's Hospital provides multidisciplinary acute care, rehabilitation, referral to community services and follow-up to approximately 220 to 250 people with traumatic brain injury each year. Between 1986 and 1991 we have seen 1,288 people with traumatic brain injury.

In addition, we follow these people at six months, one year and two years post-injury, so we have good opportunity to find out exactly how they access their insurance and what the effectiveness of that was. Many of the individuals we see have been injured in accidents and qualify for no-fault insurance or workers' compensation benefits. Our comments to follow are based on the inpatient and outpatient experiences of these people.

Generally, our team has found that individuals are better served by the current no-fault insurance system under the OMPP. Previously, when individuals had a maximum of $25,000 for rehabilitation, they were often placed in a position of having to wait until their court cases were settled before they could proceed with future rehabilitation. In fact their lives were on hold during this time. Under the current OMPP system we have found an improved access to case management and rehabilitation in a much more timely manner.

The proposed system certainly is an improvement, particularly for students and for those who were non-earners prior to their injuries. Children are still not addressed very well, we feel, but it is encouraging to see a proposal for eliminating the lifetime cap on attendant care. Obviously one who is serious enough to need attendant care will likely need it for the rest of his or her life.

Now I'll move on to our primary concerns tonight, and our concerns are based on the individual's ability to access the insurance funds. As you know, insurance benefits are only effective if they're accessed appropriately and this requires accurate assessment.

Our first point tonight is that assessment of brain-injured individuals by the insurer's representative may not be in the person's best interests. The first reason for that is that an assessor who represents the insurance company is not impartial. Furthermore, individuals with traumatic brain injuries frequently have lack of insight and, as such, they are unable to recognize the full impact of their injuries. Therefore, such a patient's point of view, in an interview as an insurer's representative comes, will probably not represent him well and in fact will be inaccurate.

Usually the health care professionals in the hospitals have spent hours evaluating the patient's status, using standardized tests and 24-hour observation. An assessor should seek the advice of these individuals in developing the rehabilitation plan, rather than just relying on a quick interview with the person or their own assessor.

Our second point is that frequently we have had representatives of the insurer entering the hospital and questioning the patient's family and hospital staff regarding the patient's status. When the patient is not cognitively competent to understand and appreciate the consequences of such an interview, we believe this is a violation of the patient's rights.

The next point is with regard to confusion. If an insurer's representative enters the hospital and begins to ask questions of the person and then presents his or her own predictions and recommendations, and if those predictions or recommendations contradict those of the rehabilitation team and medical staff involved, this becomes very confusing to the patient and family.

The next point is that such assessments by the insurer's representative are a costly duplication of service. When an individual is being thoroughly assessed by a professional team, paid for through OHIP dollars, there is no need to have that person reassessed by the insurer's representative. This can be not only frustrating for the patient but costly for the insurance company, and then the consumers, who are us, end up paying the extra amount.

The solution we propose to this is quite simple. We can appreciate the insurer's need to have information early in the post-injury phase, and therefore our team solution has been to write a letter to the insurer with a summary of all of our assessment findings. This then acts as a prescription for the patient's rehabilitation. That letter is on the last page for your reference. This has streamlined the referral very well for us and has helped people to get their insurance benefits in a more timely manner.

Our second point is unreasonable delays in accessing insurance. We have had many situations in which the insurers have not acted promptly on our recommendations despite the fact that we have sent the rehabilitation prescription letter mentioned earlier. Due to the nature of the cognitive and communication deficits of these people, it is very difficult for them to lobby on their own behalf. What we tend to recommend to them is that they get a lawyer to assist them with the process of accessing the insurance. We think this necessity then negates one of the purposes of the statutory benefits plan, which is to reduce the administrative and legal costs ultimately and have the funds transferred to the individual involved.

Our third point is with regard to change of case management or rehabilitation services in midcourse. In some cases, the patient we are following in clinic will have been seeing a particular specialist whom we recommended for approximately six months only to have his or her case management changed in midcourse because the insurer decides it would like to use someone it has recommended.

Such situations are compounded when the case management or rehabilitation firm that the insurer hires is unfamiliar with head injury. At least 20 to 30 times a year, one of our team members receives a phone call from a firm or agency which alleges to be providing service to one of our patients but is unfamiliar with brain injury. In fact, we've had some of these people who were being paid for their services calling to ask us how to work with the person. While we're happy to be a resource, we think that this is not a good way to provide service to individuals and that there should be some standards put in place to prevent insurers from being able to change the course of rehabilitation on a financial basis when we have made recommendations objectively in the patient's best interests.

Our fourth point has to do with objective multidisciplinary assessment. We are concerned that individuals should be assessed initially and during follow-up by an objective multidisciplinary team. The reasons for this are that, first, it will ensure fair estimates of their rehabilitation and vocational needs and, second, it will ensure that subtle deficits are detected and that the subtle difficulties that occur as a result of diffuse brain damage will be picked up.

For example, a physiotherapist would be more likely to detect subtle physical deficits such as high-level balance problems or difficulties with fatigue in standing in one position over time. That person is going to be more likely than a neuropsychologist or a physician to determine.

We have to have many disciplines looking at the patient to have a fair estimate of his abilities. The multidisciplinary assessment team should include the following: a social worker, an occupational therapist, a speech-language pathologist, a physiotherapist, a neuropsychologist, a psychometrist and a physician.

The third reason why we propose multidisciplinary assessment is to reduce costs by ensuring that the person has the most appropriate rehabilitation plan and can get on with it early in the rehabilitation phase.

Finally, we feel that multidisciplinary assessment will reduce problems proactively rather than after failures and complications arise. It can be quite a mess if the person has to experience job failure and difficulties with his family before he can get on with the business of rehabilitation.

Frequently, we find that the needs of individuals with head injury are overlooked by insurers, physicians and employers who are unfamiliar with the subtle difficulties of traumatic brain injury. Again, this is why we recommend a comprehensive, multidisciplinary assessment at the outset, as the person is leaving the hospital and entering the community.

Our fifth point has to do with the standards and knowledge base of the professionals who assess and treat individuals with traumatic brain injury. Presently, in the draft regulations of January 1993, part VIII, rehabilitation benefits, it's indicated that insurers will accept authorization for assessment and treatment services from a medical doctor, a registered psychologist or a chiropractor. In the case of brain injury, we feel that this process of authorizing and referring patients for rehabilitation services would limit the total picture of the patient's rehabilitation, vocational and academic needs.

Furthermore, it would cause unnecessary time delays. With this process, the patient would have to wait for services while a member of the regulated health professions such as an occupational therapist, physiotherapist or speech-language pathologist would have to go and lobby the doctors or psychologists to cosign their recommendations. This is an unnecessary time delay.

In present practice, these professionals regularly make rehabilitation recommendations independently. For example, occupational therapists prescribe wheelchairs without needing the assistance of a physician or a psychologist. Similarly, speech-language pathologists prescribe communication aids without the involvement of a doctor or a psychologist. A social worker's recommendation that a person requires ongoing counselling should be followed immediately, despite the fact that such professionals are not doctors or psychologists.

The other drawback in accepting information from only these three sources is that despite the fact that a person may be a doctor or a psychologist, he or she may not have adequate information about the cognitive, communication, emotional or functional effects of a head injury. Therefore, the criteria should be related to the professionals' knowledge of brain injury and not simply his or her title.

Our solution that we propose for this final point is that there be objective multidisciplinary assessments, and they should be conducted in order to design fair, comprehensive and effective rehabilitation programs for those who have traumatic brain injuries. It would be possible for clinics in regional trauma centres such as St Michael's to have multidisciplinary follow-up head injury clinics and they could provide assessment and recommendation for the insurers to follow. Such regional centres could assist insurance firms in developing preferred provider lists to ensure that quality of service is maintained.

With regard to who should prescribe or authorize rehabilitation services, it is recommended that the draft regulations be amended to ensure that regulated health professionals as well as physicians and psychologists can do so, and we recommend that standards be set by each profession to indicate the type of training that would qualify one of their members to work with someone with a traumatic brain injury within his or her area of expertise. For example, an ophthalmologist should not comment on one's need for cognitive retraining any more than a speech-language pathologist should comment on one's need for cataract surgery.

Insurance firms should have a network of professionals whom they can consult regarding rehabilitation plans for individuals. Such professionals should have demonstrated expertise in the area and should be recommended by their professional associations.

In closing, we would like to add that there are many opportunities in which insurers and rehabilitation professionals can learn from each other. Our head injury team would be pleased to be a resource to insurers, either in the area of providing education to insurance workers or providing assistance in developing standards and procedures that are more fair for brain-injured clients.

Remember that fair access to the comprehensive insurance benefits to which brain-injured individuals are entitled can only be achieved if there is fair assessment and referral to appropriate and effective services. Thank you.

Mr Owens: The Regulated Health Professions Act seems to follow me around. I want to say that in terms of your concerns with respect to delegating the responsibilities down through to other practitioners, we'll take that recommendation back to the minister. I certainly hope, in terms of offering your services, that we can be included in that offer and, as we have consulted with you in the past, that we can continue to consult with you.

As you're aware, we've set up a task force to look at standards of care to essentially address the issue of the $3,000 cap with respect to attendant care. I guess my question to you is, how would you like to see the standards of care developed around the treatment of a person who sustains a cognitive injury as a result of an accident?

Ms Sheila MacDonald: That's easy. There are already some in place in some of the colleges, and some of our Ontario associations borrow from the American standards already. Each profession should set up its own within its college. It should be something that consumers demand of the colleges, the College of Audiologists and Speech-Language Pathologists of Ontario, the College of Psychologists of Ontario, the College of Physicians and Surgeons etc. I think those colleges could write those standards without any expense to taxpayers.

Mr Owens: I guess the one thing around this certification, I guess is the word I'm looking for, for persons who would be capable of rendering an opinion with respect to a head-injured individual: How do you see that happening without having to go through the 12-year wrangle and transcending three governments, three political parties? How do you see that happening in a relatively expeditious period of time?

Ms Sheila MacDonald: I'm presently designing a course that I hope to offer at the University of Toronto for speech-language pathologists, so I'm being proactive in this and I would hope that other professions would do the same.

Ms Irene Sullivan: Psychology is moving towards specialty designation as well.

Ms Sheila MacDonald: Yes, so we would just require in our associations that you have to have a certificate in this area before you can comment on it.

Mr Mancini: I don't really have any questions other than to say that I find your brief to be highly professional, most interesting and I believe that the things you've recommended make good sense.

I'm hoping that whatever this committee is that the parliamentary assistant keeps referring to—I should let you know that every group that comes in that has some idea or some problem that doesn't seem to be able to be implemented at the moment is all going to this committee. So you join a long list of people who are going to be considered at whatever this committee is. But certainly I wish to compliment you on the work you've done and on some of the initiatives that you've told the committee you're undertaking.

Having had some experience in working with the head injury associations across Ontario, particularly groups in southwestern Ontario and here in Metropolitan Toronto, I know the work they do is not only very needed; it's not well understood the way—I just want to re-emphasize the point you made this evening. There are very few people out there who understand the difficulties that head-injured persons face when they try to go back into the community. The more professionals we have who understand this problem, the better we'll be able to educate the entire community and the quicker we'll be able to integrate these people back into their own neighbourhoods.

The Chair: Mr Harnick. We've got three minutes till 9 o'clock. I made a mistake. It wasn't—

Mr Harnick: Can I have as much time as Mr Owens? He had about five minutes. I timed it. I timed it specifically because he got a second question in.

The Chair: You've lost one minute already. Go ahead.

Mr Harnick: Thank you. Let me tell you about a situation that I'm aware of: Young fellow, high school age, end of high school, is involved in an accident. He's an innocent victim and he suffers a severe head injury. What made me think of it was the use of the word "subtle," because when you look at this young fellow, he is the healthiest-looking person you can imagine.

Ms Sheila MacDonald: The walking wounded, we call them.

Mr Harnick: He doesn't even look wounded. He plays tennis, he skis and physically he's in good health. Unfortunately, his brain was injured in an accident in which he was an innocent victim and his ability to learn has been totally lost. He can't retain any information. He was a relatively good student and, based on some of his interests, a future income loss was developed for him based on what he, in all likelihood, would have gone on to do. A future income was based on an income of some $50,000 to $60,000 a year. He received a package that, based on his future loss of income, will make his life a quality life.

Under Bill 164, which fortunately hasn't been implemented for this young fellow, he would have received the equivalent of about $20,000 a year for the rest of his life, which would have put him on the poverty line, because this bill, Bill 164, says you can't claim for your economic loss beyond what we're prepared to give you, and we're prepared to give you $391 a week and that's indexed so that you'll keep up with the poverty line. That's basically what it says. Under the OMPP and under the system previous to that, he claimed his full income loss.

How important is it for this innocent victim, who suffered subtle head injury, or even a not-so-subtle head injury, to have access to his actual income loss in terms of the quality of his future life?

Ms Irene Sullivan: I think one of the areas that the new proposal falls down in is with children and adolescents who have no work experience or limited work experience. We cannot speak totally to their potential; we make estimates about what their potential would have been. I think for children and adolescents and people in school this act falls very far below helping them and they still should retain the right to sue for income.

There should be estimation based on—for example, sometimes we have the luxury of having school reports to know how they're performing prior to their injury. With estimations post-injury I've seen people whose—for example, a case where an IQ was 150 following a head injury. Of course, the lawyer and the insurance company said he's still above most of the people. However, as we had the luxury of having the results prior, he'd been tested in school just by chance. His IQ was around 185. So his potential was any kind of job he wanted, really, and now he has severe behavioural problems and basically he'll never work. He's inappropriate.

So I think especially for non-income earners or people who have not earned a wage, the act falls down very badly and really does affect the quality of their rights.

The Chair: Mr—

Mr Harnick: I want a second question, just like Mr Owens had.

The Chair: Mr Harnick, it's exactly the same time. I'll make sure when we go on the road you've got a new watch there, okay? I'd like to—

Mr Harnick: Will you buy me a new watch?

The Chair: You can use this one. It's got no face on it there, no numbers, so—

Mr Harnick: Sort of like the NDP part of the—no faces on them.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee.

Ms Irene Sullivan: Thank you for the opportunity.

STEVE RYAN

The Chair: The next presenter is Steve Ryan. Come forward, please. I like the colour of your tie there, sir. You have 20 minutes. In that 20 minutes if you can leave some time at the end for questions from the committee. Mr Mancini will be the start-off on questions.

Mr Steve Ryan: I submitted my presentation last October and it doesn't seem to be around anywhere so I just have my copy.

The Chair: Okay. We can make other copies for the committee.

Mr Ryan: Okay. But I did send it in to a Mr Decker back in October and then this was postponed.

I'd just like to share with you my experience with no-fault insurance and the OMPP. I've been very successful with it, getting every benefit we're entitled to, but it's still not good enough.

On June 29, 1990, a driver sped through a stop sign in the village of Newcastle, causing a T-type crash. Our daughter and son suffered serious injury. Both were wearing their seatbelts.

Our daughter recovered eight months later from the stomach and leg injuries, while our son remains out of school, brain-damaged from the head injuries he sustained. My wife is a registered nurse and works the midnight shift at the local nursing home. She drives on a limited basis.

On August 11, 1990, I ceased my real estate career to care for our injured teenagers.

In November 1990 we sought legal counsel with our family lawyer. He referred us to a specialist in personal injury litigation. He proceeded with litigation on behalf of our son.

In early 1991 I wrote to Mr Peter Kormos and Mr Robert Runciman of the Ontario Legislature. Both responded with letters of support. Mr Runciman's letter was very specific as to the harshness and the unfairness of the existing legislation.

After taking our son to many local doctors without any improvement, he was referred to the whiplash and headache clinic at Sunnybrook hospital. The expert examinations, physical and psychiatric treatment brought about improvements for which we are grateful.

In August 1991 I found an evening and night security guard's job with continental hours. This allowed me to work, leaving the daytime open for our son's numerous medical appointments. I was laid off January 10, 1992. It's just as well, as I was exhausted by this time.

Financial lack was taking its toll, as all savings, RRSPs etc were now exhausted. I wrote to my insurance company explaining our financial plight. I also wrote to Premier Rae and Mr Brian Charlton.

My insurance company granted me a $100 per week allowance in February 1992 and advised me to collect UIC benefits. I refused to collect UIC.

Replies came from Premier Rae and Mr Charlton. Mr Charlton's letter alluded to care giver benefits. He recommended I contact the Ontario Insurance Commission to seek assistance as to eligibility. The pre-recorded tapes and advice from the counsellor equipped me to claim care giver benefits.

At this time, a litigation specialist with my insurance company called, advising that she was now handling our file. She sent an investigator and a neurorehabilitation team to our home to assess our son and our family needs. Shortly thereafter, she granted me full gross income care giver benefits based on my 1992 security guard's wages. Subsequent to this, she paid me retroactive to August 1, 1990.

The year 1992 introduced us to the consultant doctor for independent medicals. A neuropsychologist, neurologist and neurosurgeon examined and interviewed our son in May, June and September 1992 respectively.

After six hours of interview and psychological testing, the neuropsychologist wrote in his report that our son does not have a closed head injury and does not suffer post-traumatic stress disorder. He also wrote that our son has many psychiatric problems, none of which are related to the accident. He finally stated I should be removed as our son's supervisor. I was offended and humiliated by his report. A letter of protest to the CEO of my insurance company was mailed by me.

The litigation specialist hired the neurorehabilitation team who assessed us at our home. At present, two therapists are working with our son on his cognitive and language deficiencies. He continues his Wednesday psychiatric group therapy in Oakville. He's learning pain management and healing of memories caused by the post-traumatic stress disorder.

From the time of the accident until he participated in learning pain management, he had been on five different drugs. Today, the only chemical interventions used are Imetrix injections when a severe headache comes on. He describes these headaches as feeling as though his brain is floating and a nail is being driven into it.

Our son is improving emotionally and psychiatrically. We realize he will never be 100%, due to the brain damage. On September 23, 1992, he passed the Hugh MacMillan Rehabilitation Centre's program, which will allow him to obtain his driver's licence. At this time, I will remove myself as his care giver.

Our son got his driver's licence December 16, temporarily until March 3 when he's being reassessed, so that very day, December 16, I called my insurance company and asked them to terminate me as his care giver, as we do not, my wife and I, want to hinder his recovery in any way.

Of course, this puts me out of income and out of a job, but I do realize I can claim benefits under the OMPP if I am mentally or psychologically injured. I'm stressed out beyond belief, but at this point I'm not prepared to make a claim in that regard. I want a job.

The OMPP does not provide any funding or reintegration programs for people like me. I mean, I was cut off just like that, and the insurance company had every right to do it.

In regard to the threshold, it is my understanding the first case has gone to trial and the judge has ruled that only "near catastrophic" injuries will qualify.

Mr Charlton's plans to reform the OMPP have my full support. Lifetime medical is a must. Lost future income is covered by a loss of earning capacity benefit indexed for inflation. His program provides the best of guaranteed benefits combined with access to the courts for pain, suffering and psychological damage, subject to a $15,000 deductible.

Finally, I have joined the Durham Region Head Injury Association. The monthly meetings and seminars are helping me to understand what our son and other family members are going through.

In summary, my recommendations to the committee are:

— Insurance companies must provide to accident victims and their families all pertinent information related to guaranteed benefits. I didn't know about booklet OPF number 1, which covers all the guaranteed benefits, until 20 months after the accident.

— All insurance companies should be compelled to make periodic home visits to victims to assess needs and answer questions. Phone contact alone is inadequate.

— Only doctors who treat as well as examine patients should be allowed to do independent medicals.

— Patients should be allowed to tape-record independent medical examinations to provide a record of the doctor's examination practices, questions and answers.

— Parents like myself should have income and programs available to allow us to reintegrate into the workforce. We need to be restored to a pre-accident basis.

— The Ontario Insurance Commission should be promoted with regard to its services to the motoring public. They were of great assistance to me.

— The head injury associations should also be promoted in greater detail, as many accident victims suffer head and neck injuries.

This has been my experience since June 29, 1990. The OMPP has many fine points. It needs reform. Consultant doctors who provide offensive and demeaning reports should be put on alert that their practices will not be tolerated. May God grant this committee the wisdom of Solomon as it makes its decisions.

Mr Mancini: First of all, Mr Ryan, I want to say that the story you've told the committee is one that I'm sure makes us all want to express our personal sympathy to you and your family. I'm somewhat confused as to exactly how you would like to reform the OMPP. Did I understand you correctly when you said you would prefer immediate benefits instead of the right to sue, or did I understand you to say that you would prefer the right to sue as well as immediate benefits that you weren't aware of? I lost you for a second.

Mr Ryan: I've been watching these proceedings for three days, and I must admit I have some doubts about Bill 164 that I didn't have three days ago. It's my perception that the insurance companies have no intention of paying a dime for additional compensation over and above guaranteed benefits. They're going to fight me. They're fighting me like crazy now. Our son had five independent medicals last year: three from my insurance company and two for the defence. They are fighting me.

Mr Mancini: That was going to be my next question.

Mr Ryan: So I may lose, even though my son is brain-damaged. He's not crippled. He's not paralysed. He's not slurring at the mouth.

Mr Harnick: It's subtle.

Mr Ryan: Yes, and I picked up your comment to the previous person. So I'm trading off a guarantee.

Mr Mancini: So what you're saying is that you may lose the court case. Is that what you're saying?

Mr Ryan: There's no guarantee we're going to win.

Mr Mancini: So you would prefer not to have that kind of system?

Mr Ryan: It's rolling the dice, and I'm not a gambling person. If my son were injured under Bill 164, I know he would get a cash settlement, probably up to the limit. There wouldn't be any question in my mind.

Mr Mancini: He'd get a settlement less $15,000. But he'd have to prove—that's where I seem to lose you.

Mr Ryan: I'm torn myself.

Mr Mancini: That's where I lose you, because under Bill 164, in order to get anything over and above whatever the benefits are going to be, you have to apply for action, and then there's a $15,000 deductible.

Mr Ryan: But he may get nothing. In the existing OMPP, does he have a permanent serious disability of a physical nature?

The Chair: As I go along, Mr Peter Kormos has joined us, and we go to Mr Harnick.

Mr Harnick: You just hit it right on. The drawback to the OMPP is whether his injury is permanently serious and whether it's physical in nature. We all know that under the Liberal scheme, psychiatric injuries were excluded. Physical injuries were included if they were permanent and serious, but psychiatric injuries were excluded. You may get nothing, but that has nothing to do with a crap-shoot in terms of liability. You're the innocent victim, is that correct?

Mr Ryan: Yes.

Mr Harnick: So that's the weakness of that OMPP scheme. Even though you have a demonstrable injury, you might get nothing because the Liberal government excluded psychiatric injuries, so that's a big defect, right? You have to say yes or no.

Mr Ryan: We are not suing for psychiatric; we are suing for physical.

Mr Harnick: Because if it was psychiatric—what you're trying to do is prove that it's physically based.

Mr Ryan: Yes.

Mr Harnick: Exactly. A brain injury is a physical injury. It has other manifestations, though. That's what we have to do, unfortunately, with the Liberal legislation; we have to be imaginative.

But let me tell you something about Bill 164. Your son has a serious head injury. He's also got psychiatric problems. How do you like the idea that if he can't work to the potential he had before the accident, all he gets are the prescribed benefits?

Mr Ryan: Of $185 a week.

Mr Harnick: That's right, and then eventually it'll turn into $20,000 a year, but he might have been able to make $40,000 or $50,000 a year, right?

Mr Ryan: I'm taking the worst scenario. For every five reports they have, we have 15. We're going to win this thing, but—

Mr Harnick: I hope you do, but let me ask you this. Under the NDP scheme, Bill 164, the most your son would get when he got to 30 years old was the equivalent of $20,000 a year, for his income, if he couldn't work.

Mr Ryan: I thought it was $30,000.

Mr Harnick: It's $20,000, the average wage.

Mr Ryan: I was told it was $30,000.

Mr Harnick: Yesterday Mr Endicott was here and he said it was $20,000 net. Do you think your son could have made more than that in his career if he hadn't had the accident?

Mr Ryan: Well, he went through two years of high school with a 72% average.

Mr Harnick: And don't you think he should be entitled to claim what his actual loss would be?

Mr Ryan: But as a father with limited money, I have no money to fight these guys. With Bill 164, it's guaranteed.

Mr Harnick: No, it isn't.

Mr Ryan: Yes, it is.

Mr Harnick: No, it isn't.

Mr Ryan: It is.

Mr Harnick: Let me tell you about Bill 164. The income loss, which is the largest part of his claim, might be $20,000, $30,000, $40,000 or $50,000 a year for the rest of his working life, and all he's going to get is $20,000, because they've taken away the right to claim the additional economic loss.

Mr Ryan: The OMPP could leave him with $185 a week.

Mr Harnick: That's right. The OMPP is no good either.

Mr Peter Kormos (Welland-Thorold): On a point of order, Mr Chair.

Mr Owens: He's not a member of this committee.

Mr Harnick: He is so.

Mr Kormos: A point of order, Chair. The standing orders entitle me to raise points of order.

The Chair: What's your point of order, Mr Kormos?

Mr Kormos: The point of order is that that's exactly why New Democrats have always fought for good no-fault, so that people could live—

The Chair: I'm sorry, it's not a point of order. Shut the mike off.

Mr Kormos: Wait a minute. You didn't let me finish my point of order.

The Chair: It's not a point of order. It's a piece of information. I go to Mr Owens.

Mr Kormos: The Premier hasn't even passed his laws yet, Chair, and you're already gagging a member of the Legislative Assembly. Good style.

Mr Owens: My question to you is quite simple. In your view, as a parent, what's more important to you—

Mr Ryan: Security, sleep at night.

Mr Owens: What's more important for you? Is it more important to you to spend years and years in court and potentially end up with nothing or to have immediate benefits, immediate access to rehabilitation? Is that more important to you?

Mr Ryan: I have given this careful, careful consideration. I believe my son would receive less under Bill 164. I know that. But I'll tell you, the accident was two and a half years ago, and our son is improving wonderfully, because he's had the access through my fighting for him with the insurance company. I have a good insurance company: You hear all these horror stories of people getting cut off; we've never been cut off. They have provided and paid for everything I have asked for that's in the insurance contract, but they won't tell me what I'm entitled to. I have to really root around to find out what I'm entitled to.

In the head injury association, I see victims injured four years ago with no medical treatment like my son is receiving. So the no-fault guaranteed benefits—no-fault is the answer in principle.

Mr Owens: I appreciate your answer. Mr Manicini offers you sympathy, but are you aware of what his government gave the insurance companies?

Mr Ryan: Yes, $750 million a year, my money.

Mr Kormos: And you propose to give them even more.

Mr Owens: Were you here for the presentation from St Michael's Hospital?

Mr Ryan: Yes.

Mr Owens: You've mentioned something about the kinds of consultations that took place around your son in determining the nature and extent of his injury. Do you agree that it's in the best interests of people like your son and other accident victims that we look to establishing appropriate standards of care, to have an individual's own physician being involved at the outset in the assessment?

Mr Ryan: We have that now. Nothing happens without the psychiatrists in Oakville coordinating, because the insurance companies pay only if the treating physician makes the proposal, the need. The biggest problem with the insurance company doctors is that they're dinosaurs. They do not have the knowledge or the experience of the physicians who are treating our son from Sunnybrook and the whiplash and headache clinic. They report the most outrageous comments and conclusions after one visit. Every one of them, all five of them—or four out of the five, pardon me. The four consultant doctors left me out in the waiting room every time; they wouldn't invite me in. With the last one I forced my way in. He still wouldn't let me come in.

The Chair: Mr Ryan, I have to say our time is up; it's 9:20. I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee today.

The Chair: The next presenter is Sal Valela. Welcome to the standing committee of finance and economics. We have 20 minutes, until 9:40. You may begin. Leave some time at the end for some questions too, please.

Mr Sal Valela: I'd like to say good evening to everybody tonight. I love you, Bruna and Vanessa and Robert.

My problem started back in August, when I was involved in a motor vehicle accident. Someone hit me from behind. It wasn't as catastrophic as some of these people I've been listening to, who've been given the runaround and all these other things, but it's hurting me enough.

Another thing that this new Road Ahead report doesn't cover is people who have already incurred a disability. There's nothing mentioned about people who are already on disability, either partial or permanent, whatever the story may be.

No-fault: Both the OMPP and this new one have their goods and their bads: The capping is taken off; no index. I don't agree with the 90%, because when I'm involved in an accident and it's not my fault, I believe I'm entitled to what I'm entitled to. I don't believe I should be getting paid over and above the amount of money I've been making as an employee; I should be making the same money I would be making as an employee. That's fair in my eyes, and in the eyes of Solomon, of course.

I don't like the things about the children, the spouse—the death plans. They're going to be increased, but for me that's not high enough, because Robert and Vanessa—I've come to learn, as other people have been teaching me, that you can't put a price on a child's death. But let me tell you, you can put in something to make you happy as an individual, something to make you feel there's something there to care for: You go to the cemetery and bring them flowers or whatever you do, and the thoughts will always be there. The insurance companies are trying to wonder, "How is this going to impact my insurance company in the next 40 years?" It seems I've been going a little off the topic here and there.

Mr Mancini: You're right on.

Mr Valela: Starting with Mrs Fernandez, the lady who came to take the report at my residence after the date of the accident, she was good. She came, she took the report and everything, but I made a mistake on the report and I asked her to send me another one. We had some difficulties: I had to go up and get it. I asked her to mail it. I asked her to send it by courier. They won't send things by courier, which I disagree with, because the way I've organized my life is that I do the minimal running around. I let everything else be mailed to me, even my bank statements or the direct mail deposit I took advantage of back in 1979 or 1980, when I was employed by—well, I am employed by Canadian National Railway. I don't suspect I should be running around to go get my cheques, and all these other behaviours. I just don't like all this running around: I have to run around for Sun Life, for doctors' reports, my reports, for all kinds of different things.

They said about this new family act thing they're talking about that you lose the first $5,000, or a $15,000 deductible. I disagree with that 100%. None of this deductible here, it's just too touching to the heart. I can show you my skis, my fishing rod and my boots and all the fishing equipment that I'm going to try to show my children that there's more to life than running around, that you could spend your time on a hill, you can spend your time out on a boat, fishing, playing chess, doing things. Vanessa, in return right now—she's almost three years old—out of the blue, she'll come up to me and she'll say, "Daddy, my back hurts me," because that's what I say to her. She says, "I want to play horsy. I want to do things," and there are limited things that I can do. I feel pain in my leg.

I believe that the OMPP is a good one, but it can be modified also. So can the new one; it can be modified. The insurance companies are making millions of dollars. They've got houses in Switzerland, Mercedes Benzes, caviar in their cars. Of course, they're working 24 hours of the clock, because their company is striving to make money. But listen, I'm an individual too. I don't want to be behind. I want to be fair, fair to me. I'm losing out on my RRSPs.

Interjection: Why?

Mr Valela: Because my contributions are as high as what they would have been if I was working. But the plan of the RRSP is the same as their request: How is it going to impact me in 25 years? If my contribution is $3,000 this year, 25 years from now that contribution will grow and be substantially higher for me, for Sal Valela and his family.

The insurance company is using the adjusters to relay improper information. I'm phoning the Ontario Insurance Commission, and Mrs Paquette is the lady. Thank God that I've run into this lady, because she's helped me out. I would have banged my head against the wall, because it just seems like the insurance company's allowed to tell the insurance adjuster to inform information to me, like I'm not allowed to get the 80% of my premiums, I'm only entitled to either 79% or they're going to cut me off because of this, this, this and that, when the plan states that you get 80% of your gross pay tax-free. They even disputed that. I had to take out one of their flyers to show them that on the thing it states tax-free. I've got just so many papers. You talk about baggage. I've got my suitcase of baggage.

I really want to get back on to the point of disabled. This act does not show anything, or the previous act, to the people who are incurring a disability, and it hurts, because when I returned back to work in February, not only did I have to hold the pain of the automobile accident but also the pain that I have occurring in my right shoulder: bursitis, tendonitis, rotator's cuff. It's not an easy pain to live with.

I try to manage, I try to get above a lot of the cycle of things by just thinking of the future and moving on. I try to do a lot of things. I want to get better. I don't want to stay idle. I want to be active with my children. I'm missing Robert and Vanessa. I'm missing that thing of putting on the binders and the boots and going down the hill with them and appreciating it, even if it's just here on Bathurst and Sheppard on that little hill. Just to be active, to get back. It's not that I'm not trying. I'm trying my best.

But I don't need a runaround from the insurance companies telling the adjusters and then me phoning the Ontario Insurance Commission to find out what my rights are. As with one of the people in the Ontario Insurance Commission, I put in for my mileage. I still haven't got paid for my mileage. This is 1991. I was going to the doctors, physiotherapy, going back home and to the bank. These people were talking about that.

I took advantage of the system, when the system said that the Canadian National Railways put direct mail deposit. For me, that was beautiful. That was perfect. I never had to go to the bank, worry about my money. The money was always there. Now, when the cheques come to me, I have to take the extra mileage to go to the bank and deposit my money.

I didn't have to do these things before. I had my system. I had my way of living and standard geared in the best and suitable way to make my life better financially and get my financial statements and credits with standing above triple A. I believe you shouldn't abuse or you shouldn't take advantage of the system and you should pay your rates and you should do what you can do and do it properly. That's basically all I have to say.

2130

The Chair: Sal, there was one thing. You never mentioned the accident. Was this a car accident or a motorcycle accident?

Mr Valela: It's a car. I was involved—

Mr Harnick: Rear-end collision.

The Chair: Rear-end collision, okay.

Mr Valela: A rear-end collision in a truck, where I was rear-ended. This is another thing. The TTC driver presented me with an invalid insurance licence. So I took it away from him and he never had one until the police came. After the police came and the other TTC insurance driver came, he presented the police officer with a valid insurance company. All this time that TTC driver was saying to me, "Give me back my insurance card," and I said to him, "No way, this is invalid, a month and a half invalid."

He was never tried for careless driving, driving too close, nothing at all. I even complained to the Ontario Insurance Commission. I've got my briefs here, if you're willing to photocopy them and go back into the briefs. It was what you might consider a minor accident. To who? To other people but not to me.

You've got to look at the individual I am. I'm already disabled. I'm trying to do a job and when I went back to work at Canadian National Railways, you know, they discriminated against me in saying that, "We're going to cancel your job as a painter because the diesel shop and the car shop don't really need a painter any more." In turn they were crying and complaining to the department I work out of that they did want a painter, that they did want someone to get in there and start painting all the safety lines, the safety rails, the walls that are full of grease and grime, paint them white. I was discriminated and I had to fight through my union.

That's another thing—Sun Life. I pay benefits for Sun Life. I shouldn't see why the insurance company should be getting away free. If I pay a little bit, they should be paying too, the insurance companies, like in better driving programs. I agree with a lot of these other people who were up here saying, "There should be better driving programs," no matter if you're 60 years old or 45 years old.

There should be a 24-hour RIDE program. You shouldn't be drinking and driving. You shouldn't be under some kind of medication that impairs you, even out of an automobile accident, that you take some of these pills. But then I'm the only one who really has the responsibility to take care of my family because Bruna was pregnant during the time. Vanessa was small. Robert in the beginning had a meconium of the lungs and, thank God, he recovered from that and right now he's a 22-pound baby, 26 inches, 27 inches. He's a large kid, and I have a hard time holding him up. I was having a hard time going to work, managing my painter's job with a disability in my shoulder, plus doing what I was able to do with the modified duties that Doctor Ocana gave me to try to handle the job with my disabilities.

How come one insurance company sends me to a doctor and says that I'm all right and when I go to the other doctors they say to me that I have a problem, a muscular problem, an acute muscular problem, back strain? I can't understand that.

I'm a simple man. I'm a simple person. I want to lead on with my life. I want to be able to go skiing. I want to give Robert the chance, instead of just sending him out and giving him private lessons. I want to be there with him. I want to be there with both of my children. I want to be able to roll around in the snow and I'm doing that now with the pain and making my pain even worse, because I'll never gain that time, that time that you lose—three, two, one, four, five years old—with my children. You'll never regain it.

You are telling us that if you abuse a child, if you traumatize a child, the child will live with those scars. Well, how about us, 40, 50 years old? It doesn't stop there. The clock doesn't stop. The clock keeps on going all the time. Individuals, no matter if you're male, female, black, white, Croatian, it doesn't matter who you are. The clock keeps on going. I've got to try to make my life better with the injuries but I have to live with the pain.

An insurance company, a Mr Ross—over the holiday season I drove underneath the bridge. There was a company working there. They didn't have the bridge all tunnelled up and I got glass, chips and sand on my windows and now my windows are all scratched. The guy came in and he said to me it was my fault that I had chipped the windows. The insurance guy who came in said it was my fault that I chipped the windows.

Then after that, I went to go buy some groceries to have a little turkey to make my life better, bring the family over, get together at the house and feel better. I got my car. My car was smashed. Somebody hit my door. The guy came out and he goes, I hit the curb. This guy said to me that I hit the curb. These people from the insurance company, the adjusters, you just might as well say: "Hey, wait a minute. We don't need to pay you, Mr Valela. Thank you very much for your annual premium and you can go home now."

Interjection.

Mr Valela: I'm not saying NDP, PC or whatever. What I'm trying to say is that we've got to modify this plan. We've got to make it better for everybody and especially for our children, especially the people from St Michael's Hospital who have been up here who talked about doctors who make independent assessments. I will not let another adjuster in my house. Take note of that: never, never, Mrs Agresti or Fernandez. I will never let another insurance person in my house. I let Mr Jeff Taylor in because I was reaching the point that the only person who was helping me was Mrs Paquette from the Ontario Insurance Commission. I don't know what to say, but thank God for her; and my doctor, Dr Ocana, thank you also.

The Chair: Mr Harnick, we've just about run out of time there. You've got a minute or two.

Mr Harnick: I just want to let you know that under the Liberal scheme, for your injury, unless a court was prepared to say it was permanently serious, serious for ever, you'd get zero. Under the NDP scheme, you would get a certain amount of money because the accident wasn't your fault, a straight rear-end collision, but they'd take $15,000 off.

Mr Valela: How about the threshold?

Mr Harnick: Most back injuries, unless you need some surgery, are worth maybe $15,000 or $20,000 after four or five years. So under the NDP scheme you'd get zero as well.

Now tell me something. You've told us that you're not able to give your daughter a horsey ride. You're not able—

Mr Valela: Oh, I do it but I do under pain.

Mr Harnick: That's right. You do it—

Mr Valela: I do it under pain. I won't let it go by. I won't let these two, three years of my life go by.

Mr Harnick: —and it's hard for you to hold your son. Tell me, what do you think about insurance schemes that won't compensate you a penny, not a single penny because you've lost enjoyment of your life and your family has lost enjoyment of their life? What do you think of those kinds of schemes?

Mr Valela: I disagree with that, but we could come to an agreement. Forget about Liberals, PCs or NDPs or Jack TNTs or IMBNGs or whatever you want to call the next federal cabinets or caucuses. Let's be open, gentlemen and women to meet and to collaborate and to let the insurance companies make money, but wait a minute. I want to have some caviar too, I want a Mercedes too, I want a house in Switzerland also and I want a jet airplane to take me or my tax-benefit company wherever I'd like to go too. Yes, these people do work 24 hours around the clock. They do deserve to make money but I deserve something too.

Mr Johnson: My question is very short and very to the point and it's kind of general, but it could be kind of specific. Basically, you've said a number of times, "This is a proposal that we're presenting here before this committee." We would like to know from all the people who make presentations what they think of it, and we've got lots of opinions with regard to that. You've said to modify it. I was wondering, do you have any specific areas, any particular thing about the proposal we make that you would like to see changed?

Mr Valela: Are you talking about the accident benefits revised—

Mr Johnson: That for example, yes.

Mr Valela: Under this thing, what I'm reading here is the 90%. No, I should be entitled to the same amount of money I was making—I was working at the Canadian National Railways—not a penny more, not a penny less. I should be entitled to contribute to my RRSP. They use the factor, how is this going to impact us under this new plan 30 years from now? Well, how about me and my RRSP 30 years from now? I'm not going to be able to contribute the full amount, so that money won't be working for me; $600 weekly and the old one is not indexed; the new one is indexed.

For people who have businesses and they're working on incomes, like that stuff you have to work out with these groups of people, meet with them open-minded, challenge their points, they challenge your points and go on. Part-time earners I'm not too worried about as of right now, unless I go into a part-time job somehow or another or something. For income earners, you say that this plan's going to cost from $200 million to $500 million. I'd like to know where? If the insurance companies are making—

Mr Kormos: From you.

Mr Valela: Wait a minute. Wait a second. I know it's from me, but what I'm saying is, if the insurance companies are making $700 million, they should be able to lose too. They should pay into the RIDE program.

Mr Kormos: No, that's not how it works.

Mr Valela: Please, excuse me. They should be able to pay into the RIDE program because they want better safety programs, right? We should all pay into it. We should all be able to make better safety programs, everybody, the whole system, because that's what they're after. They're after lowering the premiums, and if you go after that problem head on, you will lower the premiums.

I had one of the worst driving records around. I had to get down on my knees—

The Chair: Excuse me, Sal. Time has run out and I don't think you want the insurance companies to know that you've got a poor driving record.

Mr Valela: No, no, no. I have a good driving record now because I've curbed my standards.

The Chair: Okay, fine. I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee. I understand you've been watching the procedures for the last couple of days.

Mr Valela: I have.

The Chair: We're glad to have had you with us here.

Mr Valela: I thank you very much for letting me speak and letting me present on my behalf.

The Chair: Okay, fine. Thank you. I guess we'll see the committee at 10 am in Thunder Bay. This committee's adjourned tonight.

The committee adjourned at 2142.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Monday 1 February 1993

The committee met at 0930 in the Valhalla Inn, Thunder Bay.

INSURANCE STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1993

LOI DE 1993 MODIFIANT LES LOIS CONCERNANT LES ASSURANCES

Consideration of Bill 164, An Act to amend the Insurance Act and certain other Acts in respect of Automobile Insurance and other Insurance Matters / Loi modifiant la Loi sur les assurances et certaines autres lois en ce qui concerne l'assurance-automobile et d'autres questions d'assurance.

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): Good morning. I'd like to welcome you all to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. We're on day one of travelling and on day four of the hearings on Bill 164, An Act to amend the Insurance Act and certain other Acts in respect of Automobile Insurance and other Insurance Matters.

ORGANIZATION FOR THE MULTI-DISABLED (THUNDER BAY)

HEAD INJURY ASSOCIATION OF THUNDER BAY

The Chair: I'd like to call the first group forward. It's the Head Injury Association of Thunder Bay and the Organization for the Multi-Disabled (Thunder Bay) Inc. Would you come forward, please, and take a seat. For the purposes of Hansard, would you identify yourself and your colleagues and you can start. We have until 10 o'clock, and if you can leave 10 or 15 minutes at the end of your presentations for questions from the committee also.

Ms Alice M. Bellavance: I'm Alice Bellavance, and I'm the executive director of the Organization for the Multi-Disabled. We're a community re-entry service that provides community-based rehabilitation services for those individuals living with the effects of acquired brain injury, which in many cases is traumatic as the result of a motor vehicle accident.

With me are Birthe Ligate, the president of the Thunder Bay Head Injury Association, and her son, Kris. As well as being involved with the Head Injury Association of Thunder Bay they are on the board of directors of the Organization for the Multi-Disabled.

The Organization for the Multi-Disabled and the Head Injury Association of Thunder Bay appreciate the opportunity to address this committee and share our commendations and concerns regarding the Insurance Act in respect to automobile insurance.

In order to understand how this legislation impacts on individuals living with the effects of traumatic brain injury it is also imperative that individuals understand the nature of injury to the brain itself. It is permanent. Once a brain cell is damaged or destroyed, it will not regenerate and the functions performed by that cell are lost.

Damage to the brain need not be severe or catastrophic to be life-altering. Trauma to the brain can cause subtle cognitive and behavioural changes and can occur even when there is no direct blow to the head. According to the current literature, a permanent brain injury can result from an individual being thrust forward and backward in an automobile accident, known as coup contre coup or whiplash, without actually striking the windshield. Many professionals call this "minor head injury," should it be diagnosed.

Damage to the frontal and temporal lobes is often common following this type of automobile accident as well as others. The frontal lobes of our brain control executive function. Executive function controls our ability to attend, concentrate, be tolerant, make good judgement, initiate, be motivated, be in control, and our ability to think in the abstract.

When individuals sustain injury to this area of the brain, they may have ongoing sequelae with dizziness, headache, fatigue, depression, an intolerance to alcohol and related substances, sleep disorders, irritability, intolerance to noise, and the list can go on endlessly. As well, cognitive deficits caused by injury to the brain often alter the individual's ability to understand his environment, and the individual often experiences difficulty with information processing. This then can lead to an inability to respond appropriately to the environment and events in their life.

When these very real results of brain injury go unrecognized and are not treated, they often lead to disruption in the individual's work environment and family relationships. I have had many individuals living with the effects of brain injury say to me that they felt they were going crazy. These are often identified as hidden or invisible disabilities, and individuals living with this type of injury are often referred to as the "walking wounded."

In the US as well as in the province of Ontario, we have now been able to identify that this is of epidemic proportion. Just to know what the numbers are like, 200 of every 100,000 individuals sustain traumatic brain injury in this province, and there are pockets where that average is even higher. If you're having hearings in Sudbury, Ontario, you'll probably hear what those numbers are, because the Ontario Head Injury Association just completed a significant package of research. There's a section of highway where the numbers are double that average, so this might say something about the highway.

Due to the fact that there is no visible disability, the individual is often perceived by the people around him as normal and they have expectations that behaviour will be appropriate. Due to neuro-cognitive damage, this is impossible and individuals are then often perceived as being uncooperative, having a bad attitude or malingering or other such oppositional or behavioural labels. Medical professionals without the necessary expertise in brain injury often diagnose individuals with these symptoms to be neurotic or overanxious when what they are really experiencing are cognitive and physical sequelae resulting from permanent injury to the brain.

The two areas that I wish to speak to specifically are attendant care benefits and access to appropriate rehabilitation.

Attendant care benefits: Attendant/personal care for someone who has sustained injury to the brain can vary, requiring a few hours per day to 24-hour support, depending on the severity of the injury and the outcome of that injury in terms of disability. Limited periods of time may be required for this type of care and support; however, it can also be a lifelong need.

Under the current proposed amendments, the cost is being limited to $3,000 per month. An Ontario Head Injury Association survey shows that supportive life costs require an average of $200 per day for someone with disabilities resulting from an injury to the brain when there are no behavioural difficulties. However, add behavioural difficulties to this and the cost could rise to as high as $600 per day.

When we look at the current rates paid out in the public sector, for example, the per diem cost of low-end chronic care facilities of $200 per day, this works out to a cost of just over $6,000 per month or $73,000 per annum. However, a more conservative cost of institutional care, whether it be acute, chronic or psychiatric care, is about $360 per day. Then the cost escalates to $11,000 per month or $131,400 per annum.

Due to the fact that the current system does not have the capacity to provide individualized, lifelong, portable and flexible services required by individuals, they often are relegated to the back wards of chronic care facilities and psychiatric facilities, putting an additional drain on the public sector.

With all of us being in tune with the escalating health and social care costs in this province, this needs to be addressed. When I, as an individual citizen, pay for insurance benefits for my home and it succumbs to fire, I anticipate that the insurance I paid out will allow me to replace my home. If I become injured in a motor vehicle accident, I would anticipate that my insurance would allow me, first of all, to be able to access in an expeditious fashion the types of rehabilitation options I may require to return to the optimum pre-accident functioning. Should that not be attainable then I would expect to have resources at my disposal to live as independently as I can with the supports that I require for the rest of my life.

In a continent that has been known to institutionalize people at an unprecedented rate, the current proposed benefit for attendant/personal care is totally inadequate. I ask individuals in the government and in the insurance industry to stop and think if it were themselves or a family member whether this is indeed the outcome that they would want to see for their loved ones.

Many of us over time do not need to access benefits that we pay into. However, a limited number of individuals do and should be provided with the opportunity of accessing real supports. The current system is not a win-win situation and impacts on real lives and real people who then face physical hardship, mental devastation and economic ruin.

It is our recommendation that the attendant/personal care benefit be a minimum of $4,500 per month and that it be indexed.

Access to proper rehabilitation: We, the Organization for the Multi-Disabled and the Head Injury Association of Thunder Bay, are pleased to see that the proposed benefits see no lifetime cap on supplementary medical and rehabilitation costs as well as no time limit. It has been demonstrated over and over again in the literature and programs that if an individual, for example, is age 16 when he or she is injured, his or her rehabilitation period may not end at 10 years, which was the case in the current system. That would therefore limit access to these benefits. Also, the costs of lifetime support or care certainly cannot be met with the $500,000 amount, but then that's now offset with the new proposal in the attendant care section.

In expanding the benefits under the new system, which we support, we also have a foreboding concern in that when the initial system was announced there was a proliferation of private for-profit rehabilitation companies and/or individuals that came into the marketplace. Much as we are in support of private enterprise, we question to whom these private companies are accountable in terms of quality assurance and standards of practice.

In the publicly funded sector, we are currently in the process of addressing the fact that we have to provide efficacious programs and services to those we purport to serve and that we are accountable to our funding source, ultimately the taxpayer of the province. There are many private rehabilitation companies that have rehabilitation or medical consultants in their employ who truly work in the best interests of the clients and take the onus upon themselves to develop some knowledge and skill when they provide case management services to individuals living with traumatic brain injury. However, there are a small number of individuals who really do not understand the sequelae following head injury and thereby do a great disservice to the individuals they represent.

We recommend that the insurance industry, along with experts in the field, provide a range of educational opportunities to develop and/or enhance their skill and knowledge in this field.

In a news release dated January 18, 1993, from the Ministry of Financial Institutions, the heading indicated that the minister was establishing a task force on auto insurance. I quote:

"The mandate of this task force was to develop regulatory standards which are sensitive to the concerns of both the costs and the needs of appropriate rehabilitation services. I have also asked for recommendations on the appropriateness of, or alternatives to, the monthly attendant care cap. I look forward to receiving the recommendations of the task force at the end of April."

In reviewing the list of names that the Honourable Mr Charlton announced, my two questions are (1) where is the representation from the consumers who speak on behalf of individuals with head injury, and (2) where lies the expertise on behalf of the professional sector in terms of individuals living with traumatic brain injury?

In consultation with the Ontario Head Injury Association, a literature review was requested for Dr Amies, Dr Corey and Mr Samis and, with no disrespect, none was found.

Currently the Ministry of Health has two advisory committees: one to address issues in acquired brain injury and the other in rehabilitation. Both of these committees are representative of the expertise in these fields in our province. Neither committee was approached with a request for a representative to this task force, nor was the Canadian Association of Rehabilitation Personnel or Chedoke-McMaster Hospital, which is the designated acquired brain injury program in the province.

Going back to my first question, what about consumer representation? The following groups could have been but were not approached: the Canadian Paraplegic Association, the Canadian Head Injury Coalition and the Ontario Head Injury Association.

Further to the fact that there may be a proliferation of qualified and educated personnel employed by the insurance company or rehabilitation corporations, the burden of wading through the morass of documentation and examination and mediation and arbitration procedures still lies with the injured person. When I, as a service provider, think about the challenges I am faced with on a day-to-day basis in dealing with the system, I can't imagine what it would be like for an individual who has to adjust to the life changes caused by head injury. It would appear to create a win-lose situation, with the insurer winning.

Since one of the outcomes of traumatic brain injury often deals with the issue of insight, the individuals themselves may not feel they have a permanent, ongoing disability and have restrictions on their lifestyle and that they have the capacity to return to their pre-morbid state of living. For the most part, for a short period of time they may be able to present in that fashion. However, in the long term, they may not be able to meet the demands of day-to-day living and thereby begin a downward spiral.

When barriers are placed upon the individual in terms of accessing appropriate mediation or supports or if he or she is working with an individual who is not educated or qualified in the field of head injury, the ability to receive effective treatment is severely compromised. Although individuals employed by the insurer may assist the client to complete forms etc, it must be remembered that there is somewhat of a conflict of interest, as it would be in the representative's responsibility realm to save costs on behalf of the insurance company. This would also constitute a manner of legal and ethical conflict of interest.

Should an individual seek to go into mediation with the insurance system, the insurance system is in a better position to afford the best legal counsel, and thereby again success is weighted in its favour. When individuals sustain neuro-cognitive impairments because of injury to the brain, the situation is much worse. Without legal counsel and/or funds to pay for expert witnesses that are equal to those of the insurance company, the injured individual literally has no hope of winning an arbitration or mediation hearing. We recommend closer collaboration with existing bodies of expertise, thereby setting the stage for a win-win scenario for all.

I'd like to thank you again for this opportunity. If you feel we can provide you with more input into this process, we certainly would like to provide that.

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt):

Thank you for the thoughtful presentation. The area I want to get your further comment on is rehabilitation. As you were leading up to your recommendation, I kind of thought you were recommending a closer scrutiny of standards and what not, but the recommendation, at least the words in the recommendation, were slightly different than that. Maybe you could just help me along a little bit with what you mean by, "We recommend that the insurance industry, along with experts in the field, provide a range of educational opportunities."

Ms Bellavance: That's one component of it, and I suppose I could have been very specific around the standards as well. Maybe it's not common knowledge at this point, but the two advisory committees that I mentioned are currently working to address those issues of standards that hopefully will apply to both the public and the private sector. That was knowledge that I just gained on Friday, but this was already typed. I'm hoping that will address it.

Mr Phillips: I actually thought that's what your recommendation was when I was listening to you, that it was going to be around closer scrutiny.

Ms Bellavance: I think it has to be twofold. You have to have the education to have the skill and the knowledge, and then you can develop the standards as well. If you don't know what you're working towards, it's difficult to develop standards. So you have to do both, hand in glove. I just received a call from the Ministry of Health, and I believe there's going to be a workshop March 4 with the Ministry of Health, with some of the experts in the field, along with the insurance industry, to look at how we can develop those types of standards.

Mr Phillips: That's useful. Thank you.

Mr Remo Mancini (Essex South): Can I say to the organization that your brief is quite good. The head injury organizations must be working closely together, because we heard from the Chedoke-McMaster people in Toronto and they had quite an outstanding brief too. I would like to say to you that I appreciate the information you've given us concerning attendant care, rehabilitation, the possibility of moving ahead with important educational matters etc, but you haven't touched at all on what Bill 164 does for people who are severely, permanently injured or disabled in regard to their economic loss.

Are you aware that this bill takes away the rights of all people to sue for economic loss? In some of the examples that you've given in this particular brief, one would assume that a person could sue for economic loss for hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Ms Bellavance: That's right; they could have. My understanding in reviewing the number of documents that have been put out by the government is that—Mr David Tilson (Dufferin-Peel): Don't believe everything you read.

Ms Bellavance: Okay. Under the current system, my understanding was that basically only 5%, who could meet the threshold, still had the ability to sue.

Mr Mancini: But that's for non-economic loss.

Ms Bellavance: That's for non-economic loss.

Mr Mancini: It's for pain and suffering and serious and permanent disabilities. Under the old legislation, which these people are going to change, those people also have the right to sue for economic loss. We're going to be the only jurisdiction in North America that has taken away the right of people to sue for economic loss. No other state, no other province in North America has—

Mr Stephen Owens (Scarborough Centre): That's not true.

Mr Mancini: Can I please have the floor without interruptions from the parliamentary assistant?

The Chair: Go ahead.

Mr Mancini: We're going to be the only jurisdiction—

Mr Owens: Point of order.

The Chair: Mr Owens?

Mr Owens: Quebec also does not allow suits for economic loss.

Mr Charles Harnick (Willowdale): Wrong.

The Chair: I'm sorry, Mr Mancini has the floor now.

Mr Mancini: Not only is that not a point of order, Mr Chairman, but that's incorrect. The parliamentary assistant doesn't even know what he's talking about.

Mr Harnick: You have to buy insurance to protect yourself—

The Chair: Mr Mancini, your time's getting eaten up, so go ahead.

Mr Mancini: I can't help it if the parliamentary assistant keeps interrupting with false information. This group has come to us and this group has made a very solid presentation on matters that concern people who you're trying to represent. I've had a long history of working with head injury organizations and I know the work that you do, and I know that young people, factory workers, people who have a career ahead of them, are going to be big losers under Bill 164 because they're losing the right to sue for economic loss. If you had a son or daughter in university—

The Chair: Mr Mancini, you have 30 seconds left.

Mr Mancini: —and if this son or daughter in university had a career ahead of them, don't you think they should be able to sue for the amount of money that they could have made in their lifetime if they're injured and if they're not at fault? I think that's only fair. Wouldn't you tend to agree?

Ms Bellavance: I'd tend to agree.

Mr Tilson: I'd like you to tell me a little bit about who's going to act for the people you represent, specifically if you're dealing with insurance companies, if this terrible bill is passed.

There's no question that one of the big issues, I guess, that you're thinking about is, will your people qualify to go over the $15,000 deductible? Probably many of them will. But if they don't, there's that whole issue of economic loss, which is probably your major thought, the individual who doesn't receive anything for loss of future income, absolutely nothing for loss of future income. That's the major blow to your individual who may partially recover but will never be adequately compensated for the loss of wages. That's the most dastardly thing that this bill is doing to the people you represent.

Having said that, you're looking at the whole issue of benefits that this package, this unbelievable—I don't know where they are, but they're about that thick of regulations. Who is going to explain these terrible regulations, these regulations that even the insurance companies, the lawyers, almost every group that come to us says they don't understand? Who's going to explain those regulations to the people that you represent?

Ms Bellavance: That was part of the problem with the current system, in that no one could represent the individual because most lawyers, individuals who had an understanding of all the legalese in the legislation, who could explain it, often chose not to take these clients on because there was no point if they didn't meet tort. If they didn't meet tort—

Mr Tilson: They're gone.

Ms Bellavance: —there was no cause for suing; therefore, there was no remuneration.

Mr Tilson: It doesn't matter that there's no money for the lawyers; no one is going to be representing these people. That's the whole point.

Mr Harnick: So why don't you change the bill so that somebody can represent these people?

Mr Tilson: I guess the whole question of dealing with that whole process at that time—are you saying that you don't believe that the way the legislation has been put forward, there's no one to represent these people in dealing with the claims adjusters specifically? Because that's who they're dealing with.

Ms Bellavance: That's right. We have come across a number of situations. We're very fortunate in some ways in Thunder Bay in that we're somewhat smaller. We happen to know a lot of the individuals who are involved with the companies, and they do make it their business to know what is available and they do act in the client's best interests.

There's a very small number, if any, in this community who don't act in the client's best interests, but I hear horror stories all the time where these individuals will rush a client through the rehabilitation process, sort of do a down-and-dirty job, and be able to close the file, thereby saving the insurance company all kinds of money.

Mr Tilson: I don't mean to be indirectly taking shots at the insurance companies, because I think they're going to be put in a very difficult position.

Ms Bellavance: Sure they are.

Mr Tilson: The insurance companies are saying that because of this bill, rates are going to go up 20%. The minister says: "No, they're not. They're not going to go up a dime."

Ms Bellavance: They're going to go up 4%, or the projection.

Mr Tilson: Well, that's one of their figures: 4% to 20%. Whether it's by 4% or 20%, they're going up. The fact of the matter is, the minister says they're not going up. So we can easily see that the squeeze is going to be put on the insurance companies.

Ms Bellavance: But there has to be a balance. Excuse me, sir. There has to be a balance between the no-fault system and the adversarial system. If there isn't a balance and there is all kinds of suing going on, the insurance company is still paying out, which is still going to impact on our premiums.

Mr Tilson: You misunderstand what I'm saying.

Mr David Winninger (London South): I think she understands perfectly.

Mr Tilson: You misunderstand what I'm saying. What I'm saying is that it's going to become more and more difficult for the insurance companies to provide the package the government wants, and because of that, who's going to represent these people? Because it may not get as easy as you're saying. Is one of your major messages, who's going to represent these people?

Ms Bellavance: It's one of the messages, yes. Who is going to represent the individual?

The Chair: I'm sorry, but you've run out of time.

Ms Christel Haeck (St Catharines-Brock): Thank you, Mrs Bellavance, for your very competent and articulate presentation. It's going to help us with our work. The kinds of comments that you make here obviously are going to help the Ministry of Health deal with some of the rehabilitative concerns, and the task force, because obviously that's a group that you should be talking to as well, and we'll pass on your concerns.

I did want to just take a brief moment to indicate some of the things that our colleagues in opposition have been suggesting, which possibly represent their view but not necessarily the reality of what is being proposed.

Let me just state that in the case of economic loss, the Quebec plan—and this quotation is taken from Hansard of last week, a question by Mr Johnson: "I understand that there is no right to sue for economic loss in Quebec. Is that correct?" The representative from the insurance company from Quebec said, "That is correct." Then it continues, "Are people happy?"—

Mr Harnick: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: I don't mind if Ms Haeck quotes the evidence, but she's got to go through and quote the whole thing because the brief—

Interjection.

Mr Harnick: Now let me finish.

The Chair: It's not a point of order.

Mr Harnick: It is a point of order if she's misrepresenting the evidence. Now let me finish.

Ms Haeck: No, I'm not, Mr Harnick. I have a right—

The Chair: Let's see what the point of order is.

Mr Harnick: Let me finish and then you can rule me out of order. But the fact of the matter is that the brief specifically said that people in Quebec can purchase insurance from their own insurance company to protect themselves from excess economic loss. The next step that evolves from that is the fact that if you have a dispute with your insurance company over the value of that excess economic loss, you can sue in a court to obtain that money. The fact of the matter is, here you are taking away the right to purchase excess economic loss insurance.

The Chair: I'm sorry. You got your point across.

Mr Harnick: If she's going to quote the brief, she'd better be accurate.

The Chair: Ms Haeck.

Ms Haeck: Thank you, Mr Chair. Also, with regard to the kinds of things—I'm sorry for these kinds of things but this happens, as you can understand, all the time.

The Chair: Ms Haeck, just carry on.

Ms Haeck: The regulations that are part of this bill are much more complete and therefore more lengthy than the previous bill because it covers many more people. It will in fact cover those individuals, like the people you serve, those people who have acquired brain injury, those people who do have psychological and emotional sequelae.

Interjection.

The Chair: I'm sorry. Ms Haeck has the floor.

Ms Haeck: I would think that under those circumstances the kinds of comments you've made and that the St Michael's Hospital head injury group has made—in fact they concur with many of your comments—this bill will cover your clients almost immediately, and not in the tort system as has been described by Mr Harnick. Your clients will be able to get the rehabilitative services that they require immediately upon having had the accident.

Ms Bellavance: I guess that's the other thing I want to comment on. In the tort system, when people are trying to access services, unless it's stuff they need to get under the Public Hospitals Act and get it in the hospitals, they may not get it.

We've just had a perfect situation with an individual who is under the system before OMPP where he definitely meets threshold. He's got severe physical and cognitive impairments and he needs to access specific services that aren't covered under OHIP, such as neuropsychological services, or if he needs speech therapy he has to wait two years because the public system doesn't have enough resources so they can buy it privately.

This young man could not access it because the insurance company wouldn't pay it because they were going to sue the insurance company. They weren't going to pay out any benefits for this gentleman's rehabilitation. He is three years post-injury. His needs are much higher than what we can provide.

He gets shipped up here from northeastern Ontario because our catchment area is that large, and we had to ship him back in chemical restraint, in air ambulance, back to his home community because we couldn't serve him. What he needs is what Chedoke can offer, but it has a waiting list of two years for its six-bed unit. Now you tell me that's fair.

The Chair: Okay. I'm sorry. Time has run out. I'd like to thank you for your presentation before this committee.

While the other group's coming forward, maybe with the clerk we can get some clarification on checkout time. Is there going to be a room available at the front to bring our bags? Okay, you can put your baggage in room 204 or the front lobby.

STANDARD INSURANCE BROKERS LTD

The Chair: Welcome. Take a seat, sir. I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. We have one half-hour. In that half-hour can you leave some time at the end for questions, and we'll start off with Mr Tilson as soon as you've finished your brief.

Mr John Berringer: Ready to go?

The Chair: Go right ahead.

Mr Berringer: Mr Chairman and committee members, welcome to Thunder Bay, in the great northwest. We're happy we have some warm weather for you, as opposed to what happened last week.

Thank you for allowing me this opportunity to express some views on Bill 164. My name is John Berringer and I am the president of Standard Insurance Brokers. Our offices are located in Kenora, Dryden and Fort Frances. We employ 31 people in our organizations.

Today, I would like to address some of the issues surrounding Bill 164 and leave time at the end of my presentation for questions and discussion.

Firstly, let's talk about cost. As we speak, prices for automobile insurance have stabilized greatly, and many of our clients are seeing their renewals issued at lower premiums than last year. Price does not seem to be an issue at this time, certainly in our area. However, those insureds who, for one reason or another, have poor driving records and find themselves either surcharged or exiled to the Facility certainly raise their voices regarding their premiums. On the other hand, good drivers should not be expected to subsidize these drivers to a greater extent than they are presently doing.

Let's face it: Every professional insurance broker in this great province, and I dare say in all of Canada, wants to sell the best product he can to his clients. Price, though, becomes an issue. Not everyone can afford the products proposed in Bill 164, but we all can and should work together to put in place improvements in the product that are compatible with cost.

We don't hear complaints in our office about the cost of automobile insurance since rates have stabilized, and the competition is still alive and well, certainly in the northwest. Both Mercer's study for the government and Wyatt Co's for the insurance industry indicate that costs are going up for OMPP as it is now, and after Bill 64, premiums will be higher than they are at present. How much is anybody's guess; we don't know yet. Every product, be it a lawn chair or an insurance policy, has a price, and it is based on its various component parts.

Now let's talk about complexity. Bill 164 is complex, all 68, 69 or 70 pages of the draft legislation. Bill 164 will be costly and difficult to understand and administer. We must have a system that is easy to comprehend and relay to our clients. It is my belief that if, through legislation, you attempt to define each and every accident scenario, this will lead to strict interpretations. But we're all human, and what happens when someone falls through the cracks? When coverages are described in general terms, then coverage is provided unless specifically excluded.

There have been considerable discussions about increased benefits, but let's really look at the root of the problem: What puts premium costs up? What's happened to Bill 39? The Road Ahead places a strong emphasis on the need for safer roads as a key to reducing insurance costs, let alone social costs. Road safety, changing driving habits and continued education is at the heart of everything we are talking about here today.

New Brunswick is moving towards graduated licensing. New Zealand has had this in effect for many years.

Drinking and driving is becoming socially unacceptable in many regions of our country, and the use of seatbelts is on the increase. This did not just happen, but rather came about through education. A reduction in accidents would not only save lives but cut down on medical emergency service and court and insurance costs.

The proposal to let clients sue for both economic and non-economic loss is contrary to the concept of no-fault insurance and will lead to increased costs. Deductibles are always subjective and don't necessarily serve the purpose they were intended to do.

Approximately 6% of claimants for compensation for economic and non-economic loss obtain tort access at the moment. It is estimated this will rise to 18% under Bill 164. The real winners here will be lawyers and at-fault claimants who will recover more than under OMPP, through higher benefits. The losers will be the consumers, who will pay more in the long run for this insurance.

OMPP has worked well for the last two years. The marketplace is much better than in the past, with premiums stabilized and claims being settled quickly. We do not see many unhappy insureds in our office with complaints about the product or treatment received from the industry.

As an insurance broker I wear two hats. One, of course, is for my clients, the insureds. The other is for my source of product supply, the insurance company. The withdrawal provisions, as set out in Bill 164, establish a dangerous precedent in that they impose very strict limitations on these carriers. If I lose an insurance company now or in the future, considerable disruption results, both inside my office and also for my clients, the insurance public. Also, this legislation sends out a very negative message to the business community at large and I urge you to review this area of Bill 164.

The Chair: Mr Tilson.

Mr Tilson: The reason why OMPP was, of course, introduced was because rates were on the increase and the principle of OMPP would be, yes, there would be fewer rights but that payments would be down.

Mr Mancini: Why don't you let him finish?

The Chair: I'm sorry. I haven't got a copy of your brief. I took it that you came to the end.

Mr Berringer: Not yet.

The Chair: Okay, then carry on. I'm sorry, I'm without a copy.

Mr Berringer: I'm almost finished.

The Chair: Okay, fine.

Mr Tilson: What do you want us to do, Mr Chair?

The Chair: Let him carry on. You paused at the end. I thought you were done. I'm sorry.

Mr Berringer: Brokers and insurers are working to improve the product all the time. For example, in June of 1992 the industry made a commitment to ensure that all Ontarians injured in automobile accidents would have access to standardized rehabilitation procedures wherever they live. Also, under OMPP the Facility continues to be depopulated without government intervention. The industry continues to work with the Minister of Transportation to develop the Ontario Road Safety Corp, and of course I mentioned graduated licensing.

Bill 164 contains some positive suggestions as well. For example, education disability benefits and retraining funding improvements are positive. Getting an injured person back to work should be first and foremost on everyone's mind.

Finally, let me leave you with a thought. I started my insurance career in Manitoba prior to the NDP introducing public automobile insurance. This has turned into something less than a perfect solution for the automobile public in Manitoba. More importantly, the last New Democratic government in Manitoba went down to defeat partly because it had a strong hand in establishing and implementing automobile insurance premiums. Mr Harcourt in British Columbia is also under some criticism at this moment. At present there are approximately 170 auto insurers in the province. Competition is keen. No one controls more than 10% of the market. Why do you want to have cabinet involved in rate setting? Why not distance yourself from it? Thank you.

The Chair: Mr Tilson.

Mr Tilson: Yes. How much time do we have for questions?

The Chair: Close to seven minutes.

Mr Tilson: Is that seven minutes each?

The Chair: Close to it.

Mr Tilson: The reason why OMPP was introduced, of course, was because there was a great concern with the increase in insurance rates. OMPP came along and the result of OMPP was that people had fewer rights, and supposedly rates should go down. Well, they didn't go down. In some cases the insurance companies are saying they're going down, but they haven't always. Now we have a new bill that's come along and it's supposed to provide new rights, new reforms—reform the whole system. The difficulty, of course, is that we're guaranteed that rates are going to go up. They're going up anywhere from 4% to 20%. We're also certain that they're going to have fewer rights. People are going to have fewer individual rights, the innocent accident victims.

So, I must confess that the whole philosophy of this government that opposed OMPP when it was in opposition is now almost going in reverse. It's like they've done a complete reversal and are going backwards in time.

Mr Paul R. Johnson (Prince Edward-Lennox-South Hastings): That's your opinion.

Mr Tilson: Well, that's exactly what you're doing. So I guess my question to you is, having said that, at the same time—and I keep harping on what the minister has said to the insurance industry—you and the insurance industry are saying rates are going up. The minister has guaranteed us that rates are not going up. They're not going up, and there are at least two different ways I know of, and maybe the minister has some other ways that he hasn't revealed to us yet, that rates are not going to go up. What is that going to do to this whole process? What's it going to do to the insurance business and what's it going to do to the innocent accident victim?

Mr Berringer: Clearly, from a broker's standpoint, if you enhance the product, someone has to pay for it. Clearly, from our perspective or from my perspective, where I sit now, the system seems to work well. It's not perfect, but no system is perfect. But it seems to work well and costs seem to be contained. I think if you enhance and broaden out the coverages, like you're proposing on one hand, and taking certain things away on the other, but generally it's a broader package, it's going to cost more money.

The proposal in Bill 164 to limit the claimant's ability to sue for economic loss of course is negative, and that's going to put some hardship on certain individuals who find themselves in that unfortunate position.

Mr Tilson: Really, my question was directed to the issue of rates and how the system's going to operate. The insurance company needs to have money to make this system operate. The government isn't going to let you acquire the moneys that are needed to operate these very expensive benefits. The minister says rates are not going up. My question to you is, what's going to happen to the insurance companies that are going to be carrying these very expensive benefit packages if the minister carries out his threat?

Mr Berringer: I'm not an insurance company person, but it would seem to me that they will restrict their offerings and withdraw from the province. They have no choice. You can't run a business and lose money for ever.

Mr Tilson: Mr Harnick has a question, Mr Chairman.

Mr Harnick: Sir, in your experience, have you found that the rates of accident benefit payments—in other words, the $600 a week, and the various levels of payments under OMPP—through your experience with your insureds, are adequate levels of benefits under the no-fault aspect of the OMPP?

Mr Berringer: Generally I would say that's true, yes.

Mr Harnick: Have you found that people's weekly incomes have suffered because those rates are not high enough?

Mr Berringer: No.

Mr Harnick: And would you agree with me—you say people generally aren't complaining—that if they change this system and they implement Bill 164, which takes away the rights of innocent victims to claim for their actual economic losses, that in fact you're going to start hearing from insureds who've been seriously injured, saying: "Why can't I claim my excess loss? I was innocent"? Do you think that'll become a problem?

Mr Berringer: I think you're probably right. We don't see many claims that go through what we'd call the threshold, generally speaking.

Mr Harnick: Because it's pretty high.

Mr Berringer: It's very high, and there was considerable thought into this process when it originally began, to set these numbers and figures at an appropriate level that seemed to work. But I think, certainly, you're right. People will be unhappy when they're stuck.

Mr Harnick: Would you agree with me as well that under the OMPP it's been a relatively successful system, except that the threshold has been too high, and if there's anywhere you're hearing complaints they're complaints about the high threshold, "Why have they taken away my right to sue? I'm seriously injured," that kind of thing, right? Yes or no.

Mr Berringer: Yes.

Mr Harnick: Just one other thing. When Mr Tilson was asking you, you indicated that with an enhanced product you would expect people would pay more or that the cost of the product, because it's enhanced, would go up. Just in our little discussion between you and me, the fact that we've zeroed in on this taking away the right to sue if you're innocent, to me, that doesn't enhance the product. What I see with Bill 164 is a more complicated product, a product that takes away more rights from innocent victims and in fact is going to end up costing us more. Would you agree with that?

Mr Berringer: The product will cost more, I think, because if you look at the other side of the equation, with the ability to go back and sue now for pain and suffering, subject to a $15,000 deductible, I think that's going to blow it up.

Mr Owens: I'd like to thank you for your presentation. I'd like to address a couple of things you mentioned in your brief. First of all, you mentioned that the depopulation of the Facility Association is ongoing, without the assistance of the government. Are you aware that an agreement was reached with the Facility Association and the Ontario Insurance Commission as to how that depopulation would take place, and the categories by which people would fall into the FA rather than what currently happens under OMPP?

Mr Berringer: Yes.

Mr Owens: All right. In terms of costs, you're talking about benefits versus costs. Do you think it's reasonable under the current plan that some of our most catastrophically injured, perhaps some of those who were addressed by the head injury groups today, are capped at $500,000?

Mr Berringer: The problem really becomes, where do you set a cap that's reasonable and compatible with what the product costs? I think you have to set a limit somewhere, because when you exceed that amount of money, whatever that amount of money is, then really that particular individual moves to a different—

Mr Owens: So it would be your view that if a person at the age of 16, shortly after getting his or her driver's licence, is involved in an accident and that individual is catastrophically injured, say, at around 30, that person would be left to hang out to dry.

Mr Berringer: We have a social responsibility in this province and this country to look after people, and we do.

Mr Owens: In terms of the indexation of benefits, do you believe it's a good thing that benefits are indexed?

Mr Berringer: There again, I think you have to set a limit to how far you're going to go.

Mr Owens: The benefits index with respect to CPI and rates of inflation: Is that a reasonable measure to take?

Mr Berringer: Yes.

Mr Owens: You're aware that we've done that?

Mr Berringer: Yes.

Mr Owens: Just in terms of dependant care benefits that we've extended to working people—also increasing the dependant care benefits of those who are not working—do you think that's a reasonable extension of a benefit?

Mr Berringer: Yes.

Mr Owens: All in all, in terms of the benefits we've talked about in this short time that we have together, do you think that's a reasonable enhancement of benefits that people would require in fact if they became victims of an accident in this province?

Mr Berringer: Within limitation.

Mr Paul Klopp (Huron): Thank you for your brief. On one of your pages you talked about the withdrawal provisions. In the first draft that came out from the ministry, are you aware that in further consultation with the industry it changed that regulation and has amended it to with just a notice of withdrawal? Are you aware of that, first off?

Mr Berringer: Not totally; I haven't read it.

Mr Klopp: That was one of the issues, that they have to give a timely notice. I guess the commission actually reviews it and then can delay it for a further maximum of 90 days, but cannot stop them if they want to move out of an area.

You as a broker, but I as one of your people who has insurance—I have known people who all of a sudden were told, like an hour after that: "Oh, the insurance company doesn't want you any more. They sent a letter yesterday. Didn't you get it?" Do you not agree that this puts people in a really bad position, maybe even yourself, with an insurance person phoning you up and—

Mr Berringer: Short notice is difficult. There's no question about it.

Mr Klopp: I think it's a fair thing for the industry to give good, long-range notice to you as a broker but also to the person who has been paying insurance.

Mr Berringer: Of course.

Mr Klopp: One other, really quick: You mentioned about the graduated licences and that whole issue. I come from rural Ontario. It's Bill 39 you referred to, and that part of government is working towards these goals. Do you have any suggestions? My argument is that Toronto has got lots of people. People can get on a bus or whatever, but myself in rural Ontario, or even here in the north—do you have any suggestions for help with graduated licences or whatever?

Mr Berringer: I live, obviously, in rural Ontario as well. In our community, it could potentially pose some problems but I think you can work around that by making exceptions for a rural area. For example, if I was eight miles from school and the school buses weren't on schedule and so on and so forth, if one of my kids could drive my car and go to school and have to stay late for a basketball game, I'm sure provisions could be made for that. I think the whole concept of graduated licensing, though, is that when you turn a 16-year-old loose on Highway 401 at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, it's awesome. It's awesome for just about everybody in this room. You've got to consider that.

But certainly there are ways I think you could work this, depending on the region and the area you live in. Most 16-year-old children probably shouldn't be out after midnight anyway; they should be home.

The Chair: Mr Phillips.

Mr Peter Kormos (Welland-Thorold): A point of order, Chair.

The Chair: Yes, Mr Kormos.

Mr Kormos: There is one minute left in the government time slot and I expected to be able to address—

The Chair: Are you saying that the Chair can't tell time?

Mr Kormos: Yes.

The Chair: Mr Phillips.

Mr Kormos: Among other things.

The Chair: Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: The thing that we are really questioning is the cost-benefit analysis of this bill. In many respects, it'll be people like yourself who will be the first to face it when you send your bill out and then the phone call comes back, saying, "What in the world happened?" I think, based on all analyses, government analysis as well as other industry analysis, there are a whole bunch of people who will be facing increases in excess of 20%.

My question to you is this: Seniors, under this bill, look like they'll face very dramatic increases, well in excess of 20%, and many of them live on fixed incomes. When that bill goes out and someone phones you back and says, "My premium has gone up and it looks to me like it will be going up well in excess of 20%, well over $150," how will you respond to them when they say, "Why did this bill go up $150; I had no accidents; nothing happened to me; it just came to me out of the blue"? What will your explanation be and what should we, in the elected positions, who have passed this bill, expect from seniors?

Mr Berringer: I suppose I'd have to be honest and straightforward and say: "This is new government-driven legislation that's put your insurance premium where it is. We have no other choice."

Mr Phillips: I appreciate that. Believe me, I went through this several years ago when the previous bill was being contemplated, and the elimination of age. I don't think I had a more vocal group than the seniors, who really resented the thought of paying substantially increased premiums through no fault of their own. You're suggesting to us that it will rebound very quickly to the elected people. You'll say, "Listen, it was because of this bill that your rates went up well in excess of 20%."

Mr Berringer: I would think so.

Mr Mancini: First of all, I'd like to thank the witness for his brief. It was well done and the answers have been straightforward. Are you aware of the Coopers and Lybrand report that has been made public over the last couple of weeks that has estimated the premium increase, the rate cost increase for Ontario consumers, and are you aware, sir, that in Thunder Bay in the annual increase per household, insurance rates are going to go up $170? Are you aware of that report?

Mr Berringer: I haven't read the report cover to cover.

Mr Mancini: I have a copy of the report here and I'd be most pleased to make it available to you. Do you think the people in Thunder Bay region are in the financial position to pay $170 more per household for their insurance benefits, while at the same time losing the right to sue for economic loss? Do you think that's a fair exchange?

Mr Berringer: No, I don't, because I think the present system is serving them well.

Mr Mancini: Are you as disappointed as I am that the government is moving so slowly with the road safety program?

Mr Berringer: Yes.

Mr Mancini: Do you believe that a solid road safety program could in fact not only save lives and save people from being injured, but could put a cap on the rate increases of people's premiums?

Mr Berringer: Yes, I do.

Mr Mancini: Do you believe the government would be better spending its time working on road safety than trying to save face over its flip-flop on government-owned automobile insurance, and move ahead with road safety instead of with Bill 164?

Mr Berringer: I think continuing education is the key. This is what is starting to work for us now. It's called risk management.

Mr Mancini: Mr Phillips has another question.

Mr Phillips: I was curious about your comment about the reaction you're getting from people you deal with in terms of the rates they're currently paying on their insurance, and indicating, from your brief, that perhaps they're feeling a little less angry about the rates than they might have been three or four years ago. Has that been your experience?

Mr Berringer: There's no question. The great majority of our insureds are quite happy. When prices have been soaring around them, they've seen stability in their renewals, assuming they kept the same automobile and didn't have an accident or a conviction. All things being equal, they're very happy.

Mr Phillips: That has been my experience in my constituency. What, in your judgement, then, would lead a government, in one of the few areas where people are not complaining vigorously, to want to stir up an area that seems to have calmed down slightly when there are so many other areas that already have been stirred up?

Mr Berringer: I have no idea.

Mr Kormos: Panic? Hysteria?

Mr Berringer: I don't know.

Mr Phillips: Mr Kormos has given us two choices: panic or hysteria. I am curious about that because I think right across the province, people's incomes are going up very little, if at all. Average incomes are going up less than inflation just because of the number of people unemployed, and yet we would look at taking something as fundamental—it's almost that if you want to be in the economy in Ontario, you've got to have auto insurance. Why a government would want to take out of the pockets of the taxpayers—their own estimates, by the way, indicate at least a $200-million increase.

Mr Owens: Not true.

Mr Phillips: Well, it is true. It's 5% of the premiums. The parliamentary assistant continues to interrupt, and with information that's incorrect. I'm trying to deal with, trying to get the benefit of—

The Chair: I'm sorry, Mr Phillips; your time's running out. Get to the question and try not to listen to anyone else. You've got the floor.

Mr Phillips: The government itself says that the increase will go up 5%. Five per cent on premiums is $200 million, as you know and any sensible person in the province knows. Why would we want to take $200 million out of the hands of taxpaying people at a time when the economy needs as much disposable income as possible in their hands?

Mr Berringer: That's a very good observation. That other one that to me is even more enlightening is that the OIC has said it will have to hire another 100 people and spend $5 million to sort that part of it out.

The Chair: I'm sorry, but we've run out of time. I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee.

ZURICH CANADA

The Chair: The next presentation is from Zurich Canada.

Mr Harnick: Zurich. It's a place in Switzerland.

The Chair: My wife being German, she pronounces things a little different.

I'd like to welcome you before the committee. We have half an hour, and for the time left over, I guess the three caucuses can argue over it and give the Chair direction on how many minutes each they have. You may begin.

Mr Harry Saunders: Thank you, Mr Chairman and members of the panel. My name is Harry Saunders. I'm the president of Zurich Canada. I'd like to introduce my two colleagues who will be assisting me in my presentation this morning: Dante Alejandria, vice-president, claims administration; and Paul Minnoch, vice-president, personal automobile underwriting.

We appreciate the opportunity to participate in these hearings on Bill 164. You may be pleased to learn that we can be brief this morning because you gentlemen and ladies heard the presentation of the Insurance Bureau of Canada last week, and in large measure we support the position it put forward. In fact, we made a strong contribution to its development over the last few months.

We are not here to present an alternative plan—we could do so if that were appropriate—but rather to emphasize the significance of five areas of Bill 164 in the hope that you will consider them in your final decisions. They are: the cost of the proposed new system; the dangers inherent in the proposed changes to access to tort for non-economic loss; instability that will be created by uncontrolled costs for rehabilitation services; to encourage the establishment of a uniform classification system which the consumer could better understand; and, finally, to urge a joint commitment to action on road safety reforms.

Surely at the root of everyone's concern is how to provide Ontario motorists with the best value for their money in automobile insurance coverage. We at Zurich are willing and able to provide insurance under any number of forms or combination of forms: pure tort, on the one hand, pure no-fault on the other, or various combinations in between.

At the same time, we must be straightforward in reminding all concerned—motorists, politicians, brokers, insurers, lawyers, care providers and taxpayers and residents of Ontario at large—that for every benefit there is a cost to be borne. Our experience leads us to believe that the best value for the consumer can be achieved through a combination of tort rights, however modified, and no-fault benefits, however generous, which indeed is the basis of both OMPP and Bill 164, although those two approaches differ significantly in the implementation of the principle.

Turning to the cost of the new legislation, why are we concerned about the cost of the new legislative proposals? Ample evidence has already been presented that shows that the increases under Bill 164 suggested by the Mercer research, the government's actuaries, are inaccurate and lower than what could reasonably be expected. They're based on irrelevant and non-current information and indeed were targeted to go into effect on July 1, 1992, so already they are seven months out of date.

Furthermore, the fact that the industry results since the introduction of OMPP have been profitable have led some to believe that automobile insurance is overpriced and that increases can be absorbed. We would like to argue that, in effect, this is not the case. Current rates have become inadequate for the existing system and will be more dramatically affected by the proposed legislation if certain issues are not addressed.

Part of the reason for this is that any premium we charge today must be adequate to cover claims in the future. A change in rate does not generate overnight an immediate increase in revenue. It takes two full years for a change in rate to be fully reflected in revenues. This time lapse can distort one's view of results today and makes addressing future premium levels an issue of concern.

I'd now like to refer you to Mr Alejandria, who will speak to weaknesses in the proposed changes to tort and, secondly, rehabilitation and long-term care costs.

Mr Dante Alejandria: One of our greatest concerns is the uncertainty the new legislation will create with regard to awards for pain and suffering. Right now, there are clear legal precedents which provide indexed limitations on the amounts of awards for non-economic loss. The limits were originally established by the Supreme Court of Canada at $100,000 and have grown to a present-day value of about $240,000. It is vital to note that the court's decisions were based on the assumption that all economic loss has been satisfied.

Since Bill 164 does not necessarily provide full protection for economic loss, the basis for a limitation to pain and suffering claims will be seriously weakened. This uncertainty makes it extremely difficult for insurers to set fair and adequate rates with a reasonable degree of certainty, and until these assumptions are tested in the courts, consumers will also feel a great deal of uncertainty regarding their level of protection.

An additional area of serious concern is the proposed treatment of the deductible which would be indexed to the consumer price index. It can be demonstrated that the consumer price index grows at a rate far below the inflationary costs of bodily injury settlements.

We believe that both a stronger definition of the limitations on non-economic loss and a more realistic approach to indexing are among the adjustments required to Bill 164.

On the subject of rehabilitation costs, we know that we speak for the industry when we say we are encouraged by the creation of a task force to examine rehabilitation and long-term care benefits required for people injured in automobile accidents. An effective rehabilitation program as an essential part of claims service to our clients has been recognized by Zurich for many years and continues to be an area in which we take great pride.

We are here today to say that we believe the mere removal of limits for these coverages in no way guarantees the best possible benefit to an accident victim. It certainly does not offer the most cost-effective auto insurance system to the people of Ontario.

Unlimited and uncontrolled coverage in this area will create costing uncertainty that would be of acute immediate concern for insurers and reinsurers alike. In the longer term, unlimited and uncontrolled costs would compound the uncertainty for funding of future losses, and the lack of limits on claims would form an ever-increasing component in rate calculations.

The cost of rehabilitation needs further attention to ensure proper care for victims and affordable impact on premiums.

Mr Paul Minnoch will address our two remaining concerns, namely, in the areas of uniform classification system and road safety.

Mr Paul Minnoch: With regard to the uniform classification system, I'd like to point out that on January 1 of this year, we moved into a take-all-comers environment that allows all but clearly defined bad drivers to obtain automobile insurance from the company of their choice. This is a good start, but we believe the consumer deserves more: a uniform classification system he or she can understand.

At Zurich Canada, we feel very strongly that consumers must be able to understand easily how they have been rated and that all insurance companies should define the customer in the same way. Only then can buyers of insurance, on their own or with the help of a broker, shop with confidence for the best insurance value for their money.

The definition that would come from a uniform classification plan could exclude factors of age, sex and marital status, but a uniform classification system does not mean that age, sex and marital status must be excluded. These are two different issues. The decisive factor in the cost of insurance must be the driving record of the operators of the vehicle.

A uniform classification plan was presented to the government in October 1991 by the Insurance Bureau of Canada along with the Association of Canadian Insurers and the Ontario Mutual Insurance Association. For the benefit of the motorists of this province, we would like to see some dialogue on this issue as soon as possible.

Before we leave the subject of a uniform classification system, we must make one last observation. While we maintain that a uniform class plan is beneficial to the consumer, we must also state that these benefits can only be realized if insurers are allowed to establish their own mathematical algorithms and differentials to establish rates. Only in this way will insurance companies be forced to compete for the consumer's business on value and service. When this happens, the consumer can get the best deal.

On the topic of road safety, we would like to stress that this is one we are sure there is general agreement about in the room, yet we feel obliged to mention it at every opportunity because of its importance. It is something that will not only save money but will also save lives, especially the lives of our young people, and remove suffering on the part of their friends and families. We are talking about road safety measures.

In the government's policy document The Road Ahead: Ontario's Strategy for Insurance Reform, a great emphasis was placed on road safety. This component remains an integral part of responsible and affordable reform through the reduction of accidents.

We can say with confidence that as a company, Zurich Canada intends to stay at the forefront in road safety education. Last year, our single largest advertising effort, in partnership with Health and Welfare Canada and the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, was on a drinking and driving campaign which featured Wayne Gretzky and was aimed at young people. We'll be doing even more this year in areas of road safety education.

At this point, I would like to offer you two examples which came to my desk on Thursday and Friday of last week and will highlight the next portion. These are two claims underwriting summaries that came to me. The first was an accident that occurred on November 10, 1992. This accident involved an 18-year-old driver, newly licensed. He had driver training. It occurred at 11 pm. He and five friends were on their way home from a hockey rink. They were travelling at excessive speed, lost control on a curve, and one of the passengers, one of the friends, had a spinal cord injury and he will be confined to a wheelchair for the rest of his life.

The second case involved a 19-year-old daughter of one of our insureds, who also had driver training, licensed only 16 months. She and a friend were travelling down a country road at 90 kilometres per hour. They came up to a stop sign, put on the brakes, slid on loose gravel and the vehicle rolled. The friend died in the accident. That case occurred on September 30, 1992.

This brings us to the topic of graduated licensing, which the insurance industry has been advocating for some time. The government stated in its policy document that young or new drivers are significantly overrepresented in all traffic accidents. For the sake of these people and all other people on our roads, we encourage—perhaps I could say implore—the government to continue the approach that does not consider Bill 164 in isolation but within the whole environment of automobile usage. Graduated licensing can be an important part of what the government wants to achieve in responsible reform.

Graduated licensing would have an effect on reducing excessive loss costs produced by one recognizable group. Graduated licensing protects not only the value of the cost of insurance but, more importantly, the value of life, especially the lives of our young people.

Mr Saunders: That concludes our presentation, Mr Chairman. We will be happy to accept questions.

The Chair: We'll start off with Mr Winninger.

Mr Winninger: I certainly appreciate your well-balanced presentation. I'd like to direct my question to Mr Saunders. I know you've had extensive experience in the insurance industry, and in your brief you mentioned the fact that Zurich Insurance is used to providing insurance in a number of different forms. I'd like to deal with the issue of coverage for excess economic loss, which has come up earlier in these proceedings as well.

As you know, Mr Saunders, economic loss can take many forms. It can involve loss of future earnings, it can involve the cost of future rehabilitation and long-term care, to name a few examples. Even though our Bill 164 will actually cover 97% of full-time earners compared to 73% under the Ontario motorist protection plan, we still know there are some areas of economic loss that will not be fully compensated. There may be people for whom $1,000 a week does not provide adequate compensation for lost earnings. There may be people—

Mr Tilson: It depends on how you look at it. No matter how you look at it—

Mr Winninger: Mr Chair, it's difficult to put an important question and also deal with the wailing of the banshees in the opposition.

Just getting back to the question, there may be people who may suffer loss of competitive advantage or a loss of earning capacity; there may be people who suffer significant capital loss due to the loss of their businesses. So a proposal has been put forward, which is certainly not precluded under our legislation, for those for whom, under section 63, an agreement to pre-estimate lost earnings may not be enough. A proposal was put forward that the insurance industry could offer excess economic loss coverage. I wonder if your company has put any thought to the costing of such a proposal, as well as any practical difficulties that such a proposal may be facing.

Mr Saunders: Such coverage could be made available. I'm inclined to ask Paul Minnoch to assist me in answering the question, because he's more directly involved in product development and costing. Certainly, I see no reason why some forms of excess economic losses couldn't be layered on top of the proposed Bill 164, but it depends on what shape and form this will be presented and what the basis of arriving at settlement would be to hazard a guess as to costs. Paul, do you have anything to add to that?

Mr Minnoch: No, that does state it. We would have to see exactly what you required, what you had in mind, but as Mr Saunders mentioned, we could layer that on top of the product.

Mr Winninger: I take it that Zurich also is involved in insurance in other provinces as well, in Canada?

Mr Saunders: It is.

Mr Winninger: Has it considered excess economic loss there?

Mr Saunders: Yes, covers are available in that sense in other provinces, yes.

Mr Winninger: Certainly we've heard all kinds of wild claims about how Bill 164 is going to dramatically escalate the cost of auto insurance premiums. I take it that your industry is prepared to work with government towards containing any increases to the consumers.

Mr Saunders: I think there are some flaws in the legislation that's presented which have to be addressed. We're very concerned about the two aspects of the tort provisions, which we've already talked about this morning. We're encouraged about the task force work. I think we can put some useful controls into rehabilitation and long-term care which will still deliver a very valuable product without having the costs escalate out of all proportion to benefits, and we'll continue to work. But as it stands at the moment, I'm very concerned. We are looking at substantial increases in costs and therefore premiums.

Mr Winner: Today you expressed some concern about expanding the right to sue for non-economic loss. There are some members of the opposition who would like to lower the deductible for pain-and-suffering lawsuits even further. Certainly that would increase premiums.

Mr Saunders: As we said in our opening remarks, we're ready to provide any level of service or any combination of coverage that the politicians and the public feel is in their best interest, provided it is reasonable and provided we can reasonably cost it.

Mr Winner: Thank you.

Mr Saunders: There's no free lunch.

The Chair: Mr Johnson. One minute left.

Mr Johnson: That's not a lot of time. However, when one goes out to buy automobile insurance as a consumer, people often think that all insurance companies must be the same. There's a basic product you have to buy, and therefore it doesn't really matter where you go. But we know. We've heard the horror stories where people have been claimants and they've had to file a claim against an insurance company—

The Chair: Mr Johnson, get to the question.

Mr Johnson: Without a little bit of a preamble, it's very difficult. Anyway, I'll do this as quickly as I can. Insurance companies are not all the same, and some insurance companies—I won't mention any names because I don't want to be liable—but some insurance companies have reputations for not being known as—

The Chair: I'm sorry, Mr Johnson, you ran out of time. Mr Mancini.

Mr Tilson: Good preamble, though.

Mr Mancini: Mr Saunders, I'd like to thank you and your executives for making the presentation you have to this committee. I'd like to state for the record, and be very clear about it, that my bias is towards the consumer, the buying public. We're in the middle of a four-year recession, and even prior to the recession, before we had lost those 500,000 manufacturing jobs in Ontario, people whom I represented were, in fact, complaining loudly about the cost of their insurance.

Through the Ontario motorist protection plan, rates were in fact stabilized. Now we enter a whole new realm of instability for rates, and I'm particularly concerned about what this legislation is going to do to senior citizens.

Senior citizens have not fared well under the NDP government. They've had their drugs delisted from OHIP, they've had senior citizens' property tax—

The Chair: I'm sorry; would you wind up getting to the insurance issue?

Mr Mancini: How much time do I have, Mr Chairman?

The Chair: But keep on subject.

Mr Mancini: How much time do I have?

Mr Kormos: Stop trying to muzzle the opposition.

The Chair: I am not muzzling—

Mr Kormos: The Premier is trying hard enough to muzzle the government members, never mind the opposition members.

The Chair: Go ahead, Mr Mancini.

Mr Mancini: I'm building a case, with the Chairman's permission, to show the impact that this government has had on senior citizens. They've had their drugs delisted from OHIP, meaning they've had to pay more out of their pockets—

The Chair: Does this have anything to do with insurance?

Mr Mancini: Yes. I'm building a case, if you would stop interrupting. Mr Chair, on a point of order: You have absolutely no authority under the standing rules to frame my question. You only have authority to ensure that I do not overuse my time. Please reread the standing orders and govern yourself accordingly.

Mr Kormos: They think they can control opposition members just like they control government members. That's the problem.

Mr Mancini: It hurts the government when you point out what has been happening to senior citizens in this province. That's why we get these uncalled-for interjections from the Chair. Senior citizens have had their drugs delisted from OHIP, meaning they have to reach into their pocketbooks and pay for drugs they didn't have to pay for before. They've had their property tax grants shrunk considerably, meaning tens of thousands of senior citizens have to pay more in property taxes today than they did two and three years ago.

This, I believe, will be the last nail in the coffin for senior citizens. Documentation we have received, Mr Saunders, indicates to us that with the rate increases in Bill 164, along with the uniform classification system that the NDP government is talking about, senior citizens in the Toronto area will face at least a 24% increase in their automobile insurance; in the northern Ontario region, 21%; in Windsor, 23%.

Mr Owens: How do you know that?

Mr Mancini: Will you control the parliamentary secretary while I have the floor?

The Chair: One thing we're going to do in the next place we go, because I can hear everybody—

Mr Mancini: Mr Chairman, you and I are not going to get along in this committee if you do not follow the standing orders. The standing orders do not give you authority to frame my question or to muzzle me in how I'm going to present my case to the witnesses and to the general public who are here today. You have authority to ensure that I do not abuse my time.

The Chair: I have the authority to keep you on track.

Mr Mancini: You do not have authority to frame my question. I suggest you speak to the clerk. We are not going to get along if you continue in the abusive manner that you've demonstrated this morning. There's going to be great difficulty in this committee, let me tell you.

The Chair: Carry on.

Mr Kormos: See, now you've got him mad at you too.

Mr Winninger: Thank you, Charlie McCarthy.

Mr Mancini: Mr Winninger, if I were you I'd be quite worried about what's happening to seniors in your riding. In the Ottawa area, seniors may face increases of greater than 22%. Somebody has to be concerned about the senior citizen population. These people are not concerned about them.

I want to ask you, Mr Saunders, because you are one of the longest-serving executives in the insurance industry in Canada today, do you think that senior citizens can afford increases of anywhere from 20% to 30% in their premium rates?

Mr Saunders: Mr Mancini, we haven't taken our costing down to the individual level like that. I'm very concerned about the overall cost of Bill 164. There's no question that those costs have to be addressed and some reforms have to be put into Bill 164 before it should go into place. I think Mr Minnoch might want to add something along those lines.

Mr Minnoch: Very much so. If the program continues as it is presented at the moment, those costs will in fact impact seniors the way you've described. In the uniform classification plan that the industry submitted to the government in October 1991, which I mentioned in our brief, we did in fact pay special attention to seniors as a group, and that did form part of our submission to the government. In fact, we presented that to the Consumers' Association of Canada informally at the offices of the insurance commission, and it was very well received by the senior group represented by Helen Anderson of the Consumers' Association. So the seniors have been considered by the industry.

The Chair: Mr Tilson.

Mr Tilson: Mr Harnick has a question.

Mr Harnick: My question is to Mr Saunders. Last week we heard from the deputy minister or the legal adviser, a fellow by the name of Mr Endicott, who, I understand, was pretty much responsible for writing Bill 164. He told us that a young student injured in a car accident who would never be able to work again would receive the equivalent of $391 a week for the rest of his life, which pretty much puts him at the poverty line or a little below the poverty line. In addition, he would be able to keep up to the poverty line because that generous $391 for life would be indexed.

I know that you've been in this business for a long time and that your company's been looking after injured people for a long time. In cases where an innocent young person has the rest of his working life snuffed out from him, would you agree with me that $391 a week, indexed to pay that person's lost income for his lifetime, is miserly and improper?

Mr Saunders: I'd have to agree with you, Mr Harnick. I think I would go further and state a personal opinion here. I truly, firmly believe that any effort to address all economic loss through a pure no-fault system is faulty and I think that's the fatal flaw of Bill 164. We weren't here to present alternatives. We are here to try and make Bill 164 work, but I'm extremely concerned about that aspect of the legislation.

Mr Harnick: If I can quote you then, the fatal flaw of Bill 164 is trying to pay all economic loss under a no-fault system?

Mr Saunders: Absolutely. That is my personal philosophy, 100%.

Mr Harnick: I'll be right with you.

Mr Saunders: Do you want me to repeat it?

Mr Harnick: No, I think I've got it.

Let me take this one step further, then. If you agree that you can't pay all economic loss under a no-fault system, the way the bill is presently framed, it says you can't make any claim for economic loss. In other words, it's going to be against the law. The only way you could offer coverage is if the bill was amended to permit you to offer economic loss coverage—

Mr Saunders: Excess.

Mr Harnick: —excess coverage to individuals. Is that correct?

Mr Saunders: On an insured-option basis, you mean?

Mr Harnick: Yes.

Mr Saunders: Yes.

Mr Harnick: Much the way we do SEF 44.

Mr Saunders: Yes. I'm not an expert in legislative drafting. I doubt the technicality is that difficult or complex.

Mr Harnick: Yes. You've indicated that you thought that would be an economically viable product for the insurance industry to sell. What I want to ask you is this, and it's very important—at least to me. The government is trying, under Bill 164, to put everybody under one roof and is saying, "What's reasonable for one should be reasonable for all."

One of the beauties of auto insurance, over the years, has been that auto insurance has been able to pay people for their particular circumstances. In other words, everyone's different and everyone can claim to what their actual or potential loss might be. What I envision, if the government responds to what it's been hearing from witness after witness for the last week, is making a product available so that individuals can protect their actual losses, so that they're not lumped in under one roof. If I pay my extra premium, as I do for my underinsured coverage, I want to be able to claim for what my actual loss might be or what my children's economic loss might be if, God forbid, they're injured in an accident. Can that kind of product be made available?

Mr Saunders: That was a rather lengthy question, Mr Harnick. I suppose the simple answer is yes, of course, but you raised a lot of questions there.

For example, you refer to the economic viability of excess economic loss. I don't think I said that. I said we would be willing to offer the product. I have some concerns about how widely it would be purchased and therefore how long it would stand the test of time in the marketplace, but in general concept what you described should be a practical proposition, sure.

Mr Harnick: Thanks.

The Chair: I'm sorry. The time has run out. I'd like to thank you, gentlemen, for coming before this committee.

Mr Saunders: What are we doing at lunchtime?

The Chair: Talking about the game last night, I guess.

Mr Harnick: I thought you were buying.

Mr Saunders: After last night, Brad had better buy.

The Chair: Some subjects we can talk about here—football games and I think no one would object. Other issues, some members object to.

Mr Kormos: The government's in bed with the industry. They might as well eat with them too.

RUTTAN BOLDUC ADDERLEY
GENERAL INSURANCE BROKERS

The Chair: The next group to come forward is Ruttan Bolduc Adderley General Insurance Brokers. I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. We have a half-hour; we have until 11:30, and in that half an hour, if you could leave some time for questions from the committee members, and you may begin.

Ms Jo-Ann Menard: Good morning, Mr Chairman and members of the committee. My name is Jo-Ann Menard. I have been an insurance broker in the city of Thunder Bay for the past 20 years. I have served on the boards of various industry-related associations and am presently the vice-president of the Insurance Brokers Association of Thunder Bay. My presentation today is on behalf of my firm and the clients I represent, those consumers of the auto insurance product.

As you are aware, the role of an insurance broker is to act on behalf of his or her clients, providing a product that meets their needs. The consumer is basically interested in two things: keeping insurance premiums down or at least stabilized and getting the benefits which they are entitled to have, which they have paid for, with a minimum of fuss or hassle. In my opinion, Bill 164 does not address these needs of the consumer, as it is costly, it is complex, and, above all, it's a change that the consumer on the whole has not requested.

Prior to the implementation of the Ontario motorist protection plan, either auto rates were too low or costs were too high. With double-digit increases being applied to the product in the early to mid-1980s, the consumers were not happy campers. They let the insurance industry and the government know that things were getting out of control; thus the implementation of OMPP.

OMPP has addressed those needs of the consumer. In general, consumer satisfaction with the product is high. OMPP is working. Premiums have stabilized and in some cases have been reduced. Claims have been adjusted quickly, fairly and without the hassles found in the pre-OMPP product. It is a pleasure to deal with clients who are satisfied with the product. To have a client smile when he's handing you payment for his auto renewal is a definite indication of satisfaction.

There's no solution to providing an insurance product that will be 100% satisfaction guaranteed by all consumers of that product. There will always be some deficiencies. The insurance industry has recognized these deficiencies, and under the OMPP there are provisions to modify and enhance the benefits. Why not let the insurance industry do its job? As front-line distributors of the product, the brokers are the first ones to hear of any dissatisfaction with that product. We voice our concerns not only to the insurance company but also to the Ontario Insurance Commission, and we have no reason to believe that we are not being listened to.

Bill 164 carries a large degree of uncertainty, the potential for higher costs and the need for increased premiums down the road.

When improvements are made to benefits, the average cost per claim rises. Bill 164 raises the possibility of increased adjustment costs because a higher percentage of accidents involving bodily injury will have to be thoroughly investigated, as there will now be a liability exposure. Insurers will have to look at all injured third-party claimants and may have to set reserves because a year from now they could be sued. Bill 164 seems to be taking a backward step in this regard.

The right to sue for pain and suffering beyond a $15,000 deductible will unnecessarily increase access to an already overburdened court system, thereby once again increasing the costs. The proposed deductible will have no impact. Time and time again, experience has shown that monetary thresholds merely raise the minimum claim size. The threshold becomes a target rather than a deterrent. I must once again emphasize that the consumer will not accept more than a very modest premium adjustment.

The current legislation fails to address the issue of road safety, which must be a priority. The document The Road Ahead placed significant emphasis on the need for safer roads as a key to containing both monetary and social costs. It appears that the road safety agency has been delayed. Why? The frequency and severity of accidents is a major concern not only for the insurance industry but also to the consumer. We live in a very fast paced society, which in turn is being reflected in our driving habits.

The implementation of the road safety program will lower the toll of accidents, injuries and deaths on our roads, thereby reducing the cost of claims and passing benefits on to the consumer. The campaign in Ontario for graduated licensing drew overwhelming public support, but to date there has been no action on this matter. Progress has been made and must continue to be a priority to promote seatbelt use and to reduce drinking and driving. The high-profile campaigns and strict law enforcement have had a definite impact.

I believe the government should also be focusing on an educational program for those who have been licensed over a certain period of time, say 25 years. At present, once a person is licensed to drive in this province, there is no requirement for retesting until the age of 80. There's a large gap here. People pick up bad driving habits that they are not fully aware of and these bad habits play a major role in the frequency of accidents. The road safety agency is a must.

In the first two weeks of January 1993 in Thunder Bay there were an average of 17 accidents per day. This is an alarming amount, considering the population of Thunder Bay is only 113,000. Something has to be done.

Bill 164 does not provide for any changes to the direct compensation property damage portion of the liability section, nor to the physical damage coverage. Ironically, the majority of the consumer complaints lie within these two areas and not in the no-fault accident benefits section. Areas of consumer concerns are with the way vehicles are being valued in the event of a write-off, the lack of time given for return of a rental vehicle when a write-off has been allowed and other minor but significant concerns. Another major problem that is of concern is the double pricing of body shop repairs: one price if you have collision coverage and a lower price if you don't. This problem must be addressed.

Bill 164 provides for government regulations of risk classification. In 1987 the Ontario Automobile Insurance Board examined changes to the risk classification and after much discussion and in-depth study the proposal was abandoned as not being economically feasible. As a result of a uniform rating system, women in all age categories, who have traditionally enjoyed better driving records, as well as mature drivers, will be required to share the cost of claims by younger and higher-risk drivers, specifically males under the age of 25. A change of this nature would also limit competition among the insurers. The present system allows a series of specialized discounts which benefits a variety of consumers, and a number of these discounts are especially beneficial to Ontario seniors. Seniors are on fixed incomes. They cannot afford the increased cost of such a change.

By removing the caps and time limits on supplementary medical rehabilitation and care benefits, the system could be opened up to abuse and add considerably to the costs. It is imperative that proper and accessible facilities be provided to assist injured people, wherever possible, to return to work and lead productive lives.

I'd like to share with you information received from a copy of an article out of the Detroit Free Press which states that Michigan plans to cut auto rates by 16% through the elimination of mandatory unlimited medical coverage and instead requiring a minimum of $1-million coverage with the option to buy up to $5 million. A copy of this article is attached with my presentation. This article undoubtedly gives some indication of the cost involved in giving an unlimited amount for medical coverages. I believe the government should take the same stand in enhancing medical benefits as set out in the Michigan legislation.

Addressing the changes to increasing the income replacement benefits, these benefits in their present form under OMPP seem to be sufficient for the average wage earner in the province of Ontario. Those whose earnings are in excess of $39,000 annually more than likely can afford to purchase the buy-up option which is presently in place under OMPP. Consumers of average earning capacity should not have to pay higher premiums to subsidize those above-average income earners.

In summary, the present system can be modified and improved, gaps filled, with only a modest premium adjustment. We need to deal with the existing problems and feel that government is here to look after society and not here to put on added controls.

For most of the last 30 years, especially in the past 6, there has been a political cloud hanging over the future of auto insurance in Ontario. The consumer is fed up. Let's hope reason finally prevails, that the marketplace is allowed to function and that auto insurance settles down to a long period of stability.

I thank the committee for allowing me this time to voice my concerns.

The Acting Chair (Ms Christel Haeck): Thank you. We have Mr Mancini for the Liberal Party, and in fact you've got just around six minutes.

Mr Mancini: I see from your attachment you have a news article from the Detroit Free Press, which I was looking at the other day, where in the state of Michigan a bill will be introduced, cosponsored by both Republicans and Democrats, which plans to cut the insurance rates for automobile drivers by 16%. We're doing exactly the opposite in Ontario, and I'm wondering why.

I'm wondering if we have consumers and families living in Ontario who are that much more wealthy than they are in Michigan or whether or not this legislation is ideologically driven. Whether or not we have car rate insurance increases or not seems to be not the primary concern but only a secondary or tertiary concern. I was wondering if you'd had a chance to look at that proposal that's being introduced in Michigan, cosponsored by both Democrats and Republicans, and what you think of it.

Ms Menard: I haven't had a chance to look at the proposal. This is the only piece of information I have received at this point in time.

Mr Mancini: Basically in your brief you've made four very good points. You've talked about road safety and the impact that road safety legislation would have on drivers and their insurance rates, something that the government has not done yet. You've talked about the rate increases and mentioned in your brief that people you serve cannot afford any more rate increases. You've talked about the difficulty of administration. I brought with me the new draft regulations, all 68 pages of unintelligible regulations that even senior officials in the insurance industry and top-notch lawyers have told this committee they cannot understand. Your fourth point was the removal of the right to sue for economic loss and how devastating that will be to many families and individuals.

I wanted to ask you, is there anything in the legislation that you think is worth the anywhere from 4.5% rate increase to the 23% rate increase, that all of the actuaries have said we can expect anywhere in that range? Is there anything in Bill 164 that your customers have come in to talk to you about that is worth that increase?

Ms Menard: No, there isn't.

Mr Mancini: Thank you.

Mr Phillips: I really congratulate you on a thoughtful and consumer-oriented brief. The second last paragraph in your brief, I thought, was instructive for us, essentially saying that auto insurance has been in turmoil for years, and just as it's settling down, the people's government has decided to stir it back up again. My experience will be that they're sort of on a mission of Operation Alienation. This is another group to alienate, and that, unfortunately, is all of the public.

You're in the front line. There's bound to be a normal increase in auto rates in any event, just as inflation takes hold, and I think there's agreement that the minimum increase is 5% and up to 20%, but even if we say it's just a 10% increase in premiums, how do people in your business respond to a 10% premium increase? What will be your response when they phone you back and ask you why their insurance has gone up $150?

Ms Menard: Consumers aren't happy with increases. They don't want the increases. They will take minimal amounts of increases on a regular basis. They can deal with that. But they will not accept a double-digit increase in an auto product where they cannot really see where the benefit is of that product. They're tired of hearing about the auto insurance industry, and their main question is, why is the government involved in this?

Mr Phillips: Thank you.

The Chair: Mr Eddy.

Mr Phillips: I have another question.

The Chair: Okay, Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: You comment on the risk classification, and my memory goes back to that 1987 period, what do you think the response of seniors will be when they find their rates are going up 25% or thereabouts?

Ms Menard: The response is going to be anger, definite anger on behalf of the seniors. They're on fixed incomes. The average person doesn't want to see a 25% increase, those who might be able to take it out of their pockets without hurting too much, but for the seniors in Ontario, there's no way. With the cutbacks and everything else they've had, a 25% increase in an auto insurance product? They will not be happy.

Mr Phillips: If, theoretically, you had the option of offering two packages, the existing package at the existing price or this package with a premium 20% higher, what do you think your sales would be on those two packages?

Ms Menard: I would most definitely be able to sell the OMPP package much more than Bill 164.

Mr Tilson: As critic for the Progressive Conservative party, I get a number of letters and telephone calls not only on this bill but also on OMPP. The concerns that come to me from the consumers you are speaking for, which I appreciate, deal not only with their remarks directed against Bill 164 but also against OMPP.

One of those criticisms is the whole process, that it's very difficult to deal with insurance companies. I don't know whether these allegations are true. I get letters, I get calls; some of them may be true and some of them may not be. But insurance companies are in the business, of course, to challenge claims to make a living. At the same time, it's becoming quite clear to me, because of the bureaucracy that's going to be created by Bill 164, that this whole relationship between the consumer and the insurance company is going to become more strained.

I'll read you portions of a typical letter I've received from an individual. I'd like you to give your comments on what I say to them. They complain about OMPP in this letter, and now Bill 164 is going to be even worse. What am I going to tell these people? The letter says this:

"On November 14, 1992, my daughter was involved in a car accident. She's a VON and was on duty, going to see a patient. The police laid no charges and stated the cause of accident as weather conditions. My daughter was in St Michael's Hospital in Toronto for three weeks with head injuries and brain damage.

"The hospital people told my son-in-law to get a lawyer, that because of the insurance and workers' compensation involved, there would be many grey areas. He did. There are.

"The hospital wanted to have follow-up care come to the house to treat my daughter at home, to start at the time of her release from the hospital. This did not happen, because the insurance company would not give the hospital the assurance that its expenses would be covered. Instead, she was cared for by family, friends and VON.

"The insurance adjuster called my son-in-law at his workplace and told him that the insurance company would not accept his claim, as the accident was my daughter's fault. The agent continued to harass him to the point that his employer relieved him of his duties for the day, as he was in an unsafe state of mind to continue working. In my opinion, by not receiving the professional services supplied by St Michael's Hospital, the insurance company has slowed my daughter's recovery and is jeopardizing her health and long-term recovery.

"If the insurance companies would cooperate at the time of an accident, there would be no need to sue. But the way they are carrying on, yes, I believe we, the people, should have the right to sue. If both parties in an accident received proper compensation, no-fault would make sense. But when the person who caused the accident can say, 'Not my fault,' and walk away, I don't believe it's working."

I get a number of complaints orally and in writing about that. What am I to tell those people?

Ms Menard: There's no such thing as "not at fault" and walking away from the accident. OMPP has got a no-fault section in the accident benefits only. Any physical damage coverage and everything else are still based on fault.

Mr Tilson: These people are responding to the OMPP position.

Ms Menard: It's a misconception that unfortunately happened when OMPP was put into place. The "no-fault" scenario of OMPP misled the consumer. They were not aware that the no-fault benefits were only under the accident benefits section and not under the whole product of OMPP. That was really hard to try to address to the consumers.

Mr Tilson: The difficulty I have, of course, is that now I have to tell these people: "You're going to have even fewer rights. You're not going to have the right to sue for loss of future income, economic loss. Your difficulties with the insurance companies may accelerate." And the poor insurance companies are going to have less money to work with, obviously. They're going to have to fight to make every dollar they can. It's a mess. What are we to tell these people?

Ms Menard: It will be a fighting battle; it will be.

Mr Tilson: Now we're finding out that the government's boasting about this wonderful task force, and now the subject of a workshop has come up to try to explain to us all how this whole thing is going to operate. I don't know how much input you personally or contacts you have in the insurance industry have had into this bill, but why do you feel the government's going at it this way now? Why now?

Ms Menard: I don't have an answer for that question. I really don't think the public has requested that OMPP be changed to this extent.

Mr Tilson: So it doesn't make sense to you, at this particular time, in this recession?

Ms Menard: No, it doesn't. In the recession it makes no sense whatsoever that this is coming up.

Mr Tilson: Particularly as costs are going to go up, difficulties are going to be accelerated.

Ms Menard: Definitely.

Mr Tilson: Does any of Bill 164 make sense to you?

Ms Menard: No.

Mr Tilson: I'm going to leave it at that, Mr Chairman.

The Chair: Fine; you had 30 seconds left. I'm going to go to Mr Owens.

Mr Owens: I don't think anyone in this room, whether sitting at these tables or out in the greater audience, would say they don't care about senior citizens, so my blunt question to you is, why should auto insurance premiums be based on age rather than driving record, where it really doesn't matter whether the person is 25 or over 65? If he has a bad record at 65, why would you be interested in subsidizing that bad driver instead of looking at his record directly?

Ms Menard: Those drivers at the age of 65 who have a bad driving record are being penalized for it.

Mr Owens: In terms of the uniform classification system then, we are looking clearly at doing that throughout the whole system, not looking at drivers and saying, "Because you're a married female over the age of 25, that automatically qualifies you as a better driver." Why do you think we should look at variables like that, rather than simply looking directly at a driving record?

Ms Menard: I think the stats show that those under the age of 25—I don't have any figures with me, but the percentages are high. The youthfulness of the driver, the inexperience of the driver: Those are the ones who are creating the majority of the havoc on our roads.

Mr Owens: So in terms of the uniform classification system, those bad drivers will get dinged and those who are good drivers won't get dinged. Is that not right?

Ms Menard: Yes, they would.

Mr Owens: Thank you. Mr Winninger.

The Chair: I'm the Chair. Mr Winninger.

Mr Winninger: I certainly appreciated your presentation, particularly a statement you made on page 4, that consumers who are of average earning capacity should not have to pay higher premiums to subsidize those above-average income earners. Many critics on the opposition side have suggested that the government was remiss in not allowing accident victims to sue for their full economic loss, which would of course mean that consumers of average earning capacity would be paying higher premiums for those who are well beyond average earning capacity.

When I suggested that the proper way to approach that is through providing contracts of insurance for excess economic loss, Mr Harnick said Bill 164 does not allow for contracts insuring excess economic loss. I think Mr Harnick, who is himself a lawyer, should read subsection 224(6) of the Insurance Act, which says quite clearly, "An insurer, with the approval of the commissioner, may offer optional benefits in excess of the benefits that must be provided under the no-fault benefits schedule." That is also restated in section 253.

So my question to you would be, given that there are policies that can be made available to insure for excess economic loss, does it not tie in quite closely with your observation that people of only average earning capacity should not subsidize those who are above the average?

Ms Menard: Yes, it does. The excess is exactly that; it would be excess. It would be an option paid by the insured. If that insured wishes to pay for that excess coverage, that's his option, and that's the way it would be placed in the bill: as an option for excess economic loss.

Mr Klopp: You mentioned early in your brief, page 2 or 3, the business about the government pushing through the Ministry of Transportation things to do with reducing through education etc, and you're wondering why not. I've sat in the House and seen people spend all day reading lakes into the House. Sometimes one has to waste time doing that, and it's pretty hard for different ministries to push the process through, and that's an issue we have to look at. Here today we're dealing with the insurer, and the other side is to look at reducing through education. Do you have any thoughts or ideas, coming from a rural area, on how to do things, like graduated licences and stuff like that?

Ms Menard: I think there could always be provisions made in the graduated licensing program for different variables: different areas of the city, time schedules, time permits. It can be enhanced. The graduated licensing program will work. I'm positive it will work, and I think it's a necessity that we have it in place as soon as possible.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee today.

THUNDER BAY INSURANCE SERVICES LTD

The Chair: Everyone has the next presenter's brief in front of them. Would Thunder Bay Insurance Services Ltd come forward, please. I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. We have one half-hour, until 12 noon. In that period of time, could you leave some time at the end of your presentation for questions from the committee? You may begin. Please identify yourself for the purposes of Hansard.

Mr David Baxter: Good day, Mr Chairman and members of the committee. My name is David Baxter, president and general manager of Thunder Bay Insurance Services Ltd. Thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today.

I own and operate three offices with 21 staff, servicing approximately 7,000 client families in the Thunder Bay and Nipigon region of northwestern Ontario.

I myself have been in the insurance industry for over 14 years as a general insurance broker and deal with the public on a daily basis. I also serve as a director and executive officer of the Thunder Bay Insurance Brokers Association, an affiliate of the Insurance Brokers Association of Ontario, for the past 10 years.

Today I would like to address my concerns on Bill 164 on behalf of my clients, who have entrusted their confidence in my firm. When counselling our clients, we try to provide a level of service that educates them on the products they are purchasing and helps them understand the benefits and limitations of these products in simple terms. Once we have agreed on the coverages that are necessary for their protection, we begin the process of affordability versus protection and the education of the costing of these benefits. This process that we undertake as an insurance broker aids the consumer in simplifying the insurance purchase, which makes it less confusing and less frustrating for them.

I will attempt to describe the history, as seen through my office, of the insurance problems that led up to the creation of the Ontario motorist protection plan. I will also describe the benefits this plan has had for my clients and some of the problems that have arisen. Finally, I will express my opinion on what I see as the effects of Bill 164 on my clients.

First, I would like to reflect back on the early 1980s, when the tort system was in effect. Clients in the tort system were treated as adversaries by third-party adjusters or company personnel. Because the adjuster was working in the third-party environment, his job was to keep costs down, creating a feeling in the consumer that he was not being dealt with fairly. Lawyers were involved as the public grew in their antagonistic feeling to get back at the big insurance companies for not giving them their fair shake. As frustrations grew with the rising costs, the public was caught in an endless cycle that could be best described by the expression: "I deserve to get more in my claim. I've paid plenty of money for my insurance."

By the mid-1980s, the public became more aware of settlements being paid by insurance companies for large sums due to lost wages and pain and suffering. Soon more writs were being issued in the public's attempt to fight back in frustration at the claims process and in the hope to benefit from the situation for a possible windfall. The system was being abused.

I would see a copy of a lawsuit received by one of my clients at least three times per month, and I'd be consoling my clients on the vindictive legal terms used against them in these writs. What first started out as an attempt by the consumer to receive a fair settlement had gone full cycle and had driven the insurance costs up, creating more frustration with the system. Insurance had become a product no longer of protection but one of abuse.

In the late 1980s, in an attempt to address the public outcry, the previous government, under the Ontario Automobile Insurance Board, froze insurance premiums while attempting to analyse spiralling insurance costs. Factors that were addressed were the cost of the legal system involvement and the possibility of a new classification system. After numerous studies, the Ontario motorist protection plan was introduced in June 1990. It brought back the accountability of the insurance companies to the public by making the insurance companies a first party in their client's claim settlement, taking away the adversary condition of the previous system.

OMPP has addressed a fair compensation of wage loss, medical costs and rehabilitation for the injured client. Although it is not a perfect system, it has created consumer confidence by their understanding of the Ontario motorist protection plan product. It has also brought premium rate stabilization to the consumer. OMPP is a complex enough product, but it can be understood by consumers, allowing them to know their rights.

Since the introduction of OMPP it has taken our staff many hours to explain the different options available under the plan to our clients. Generally, our clients feel that OMPP gives them fair compensation in the event of an accident. The present accident benefit levels are accurate for the majority, with only 5% of our clients opting to purchase higher limits. Those who need the increased limits are those who are in a higher income bracket and can generally afford to purchase the optional limits.

Complaints under OMPP compared to the tort system have dropped drastically. The complaints seem to be centred on the cost of repairs rather than the levels of compensation for lost wages or medical rehabilitation. It would seem that the focus should be on physical damage and direct compensation for vehicle repairs rather than the re-establishment of a new accident benefits structure.

In the fall of 1991 the government had stated that it would not start a government-run auto system due to the cost involved; it would rather focus its attention on safer roads and educating the driving public, under Bill 39 and The Road Ahead. It appears these two initiatives have been shelved in order to satisfy some self-interest groups that make up a minority of the insurance public.

Should a question at this time be asked, "What has happened to the road safety board," or is this a job that private industry must carry forward? Also, there is much money spent in the promotion of graduated licensing, which should reduce the number of serious or fatal accidents, but again this has been stalled prior to implementation. I, along with my clients, feel the money would be better spent on both of these projects rather than the cost of implementing Bill 164.

Upon reviewing the proposed changes to OMPP by Bill 164, the main focus addressed is on the improvements of accident benefits and the right to compensation for non-economic loss, pain and suffering. Other items addressed are the new classification system and the insurer withdrawal from the marketplace.

In assessing the benefits of the improved accident benefits for my clients and in discussion with some of these clients, it is an opinion that to increase income replacement beyond the average wage earner will only increase the base cost of the average wage earner and is not necessary at this time. In addressing the indexing of benefits, would it not be far simpler to review the level of benefits every three years rather than the complex formulas that are designed, which will undoubtedly not only confuse the insurance adjusters but the insurance public as well?

In these areas I feel it would be better to make minor adjustments rather than implement wholesale changes that would increase the cost of the product. Another cost factor in these changes is the increased cost of advising the public of their new rights, either by the Ontario Insurance Commission, independent brokers or through a legal system.

Under supplementary medical rehabilitation and attendant care: By taking away the cap of $500,000, are we trying to solve a threshold problem or create another one? Also, by unlimiting the time for rehabilitation, does this not create an incentive that people will not want to be rehabilitated? Under the death benefits, by increasing from $25,000 for a spouse to $50,000 upwards to $200,000, are we not interfering with the life insurance industry by creating an over-sense of security under an auto policy? In addressing funeral benefits, I believe the present gives a very cost-effective option for compensation and that an automatic increase is only forcing the consumer to absorb that cost.

Overall, I feel the present accident benefit structure may need minor adjustments and not the changes that are proposed by Bill 164, because of the potential cost to the consumer.

Now I'd like to address the proposal for the right to sue for non-pecuniary loss. I feel bringing back this section for a debatable issue such as pain and suffering would only bring back the windfall-type attitude of the mid-1980s. Would this not be better served on a charted injury system that would be far fairer to all victims throughout the province, rather than leaving it up to the courts in different jurisdictions and the availability of the best lawyer to get the best settlement?

Also, under this section with the $15,000 and $5,000 deductibles respectively that are stated for the reduction of damages, will these become a benchmark in order to start the point of negotiations? Also, would the legal profession still charge a total settlement, or the settlement less the deductible? Would the consumer benefit or be at a loss?

In regard to the new classification system, at times I can fully agree that new drivers pay far above affordability in comparison with the chance to prove themselves through their driving record. But as many accident statistics still prove, after reviewing statistics as late as December 1992 for our city, new and youthful drivers still cause the majority of accidents.

Rather than having cabinet devise a new classification system, would it not be better that the ministry and the industry provide rating changes that address "innocent until proven guilty"? It is also feared that devising a new classification system may increase the cost for the average driver. This may increase the possibility of more uninsured drivers due to the increased costs, a scenario which I have not seen since the mid-1980s, whereby several times a year I would appear in provincial court testifying and showing records of those drivers driving without insurance.

Finally, in addressing the proposal regarding the insurer carrier withdrawal from the marketplace and the cost of such withdrawal, I believe some of these options have been addressed by the minister and that the cost and the waiting period for withdrawal have been amended.

In summary, I feel that Bill 164 is complex. The complexity of the bill will add a costly burden to my office, the offices of the independent adjusters, the insurance carriers and the Ontario Insurance Commission, a price which the consumer is not prepared to pay in order to understand a more complex insurance product. The consumer does not wish to have a more complex insurance product at additional cost, but rather an understandable product at a reasonable cost. With regard to the increasing benefits of Bill 164, I feel that the cost to the average consumer may be too great in comparison with the true benefit to the average consumer.

Finally, when discussing some of these changes with my clients over the past few months, the general feeling is, "Why do we need these changes and how much more am I going to pay?" As a representative for my office, my staff and my clients, I feel that the efforts could be better spent on minor improvements to OMPP and on a greater focus on the road safety board to get started in reducing the amount of claims and the implementation of graduated licensing in order to help create better drivers. Thank you for your time. I hope you take my points into consideration.

The Chair: Thank you. Mr Tilson up first.

Mr Tilson: How much time do we have?

The Chair: We have about six minutes.

Mr Tilson: You've raised the point that I have maintained over and over to this government, that the tort system, the pre-OMPP system, took years and years to develop in going to courts, and now we have the OMPP which is before us, whether this bill removes all that, and already there are a whole bunch of cases that are going to the courts on that. In fact, the insurance companies tell us—and they may be right; I don't know—that in time the courts will determine a proper test, that if you let this system work, whether you have one case or another case, eventually through a number of years the proper test will develop.

Now, of course, we've got Bill 164 and they're kidding themselves. The government is kidding itself that that isn't going to produce a whole raft of cases; in other words, the subject of general damages, the cap that's put on by the Supreme Court of Canada on general damages. Because there's no more economic loss, will that subject change? Will courts bend over backwards to enable people to get more than $15,000? There's going to be a whole slew of cases on that. The consumer will just be befuddled as to which situation we're going to be under. I think that seems to be one of your messages: Let's sit back, and whether OMPP was right or whether it was wrong, let's sit back. Why make it worse? Why make it worse 10 times?

I have another question for you that I haven't heard asked. Is it possible that—

Mr Baxter: Can I answer on the first part?

Mr Tilson: No, that wasn't a question.

Mr Baxter: Okay.

Mr Tilson: That was just my morning wrath against this group of people. The question I have is, do you anticipate another form of litigation, and that is by the consumer against the insurance company? I believe because of the difficulties that this government is going to be putting on them—they are not going to be allowed any more rate increases, they're not going to have any more money and yet the benefits are going to be unbelievable—insurance companies will be more and more difficult to deal with and I believe there will be more and more litigation against insurance companies. Have you any thoughts on that?

Mr Baxter: I feel that introducing Bill 164 will cause a frustration similar to the mid-1980s where the clients did feel it was them against the big insurance companies due to the cost factor. They're paying more and they're not getting what their fair shake is. Yes, if we could go back to the simple times where they hired a lawyer to get their fair shake. So it would be an attack against the insurance companies, which will start the same spiral in cases that we had that led up to the late 1980s problems.

Mr Tilson: That's the joke of it all because it has become quite clear that no one—insurance companies, lawyers, even the dippers—understands the regulations. No one understands these regulations. People are going to have to go to court because one group of people is going to say, "This is what I'm entitled to," and the insurance companies are going to say, "No." I'm being harsh on the insurance companies but I think under the circumstances that's probably what's going to happen. The result of it will be that the costs of insurance will escalate even more, even greater than these people dreamed.

Mr Baxter: When you get into complexity it does take more than one person to interpret it, so when you get more interpretations you have more people involved and thus the costs go up. The public needs to be protected. Their costs will go up through the insurance in order to interpret the product that's made for them.

Mr Tilson: So that the cost of litigation, which these people are trying to reduce, in fact will increase. It will increase on two fronts. They're saying, on their own admission, that it's going to increase as a result of the deductible principle, and there will be litigation over that subject, there will be more cases before the courts, and more importantly there will be more litigation against the insurance companies.

Mr Baxter: The insurance industry as a whole, and possibly different government officials, to try and debate the understanding of this bill.

Mr Tilson: I'd like to ask one more question and that is with respect to the elimination of age, sex and marital status. I'd just like you to comment as to your thoughts on that. That, of course, was originally proposed by the Liberals, as I understand it, with OMPP, but even they withdrew it.

Mr Baxter: Prior to OMPP, by the Ontario insurance board.

Mr Tilson: But that was withdrawn, of course, and now the concern is that in fact there's going to be a subsidization of the young, the unmarried and males. That's in effect what's going to go on. We're trying to make the premiums the same all the way across, but those who are good drivers—the records show who are good drivers—are going to be paying more premiums. Is that the message?

Mr Baxter: If you do try to come with a balanced system, with taking age and sex out of it, yes, there would be more of a balanced rating throughout the system. But at the same time you are looking towards the driving record as a principal cause. Factors and rate reflection on that have not been tested yet and are only in the studies, but I believe the Liberal government had not gone far enough on its study to say that it could come to conclusive evidence that it would work.

Mr Tilson: I'm going to give the rest of my time to Mr Kormos.

The Chair: I was just going to tell you that you had run out. That's why I was motioning to you.

Mr Tilson: That sounds usual. Mr Chairman, I must confess I don't always agree with Mr Kormos. I disagree with him on a lot of things.

Mr Kormos: Mr Tilson, I'm shocked.

Mr Tilson: But it seems to me that he is being shunted out of these proceedings—

The Chair: No, he hasn't.

Mr Tilson: —and I resent that, as a member of this Legislature. I disagree. Anybody has a right to speak.

The Chair: I had already motioned to you ahead of time. The Chair has made a decision. Mr Johnson.

Mr Kormos: Mr Tilson, I thank you graciously for your offer. You are far more generous and far more democratic than—

The Chair: Mr Johnson.

Mr Johnson: Thank you very much for your presentation. It offers some interesting perspectives. Consumers, your customers—your clients, if you will—who have been in an accident and have to make a claim become claimants, but consumers and claimants are indeed one and the same.

Mr Baxter: Yes.

Mr Johnson: When you're a consumer and you haven't been in an accident, you want to see your rates kept as low as possible. That's common sense, that people want to see their rates as low as possible. But once you become a claimant and you've been in an accident, you want to see the maximum benefit. At least, you want to get what you think you deserve as a result of having been in an accident.

Mr Baxter: Correct.

Mr Johnson: One statement you make here is that you talk about self-interest groups that are a minority of the insurance public. Claimants are a minority, because for all the people who drive, there are fewer claimants than there are actual drivers. That's common sense.

Mr Baxter: Yes.

Mr Johnson: I think those people who have been in accidents and need rehabilitation and recovery for lost earnings and things like that want to access them as quickly as possible, and they want to maximize that. Under this new system, Bill 164, I understand that there is an improvement over the OMPP. Wouldn't you agree?

Mr Baxter: There are minor improvements, but OMPP does have some of that system covered already.

Mr Johnson: But there are some improvements so that people are going to be served more quickly, and some of the benefits have been increased for lost wages and rehabilitation.

Mr Baxter: Have they necessarily been increased for lost wages?

Mr Johnson: They have. If you look at some of the things that have been improved in the overall bill, there are certain areas where, when people have the right to claim for those things, there are increases, from $600 to $1,000 per week, for example.

Mr Baxter: Those options are presently in the OMPP system.

Mr Johnson: But there have been improvements.

Mr Baxter: Improvements at what cost?

Mr Johnson: That's what I'm getting to. In fact, there are improvements, and I know Mr Phillips offered this question earlier, but if you were to offer the OMPP plan versus the Bill 164 plan at the same cost, wouldn't the claimants be getting a better deal?

Mr Baxter: There would be a question whether claimants could understand Bill 164 enough to see the viability of the factor of whether to purchase that option, even if it is at a nominal cost or an equal cost.

Mr Johnson: But in the final analysis, there are lawyers, there are the insurance companies, there are brokers and then there is the consumer, who may be a claimant if, God help him, he's in an automobile accident. The whole purpose of this process is that we have an opportunity for people who become claimants to access some benefits, and that may be dollars or that may be rehabilitation. To get better benefits: Isn't that what we're all aiming for?

Mr Baxter: Whenever you get any product in life better, you usually pay more. There is no magical gift out there that gives you something better for free.

Mr Johnson: But the whole purpose of this is to make sure that people who are in accidents get benefits, that they get rehabilitated, that they are helped after the accident. Isn't that the point?

Mr Baxter: Which is the purpose of OMPP and that's why it was there. I agree there are minor improvements that could be done to it, but this bill does major improvements at major cost to the consumer, and my job as a broker is to protect the consumer for his costs.

Mr Johnson: But what about the claimants?

Mr Baxter: Also, as a claimant, to make sure he is getting the proper product for affordability.

Mr Johnson: Some of the claimants have said, and in fact at Queen's Park we've heard some of the horror stories about some of the claimants, about the problems they're having today, and this is under the OMPP system. They're not having a good relationship with their insurance company. I think the brokers are doing a reasonable job, but the insurance companies themselves, the ones that actually look after paying out the benefits—some of these people have told some real horror stories about delays that have gone on for long periods of time, many years, when they've received nothing.

Isn't it the claimant who needs to be looked after immediately following an automobile accident? Don't you think that an improvement in the timeliness of responding to their needs is something that's very valuable and important?

Mr Baxter: I agree, and under OMPP there are regulations that can be enforced to improve those improvements. This does give a better improvement above that, but we have not costed the factor for this improvement. Is the public willing to pay that as a generality, compared to the minor cases that are before the courts today and have not been settled?

Mr Johnson: The consumer who becomes a complainant, or a claimant, rather—and maybe a complainant if he's not getting serviced properly—certainly wants to make sure he is going to get the very best benefit he can. When we look at some of the horror stories we've experienced, listening to people who have come forward at Queen's Park recently—

Mr Baxter: If I can reflect on the paragraph right after that, only 5% of the consumers I presently have have purchased increased options.

Mr Mancini: Mr Chairman, I'd like to reserve half of my time for Mr Kormos. Could you please let me know when my three minutes have expired?

Interjection.

Mr Mancini: Six minutes. I've got nine minutes altogether?

The Chair: Six minutes altogether.

Mr Mancini: Mr Baxter, thank you for your brief. It's clear, concise and gets right to the point. I'm interested in what just transpired. Mr Johnson used his entire time this morning to try to indicate to the members of the committee, to yourself, to the viewing public, that the reason the Ontario motorist protection plan isn't good enough and that the reason Bill 164 is being introduced is that they want to give more services, more benefits to the general public. I would say to you and to all who are listening that that's not true. I'd like to quote Mr Mel Swart. Do you know who Mel Swart is?

Mr Baxter: Yes.

Mr Mancini: Mel Swart is a former New Democratic MPP for the Welland-Thorold riding near the St Catharines-Niagara Falls area. Mr Swart and Mr Bob Rae and all of these New Democrats here today ran on an election platform that said, "We will provide the consumers of Ontario with (a) government-owned automobile insurance, (b) cheaper rates, and (c) full tort, full right to sue for both economic and non-economic loss."

They have in fact broken every one of those three promises. Mr Swart says—not Remo Mancini and the Liberals or Mr Tilson and the Conservatives—the reason Bill 164 is being introduced—and I quote, "Bill 164 is before the Legislature only because, after the NDP leader and members had made so much fuss in opposition, they couldn't be seen as doing nothing now." The only reason senior citizens will face higher rates, the only reason young married couples will face higher rates, the only reason people have lost the right to sue for economic loss, the only reason for all of this and the only reason for taking, because of rate increases, anywhere from $200 million to $500 million out of the economy, is so that these five or six ladies and gentlemen can save face within the Ontario New Democratic Party. I say shame on them. Shame on each and every one of you.

Sir, could you please tell me, in your opinion, if the road safety program were in place—if modest increases such as you've discussed this morning and changes were made to the OMPP, do you think we'd have an affordable and practical package?

Mr Baxter: Yes, I think road safety and graduated licences would improve driver safety, which would reduce the amounts of claims and claimants.

Mr Kormos: Mr Baxter, I've got to tell you what a pleasure it is for me to be once again involved in these insurance wars. I'm a little bit of a veteran, certainly not the veteran that Mel Swart is.

Look, this is what concerns me. Everybody expects puffery and hyperbole from governments. Lord knows we had it from the Liberals and, indeed the Tories before that. The problem is that the peddling of this particular bit of legislation has descended from puffery into outright deceit and dishonesty. The line that somehow benefits are going to be increased is the greatest mistruth. To wit, 90% of net—that was marvellously borrowed, plagiarized from the workers' compensation system. If you love workers' comp, you'll love Bill 164. I tell you, 90% of net was a hell of a lot less than 80% of gross, which is what the OMPP currently provides by way of wage replacement.

It is incredibly dishonest, it's an outright lie, to suggest that Bill 164 increases benefits for the vast majority of injured people. Their benefits will be reduced, and a simple calculation will substantiate that. It causes me great concern that the government will not speak honestly about that particular issue. It causes me great concern that somehow the government indicates that it's opened the courtroom doors to innocent victims so that they can litigate for pain and suffering, yet every successful litigant is going to have to pay a premium surcharge of $15,000 back to the insurance company. It's going to be the innocent party who's going to have $15,000 taken from his legitimate award to be paid back into the coffers of the insurance industry. It's remarkable that somehow the government can suggest that the courtroom is an adequate place to assess pain and suffering but isn't an adequate place to assess the real economic loss of the most seriously injured.

I am in the remarkable position of having to agree with more than a few of the comments from the insurance industry. Now, that's a remarkable change from some short time ago, but I agree with those people that I would far sooner see Bill 68 tested as it is in the courts now than see Bill 164 imposed, stripping away what few rights were left to innocent accident victims, especially the rights of the most seriously injured.

It's remarkable that it's an NDP government that would steal from the most seriously injured innocent accident victims their right to be compensated. At least OMPP preserved that for them, and the courts now, in Meyer and Dalglish, as everybody well knows, are currently testing the effect or impact of the threshold.

It's remarkable and it's shameful that it's an NDP government, which promised to restore innocent accident victims' rights, that would reduce, strip away, steal from them, lock and bolt that courtroom door for ever and ever to the most seriously injured: the paraplegic, the quadriplegic, the head-injured, all those people whose lives effectively were stolen from them on the pavement of a highway. Any remedies that they might have had under OMPP are subsequently stolen from them by a government that said it looked out for the little people. Shame, shame.

The Chair: Mr Kormos, would you like the presenter to reply?

Mr Kormos: Sure, I'd love him to reply.

The Chair: I know he can talk. I know you put a lot of words into—

Mr Owens: His mouth.

The Chair: —his mouth. Would you mind replying? That'll be the end of the presentation.

Mr Mancini: Who's the Chair, you or Mr Owens?

The Chair: I'm the Chair.

Mr Mancini: Then have him behave.

The Chair: I'm deaf in this ear. Go ahead, sir.

Mr Baxter: In reply to some of his comments, yes, the 90% of net is lower than the 80% of gross until you get into very high wages, supposedly above the $65,000 figure. I have done a calculation on my own wage. I would end up with less if I was in an accident.

Mr Kormos: The poor people are subsidizing the rich; from the New Democrats, of all people.

The Chair: Sir, I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee.

This committee will be recessed until 1:30. It will be the Thunder Bay Chamber of Commerce up first. You can put on that nice, quiet music there.

The committee recessed at 1158.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1332.

The Chair: We will resume the standing committee on finance and economic affairs, Bill 164, An Act to amend the Insurance Act and certain other Acts in respect of Automobile Insurance and other Insurance Matters. This is day one on the road, day four in the hearings.

THUNDER BAY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The Chair: I'd like to bring forward the Thunder Bay Chamber of Commerce. If you don't mind, take a seat up here. You're Mr Smith? Do you have any colleagues with you?

Mr Douglas L.A. Smith: No, I do not. I would acknowledge the executive director of the Thunder Bay Chamber of Commerce, Rebecca Johnson, in the audience.

The Chair: Have her come up and sit beside you. I'd like to welcome you to the committee. We have until 2 o'clock. In that period of time, after your presentation, can you leave some time for questions from the committee? If you were sitting here this morning, you saw there were a lot of questions. Introduce yourself and your colleague for the purposes of Hansard. You may begin.

Mr Smith: My name is Douglas Smith, and I am a director with the Thunder Bay Chamber of Commerce. Rebecca Johnson is the executive director of the Thunder Bay Chamber of Commerce.

Good afternoon, Mr Chairman and members of the committee. I have been a director of the Thunder Bay Chamber of Commerce for the past four years, which was that period of time within which the automobile insurance industry moved into the Ontario motorist protection plan, or OMPP as it is known today, following many studies and much investigation by all three political parties.

I would also inform the committee that I am a general insurance broker by profession, owning and operating a family business begun by my father here in Thunder Bay in 1946. Being closely involved with the evolution of the no-fault, first-party OMPP product, I have developed certain views upon the complex issues surrounding automobile insurance within the province of Ontario, but my remarks today will focus upon the concerns relating specifically to the business membership of the Thunder Bay Chamber of Commerce.

Before I begin those remarks, may I first welcome you to the city of Thunder Bay, site of the 1995 World Nordic Ski Championships, and applaud your decision for taking these hearings beyond the city of Toronto. We often feel it is the "province of Toronto" sometimes, rather than the province of Ontario, and we are always concerned about getting the northern voice to you. Also, I want to thank you for considering this regional centre, as represented by the city of Thunder Bay, rather than a smaller community which would have made it much more difficult for the majority of presenters to make travel arrangements.

The Thunder Bay Chamber of Commerce is an organization with approximately 800 members, 75% of which, like myself, are classified as small business. My message to you, on behalf of that membership, is quite straightforward and deals with the affordability issue of automobile insurance, not only to the business community but to consumers in general.

As I am sure you can recall, the driving force behind the automobile insurance industry's move to the first-party system of no-fault insurance was the uncontrolled escalation of costs relating to the deliverance of the product to the consumer. In a five-year period in the early 1980s, the cost of third-party claims and adjustment expenses rose 16.5% each year. This created the serious imbalance between the cost of settling claims and insurance premiums. Automobile insurers experienced substantial losses and increased rates sharply. The overall marketplace tightened, resulting in the growth of the Facility Association, of course being the industry's market of last resort.

Consumers quickly forgot about any earlier period of affordable premiums and pressured the government to act. With the average annual automobile insurance premium in the mid-1980s reaching between $700 and $800, it became apparent that fundamental changes had to occur within the industry, hence the evolution of the Ontario motorist protection plan, which commenced in June 1990. That fundamental change was from the adversarial third-party system to the rehabilitation/income-replacement first-party system, known as Bill 68.

One of the significant requirements within Bill 68 was a review of how the new product was doing at the two-year period following its introduction; that would be the time frame we are now in. That review was to include cost control concerns, particularly in rehabilitation services, to ensure not only fairness of benefits available but also continued affordability.

Given, now, the government's attempt to introduce Bill 164 and again significantly alter and complicate the existing OMPP product, the main concern of the Thunder Bay Chamber of Commerce membership continues to be stable and predictable pricing and its environment for automobile insurance, in order that premiums remain affordable and the product remains competitively available. We recognize that the current system, as represented by the Ontario motorist protection plan, can be and must be enhanced, but changes must only be made with an eye to additional benefits that consumers both want and can afford. It is the view of the Thunder Bay Chamber of Commerce that a healthy, competitive industry is the best way to obtain such results.

At this time, I would focus my remarks upon the projected estimates of automobile insurance costs within Bill 164. The Mercer study, as done at the request of the government, and the Wyatt Co report, as commissioned by the insurance industry, both illustrate the large uncertainty as to what actual cost increases will prove to be. The Mercer study acknowledges that actual costs may vary significantly from its estimates, which were politically stated by the Minister of Financial Institutions, responsible for automobile insurance, as being a minimum of 4%. It is to be noted that the minister, appearing on a Toronto radio talk show January 28, when asked by the host of the show as to the possibility of premium increases being higher than 4%, responded by stating that the government actuarial study did not reflect accurate costs of the operation of a system and that theoretically premiums could rise higher. The insurance industry's actuarial Wyatt report indicates that premium increases would be closer to 20% with the incorporation of the complex changes within Bill 164.

It is the very real concern of the Thunder Bay Chamber of Commerce that any increase of automobile insurance premiums cannot be currently absorbed, especially by small business, as the community struggles with stagnant growth and revenues but overall increased operating expenses. If automobile insurance premiums again begin to spiral, with businesses at the same time now having to handle additional recent corporate expenses like the employer health tax and the government sales tax, many, if not most, firms will find it very difficult as they struggle for their economic survival.

It is our message to you today that your decision on Bill 164 should not be driven by political ideology but rather stay focused upon what would be the reality of any cost increases to the consumers. Quite simply, nothing has changed since OMPP came to be. In fact, we are all aware that economic conditions are more adverse than two years ago. The consumers of automobile insurance cannot afford to pay much more than what they are paying now.

May I conclude my remarks on Bill 164 to you today, on behalf of the Thunder Bay Chamber of Commerce, by reaffirming that in order to maximize product benefits to the automobile consumer, a healthy competitive general insurance industry, both nationally and provincially, is required. In this way, service and product innovation will best serve the evolving needs of Ontario drivers.

As a brief overview, I would remind the committee that Canada's property and casualty insurance industry currently employs about 118,000, of whom approximately 47,500, or 40%, work in Ontario. Total industry employment is split about evenly between insurance companies on the one hand and independent agents, brokers and adjusters on the other.

Total assets in Canada for the industry were approximately $32 billion in 1991, while current industry investment in the province of Ontario was about $9 billion. In 1991, total premium income in Canada was $14.5 billion, of which $7.2 billion came from business in Ontario. Automobile insurance in this province represents 60% of this $7.2 billion, or approximately $4.3 billion.

The point to be made is that the automobile insurance industry is a vital economic component of our province and must be allowed to operate within a predictable and stable environment if the consumer is to realize optimal benefits of coverage and costs.

In September 1990, the current government announced its plan to introduce public automobile insurance in Ontario. In September 1991, after much study, the government announced that it would not introduce public automobile insurance because it would be too expensive and disruptive to the province's economy. The main reason for abandoning the government-run plan was a projected displacement of 22,000 jobs, mostly being female, the withdrawal of investment from the province and the projected $1.6 billion in startup costs that would have been required. The bottom line, given the above, was that automobile insurance premiums would not be reduced to the consumer. Indeed, the Premier of the province stated that the issue of government-run automobile insurance would not be revisited again.

Given that this decision has clearly been made, it is the position of the Thunder Bay Chamber of Commerce that the government minimize its involvement in the product if the results of such involvement would be a further escalation in premiums to the consumer, which cannot be borne during these adverse economic times. Rather, the government could play an effective role with the industry by concentrating on issues like graduated licensing, road safety, physical repairs and automobile design.

Allow a reasonable rate of return to the industry, which the Coulter Osborne study in 1986 stated was approximately 12.5%, and then the free enterprise market forces will continue to serve the best interest of the consumer. The government is requested to enhance the product of automobile insurance within the existing structure of the Ontario motorist protection plan if it is determined that any of the amendments considered within the new legislation as represented by Bill 164 would result in increased costs or eventual product availability.

On behalf of the Thunder Bay Chamber of Commerce, I respectfully submit this report.

The Chair: Thank you. Mr Johnson.

Mr Johnson: At the very beginning of your submission, you mentioned that 75% of your 800 members are small business people. Is that correct?

Mr Smith: That's right.

Mr Johnson: I was wondering if you'd had a chance to review the government amendment with regard to the withdrawal provision, or if you had any comments on this.

Mr Smith: No, I haven't, to be honest.

Mr Johnson: Then let's go on with something else. With regard to self-employed people, Bill 164 has tried to take into account the special needs and difficulties that self-employed individuals have, especially with regard to those individuals who may have the misfortune of being involved in an automobile accident. Some of the changes that take place under Bill 164 are such that, for example, there's a longer averaging period—three years—to address the volatility of income; as you know, income can change a lot in a private business over a period of time. It also offers the alternative of agreeing in advance with the insurer the level of income replacement that might be required if you should not be able to do your job; also, compensation for special business expenses incurred as a result of the particular accident. These are improvements over the OMPP plan, and I was just wondering what you think about that for self-employed businesspeople who have those.

Mr Smith: To respond to that, the Thunder Bay Chamber of Commerce's position has to incorporate all of its membership, and I would say it's the escalation of premiums in the competitive marketplace that we're most concerned about. As an insurance broker, clearly those are areas of enhancement that are required within the product. Certainly the product is evolving, as when OMPP came to be two years ago. That is why, after a two-year period, it has to be addressed and enhanced where possible, and certainly those are areas of enhancement that could be considered, yes.

Mr Johnson: So self-employed people do have special needs that need to be addressed; however they're addressed, they need to be addressed.

Mr Smith: That's right.

Mr Johnson: I talked about this earlier this morning. When we talk about the benefits versus the cost ratio, I think it's important to note that, especially for people who become disabled permanently or who need rehabilitation, there used to be a cap of $500,000, and also a termination after a period of time—I think it was 10 years—and those caps have been removed. What that means is that those people who have suffered a very debilitating mishap will now be continually compensated after those times. That means that if people who are, say, 20 years old, after 10 or 15 years, depending on exactly what the cap is, will, if they've gone over that $500,000 mark that right now the OMPP limits them to, or the 10 years, then they no longer have any kind of compensation. Do you not see that as an improvement?

Mr Smith: That is an improvement. Again, the bottom line from a chamber perspective is the cost of those improvements. The average premium in the province now I understand to be $900. If that is the case, meeting expenses is becoming exceedingly difficult for small business and business in general.

Mr Johnson: I know that when I was a kid, I paid about $600. When I was about 16, I paid about $600 for automobile insurance, and now I still pay $600 a year, but that's a different point altogether.

The Chair: Mr Klopp.

Mr Klopp: I'll stay on the same kind of discussion. We're proposing a lot of benefits changes in this bill. Paul's mentioned a couple. On page 2, you've made a comment that there needs to be some other changes. In all fairness, you mentioned the one about the self-employed. Are there any others that you are happy are proposed in this bill, from the indexation to better income for students if they are in an unfortunate accident? Can you make a comment on those?

Mr Smith: The only comment I would make there is the complexity of what is being offered within that bill. At this point in time, with no-fault as it is, again it comes down to overall premiums. All of that can be made available. It's a question of, will the consumer pay for it? I'm saying to you, from my perspective, that the consumer is very much at a point now where any higher increases would be very difficult, whether you make use of brokers offering optional coverages to provide enhancements, or deal with enhancements in another way so the industry can respond to it and price it, because if it's not priced properly then there would be other problems within the industry.

The Chair: Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the chamber's presentation. I think you've given us some good thought here. Just for your own information, we in the opposition are having difficulty in understanding the priorities of the government. On the one hand, as you know, hospitals this year will be getting no increase: 0% increase this year, 0% increase next year, frozen. They were promised a 2% increase, which would have cost about $140 million to the hospitals, but they're frozen because the government has no money. I guess we can understand how they may arrive at that conclusion.

But here we have, on the other hand, a government saying to the people of Ontario—and they have no choice; if you want to drive a car, and most people who are in the workforce or retired and want to get around need to drive a car. The minimum this is going to take out of the pockets of the people of Ontario is $200 million; more money out of the pockets of the people of Ontario than it would have cost for the government to do what they said they were going to do on the hospitals.

Actually, if the industry estimates are right, it could take as much as $800 million out of the economy, if that 20% increase is right. Now to put a dimension on that, that's the same as taking as much money out of the economy as raising the provincial sales tax from 8% to 9%. So that's what we're talking about here; an enormous amount of buying power, if you will, disposable income, out of the hands of people.

But the government members don't seem to be able to realize that there is a direct impact. As I say, on the one hand they're saying to hospitals, "We don't have the money." On the other hand they're saying, "But we do have the wherewithal to essentially take your taxes up"—because this is almost like a regressive tax; you've got to buy this insurance—by at least $200 million by their own estimates, industry believing $800 million.

The reason I go through all of this is that I share the chamber's concern about the economy right now. It is not at all clear that we're out of the recession. By even the most optimistic estimates, the Ontario economy at the end of 1993 will be lower than it was at the end of 1989. So even with the modest recovery plan, we'll still have an economy below 1989.

My question to the chamber is this: If the government proceeds with this and if it takes a minimum of $200 million out of the economy, have you any feeling of what that may do to helping the economic recovery we're all hoping for?

Mr Smith: From a general economic perspective, I don't think it takes much imagination to appreciate that spiralling costs—this is just another economic nail into a lot of businesses' coffins. Businesses are very much struggling right now to keep their nostrils above water, and any increased expenses from programs like automobile insurance just bring them that much closer to the brink.

Mr Phillips: From our perspective, we're having difficulty knowing why this is a priority for the government. In fact, if I were a government member, I'd be asking myself, "Do we really want to annoy all the people we're going to annoy?" Because believe me, I guarantee you, when those bills go out to the people and they see their premiums going up as a result of this bill, you will get hundreds of phone calls. I guarantee it. I know what will happen. I can't understand the priority of the government wanting to proceed with this bill. And it has a direct economic impact. You will run into all sorts of people who will say, "You didn't have the money to do the things you promised me in health care, in education, in community living," but you do have the wherewithal to pass a bill that's going to take out of the pockets of the people of Ontario significant sums of money.

My last question to the chamber: You people are close to the economic heartbeat. What is the current state of the economy, in your mind, in this area, and how are your members looking ahead over the next two to three years about the economy? Are they expecting a robust recovery? Are we well into a strong recovery? Or should we expect that we're going to have a slow, somewhat painful climb out of the recession?

Ms Rebecca Johnson: That's a good question, Gerry. A general comment is what I can provide for you. If you ask the average businessperson right now, I would say his gut feeling would be that he's managing. That's what they're doing: They're managing. If you talk to some businesspeople, they're not even taking home what their employees are taking home at the end of the business day. As Doug has already alluded to, they are just coping and that's all. Any more taxes of any kind, it doesn't matter what it is—municipal, provincial or federal—they cannot absorb. I can't say that to you any more strongly: They cannot absorb any more. It's at the point, for a lot of businesses right now, of, "Do I stay in business or do I go out?" That's probably what the average businessperson in our community would say.

There are some businesses that are doing extremely well. We are a northwestern Ontario hub, so a lot of people come into our community to do their business and some of our businesses do well because of that. That probably gives us an edge in a lot of things: in retail, in some of our small manufacturing etc. We've also been able to provide some export commodities that have done very well in the international market.

We are, of course, in a pulp and paper/forestry industry situation. If you read the papers you'll know that, as of today, it's still unknown where Provincial Paper is going to go. Our other forest products and industries are also on the brink of, "We don't know where it's going to go." If we look at the total impact of what happens if any of those close, whether it be Provincial or Canadian Pacific Forest Products Ltd or Abitibi, we are in dire straits. There is no question that we are on the brink of—I don't know what we will do at that point in time. I guess I have to look very positively, that we will do something; there is no question that this community will rally around, and we will do something.

But make no bones about it, Thunder Bay is in a managing position. I can't lay it any stronger than that. The little businessperson out there is having a tough go of it.

The Chair: Mr Tilson.

Mr Tilson: Thank you for your presentation. I've heard your organization give a number of presentations the last number of times I happen to have been chosen to come here. I will say that in spite of all the adversity you have in this area, it always amazes me how you can find something positive to say about how small business is surviving. I congratulate you.

I have one question with respect to OHIP. Under this bill, OHIP will continue to pay all medical costs, and there's been some expression of fear that the costs will increase substantially under this bill because of the benefit packages that are being set up, and that this in turn will have a rather devastating effect on OHIP. I don't know whether you've had a chance to look at any of the papers or articles that have commented on that subject, and whether you, from your perspective in Thunder Bay, have any thoughts on that area.

Mr Smith: The issue from the industry's perspective is the unlimited cap. It's very difficult to price anything that's unlimited. I think there's a whole evolution there, as OHIP and the Workers' Compensation Board etc, and those problems feed their way into the insurance industry. Again, being able to accurately cost that and the implications if it's not accurately costed are really the concern, because the market will tighten, Facility will grow, premiums will go up and we're back into the problems we had in the mid-1980s.

Mr Tilson: But not only insurance rates could go up, but OHIP rates could go up.

Mr Smith: Yes.

Mr Tilson: Mr Chairman, the Progressive Conservative caucus would yield the rest of its time on this delegation to Mr Kormos.

Mr Kormos: How much time do I have, Chair?

The Chair: About two minutes.

Mr Kormos: I want to tell you folks again: I appreciate the hospitality Thunder Bay has shown to all of us, and I appreciate you being here.

One of the problems I have—you know I wasn't crazy about Bill 68, the OMPP. A whole lot of us thought that the restriction on the right to full compensation for innocent victims was too rigid. It was interesting, because when the minister was making his opening comments he referred to but one court decision, Meyer, from the London area, which was a very rigid approach to the threshold. He neglected to refer to the Dagliesh decision, January 12 of this year, coming out of London, which was a far more tolerable definition of threshold. It strikes me as obvious, then, that the government, in determining this weird, wacko, unconscionable legislation, which, strangely, nobody's asked for—people from across the province are saying, "Who was it?" There hasn't been a phone call, a letter, not a note in the mail, saying to the government, "Restrict the right to sue for innocent accident victims even further than what the Liberals did."

Let's talk about small business people. Let's talk about a small business person, because my family were small business people all my life—my grandparents as well—who often take modest draws from their business; whose equity, whose future, whose pension plan is in that business; who, if they're disabled from making that business work because they're struck down by a drunk or a careless or a reckless or a negligent driver. Their income is oh-so-modest; that's what their no-fault benefits are based on. Mind you, the no-fault benefits are going to be lower under this scheme than they were even under the Liberals. The benefits are lower.

You're talking about a piece of legislation that is an attack on entrepreneurs and small business people, because it will forbid you, will say you can't go to a courtroom and demonstrate to a judge or a jury that your business and your equity would have been what it could have been, had it not been stolen from you by a government that doesn't care about small business people and by a drunk driver who couldn't give a tinker's dam.

I say to you as spokespeople for entrepreneurs and for small business people, legislation that takes away from an innocent victim the right to seek justice is the last thing—I know that not all of you voted for the New Democrats. I know that. I saw the poll results. But notwithstanding that—

The Chair: Mr Kormos, you have 15 seconds.

Mr Kormos: I'd have had longer if you hadn't interrupted here.

You know that even for those who didn't vote for the New Democrats, this was the last thing in the world they expected from the New Democrats. Had the New Democrats run on Bill 164 as a policy in the last campaign, they wouldn't have elected enough people to form—

The Chair: I'm sorry. Time.

Mr Kormos: Well, don't interrupt me next time.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee. Did you have an answer for him?

Interjections.

The Chair: Okay, thank you.

THUNDER BAY INSURANCE
WOMEN'S ASSOCIATION

The Chair: Is Mr Bert Alcock here? I believe he's maybe delayed on his flight coming in from Kenora, so we'll call on the Thunder Bay Insurance Women's Association. If you would come forward now. Do you have any other colleagues with you?

Ms Marjatta A. Light: No, sir, I don't.

The Chair: Okay, fine. I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. We're on until 2:30. In that period of time if you can leave some time at the end, as you see the members are very anxious to ask questions and make statements. You may begin.

Ms Light: Good afternoon, Mr Chairman and members of the committee. My name is Marjatta Light. I've been an insurance broker here in Thunder Bay for 14 years. Over the years, I've served on the boards of several insurance organizations, including the Thunder Bay Insurance Women's Association, the Thunder Bay Insurance Brokers Association and Insurance Institute of Canada. I've also been an instructor and speaker at local insurance courses.

I am not here today representing my employer or any insurance company. I am here today because of my concern about the impact of Bill 164 on seniors and women who represent a portion of my customers.

Some years back before the Ontario motorist protection plan, I did not particularly like contacting my clients at auto insurance renewal time. It bothered me to have to tell them that there had been another double-digit increase in their premium again. Most people were very upset and angry as they hadn't had any accidents, but their insurance rates were escalating a lot faster than their pay cheques.

There were also some insurance companies that became insolvent, and people that had paid for auto insurance already, had to be changed to different carriers and repay the premiums in order to continue protection.

But then came OMPP. It has brought stability to both premiums and the auto insurance marketplace. It has been a pleasure to contact my customers at renewal time the last few years, as premiums have stayed about the same, and in fact most of my clients have enjoyed premium decreases. The market for auto insurance has never been better since I've been in this industry. Difficulties that used to be in the system for placing newly licensed drivers or those with minor infractions are no longer there. I wholeheartedly feel the consumer is being better served.

But I am very concerned about the changes to be made by Bill 164 and their impact on the present system, especially the impact on retirees and women with low or no income. Under this bill, they will be subsidizing higher income policyholders. While both will pay the same, the low-income policyholder will not qualify for the maximum benefits. In fact, if I correctly understand this bill, those insureds earning less than $40,000 or $45,000 a year will actually receive lower benefits than under OMPP.

OMPP in its present state has provision to increase the income replacement benefits. Those earning more than $39,000 a year are able to purchase more coverage as an option. Those people earning more than $39,000 a year can better afford to pay the additional costs than seniors or women with lower incomes. The opportunity to buy additional income replacement, increased funeral and death benefits and care giver benefits is working. It is fairer to have those insureds requiring the additional coverage pay for these additional benefits, rather than place the cost on everyone.

I am also very concerned that we may be turning the clock back instead of going forward with OMPP. The Ontario driving population could no longer afford the law suits and costs associated with the old system prior to the implementation of OMPP. Many studies were done and much time was spent trying to ascertain what to do to ensure that injured parties were looked after, but yet the costs were controlled.

Will we be going back to Ontario drivers financing more paper pushing and legal costs? Will we be gaining anything by bringing back the right to sue for pain and suffering? The intent of OMPP was to channel moneys to the claimants by a system that was simple and direct, not complex and costly.

I do acknowledge that there are some situations that must be addressed and changes that have to be made to OMPP. It was known at the time OMPP was legislated that changes would probably have to be made in some areas and provision was put into the bill to make these changes, but until the system was up and running for a while, the areas of change were not known.

I believe we should be trying to modify and improve OMPP, rather than passing new legislation which will cause premiums to increase and create hardship for people on fixed incomes.

The insurance industry has suggested a schedule of benefits for pain and suffering, capped indexation of certain benefits and provision for excess economic loss, taking into consideration those who are self-employed.

Graduated licensing has proved a workable solution in other countries to protect the lives of newly licensed drivers, and road safety can no longer be put on the back burner. Government is appointed by the people to provide for our safety and this government's legacy could be to put measures in place to ensure that job gets done.

Government and the insurance industry, with input from consumers using the product, should work together as partners to make any necessary changes to OMPP.

I strongly feel that Bill 164, with its complexity and certainly its increased cost, is not the answer. Passing laws makes it harder to apply change if it is the wrong thing to do. However, OMPP has provisions already in it to make improvements that are warranted and perhaps that is the way we should be going.

On wading through the new bill, I note there is some indication that the present classification system is to be changed. Again, if this proceeds, seniors and women will bear the brunt of the increased cost. The present classification system ensures that those driver groups with the most frequency and severity of auto insurance losses pay more, while those groups with less severity and frequency pay less. To me, that seems fair.

If we proceed with changing this system, the premiums required will have to be redistributed, and those groups that pay more now will pay less. However, those groups such as seniors and young women will pay substantially more.

The present classification system has been the topic of controversy many times. However, everyone who has reviewed and delved into the situation has concluded that indeed it was fairer to charge those groups at higher risk more. Perhaps, as a progressive society, the present system's use of age, sex and marital status is a little uncomfortable, but it is a tried and proved system that is fair.

I've heard the argument that if auto insurance can't class this way, then shouldn't a 60-year-old man pay the same for life insurance as a 25-year-old man? Would that be fair? We would all probably quickly say no. Why? Because actuarially it makes sense. Well, actuarially, the present auto insurance classification system also makes sense. That's why those who previously reviewed this matter, after much thought and consideration, left it in place.

Insurance is required by society to cover economic loss. Property insurance puts you back in the same place you were in prior to the loss; no more, no less. Auto insurance was in the past perceived as giving dividends for trumped-up claims, but we can't afford to continue paying the price.

In these tough economic times, the auto insurance policyholders' budgets are strained to the limit. They do not want to pay more for coverages most do not require. They have not asked for these changes. In fact, the satisfaction rate is high with the present OMPP product. I see a lot fewer complaints than some years back. Claims are looked after on a fair and timely basis. For those who feel there are gaps in coverage as it pertains to their case, it is imperative that they let the government board know and the insurance industry know where the deficiencies are so they can be properly addressed.

I'm sure everyone agrees that legitimate claims should be handled with competence and fairness, but can Ontario drivers afford to pay for all the invisible aches and pains? The workers' compensation plan in this province is in a state of total crisis; its very viability is at stake. Is that where we want to take auto insurance in this province? I think not.

Consumers have not asked for these changes, nor are they prepared to pay for them. Let's fill the gaps there are in OMPP and go forward from here.

I'd like to thank you very much for the opportunity to appear before you here today. I would be pleased to answer any questions pertaining to my presentation.

Mr Mancini: I would like to thank the witness, Ms Light, for her brief. She's made so many good points, I'm not quite sure where I should start. I do agree with your statement that Bill 164, with its complexity, is going to increase costs because it is going to take a big room full of legal experts and others to go through these 68 pages of regulations that the government has put together to find out just exactly what you're entitled to if you become an accident victim or are involved in an accident. Why they would want to turn the Ontario insurance system into another Workers' Compensation Board is beyond me.

We have placed these questions in committee to the government members. There's not a single one of these ladies and gentlemen with the government who have joined us who has been able to explain why we need 68 pages of regulations, when before, 18 pages seemed to be enough. I want to—

Mr Owens: Hmph.

Mr Mancini: The parliamentary assistant snickers, but maybe he can afford the $200 rate increase—

Mr Owens: Give me a break.

Mr Mancini: —but the small business people here in Thunder Bay cannot afford it; the senior citizens we know cannot afford it.

Mr Owens: What did you leave out of your regulations of 18 pages?

The Chair: Mr Owens, Mr Mancini has the floor. Mr Mancini, don't recognize Mr Owens. You have the floor.

Mr Mancini: Well then, you keep him in line.
Interjections.

Mr Mancini: Who's the Chair, Mr Owens or you?

The Chair: Go ahead, Mr Mancini. You're losing time.

Mr Mancini: I want the time added back for the interruption.

The Chair: Agreed.

Mr Mancini: Thank you. You stated earlier in your brief, before I was interrupted, that seniors would pay more. Today, I placed on the record some of the figures that the industry has generated as to how much more seniors will pay. Do you think in Toronto it's going to be fair for seniors to pay 24% more? Do you think it's going to be fair in Windsor that they pay 23% more, in Ottawa 22% more, in Sudbury region and other parts of northern Ontario over 21% more? Do you think that's a fair tradeoff in this bill?

Ms Light: No sir, I don't think it's a fair tradeoff.

Mr Mancini: I think you, better than anyone else, has pointed out to this committee—and I wanted the government members to pay attention when you were saying that—what it will do to female drivers, but they don't want to listen; they don't want to believe these statistics. I want to place on the record what will happen to rates that women pay for insurance when gender is eliminated as a rating factor. In Toronto, rates will go up 49%, in Sudbury 51%, in Windsor 50% and in Ottawa 50%. You and I know that women make less in the workplace than men. Is that not true?

Ms Light: True.

Mr Mancini: Why would any government want to increase the rates that women pay for insurance when they already have less disposable income? Is there any reason you could give me that you have found in Bill 164 that would help anyone to come to these conclusions?

Ms Light: No, sir, I don't.

Mr Mancini: Thank you.

Mr Phillips: Like my colleague, I appreciate your comments. As I said to an earlier speaker, and you may not have been here, we're having difficulty understanding—I think you have a paragraph in here that sort of captured it for me—why they are proceeding with this, why in the world, when in my opinion people are relatively satisfied with insurance.

There's a whole bunch of other things out there that require all our attention: jobs; getting the economy going; keeping our taxes down; finding better ways to service people. Yet here we are about to approve a piece of legislation that even by the government's own figures will take $200 million out of the pockets of the people of Ontario, and if the industry's right, it's closer to $800 million.

My question to you is the one I asked another witness, and that is, if in your business you had the current package to offer your clients or this revised package with a rate 20% higher, which of those two products do you think your clients would pick?

Ms Light: I could probably say 95% of my clients would take the OMPP product. They don't want to hear about auto insurance rate increases any more; they've got other things on their minds. Auto insurance to them is something they don't want to pay in the first place.

Mr Phillips: My final question, Mr Chair. When the phone rings, as it will, this bill's passed, somebody's insurance needs renewing, you send out their new invoice and just hope the cheque comes back in, but normally, I think, if there's a rate increase the phone rings probably about 48 hours after you mail it. When that phone rings and it's a senior, 65 years of age, phoning to say, "Why has my premium gone up 25%," how will you respond to that phone call?

Ms Light: I'll have to be honest. I'll have to say, "I tried to stop the government from doing this but they went ahead with it anyway."

The Chair: Mr Tilson.

Mr Tilson: It's ironic that it's this party that has claimed it has always stood up for the women of this province, and yet it's as if it's out to get them. We have the increases, the general increases which have been guaranteed to us by the insurance industry, and with this particular move to in fact raise the premiums of women alone, just because it's going to be fair, it's going to make it fair with everyone, even though statistics show particularly younger women have fewer accidents than younger men and so on. All the arguments that you gave. It's almost as if it's out to do the opposite of what the party platform has been putting forward. It doesn't make sense.

The question I have to you is whether you can give us any information from a local perspective as to the cost that it might be to this particular area. There's been evidence given to the hearings that there is going to be an increase in costs because of the benefits, perhaps education, perhaps more mediation, perhaps more staff, perhaps—I'm trying to think of other examples that have been given—but, in general, the insurance industry says that the cost is going to be substantial. Can you tell us from your own observation or any financial forecast that you have to the insurance industry in this particular area as to what that might be here?

Ms Light: No, Mr Tilson, I can't answer you because we don't know. What you do is you set rates for the future all the time and you have to make sure you're bringing in enough premium to pay out the claims, but you don't know ahead of time, and a lot of things in this bill, how are you going to cost it?

Mr Tilson: Yes.

Ms Light: So there is no way. There have been all kinds of reports, I've seen the figures, but who knows? You just don't know.

Mr Tilson: Mr Chairman, the Conservatives yield the rest of their time on this question to Mr Kormos.

Mr Kormos: How much time do I have, Chair? Quickly. When the big hand's on 12—

The Chair: Four minutes.

Mr Kormos: Four minutes. Thank you kindly. I want to thank you for the opportunity to hear views. Now look, this struggle has been going on for a long time. I've got to tell you, though, my assessment of what this Bill 164 is, sometimes not entirely in jest, I call it "Made in Bucharest." It's that sort of East German pre-liberation mentality that really constituted a victory of the guilty driver, of the drunk driver, of the careless driver over the innocent accident victim.

You know that I wasn't entirely happy, nor were New Democrats entirely happy, with the restriction on the right to be fully compensated under Bill 68. The New Democrats campaigned—and I'm confident you'll recall the months before September of 1990 when they campaigned right here in Thunder Bay, across the north—on a promise to increase the rights of innocent victims and effectively reduce auto insurance premiums. However weird and wonderful it may seem, here's Ontario's first NDP government that's going to be leaving behind the legacy of having increased premiums and reduced benefits.

You recall as a broker and being active in the industry—and sometimes I wonder whether there isn't some sort of Stalinist ghost that rewrites history there at Queen's Park because people seem to have forgotten the experiences with Osborne, one of the most significant inquiries, and Osborne had very little good to say about no fault. He indicated that it was a one-time-only savings.

Indeed Kruger, Ontario Automobile Insurance Board—I gnawed my teeth as un enfant terrible, I admit, politician at the Kruger inquiry where Kruger told, after millions and millions of dollars of taxpayers' money, the government of the day that no-fault, the very kind that this New Democratic Party government, no-fault—why, it's nobody's fault, which is why everybody suffers equally—is but a one-time-only saving.

Have you had any opportunity to find out exactly who it is that this government is accommodating with Bill 164? I'm in contact with a whole lot of people who are really ticked off about insurance and premiums and benefits, but I haven't heard one of them call for an increase in premiums, for a reduction in benefits and for even more restricted access to the courts. It certainly can't be working people because they're being forced to access their sickness and accident plans before they become entitled to any no-fault benefits. Small business people are really on the hook now, aren't they, because their sickness and accident plans and LTD plans are being accessed and their premiums are going to go up too. This is a real attack—

The Chair: You have one minute to get to your question.

Mr Kormos: There's a question here, Chair, just—

The Chair: I've been trying to find it.

Mr Kormos: Well, I know, you have difficulty doing that. Who was it who solicited this attack on working people? Who is it that solicited this attack on seniors, on students, on women as victims? Can you identify any groups that are happy with the government's proposal?

Ms Light: No, sir, I don't know of anyone. All I've been getting from my customers is, they don't want this and they just want to keep things going the way it's going right now. That's the attitude I'm getting from them. I'm here to convey that to you: They do not want this and they will not pay the premiums for it.

Mr Kormos: Is there a committee that meets in the Premier's office every Monday morning to say, "Who are we going to tick off this week?" Drivers this week and victims next? Beats me. Let's keep on doing it, I agree with you. Thank you kindly.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Kormos. Now we go on to Mr Winninger.

Mr Kormos: Better than Bill 164.

Mr Winninger: Actually, Mr Kormos's question prompted me to ask this question: Do you think your consumers would like to return to the pre-OMPP regime of the 1980s when their premiums were escalating out of sight?

Ms Light: No.

Mr Winninger: Okay. Secondly, I believe it was Mr Mancini who suggested that because you have a regulation that's 70 pages long as opposed to 17 pages long it's necessarily more complex. Do you not agree that the 17-page regulation under the OMPP was complex, if you want to call such a document complex?

Ms Light: I think any time when a new piece of legislation comes out it's going to be complex, but I found this extra complex. I teach insurance courses. I'm looking at the Insurance Act here, I'm looking at this bill, and I don't understand all—

Mr Winninger: In fact, as a lawyer what I find is that sometimes a 70-page document can spell out the contingencies in a lot clearer fashion than a 17-page document where insurance brokers and agents are rubbing their heads trying to figure out what it means.

Anyway, loss of earnings: It's been suggested that 80% of gross is always higher than 90% of net, and I would put it to you and I think you well acknowledge in your paper that it's only in a certain income range—

Mr Kormos: Yes, working people.

Mr Winninger: —in only a certain segment—well, you said "all people."

Mr Kormos: Working people.

Mr Winninger: In a certain segment of the population the difference may be marginal, but I'm asking you—

Mr Kormos: Working people. People you're supposed to be representing.

Mr Winninger: —I'm asking you whether you don't agree that—

The Chair: Okay. I cut all the mikes out.

Mr Winninger: Then I'll have to get extra time.

The Chair: No, no. Hey, wait a minute. I think, Peter, that nobody interrupted you—

Mr Kormos: Mr Kormos.

The Chair: Mr Kormos. So I think the courtesy should be given to the member there also.

Mr Mancini: How come you don't say that to the parliamentary assistant when he interrupts all the time?

The Chair: Mr Winner.

Mr Winner: I think you would agree that it's in a certain income range where the difference is marginal, but I would put it to you that with indexation that marginal difference will, in the very near future under this regime, be eliminated, and that's what the actuaries have suggested.

As far as ratings for young people are concerned, you deal with all components of the auto insurance public, right? So you deal with young people, you deal with single, unmarried males, the whole works. You suggested that we should maintain the status quo rather than move towards a uniform class category—that's what I understood—and yet my constituents who call me want to pay their fair share.

So that if I go to a senior citizen and say, "Do you think John Doe down the street, who has never had an accident just like you, should be paying more than you just because he isn't married and happens to be younger than you?" And he says to me: "No. I think if he's never had an accident then he should be paying exactly what I am. Whether the person is of a different sex or different age, married or unmarried, we judge people by their accident experience."

I'm a little surprised that you would say, "Well, this bill disadvantages seniors or women," when we're looking for the best solution for all of the consumer public.

Ms Light: What will have to happen, though, is you're going to still need the same amount of premiums, so it's going to have to be redistributed and someone's going to have to pay the one that's taken away.

But I get this argument at home all the time. I have a 20-year-old son and a 17-year-old daughter, and the daughter pays a lot less for insurance. But I'm lucky; my son's studying to be an actuary, so I told him we'll have this conversation in five years again and we'll see who's correct and who's not.

Mr Winner: But the main thing is that bad drivers don't benefit from the system, and you do agree that merely by redistributing the premiums, we're not giving unfair advantage to bad drivers over good drivers?

Ms Light: You see, what happens is, we see it all the time, the frequency and severity, the statistics are there that that younger-aged category has it, and I believe sometimes it's a deterrent, the high premiums, as well, because they know that they'll go even higher if they continue to get driving infractions. So in some ways that's a deterrent, but it has been proven and continues to be proven that there are certain groups that are more high risk than others, and they should be taking more of the load.

Mr Winner: I agree with you on that, and you seem to suggest that we should maintain the status quo with only a few changes. I think we need to go a lot further than that, particularly because there are a number of inequities that have to be addressed. But I would ask you, what are the small changes that you think should be made?

Ms Light: I believe, in respect to the self-employed, there is a gap in coverage. That has to be addressed.

Mr Winner: You mean under the existing OMPP?

Ms Light: Yes. Certainly, there is. I don't know all the specifics and I'm not prepared to answer all the specifics; I didn't think I'd have to answer on it. But certainly there are deficiencies, and we all knew when OMPP was brought in that there were going to be some things that, once it started working, would have to be addressed, and those deficiencies will have to be addressed as they come along.

Mr Winner: I guess you are aware that some of the deficiencies under the existing OMPP are addressed in Bill 164. For example, a small business, self-employed person would have his or her earnings possibly averaged over three years, to account for cycles in the economy and dips in income. At the same time, a self-employed person can elect, under section 63 of the regulation, to specify a fixed loss of earnings that will apply if he or she has the misfortune to be in an accident, an amount that will cover the factor that the operator of the business might not be able to operate the business and might have to hire a replacement person. It would also cover the expenses of running a business while the person is incapable of doing so. These are the kind of improvements over the OMPP that Bill 164—

The Chair: Mr Winner, your time is up.

ONTARIO MARCH OF DIMES

The Chair: The next group to come forward is the Ontario March of Dimes. I'd like to welcome you here to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. If anybody's looking at the schedule, we're ahead because of one participant who hasn't come in from Kenora yet, I guess with the icing going on on the planes. I know we were an hour late getting out of Toronto. I guess Mr Eddy over there had the same problem coming up today, but he said there was no hot and cold water, even, in the plane. I guess everything was frozen up.

Anyhow, if you don't mind starting, we have until 3 o'clock.

Mr Terry Bellavance: Thank you very much. My name is Terry Bellavance. I'm regional director with the Thunder Bay region of the March of Dimes.

The Ontario March of Dimes welcomes this opportunity to present its brief to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. We thank the government of Ontario for inviting our response to the proposed amendments of certain acts respecting insurance as contained in Bill 164.

The March of Dimes has addressed this issue on two previous occasions. In April 1986, a letter brief was submitted to Mr David Slater of the insurance task force. Subsequently, the March of Dimes submitted a brief with respect to the Ontario motorist protection plan, Bill 68, in January 1990.

In previous submissions, our organization has consistently addressed three areas of concern:

- Economic loss for present and future income: compensation for the newly disabled.

- The threshold for pain and suffering: arbitrary limits on recoveries.

- Attendant care: obstacles created by the system.

Our comments on Bill 164 will be principally limited to the extent that the proposed amendments address our expressed concerns and focus on the needs of two sectors of the population: those who are presently disabled and those who will be disabled as the result of a motor vehicle accident.

At the onset, it's important to point out that the March of Dimes is here today as an organization speaking for and with adults with physical disabilities across Ontario. The views and interests expressed are those of adults with physical disabilities. We are not, in any way, affiliated or allied with lawyers or the insurance industry.

The March of Dimes strongly believes that insurance coverage in all its forms must now be regarded as one of life's necessities. Without it, one cannot participate in society as an employer, employee, home owner, automobile driver and certainly cannot take on the normal obligations of care for oneself and one's family.

Motor vehicle insurance must provide for the necessities faced by an injured person. Through our work in the area of rehabilitation of persons with disabilities, we understand the real needs faced by victims of motor vehicle accidents. While we support and understand the intent of the proposed legislation, without revision it would prove unfair to those it should be protecting the most: the innocent victims.

Since the organization's formation in 1951, the mandate of the Ontario March of Dimes has evolved significantly. The original function of the Ontario March of Dimes was to fund research to find a cure for poliomyelitis. With the development of the Salk vaccine, the emphasis of the Ontario March of Dimes shifted to treatment and rehabilitation of adults who were experiencing the residual effects of polio. Over time, the population served by the March of Dimes was expanded to incorporate all adults with physical disabilities in Ontario. The mission statement of the March of Dimes is "to assist adults with physical disabilities to lead meaningful and dignified lives."

As a result of this mandate, the Ontario March of Dimes is active in over 100 communities across Ontario, both as partners with persons with physical disabilities and in the provision of services to these adults. Ontario March of Dimes services are utilized by people with post-polio syndrome, multiple sclerosis, muscular dystrophy, cerebral palsy, spinal cord injury and brain injuries, spina bifida and other conditions which hinder mobility. This group numbers over a million people, one out of every 10 Ontario residents.

The service programs offered by the March of Dimes fall into three major categories: assisted devices, employment services and independent living assistance. While 90% of the March of Dimes funding supports these three programs, there are several other valuable services offered. These include camping and recreation, post-polio program, public education, research and development. Appendix 1 outlines in a little more detail each of these programs.

In addition to the services provided by the March of Dimes, the organization has a strong history of issue advocacy. Often engaged in consumer advocacy and coalition-based efforts, the March of Dimes has been active in areas such as employment equity, human rights, transportation issues, training and employment, housing and support services, assistive devices, physical accessibility, government services in accessible form, challenges to the Immigration Act and income maintenance to persons with disabilities.

Economic loss for present and future income: Here, the Ontario March of Dimes agrees with a no-fault system of automobile insurance which is sensitive to the needs of persons with disabilities regardless of cause.

The need for compensation, rehabilitation and long-term care bears no relevance to the cause of a motor vehicle accident-related injury. Reforms in auto insurance to date have responded effectively to the needs of the relatively high percentage of our clients who have become disabled through no fault of their own, or the fault of others.

The schedule of draft benefits distributed as part of the proposed legislation continues to improve the post-accident prospects of thousands of individuals who have, until recently, subsisted on low compensation offered through their own insurance policies. The increased income, from 80% of gross earnings to 90% of net income, is one area worth noting.

Although the government has included certain measures which will benefit those who become disabled through an automobile accident, the Ontario March of Dimes has serious concerns with the unfair compensation for economic loss contained in the proposed legislation and its impact on innocent victims.

Under the current system, those who do not cause accidents can sue for compensation for economic loss, such as lost wages or salary and future wage or salary potential, as well as pain and suffering. The government proposal, while allowing more people who do not cause accidents the right to sue, will limit such compensation to recovery for pain and suffering, not for economic loss.

We are aware that a number of submissions that have been presented to you have reviewed this matter in significant detail. The Ontario March of Dimes agrees with the general thrust of these arguments, but the loss of economic opportunity is not properly addressed in the proposed legislation.

The young worker or the young student or the newly graduated professional seeking employment who becomes disabled as an innocent automobile accident victim suffers twice under the proposals set out in Bill 164.

The lifestyle of the seriously disabled individual is altered significantly as a result of an automobile accident. The government's legislation imposes an additional burden on the victim by suggesting that one's economic future is frozen in time. The compensation-for-income-loss provision contained in Bill 164 effectively sentences the accident victim to a low-income level for life. Instead of looking to career advancements and changing lifestyles, the person with a disability has a low-income lifestyle forced upon him.

Even taking into account the indexing provisions in the legislation, the individual is at the lower end of economic levels for ever.

Another element which we urge the government to review stems from the suggestion that those who are employed and seek extra coverage can do so by purchasing disability insurance. This option is not open to persons with disabilities who are presently employed. Many persons with disabilities cannot qualify for such insurance.

Insurance companies not only refuse to provide coverage to the seriously disabled, they deny it to those who are disabled and active in the workforce but are living with the possibility of potentially deteriorating disabilities, like those of our members who suffer from post-polio syndrome. Clearly, something needs to be done to offer such innocent people some compensation for lost economic opportunity.

Pain and suffering: The March of Dimes emphasizes the need for insurance reform to be governed by the right of the person with a disability to return to as full and normal a life as possible. For this reason, no arbitrary limits should be placed on recoveries for persons with the most severe disabilities.

The retention of the right to recovery through the courts is an important part of any insurance reform. If the proposed legislation is to fairly serve persons with disabilities, access to the courts must be a realistic option for innocent victims of automobile accidents.

The Ontario March of Dimes understands the principle behind the government's desire to restrict access to the courts for all but the most serious cases of pain and suffering. However, it is our belief that the $15,000 deductible which the government intends to set for court awards for pain and suffering is too high a threshold figure.

The Ontario March of Dimes is aware of actions in the courts which have tried to establish a maximum threshold for pain and suffering. It is our understanding that the damage trilogy cases in 1978 resulted in the Supreme Court decision of a maximum settlement of $100,000, indexed, for the most serious cases of pain and suffering. Allowing this figure to be indexed for inflation, the figure today is commonly agreed to be around $250,000.

Obviously, the limit of $250,000 applies only to pain and suffering associated with an extremely serious permanent disability. The vast majority of pain and suffering awards would not approach this limit. It is in relation to these cases of lower settlement that the March of Dimes feels the $15,000 deductible is unrealistically high.

The figure of $15,000 which the government is proposing effectively means that the disability required in an automobile accident will have to be extremely serious before a lawsuit becomes a realistic option. Further, if there were any contributory negligence on behalf of the injured person—ie, they are partially at fault for the accident which disabled them—then the size of the award has to be even larger for a lawsuit to be considered.

For example, if a pain and suffering lawsuit awarded a victim $60,000, less a deductible of one third of the award for contributory negligence, the award would then be $40,000, less the proposed $15,000 deductible. The end result would be $25,000.

The Ontario March of Dimes supports the spirit of the government's intentions in this area but asks that a lower threshold be set to allow more realistic access to courts by innocent victims. A more workable figure would be $7,500.

Attendant care: The proposed legislation provides for $3,000 a month for attendant care. The Ontario March of Dimes has concerns, from experience in attendant care services, that this figure will prove inadequate often enough to become a concern.

Using conservative estimates and average figures, use of March of Dimes attendant care services for four hours a day at a cost of $25 per hour totals $3,000 per month. As one can see, the $3,000-a-month cap will purchase an average level of attendant care service for a person with a disability.

The estimates given do not begin to address the increased levels of service required by those persons with disabilities who require more than moderate care. Taking six hours a day of attendant care as an example, the monthly cost quickly balloons to $4,500, well above the indexed $3,000-a-month cap proposed by Bill 164.

Clearly, there is a need for some revision of this capped figure to ensure that the innocent victims of automobile accidents do not end up consistently exhausting the $3,000 and be forced into dipping into savings and other replacement income to purchase additional attendant care. Ultimately, these individuals could end up in a hospital bed, where the costs of care are not paid for by the insurer but by the taxpayer.

The March of Dimes is aware of the ministry task force which was announced on January 18, 1993. We salute the government for the establishment of this task force and its initiatives to address the spiralling costs of long-term care in the province. As the government looks at the whole issue of the cost of rehabilitation, the March of Dimes would like to offer its input and assistance to ensure that persons with disabilities will be able to remain in their homes whenever possible.

Amendments need to be made to the government's regulations to resolve the difficulty in obtaining optional extra coverage for disability. The proposed legislation should be amended to require insurers to offer optional endorsement coverage that would allow the insured to buy such optional coverage at a minimal cost without regard to the age or health of the driver.

In conclusion, the Ontario March of Dimes wishes to express its support for the government's initiatives and the principles underlying Bill 164. Our concerns as expressed deal primarily with the elements of the proposed legislation which we feel hurt the innocent victims of automobile accidents. These areas relate to:

- Economic loss for present and future income: compensation for the newly disabled.

- The threshold for pain and suffering: arbitrary limits on recoveries.

- Attendant care: obstacles created by the system.

In principle, we support the substantial compensation benefits contained in the draft schedule of benefits. However, we believe that unless the noted revisions are made, the legislation will prove unfair to thousands of innocent victims of automobile accidents. We call on the government to make these revisions.

We close by quoting Mr Alan Hutchinson, writing in the January 8, 1990, edition of the Globe and Mail, "How we treat the victims of misfortune indicates who we are and what we aspire to be."

Mr Tilson: I want to compliment you on this presentation. I don't know whether it was you alone or whether a group of people prepared this report.

Mr Bellavance: It was a joint effort.

Mr Tilson: It's excellent. If this terrible bill ever reaches third reading, you may find part of it read back, because it's that excellent a report that I would love to use portions of it in comments to the government, because you do deal with the main issues in a very clear and concise way.

I really have just one question, and that has to do with the attendant care issue. I can't remember which page it was on, but the $3,000 cap is one that's been expressed several times in these proceedings, that complaint you've given. Can you give any further elaboration than what you've put in the paper on that topic; specific examples you know of that the $3,000 simply is not enough? You commented, for example, that it is going to run out—you've almost given that guarantee—and that people will be dipping into their personal savings.

Mr Bellavance: A low-level quadriplegic—in other words, he still has a fair bit of use of his arms and fingers—would require the four hours a day. Anybody with a more severe disability, who loses some of their finger dexterity, would probably require more.

Mr Tilson: Can you relate that to figures? I don't know what information you have about what goes on now with these types of individuals, the problems they have. Can you relate what it may cost someone today? I'm doing the very thing that I don't like them doing, and that's generalizing, but could you talk in terms of real-life examples?

Mr Bellavance: It costs the March of Dimes about $25 an hour to deliver service. It doesn't matter what the service is; that's basically what the cost is. If you were dealing with somebody who needs four hours, then you're under the threshold; if you're dealing with somebody who needs five hours, for preparing meals, personal hygiene or whatever, then they're over the threshold.

Mr Tilson: I also appreciate the comments you made with respect to economic loss. When you look at the person who is on the verge of graduating or the highly skilled worker between jobs, those people simply will never, never be compensated, ever. I don't know whether you had anything to add on that area as well. The economic loss issue is what most of the opposition feels is the main terrible part of this bill.

Mr Bellavance: In the case of the young professional, there are so many variables. If the person can be retrained—which is my situation: I was in university studying to be an engineer when I was hurt; that was totally reversed so I had to totally start over at university again, but I still had the faculties and the mobility to do that. Depending on how severe the disability is and whether there is ever any potential for some vocation—it's not a very cut and dried figure. If the person can work, he might make a heck of a lot less than he made before, but at the same time wouldn't be at the level he would have been at if he had continued on in his profession.

The Chair: Mr Harnick.

Mr Harnick: I'm just struck by the comment on page 7 of your brief: "This government's legislation imposes an additional burden on the victim by suggesting that one's economic future is frozen in time. The compensation for income loss provision contained in Bill 164 effectively sentences the accident victim to a low-income level for life."

We had the legal adviser to the minister here last week to tell us that this bill, this generous piece of legislation, will pay a student who would never get back into the workforce the equivalent of $391 a week for the rest of his life, indexed. My calculations tell me that's below the poverty line. How can someone with a significant disability live on that kind of money week to week?

Mr Bellavance: It's impossible.

The Chair: Mr Winninger.

Mr Winninger: I certainly appreciated your presentation and I think your goals and objectives are quite laudable: improving compensation for economic loss, lowering the threshold for pain and suffering, and improving attendant care for people. I'll deal with those one at a time and perhaps you can choose to respond.

Let's look at the economic loss issue first. You're probably aware that Bill 164 actually covers 97% of full-time earners compared to 73% under the OMPP.

Mr Harnick: At $391 a week.

Mr Winninger: We've heard cited several times the famous case of Teno v Arnold, which is one of the Supreme Court of Canada trilogy cases that established a cap for the worst forms of injury for pain and suffering at $100,000. But that same case allowed the four-and-a-half-year-old girl who was hit by the car and left mentally and physically disabled—first of all, they awarded $7,000 per year for lost future income; that equates to, plus or minus, $17,000 in 1992. Then they took off a 20% contingency for the possibility that she might have earned less because of illness etc, and the final award for loss of income was $6,000 per year, about $13,000 in 1992 dollars.

So I would suggest to you that the system of compensation under tort for loss of income was an imperfect one at best. I think that case illustrates some of the pitfalls of that system. At least now, under our schedule of statutory accident benefits, we have fairly fixed amounts that people can turn to.

On the issue of the threshold for pain and suffering, the Ontario March of Dimes, during the hearings on Bill 68 a few years ago, supported a verbal threshold for the most seriously injured, saying, "We feel that the retention of the right to recovery through the courts is an important, in fact essential, component of the proposed OMPP." So they supported the verbal threshold of the day. Perhaps unfortunately for the March of Dimes, only a minuscule number of claims are actually being heard by the courts that meet that serious and permanent damage threshold. I think you're aware that under our proposed legislation, access to the courts to sue for pain and suffering we estimate would increase by a factor of at least three, so I submit, there's an improvement there too to the people you represent.

Third, you've acknowledged that the minister has set up a task force to study issues around rehabilitation and long-term care and whether the $3,000 proposed cap might be adequate or not. We'll have to await the outcome of that.

I wonder if you want to respond to any of the remarks I made, or whether I should ask you a specific question.

Mr Bellavance: In connection with the task force, I'd certainly like to see more consumer representation on there.

Mr Winner: I see.

The Chair: Mr Johnson, one minute.

Mr Johnson: Do you think the changes on the cap for rehabilitation for people who have been injured significantly—there's a cap of $500,000 right now, and that's been removed. Wouldn't you say that was a very positive thing?

Mr Bellavance: I would say that was positive, yes.

Mr Johnson: And the fact that no longer, after a period of 10 years, are you going to be left high and dry, that you're going to be compensated further?

Mr Bellavance: I would say that was positive too.

Mr Johnson: So there are definitely some positive things with regard to Bill 164.

Mr Bellavance: Yes.

Mr Johnson: That's good. Thank you.

The Chair: Mr Mancini.

Mr Mancini: How much time do I have?

The Chair: Five minutes.

Mr Mancini: Can you let me know when I've used up two and a half minutes? I want to give the other two and a half to Mr Kormos, please.

Mr Kormos: Thank you, sir.

Mr Mancini: I'd like to say to our witness how impressed I am with the brief. I had some experience in the late 1980s working very closely with organizations such as the Ontario March of Dimes, and always found them to be more than cooperative and helpful in forming government policy.

I want to say to you that you're not the only witness who has been lectured to by the NDP members. Every time there's a witness who comes forward who talks about getting back or saving or maintaining the right to sue for economic loss, we get a lecture from one of the NDP government members. Usually, they have some law training. Some of them do; some of them don't. But the witnesses always get a lecture that, "We're giving you more benefits," and "You're at the vagaries of the court system," and "It's like rolling the dice," and it's all of these things, and, "You don't really deserve to have the right to sue for economic loss."

I want to remind each and every one of the New Democratic Party members who are here today that it was you people who promised government-owned insurance. It was you people who promised lower rates. It was you people who promised full accessibility to the courts. You made all those promises, and it is shameful that you lecture witnesses who appear before the committee on wanting to be able to keep those rights that you said they should be able to have.

Interjections.

Mr Harnick: Remember those promises, going door to door telling people those things? They lied.

The Chair: Order. This is the gentleman who's here, to listen to what he has to say. I know he knows what you're going to say, but go right ahead again, without all the chorus.

Mr Mancini: Are you adding more time for this interruption?

The Chair: It was your crew.

Mr Mancini: My crew? My crew was sitting here quietly. What are you talking about? Do I get more time, yes or no?

Mr Bellavance: Can I be excused, please?

The Chair: Yes. It's your time.

Mr Bellavance: Thank you very much.

The Chair: Thank you.

Mr Mancini: Thanks a lot, Mr Chair.

The Chair: This committee will recess for five minutes, until 3 o'clock. We're waiting for Mr Alcock to come in from Kenora. He seems to have left, but he's not here yet. So we're recessed for five minutes, and if he does show up, we'll go on at 3 o'clock.

The committee recessed at 1455 and resumed at 1501.

The Chair: It is a little past three and our next witness has still not confirmed that he'll be here. We have a plane to catch. This committee is adjourned. We'll meet at 10 o'clock tomorrow in Windsor.

The committee adjourned at 1501.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Tuesday 2 February 1993

The committee met at 1000 in the Windsor Hilton, Windsor.

INSURANCE STATUTE LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1993 LOI DE 1993 MODIFIANT LES LOIS CONCERNANT LES ASSURANCES

Consideration of Bill 164, An Act to amend the Insurance Act and certain other Acts in respect of Automobile Insurance and other Insurance Matters / Loi modifiant la Loi sur les assurances et certaines autres lois en ce qui concerne l'assurance-automobile et d'autres questions d'assurance.

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): Good morning. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs, considering Bill 164, An Act to amend the Insurance Act and certain other Acts in respect of Automobile Insurance and other Insurance Matters. This is day five, and day two of travelling. We came from Thunder Bay yesterday and we're glad to be here in Windsor.

ASSOCIATIVE REHABILITATION INC

The Chair: I'd like to bring forward the first group, which is Associative Rehabilitation Inc. Please identify yourself for the purposes of Hansard.

Ms Joanne Gram: I'm Joanne Gram, vice-president of operations with Associative Rehabilitation, and this is June Gordon, who is our manager of quality assurance.

The Chair: If you don't mind, we have one half-hour. In that one half-hour, can you leave some time at the end for members of the committee to ask questions?

Ms Gram: Associative Rehabilitation is the largest provider of disability management services in Canada. We have provided vocational rehabilitation and related services to the disabled since 1981. During that period, we've handled more than 8,000 individual cases on referral from insurance companies, lawyers, employers and government agencies. These cases arise from motor vehicle accidents, workplace accidents and other accidents and illness. They encompass disabilities which are major as well as minor in degree, being physical, mental and psychological in nature.

In Mr Charlton's strategy publication, Considerations in Reforming Accident Compensation, he cites three cornerstones of the proposed reforms: (1) reasonable treatment for all injured persons; (2) fair compensation which recognizes fault; and (3) affordability.

As our primary focus is disability management, we'll try as much as possible to restrict our comments to this field of expertise and the first of these cornerstones, which is reasonable treatment for all injured persons. We probably have lots of comments on the other sections, but we'll contain ourselves to our area of expertise. In doing so, we're assuming that you've heard from the insurance, legal and medical communities in some detail. Since we've had the opportunity of working in past and present systems in Ontario, we feel we're able to assess both the positive and the negative implications of this legislation.

June and I have been in the business now for over 13 years each, which, if you know anything about private rehabilitation, is an extraordinarily long period of time. We may not look like we've been in that long, but we have. Some days we feel older than others. Largely, our experience is with, and our empathy is for the disabled. We're going to summarize the views of our staff at Associative Rehabilitation, which encompasses some 150 people across Canada.

The issue of public education: One of the major issues we've seen under the Ontario motorist protection plan has been a general lack of knowledge and understanding of overall rights and entitlements under the prevailing OMPP legislation. We refer not only to the average policyholder, but to insurance adjusters, medical advisers, lawyers and people like ourselves, rehabilitation specialists.

The average person simply does not know what is in his policy and specifically what his entitlements are if he is disabled in some sort of motor vehicle accident. Different insurance companies have positioned themselves, understandably so, differently on the same issues, as interpretation of the policy and how the officials of the company make that interpretation seems to be the key.

Therefore, we feel that clarification needs to be available to all parties. Although one could argue that two and a half years into OMPP we're in better shape in terms of that understanding, which of course we are, one could also argue that the stakes are too high, ie, people's livelihoods, to allow a system to take this long to be understood. These impending changes make that understanding and clarification even more complicated.

We strongly recommend, upon passing Bill 164, if in fact that's to happen, that an objective and thorough education campaign be undertaken with the goal of educating the public as to their obligations and rights under Bill 164. Assistance should be given to the insurance companies because this is a very costly endeavour for them as to their rights and legal obligations under the policies, as well as education to the medical community and the rehabilitation specialists as to the key role they play under Bill 164 and, again, the OMPP.

I don't like to present issues and then not present what we feel is a reasonable solution, so I'll try and do that throughout my presentation.

One way to achieve the goal of public education is to have a booklet in layman's terms and available in different languages designed to be enclosed with the government forms for completion by the insured. It should be mandatory for the insurer to enclose such, and to offer explanation upon request. We find that most of our clients and/or the insurance companies, as long as it's understood by both why they're doing what they're doing, whether it be denying a specific benefit or a specific—as long as everyone understands why that is happening, then there's less dispute that arises, and all of these disputes cost everyone considerable dollars.

For the insurance companies, a detailed training plan, complete with interpretation, should be afforded them to allow consistency in decision-making; again, across insurance companies. I understand that in private business part of the differences between companies is their interpretation and what not, and that's part of what they sell as their product. However, I feel it's a very, very expensive undertaking for insurance companies to interpret all of these things and to train their staff in the interpretation, and something should be afforded to them with respect to that.

We've just gone through a major change, two and a half years ago, with the OMPP, which cost everyone a lot of money in the insurance industry. Now there's even more complicated changes proposed and this is going to be expensive for everyone.

For the medical community, I think there needs to be some education as to the key role they play so that when they're signing these forms and documents attesting to someone's extent of disability, they understand exactly what that means.

The second point I want to make is the access to benefits. It's our view that basically any claims-driven system by nature is adversarial. Under any such system, which includes that described in Bill 164, there exists an inherent problem of the access of the claimant to that held or controlled by the manager of that claim, or the benefit. Some literature produced by the government with respect to OMPP and Bill 164 has commented on the adversarial nature of the tort system. Obviously, this is true.

However, the role held by lawyers to ensure this access on behalf of their clients has not been replaced in the legislation. The closest the legislation comes to identifying such a role is the role to be played by the medical community in initiating certain rehabilitation and care activities. The type of general education referred to in point 1 certainly would help promote access, but can by no means be relied on to ensure that disabled people have full access to the benefits accorded under Bill 164.

It's our recommendation that if an entitlement-access dispute arises, the insured be afforded the funds to consult with an adviser so that his or her interests are represented. We say this also with respect to those parties who are not capable of representing themselves in mediation. Many of our clients cannot speak English very well and are unable to negotiate in those proceedings and then have to consult with lawyers who are very expensive.

Clearly, entitlement to benefits which are covered under the policy should be accessed, but explanation for those who are not able to receive the benefits or why they can't should be explained to them in writing so they can understand this and, therefore, hopefully resolve the disputes and save everyone extensive dollars on that issue.

The issue of benefits conversion or, I believe they call it, the loss of economics, which is to be implemented at the 104-week point: While the process of the conversion at 104 weeks from income-replacement benefits to loss-of-earning benefits is a step forward in terms of the concept, we're not certain why the definition change of disability has been lessened from 156 weeks to 104 weeks. Also, we feel this part of the legislation is very unclear.

First, it's unclear in its general concepts; maybe you understand it but we certainly don't. It appears that the initiation of the process is at the discretion of the insurer alone.

Second, it appears there's something magic about the 104-week point. Again, it's declined from 156 weeks to 104 weeks. Is it meant to be a review point, or is there an assumption that at 104 weeks it's some sort of watershed on all disabilities?

Third, the assessment process does not appear necessarily to take into account any rehabilitation efforts that have taken place up to that point.

Fourth, the role of the attending physician is not clearly specified.

Fifth, if the goal of rehabilitation is to maximize potential—again, if—and to restore as best possible an individual to pre-disability levels of functioning, the two-year assessment process appears less inclined to maximize potential and more inclined simply to expedite some level of earnings or some level of perceived earnings.

Sixth, there do not appear to be any explicit considerations for ongoing or continuing rehab after the two-year point, with a goal of maximizing potential.

Seventh, referring to the language of sections 25 and 26 in the draft, we're concerned about the uses of words that deem people employable, as opposed to showing it to be so. Phrases such as "could earn," "best satisfy the criteria" and "reasonably possible" suggest much subjectivity on the part of this assessment facility that's referred to. This goes against the grain of rehabilitation, which should be dealing, not subjectively in assessing possibilities but objectively in achieving realities. Additionally, what is meant by "assessment facility" is not clearly defined.

We want to talk about the goals of rehabilitation. The goal of rehabilitation is never defined in the legislation. There are lots of definitions at the beginning; "rehabilitation" is not one of them. It seems to me that if presently there is $500,000 available for medical and rehab expenses, as well as an additional $500,000 soon to be uncapped if this goes through, there should be a definition of what exactly this means.

Section 53 suggests that rehabilitation exists to "permit the person to engage in employment that satisfies the criteria of subsection 26(4)," or to "shorten the disability period during which the weekly benefits are payable." Section 33 refers to the goal of "reducing or eliminating disability relating from injury." While all of these are true, these functions need to be reconciled and put in a clear context for all parties to the process.

We would strongly suggest that if not defining the word "rehabilitation," the legislation should contemplate more definitively a goal of rehabilitation to ensure that the insurer, the insured and all other parties are clear on why such activities are to be undertaken. Clear reference should be made to the maximization of potential and restoration of pre-disability level of functioning, and thus earnings, taking into account an individual's physical and psychological limitations, as well as interests and aptitudes.

Emphasis, in our opinion, should be on placement of the individual, if at all possible, not on just determining potential. Prior to OMPP, rehabilitation was hired from the beginning to the end of the rehabilitation process; with OMPP sometimes was put on, off, on and off the file, and to me that's a detriment to the whole process.

The timing of rehabilitation: Section 33 outlines that an insured person who's sustained injury as a result of an accident is entitled to rehabilitation benefits and that payments in this section are for all reasonable expenses occurred. We would suggest that the term "reasonable" be defined.

Section 53 then contains a provision that the insured will participate in rehabilitation if offered and allows for benefit reduction if refused. We believe this is a very positive step. However, there are no guidelines for the insurer to offer rehabilitation. We strongly suggest that parameters be established for insurance companies as to when rehabilitation should be offered. Timing is important for the success of rehabilitation, and we have proven over and over again in studies that early intervention facilitates effective rehabilitation, and thereby return to work, and therefore dollars saved to everyone.

Bill 164 emphasizes timely rehabilitation care as a benefit under this proposal. It acknowledges that rehabilitation should begin immediately. That's in the Considerations booklet. Our suggestion would be that rehabilitation should be mandatory at a certain stage within disability. Surely if an assessment at 104 weeks is the key to continuation of benefits, an assessment of rehabilitation potential and initiation of this activity within two months, which is what we're suggesting, is critical. This is for the protection of the insured as well as the insurer.

This is complicated legislation, as was the implementation of OMPP. For the sake of everyone, so as to prevent the halting of activity or not rendering any activity, time frames should be set on a mandatory basis for each. In other words, if the insurer can offer rehabilitation to the insured at a certain point, if he refused, then the benefits could be stopped at that point, or reduced, whatever. That should be mandatory, in my opinion.

We also feel that the monthly cap on long-term care should be addressed. While removing the 10-year limitation on the attendant care benefit was a positive step, the monthly cap of $3,000 is restrictive. Those who require this, in our experience, being the severely catastrophic injuries such as the quadriplegics, often require 24-hour attendant care. This medical requirement could translate easily into $8,000 per month and, if deemed necessary—and to me, that would be the key—by a medical practitioner, it should be payable. Having said this, we should also recognize that most of the clients under this system do not come anywhere near reaching the $500,000 cap. So on one hand, it's a moot point. But for the people to whom it really pertains, it's not effective enough.

The critical issues to us, with respect to this legislation and, quite frankly, the present OMPP legislation, are the independence and the objectivity of the rehabilitation as well as the qualifications of the people rendering this service. As I stated earlier, June and I have been in the business probably the longest of anybody I know, so we've seen different systems come and go, different ways of approaching problems come and go. We feel that we're talking knowledgeably in this area.

With respect to independence and objectivity, interestingly, the legislation makes much of the 104-week assessment being independent but makes no such requirement of the rehabilitation itself. For rehabilitation to be successful, the process must be objective and done independently at arm's length. As we stated earlier, any claims system is inherently adversarial. That's understandable. Any rehabilitation process that works on the side of the insurance company or only works as advocates for the disabled can only bring subjectivity to the process. We strongly suggest that the legislation make reference to this in its definition of the role of rehabilitation.

Prior to OMPP, with rehabilitation, insurance adjusters stayed in their area of expertise; rehabilitation people stayed in their area of expertise. In my opinion, under the OMPP, the waters have got muddied, and we each, on different occasions, try to get into each other's roles. I believe this is very detrimental. Therefore, one of the recommendations we have with respect to this is that emphasis should be placed on standards and qualifications of those administering long-term care and rehabilitation.

As one of the cornerstones of the proposed legislation, Mr Charlton talks about "reasonable treatment for all injured persons." There should be some standards with respect to the providers of rehabilitation and long-term care to help ensure this. Issues such as ethics, qualifications, independence and service standards must be considered. For example, doctors are governed by their own system, as are lawyers, in terms of the OMA and the bar association and the law society. The rehabilitation provider needs to be governed by such a body of regulating officials as well. There is a process in place presently in Canada for those who choose to participate, and the key is, if you choose to participate, there is a regulating body. Not everyone practising in the field—and I use that term loosely—is governed by this body and its code of ethics.

Therefore, we would suggest that a rehabilitation provider must (1) be an impartial facilitator of the rehabilitation process; in other words, be hired as a third party adviser, no matter who hires them; (2) provide services as an objective party to ensure the insured receives fair and equitable treatment; (3) be qualified with the Canadian certified rehabilitation counsellor designation or be directly supervised or interned by individuals with these credentials and thus be bound and subject to discipline under the code of ethics as per the CCRC designation.

This is relatively new designation in Canada is an attempt to try to govern rehabilitation providers; the first writing was in April 1991. There are—I'm guessing just on my last figures, although there's just been another sitting—approximately 150 to 170 people presently licensed to be able to provide under that governing group and thus by its code of ethics. To me, that's a key point in this legislation and, quite frankly, in the existing OMPP if this legislation wasn't to go through.

Basically, that's all we have to say. There's some time for questions, if there are any.

The Chair: Mr Mancini, about three minutes.

Mr Remo Mancini (Essex South): I think your brief is well put together. You've hit on a number of themes that we've heard over the past week or so. You mentioned the affordability issue, and that's something that's come up time and again before this committee. Are you aware just how much insurance rates will increase to consumers because of Bill 164?

Ms Gram: I've heard approximately $200 per policy.

Mr Mancini: That's about correct, and if we use the government's own figures, if we use the government's consultant's figures, the firm of Mercer from New York, at 4.5%, and if we factor that through by multiplying that figure by the number of drivers in this province, that amounts to almost $200 million. Do you think, using the government's own figures, that Ontario taxpayers are in the position today in the middle of a four-year recession to fork out $200 million for Bill 164?

Ms Gram: I think I'd rather keep my area of expertise to rehabilitation.

Mr Mancini: That's fine.

Ms Gram: I agree that that's a lot of money, but that's speaking as a private citizen, not as a rehabilitation provider. I agree that that's an astronomical amount.

Mr Mancini: That's using the government's figures.

Ms Gram: Yes.

Mr Mancini: If we use other industry figures, it goes as high as 20%, meaning more than $600 million in rate increases on the people of Ontario. We heard from a group last week, the Coalition of Motorcycling Organizations. They told us that approximately 6% of their members don't buy insurance, and because of Bill 164 they think that's going to go anywhere from 9% to 12%, and that's going to put a lot of strain on health care. It's going to put a lot of strain on people who do the job that you do, because who knows where the money's going to come from to pay for those services?

Ms Gram: Exactly.

Mr Mancini: You also mention the complexity of the legislation.

Ms Gram: Yes.

Mr Mancini: Are you familiar with the regulations?

Ms Gram: I have a copy of the draft legislation, which I've gone through.

Mr Mancini: Do you have all 68 pages with you?

Ms Gram: Yes, I believe so.

Mr Charles Harnick (Willowdale): Tell us what it means.

Ms Gram: If I had the answer to that, I wouldn't be in the rehabilitation business. I mean, it's very complicated. Everybody says that it is. I mean, we know that.

Mr Mancini: The Chair has told me I have one minute left. Are you aware that the most senior officials in the insurance industry, lawyers and other professionals, have told us that it's going to be difficult, if not impossible, to figure out what these 68 pages mean?

Ms Gram: That's exactly why we've recommended some sort of public education, not at the insurance companies' expense but at the government's expense, if they want to implement—

Mr Mancini: You mean at the taxpayers' expense.

Ms Gram: Exactly, but there's nothing you can do about that.

Mr Mancini: Do you think it's necessary?

Ms Gram: I'm sorry, but it's necessary to understand the legislation.

Mr Mancini: I agree. If Bill 164 passes, if the NDP members force Bill 164 through the Legislature, we're going to have to do one of two things, as you said. Either the taxpayers are going to have to pay people to try to understand an incomprehensible document, or people will pay through their insurance rates. Do you think that's fair?

Ms Gram: Well, no, I don't. But, again, that's as a public citizen, not as a—

Mr Peter Kormos (Welland-Thorold): Apparently the government doesn't know either.

The Chair: Okay, I have to go on to Mr Tilson.

Mr David Tilson (Dufferin-Peel): The issue of education, I think, is the message that I've received from your presentation this morning, which I do appreciate. Certainly one can say, "Oh, well, the doctors, they've got lots of money, they can train and retrain themselves on the different workings of this new mysterious system and understanding these regulations that you speak of"—

Ms Gram: But it's not anything to them. I mean, they don't—

Mr Tilson: Well, one can say that and then one can say, "Oh, well, the lawyers, they've got lots of money, they can do the same thing," and one can say, "The insurance companies"—

Ms Gram: They're not going to have any left.

Mr Tilson: There aren't too many left, I'll tell you.

Ms Gram: That's right.

Mr Tilson: One can say, "The insurance companies, they've got lots of money, they can spend lots of money and do all this sort of thing." But you get down to the innocent accident victim. It always gets down to the consumer.

Ms Gram: They're the ones who lose, yes.

Mr Tilson: Who's going to educate those people? Who's going to spend the vast amounts of money to educate those people when they come up against the doctors who say you're okay, the chiropractors who say you're okay, the lawyers who are fighting for the big insurance companies, the insurance companies themselves? You know, they say, "Oh, well, we'll get rid of this tort system because the lawyers have been skimming off the system," so they get rid of that.

Ms Gram: Now it's a mediation system.

Mr Tilson: They get rid of that. But who's going to represent these people?

Ms Gram: That's why we recommended advisers of some sort, but again—

Mr Tilson: And who's going to pay for those people?

Ms Gram: It costs money. There's no doubt about it.

Mr Tilson: The government, these people, they bankrupt the province, so who's going to pay for it?

Ms Gram: I don't know anything about that.

Mr Tilson: That's what this whole subject gets down to: Who's going to represent these people? It's sad because there isn't anyone. Mr Harnick has a question for you.

The Chair: One minute, Mr Harnick.

Mr Harnick: It's interesting that in your brief you talk about the role of the rehab counsellor to bring injured people back as close as they were to the situation they were in before the accident.

Ms Gram: Correct.

Mr Harnick: This legislation, I tell you, takes away the right of innocent victims to claim any economic loss they have beyond the benefits that the government is prepared to provide them. Do you agree this will make the job of the rehab worker more difficult, to get him back into the position he would otherwise have been in, if he suffers a shortfall by way of economic loss if he's innocent?

Ms Gram: Yes.

Mr Harnick: Thank you.

Ms Christel Haeck (St Catharines-Brock): Thank you very much for your brief. I do appreciate your comments. I had the privilege of sitting on the range of bills on the Regulated Health Professions Act, so I understand some of your comments around attendant care. There have been some very important comments made by you and a number of the other groups that have come before us.

The St Michael's group who came before us last Thursday indicated that they really support a multidisciplinary approach to the assessment and diagnosis of the patient. I would assume, as a result of hearing your brief, that in fact you would support the same.

Ms Gram: What we try to do as rehabilitation professionals is to work with the attending physician and the people who know the client the best. We try to work as a team, whether it be psychologists or whoever, all together working towards a common goal, which is maximizing the potential. One of the detriments that I see, as I think I understand this, and I preface that, is there are some assessments—the term "assessment facility" and the independent exam kind of idea may not be working with the attending physician. Again that's a concern to me.

But, yes, I agree that the multidisciplinary approach, if appropriate, should be implemented; but sometimes it isn't. Sometimes the injuries are minor, yet the person continues with limitations, so the only thing you need to do is work with the attending physician. You don't need to draw in all these people at everybody's expense if it's not necessary.

Ms Haeck: The Greater Niagara General Hospital has basically a quick response team to deal with a number of issues like this, and I know they're one of the few in the province. What that has resulted in is a major saving to the health care system and particularly to that hospital.

Ms Gram: That's the early intervention—

Ms Haeck: Early intervention.

Ms Gram: Exactly.

Ms Haeck: So at what point does your group actually get involved? Do you actually visit the patient in the hospital?

Ms Gram: We can. It depends. Our fees are paid for by the insurance, the company, the employer, the individual, the family, the lawyer, whoever decides to hire us on the case. The only time we get involved is at their discretion, which is why we're saying that there should be, as much as there are people who abuse the system—and there are people out there, so if they turn down rehabilitation, it should be mandatory for them. But it should also be mandatory, we feel, for the insurers to at least offer it, and we're suggesting at the two-month point; and again that's not early enough. In some cases—June does a lot of the file assessment and does the quality control.

Ms Haeck: So immediacy really is the issue?

Ms Gram: Sometimes it's within one week.

The Chair: Ms Haeck, time's expired.

I'd like to thank you for coming to this committee.

Mr Harnick: On a point of order, Mr Chairman: I just wonder if Ms Haeck can enlighten us as to what any of those questions had to do with an examination into Bill 164.

1030

Ms Haeck: I can enlighten you, Mr Harnick, if you would like an answer.

The Chair: I'm sorry. This is not a point of order.

Mr Kormos: It was a good point just the same.

The Chair: Thank you for coming before this committee.

Mr Robert V. Callahan (Brampton South): On a point of order, Mr Chair: I had raised my hand. I presume you've run out of time, have you?

The Chair: I had recognized Mr Mancini first and then he used up all the time.

Mr Callahan: All right, that's fine. I just wanted everybody to know that I'm here.

The Chair: Yes, okay. Welcome to the committee. Good morning, Mr Callahan, we did go around the first day and introduce everybody.

HEAD INJURY ASSOCIATION OF WINDSOR AND ESSEX COUNTY

The Chair: The next group we have coming forward is the Head Injury Association of Windsor and Essex County. Just for the committee members, there is no brief to be handed out but it will all be in Hansard. You can read it tomorrow.

I'd like to welcome you here to the standing committee on finance and economics. We have one half-hour, until 11 o'clock. As you can see, the members like to ask questions, so if you would leave at least 10 or 15 minutes it would be appreciated. You may begin.

Mr Greg Monforton: My name is Greg Monforton and I'm a lawyer, but I'm not here in my capacity as a lawyer so much as I am as the chairman and president of the board of the Head Injury Association of Windsor and Essex County. This is a community organization dedicated to improving the quality of life of persons suffering from the effects of head injuries.

The goals of the board are to promote public awareness and hopefully reduce the incidence of head injury. But speaking entirely on my own behalf, it's nice to see the broad consensus among the various members of this committee. I'm sure it's a gratifying thing for the electorate to see.

What I'm going to do is briefly address certain parts of the legislation which fall seriously short of addressing and dealing with the needs of head injury victims and persons with head injuries in particular. But in order to understand how Bill 164 wrongs people who live with the effects of brain injury, it's first necessary to understand the nature of brain injury itself. It's permanent. Once a brain cell is damaged or killed it will not regenerate, and the functions performed by that cell are lost for ever.

It's also not generally understood that damages to the brain do not need to be severe or dramatic to be significantly life-changing. Oftentimes, trauma to the brain can cause subtle cognitive and behavioural changes which occur even when there is not a direct blow to the head. People who suffer this type of injury often complain of physical, cognitive and psychosocial difficulties, including problems with dizziness, impaired attention and concentration, fatigue, depression, alcohol intolerance, irritability, impulsivity, headaches, insomnia, memory difficulties and impaired abstract thinking, giving such persons great difficulty in processing information. This in turn leads to an inability to react appropriately to events which we all encounter in our daily lives.

At the Head Injury Association of Windsor and Essex County, we call these kinds of deficits hidden disabilities. These people have difficulty functioning independently, but because they're not in a wheelchair and not the victim of any other form of obvious disability, they're often perceived by those who deal with them as uncooperative, stupid or having a bad attitude. Put another way, the words we use to describe these impairments paint dark and ugly portraits of persons suffering with the effects of a brain injury.

A normal person who has no motor, neurological or mental impairment can set and drive life's agenda, but persons suffering with the effects of a head injury have no such freedom.

What I'd like to do is briefly discuss four particular aspects of the proposed legislation which, in the view of our organization, falls seriously short of justly dealing with persons suffering with the effects of head injuries.

The first aspect of Bill 164 that I want to comment on is access to timely and appropriate rehabilitation. Rehabilitation should be a central goal of the legislation, particularly with respect to head injury victims. It's in everybody's interests that injured persons get on with their lives. I don't think there's any disagreement there.

But anyone who lives with cognitive difficulty as a result of a brain injury suffered in an automobile accident is at a severe disadvantage against the insurance company and the insurance industry in ensuring that his interests with regard to rehabilitation are properly considered. Although people in the employ of the insurance company may assist the brain-injured person with the forms, there's an obvious conflict. The company's representatives are motivated to save costs for the insurance company. They always have been and always will be.

If the matter does go to mediation or arbitration, the plight of the victim is worsened. Without legal counsel and available funds to pay for expert witnesses equal to that of the insurance company, the injured person has little hope of winning at arbitration.

A recognition of these inequalities is centrally important to an assessment of the rehabilitative process envisioned in Bill 164. If the victim's family doctor recommends treatment, the victim is usually referred to a service provider. Treatment isn't commenced until funding with an insurance company is arranged. Rehabilitation must be authorized by a doctor, almost always specified by the insurer, before the insurer will undertake the costs. The insurer controls the purse-strings.

It's not uncommon for doctors to view rehab as an unnecessary expense. They're not trained to assess the vocational implications of injuries. Often doctors hired by the insurance companies have their perspective in mind. The accident victim then must convince the insurance company that rehabilitation is necessary. The insurance companies and the adjusters often don't have the background or experience to understand the rehabilitative process. The result is that accident victims often go without effective treatment designed to get them back into the workplace and functioning in life. He or she is told to find another job where the problems won't come into play. The unwillingness to retrain is particularly true where the injured person is an unskilled labourer.

But the problems of head injury victims are compounded further. A common result of head injuries, as I said before, is the inability to process information. These types of injuries often go undiagnosed for long periods of time. The victim, as again said before, is perceived to have motivational problems. Since benefits and rehab are centred around the issue of employability of the victim, correct diagnosis of the symptoms of an injury of this type and appropriate rehabilitation are central. Yet often the insurance adjuster simply is unable or unmotivated to understand the symptoms the accident victim is complaining of. The result is a denial of benefits with the option of rehabilitation being permanently foreclosed, and this is when we're dealing with well-intentioned and motivated people.

It's simply impossible to over-emphasize the competing interests that are at stake here. The insurance industry is interested in saving costs, period. That's what initiated this entire debate three or four years ago, and anybody who thinks it was anything else is either a person of bad faith or, at the very least, very naïve. In effect, as was described by the Ontario Head Injury Association, this legislation turns the innocent accident victim into David and the insurance industry into Goliath. The only difference, though, is that in these cases Goliath will always win.

What we need is a situation in which the victim, the innocent accident victim, has his or her interests represented by a level playing field. Where a person is required to complete forms or any other documentation in order to receive benefits, the insurance company should pay for that person to consult independent legal counsel of his own choosing to assist him.

Mr Mancini, I think, made an excellent point when he held up the 68 pages of legislation. I'm a lawyer; I deal with this type of situation every day. I'm having a tough time with these regulations. Now, something tells me that if I'm having a difficult time with them, a person suffering the effects of a head injury is going to have at least as tough a time.

As another suggestion, penalties incurred by insurance companies where the arbitrator finds that funding for treatment or rehab has been unreasonably withheld must be severe enough to reflect what the injured party suffered as a result of the insurer's refusal to pay.

Mediation and arbitration panels should be entitled to consult with recognized experts in the field of traumatic brain injury, and the insurance companies should bear the costs of those consultations.

Vocational rehabilitation consultants and counsellors should be allowed to present evidence at Ontario Insurance Commission mediation and arbitration meetings. Since vocational rehabilitation is centred around the issue of employability, those counsellors are the only professionals with the insight to determine what work a victim can realistically do and what retraining will be required.

It's important that we all remember that the victim's ability to lead a productive life is at stake here. Every effort must be made in this legislation to facilitate this.

The second aspect of Bill 164 that I want to comment on is attendant care benefits. The monthly cap of $3,000 is, in my submission, totally unrealistic. A survey carried out by the Ontario Head Injury Association shows that persons suffering from behavioural problems arising from a head injury can necessitate care costs as high as $600 per day. The type of care being contemplated by this legislation provides, at best, bare necessities. It's clearly far less than the cost to care for a person who requires more than full-time or even 40-hour-a-week attendant care.

People who are "lucky enough" to have suffered injuries before the passage of either Bill 68—that being the OMPP of course—or Bill 164 receive compensation for all their losses. But with the attendant care cost limits involved in Bill 164, I'm sure that anyone who sustains injuries in an auto collision has a future devoid of opportunities and choices.

It's quite likely that in many cases, given this limit, the only feasible alternative will be to place insured persons in institutions or group homes, where the cost would be covered by government assistance instead of by those responsible. We at the Head Injury Association of Windsor and Essex County find this completely unacceptable.

Institutionalized care does not provide the opportunity needed by a brain injury survivor, and the quality of that individual's life will deteriorate along with his physical, mental and emotional condition. So I would strongly encourage the government to lift the monthly cap of $3,000, both because it's inadequate in itself and because its deficiencies are likely to be exacerbated by a tendency to view this as the upper limit.

Lastly, it's fundamentally important that the person determining the amount to be paid by the insurance company for home care or future care have recognized expertise in the brain injury field to ensure that the attendant care costs being provided are responsive to the needs of the injured victims and provide the injured victims with a sense of opportunity and choice that non-injured persons take as a right.

The third aspect of the bill I want to talk about is that it prevents victims from obtaining compensations for lost opportunity or lost earning capacity in the future. I imagine this is an aspect of the bill that's going to be commented on by a number of individuals making presentations before you. It's completely contrary to the fundamental principles of this province and this country that an innocent accident victim is not able to pursue and not able to be compensated for the losses, and every loss, he has suffered as a result of an accident in which he was involved through no fault of his own.

I don't think it's hyperbole, I really don't, to say that people have given their lives in world wars to preserve this kind of right for the citizens of this country, and what the government is attempting to do is deal with on a mass or grand scale what has to be dealt with on an individual basis. Justice demands it.

In effect, what the government has done here is treat accident victims with a snapshot, freezing them in one place and station in life. Many people who sustain head injuries in motor vehicle collisions range in age from 16 to 25 years old. Their economic potential has not yet been determined, and many haven't yet completed their education and aren't yet established in their careers. However, they're for ever assigned to a benefit level based on their position at the time of the injury. This is obviously unrealistic and in no sense just.

The last aspect of Bill 164 that I want to address is the $15,000 deduction from awards for pain and suffering. The traditional right of innocent victims to seek redress through our court system has, for all practical purposes, been legislated out of existence by Bill 68, the OMPP. Again, it seems very reasonable to me that people who find themselves injured and disabled and unable to pursue their dreams and their obligations and their responsibilities should be entitled to full compensation for those losses.

The system in the past has recognized the right of persons to go before a court of law and state their case before a jury of six people, who in effect are acting as the conscience of the community, and to seek redress for the loss that they've suffered. But again, the government has chosen to take away this right and in fact under the present legislation allows this right only to persons who have suffered what a recent judicial interpretation categorized as virtually catastrophic injuries.

The result is that we, as licensed drivers, involuntarily pay insurance premiums in the event that we're in need of their protection. When in need, our injuries, although tangible and real and pervasive, are deemed not important enough to warrant compensation.

The insurance industry has spent a lot of time and money, particularly money, over the past three or four years trying to convince the public that innocent accident victims are all motivated by greed and are treating their claim as some sort of personal lottery, thereby enabling them to retire wealthy. In my own experience, virtually nobody is aware, certainly when talking to people on the street, of the relatively modest amounts of money which are awarded for pain and suffering in this country.

Virtually nobody that I've spoken to is aware of the fact that a person who has suffered, for example, a quadriplegic injury, which will result in that person suffering excruciating pain, disability, disappointment and anguish every single day for the rest of his or her life, is restricted to a pain and suffering award of approximately $250,000. People are flabbergasted to hear this.

People are flabbergasted to hear that if a parent loses a child as a result of the negligence of a drunken driver, the most the court will give that parent for the loss of that child's companionship is somewhere between about $15,000 and $30,000. People can't believe it, and yet the insurance industry has, through a very clever and effective course of manipulation, convinced the public that there are multimillion-dollar awards out there for people suffering from hangnails or stubbed toes and that massive reform was necessary. In fact, that's simply not the case.

In closing, the goals of this legislation are laudable, they really are. I think what's trying to be achieved makes a lot of sense, but I think it's another example of something that looks tremendous on paper not working out very well when you apply it to real, live people.

It represents another major step in what I see is an undoing of fundamental human rights to which this province has always been committed. As I said before, under the former system, under the pre-OMPP law, people had a right to seek redress from the courts and from their fellow community members and I'm going to suggest to you that the vast majority of times the decisions rendered were the correct ones.

But the government, in effect, is saying: "We know better. We can do better." What any reasonable examination of this legislation fails to answer, the question that this legislation begs is very simply, who will speak for the victim?

The Chair: Okay, Mr Tilson?

Mr Tilson: How much time?

The Chair: Just close to five minutes.

Mr Tilson: Mr Monforton, I want to thank you for coming to the committee and presenting us with your very concise thoughts. You pretty well covered all the issues that have come before this committee to date, and I will say that the main message that appears to come from your presentation is, what is to become of the innocent accident victims?

That's something we in the Progressive Conservative caucus have been asking ourselves ever since this bill was first introduced, or when it was conceived in the back rooms of some hotel in Honey Harbour. I don't know when it was conceived, but nevertheless it's been a concern we've had. We keep waiting for the NDP—this was its message a number of years ago, to protect the innocent accident victims, and that seems to have gone by the door.

There's certainly still one member, I suppose, in their caucus who has been trying to speak in this committee. Our caucus is going to allow him our time, Mr Chair, to direct questions because the NDP won't allow him to speak.

The Chair: Mr Kormos—

Mr Kormos: Thank you, Chair. Thank you very much—

The Chair: Mr Kormos, just a minute.

Mr Kormos: Have I got time or not, Chair?

The Chair: Okay. I just want to make a point that you've decided to sit there. You've asked them for time. You have not put your hand up to ask a question.

Mr Kormos: Chair, that's a silly comment and you know better than that.

The Chair: No, it's not. I just want to set it straight. You haven't put your hand up to be recognized on the government side.

Mr Harnick: You keep turning off his microphone.

The Chair: When he's out of order. Go ahead, Mr Kormos.

Mr Kormos: I don't know what cabinet position you're vying for, but the cabinet's getting smaller, not bigger. Trust me.

Mr Monforton, good to see you here. Now, listen, you've been more than charitable about this legislation. I call it "made in Bucharest." It certainly doesn't reflect what Bob Rae and New Democrats promised people, not just in the few months before the last election campaign, but literally for years. And who'd a thunk it was New Democrats, because even though there were a whole lot of people who didn't vote for them, those people still understood that it was New Democrats who fought for the little people, for the victims.

Bill 68 at least left the courtroom door open for the most seriously injured, notwithstanding that it had to be near catastrophic, according to Meyer. This bolts and locks and bars the courtroom door. Even now, to the most seriously injured it says, "No, you're not going to receive full compensation or anywhere near adequate compensation for your losses." This bill is a betrayal, obviously.

I was with Bob Rae when he stood on platforms with some of the largest audiences of his political career when he was advocating the rights of innocent victims, and now we see the most complete betrayal. It was either a lie at the time or a betrayal at the present. And there's been this bizarre Stalinist-style rewriting of history around Queen's Park, something of an attempt to erase the records of the past.

Let me ask you this: The government talks about increasing benefits, yet benefits levels, even on the no-fault schedule, are being reduced to 90% of net from 80% of gross. For most victims, that's going to mean a reduction in the weekly no-fault benefits. They talk about increasing access to the courts, yet the fact is they've imposed a $15,000 deductible because access—how can courts be good for determining pain and suffering but no good for determining economic loss? It's a pretty whacko bit of sophistry, isn't it?

Mr Monforton: I agree with you entirely and, again, if you ask the average person on the street, "What does this $15,000 deduction amount to?" I think most people would say, "Well, that will get rid of very minor claims." But in fact $15,000 awards are entirely consistent with people who have suffered one, two or three years of ongoing pain and suffering from soft tissue injuries, from acceleration-deceleration injuries. To suggest that this $15,000—

Mr Harnick: Fractures.

Mr Monforton: That's correct.

Mr Harnick: Fusions.

Mr Monforton: That's true.

Mr Kormos: Doesn't it really mean that the innocent victim has to pay a $15,000 kickback into the insurance company's coffers? Isn't that what it amounts to in the final analysis?

Mr Monforton: I see it as a taxpayer subsidy to the insurance industry.

Mr Kormos: Holy zonkers. I guess that was a king-size bed and there is room for this government too. It's a ménage à trois.

The Chair: Mr Winninger.

Mr David Winninger (London South): Thank you, Mr Monforton, for your presentation. I'm only going to deal with part of it because I know my colleague Mr Lessard has questions as well.

We dealt, in response to Mr Mancini's comment, with the complexity of the regulation. Isn't it true that legislation and regulations pertaining to auto insurance are generally reduced to a standard automobile insurance policy, and that if people have difficulty with that, often the insurance companies provide flyers that describe the benefits available?

Mr Monforton: Isn't that true? No, I don't think that is true and I think the past two years have shown that. Regardless of whether they're suffering from a head injury or not—and I'm not reflecting on their intelligence or their ability—the realities of the situation are that people are completely unable to deal with the complexities of the situation. So no, I don't agree with that.

Mr Winninger: It might interest you to know that yesterday we had a presentation in Thunder Bay by a consumer representing head-injury people, and he addressed the issue of access to support for the head-injured, access to people who could assist them in putting forward their claims. It came to mind that our legislation, Bill 74, the Advocacy Act, actually sets up a commission to provide advocates for vulnerable people, including the head-injured. I wondered if you were aware of that.

Mr Monforton: I don't think that's the issue because, in the final analysis, if an unresolvable conflict arises somebody has to have the expertise and the ability to take it to its ultimate conclusion, which has historically been in the courtroom.

Mr Winninger: The head-injured asked us to lower the threshold, and we did, for pain and suffering. We've opened access to a factor of probably 3 to 1 compared to OMPP. We've also increased the loss of earnings benefits so that now 97% of full-time earners are covered compared to only 73% under OMPP. For those who aren't covered, the Insurance Act certainly permits them to purchase excess economic loss coverage.

I know that time is short and I just wanted to draw your attention to a case you're well aware of, adjudicated under the tort system, Teno and Arnold, in 1978, a four-and-a-half-year old girl hit by a car.

Mr Monforton: I'm well aware of the case.

Mr Winninger: For loss of earnings, economic loss, the court awarded $7,500 then and discounted it by 20% for a contingency that she might have earned less due to illness or other reasons. So the final annual award for loss of income was $6,000, which equates to about $13,000 in 1992.

Mr Monforton: I don't think that's correct, Mr Winninger.

Mr Winninger: If you have other figures, we'll talk about it afterwards, but our plan—

Interjection: Talk about it now.

The Chair: Order.

Interjections.

The Chair: Order.

Mr Winninger: We'll deal with Mr Gilby this afternoon. Can I complete my question? Are you aware that under Bill 164 the loss of earnings that child would be entitled to would reach 90% of the net average wage—

Mr Harnick: It's below the poverty line.

The Chair: Order.

Mr Harnick: It's below the poverty line.

Mr Winninger: I know the truth always hurts, Mr Harnick.

Mr Harnick: It's below the poverty line.

Mr Winninger: Which before tax shall be down. If you don't want to hear the facts—

The Chair: Mr Harnick.

Mr Harnick: Shut up.

The Chair: You told me to shut up? I'm sorry.

Mr Winninger: I'm telling you, under Bill—

The Chair: Hold it. I'm going to call a recess.

Mr Harnick: I'm sorry; my apologies.

The Chair: Okay; we'll carry on.

Mr Winninger: Under Bill 164, the child would be entitled to the net average wage before tax of $30,000. Are you aware of that?

Mr Monforton: I think the fundamental premise of your statement is incorrect. I'm not suggesting it's being done intentionally, but I think you're misrepresenting the breakdown of dollars awarded to this child back in 1975 or 1976. I don't have the precise figures in front of me, but a significant portion of that award was on account of future care costs, as well as future loss of earnings.

Mr Winninger: I wasn't dealing with that. I'm sorry; that's a different component of the award.

Mr Monforton: Loss of future earnings.

Mr Winninger: I'm dealing with loss of earnings, which you say we don't cover adequately, and showing how the tort system did not serve this child as well as Bill 164 would.

Mr Monforton: I wouldn't agree with that, and there's no question that the proposed system does not adequately or fully compensate persons who through no fault of their own have suffered very serious injuries.

Mr Winninger: Mr Lessard has a question.

The Chair: I'm sorry. You've run out of time there. You know what happens sometimes? You get so many lawyers here, you're unbalanced. You're overbalanced now with lawyers. So we go to Mr Mancini.

Mr Mancini: Mr Monforton, I want to thank you for coming before the committee. You bring a certain expertise here that is valuable and is needed. I'd like to make a point, though, before my first question.

Over the years, and in particular just before the last election, the Ontario New Democratic Party, now the government of Ontario, promised three things in regard to insurance. They promised (a) government-owned insurance, and they broke that promise. They promised (b) lower rates, and with Bill 164 they're breaking that promise. They promised (c) full access to the courts, and with Bill 164 they're breaking that promise.

I think it's a little bit hard to sit here and take Mr Winninger's arguments that the tort system has not worked well, when only 24 or 30 months ago he was convincing people that was the only system that could work for our citizens and for injured victims and for anyone else who needed insurance.

I want to ask you a direct question. You've had experience in working with the courts pre-OMPP, you've worked with the Ontario motorist protection plan and you may have to work under Bill 164. If you had your choice of any one of those three systems, which one would you take, and why?

Mr Monforton: I would choose the pre-OMPP situation because that system reflected the fact and acknowledged the fact that the way an injury affects a particular person is as personal to that person as his or her fingerprints. The primary problem with Bill 68 is that it deprives a tremendous number of people of the right to seek any compensation whatsoever for their pain and suffering, the net result being you've got people who have been hospitalized for six months to a year to a year-and-a-half to two years, who are left with significant but arguably not devastating residual disabilities and they're entitled to nothing whatsoever for their pain and suffering. I find that to be fundamentally unjust; so does the Head Injury Association of Windsor and Essex County.

Mr Mancini: This is where I would have a serious disagreement with you. I was in the Legislature pre-OMPP, I served constituents pre-OMPP and we had a flood of constituent representation and a flood of constituent phone calls, not orchestrated by any insurance company, but constituents who came to myself and my colleagues who said: "You've got to stabilize insurance rates. Insurance rates are going through the roof." One of the things that we promised and one of the things we did was in fact to stabilize insurance rates. If we were to go back to pre-OMPP, insurance rates would go through the roof.

Now what do you have to say, Mr Monforton? Because this is important. We must address the affordability issue. It's nice to say that everyone should have all of what they need and ask for etc, but somebody's got to pay for it. That's why this province is going to have a $12-billion deficit this year. What do you have to say about the affordability problem that exists today?

Mr Monforton: I think it's a very good question, and if the fundamental premise of your question is, has Bill 68 served to increase the profitability of auto insurance for insurers in the province? absolutely, there's no question about it.

Mr Mancini: Has it stabilized rates?

Mr Monforton: I can only say this much: We all know that in the, say, one-and-a-half to two-year period prior to the passage of the OMPP, the insurance industry would be out there in the press every three or four months crying about—

Mr Mancini: Has OMPP stabilized rates?

Mr Monforton: It's certainly increased profits.

Mr Mancini: Has OMPP stabilized rates?

Mr Monforton: Has it stabilized rates? I can't answer that.

Mr Mancini: You're not aware of that.

Mr Monforton: Well, stabilization of rates—

Mr Mancini: Mr Monforton, I'm surprised that you would make this a debate between who should make profits and who shouldn't. You're a Windsor resident, are you not?

Mr Monforton: Yes, I am.

Mr Mancini: Did Chrysler Corp make almost $800 million profit in North America this year? Are you against that?

Mr Monforton: Oh course I'm not against that. I don't see what—

Mr Mancini: Fine, that's fine. No, no. Now that we've established, Mr Monforton, that you're for some companies making profits and other companies not making profits, where do you draw the line?

Mr Monforton: No, Mr Mancini, you're misstating my words. I've never said I'm against the insurance industry making a profit.

Mr Mancini: I'm an advocate for the consumer. I want my bias to be very clear. I am an advocate for the consumer. Consumers have told me by the hundreds, if not thousands, that they could not afford insurance rates pre-OMPP, and under Bill 164 they're not going to be able to afford it either. This legislation will take anywhere—

The Chair: Mr Mancini, can you come to the end so he can reply, because your time has run out?

Mr Mancini: I appreciate that, Mr Chair.

Mr Monforton: I've kind of forgotten what the question is.

Mr Mancini: I want to give Mr Monforton the chance to reply directly to consumers. I want Mr Monforton to reply to consumers.

Mr Monforton: Well, is your question about—

Mr Mancini: Do they deserve rate stability?

Mr Monforton: Is your question about Chrysler—

Mr Mancini: Do they deserve to afford insurance?

The Chair: Wait a minute, Mr Mancini. Let him answer, please.

Mr Monforton: First, if your question is, would I like Chrysler to make a profit, yes, no question about it. If your question is, would I like the insurance industry to make a profit, I'm certainly not averse to them making a profit, because over the long haul if they don't make a profit, they're obviously not going to continue to provide insurance.

What I can tell you is that for the two-year period prior to the passage of OMPP, the insurance industry was out there crying every month. They'd be in the newspaper, on the front page of the Globe and Mail and the Windsor Star crying about how they're not making any money. All I can tell you is that since OMPP has been passed, except for the past few months when this has become a hotbed of controversy, they've been deathly quiet. Now we can each, I suppose, come to our own conclusions as to why they've been quiet, but they've been very quiet.

In fact, the reality of the situation is this, Mr Mancini, because I represent injured accident victims every single day, and I can tell you that the insurance industry over the past two years has become more intransigent. They are less willing to settle claims out of court. They are encouraging litigation. I've had numerous experiences in the past two years where I've dealt with very experienced, well-respected insurance counsel who cannot get their companies to back up the recommendations they make on the settlement of personal injury claims. Prior to—

Mr Mancini: One final question—

Mr Monforton: Let me finish. Prior to the passage of the OMPP—

The Chair: There is no final question.

Mr Mancini: He's answering a question I didn't ask.

Mr Monforton: I think it is in response to what's been asked.

The Chair: We're listening—

Mr Mancini: I appreciate that, but it's question and answer and the gentleman has to answer questions that I've asked.

The Chair: I said your time had run out, but I'd like to hear the gentleman's reply.

Mr Monforton: Your question pertained to the profitability or the effects of this Bill 68 on the insurance industry, and what I'm trying to do is tell you how it's affected the people I represent. What I'm telling you is that oftentimes now, since the passage of Bill 68, insurance counsel, lawyers hired by the insurance industry, very good lawyers, very well-respected and effective lawyers, are unable to get their companies to agree to settlements which they feel are reasonable and fair.

Prior to the passage of Bill 68, that almost never happened, never, and I'm not talking about $600,000 claims. I'm talking about $30,000 claims, $20,000 claims, claims where you've got insurance counsel who've been doing this work for 30 years and whose opinions and advice have always been sage and appropriate, now being told by their companies, "We'll pay it when a court says we have to pay it," and that's the only thing that'll get the insurance industry to treat people fairly.

Mr Mancini: So you would prefer to go back pre-1990. You would prefer to go back pre-OMPP.

The Chair: I'm sorry, Mr Mancini, your time has run out.

Mr Monforton: If your question is—

The Chair: No, there are no more questions. Sir, I'm going to have to say the time's up. We've gone over about four or five minutes. I was listening to your reply, because we're here to listen to the consumers out there.

Mr Monforton: Thank you all very much.

The Chair: Thank you.

Mr Stephen Owens (Scarborough Centre): I have the case, by the way, if you'd like to review it.

Mr Monforton: I may just want to.

ONTARIO INSURANCE BROKERS
AMBASSADOR ASSURANCE BROKERS INC

The Chair: The next group we've got coming forward is the Ontario Insurance Brokers. I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economics. We will have until 11:35 since we were a little bit over, so you have your full half-hour. If you don't mind introducing yourselves for the purposes of Hansard, you may begin.

Mr Jerry J. Beneteau: Good morning, ladies and gentlemen. Now that we're all wide awake, I'm sure, my name is Jerry Beneteau of Ontario Insurance Brokers, a local brokerage firm here in Windsor employing a staff of nine people. Our firm has been in business serving the needs of the insurance community here for more than 100 years.

In your travels you've heard from many groups already, including the Insurance Brokers Association of Ontario and the Insurance Bureau of Canada. They have each expressed views which may seem to be divergent at times, yet are unanimous in their concern over the cost to the insuring public.

Today we would like to present some of our concerns as brokers in a slightly different way, the way in which we discuss these issues with our customers. We hope this might ring a bell with you and assist in our mutual goal to provide Ontario citizens, the driving public, with the best auto insurance in Canada at an affordable price.

I would like to introduce to you Mr Norm Kelk. He's the secretary-treasurer of Ambassador Assurance Brokers Inc, another insurance firm here in Windsor. Mr Kelk has 24 years of experience in dealing with the public. While he is a friendly competitor of mine, I have no hesitation in suggesting to you that he will make an effective and meaningful presentation.

Mr Norman Kelk: We're viewing this from the point of view of the kinds of questions we get asked by our people, because I think that's what's important. It's what the consumer is looking for and what he wants.

He asks us, "What's the price?" He asks us, "Is it good coverage?" He asks us, "Will I have a problem collecting if I have a claim?" He doesn't care much about what it says. He doesn't care how long it is or what the policy actually says. Those are the questions he wants us as brokers to answer for him.

"What's the price?" Now I have to tell him I don't know what the changes will cost, but there's universal agreement that the cost will increase since the benefits are increasing. The current system has provided price stability since 1990, and all rate changes must be approved by the Ontario Insurance Commission based on a full cost submission by the company requesting the change before they can be implemented now.

Everyone would like more benefits but they want to know how much. A recent survey shows that over 80% supported increasing benefits in auto insurance, but when they were asked if, with a cost of $50 added, they would support it, the support dropped to just over 50%. Significantly, when the cost was indicated as $100 or more per year, the support dropped below 30%. Cost is an issue in the public's mind and this is what it wants us to address.

"Is it good coverage?" Yes. Your current policy provides the highest level of no-fault accident benefits in Canada, and we believe in the world; I'm not familiar with outside of Canada and the United States, but certainly in North America, and you have the right to sue for economic and non-economic loss if your physical injury is both permanent and serious. There is a need to fine-tune these benefits. For example, there's a clause making workers' compensation claimants ineligible for any OMPP accident benefits even though workers' compensation does not provide all the benefits available under the auto policy and has stricter requirements. So we do have to change some things.

"Will I have a problem when I make a claim?" No, and I can say that unreservedly, despite Mr Monforton's comments about the adversarial nature of the system. Under the current system, you'll be collecting your benefits from your own company in almost all cases. The accident benefits definitions of "disability" are very broad. They're as broad as in any insurance policy I've ever read governing disability insurance. The medical and rehabilitation benefits are available for "all reasonable expenses."

The first presenter suggested that this was too broad and that it should be defined, but it is, for "all reasonable expenses," as are care benefits, currently up to $500,000 for each benefit, and regulations provide for quick resolution of disagreement through the Ontario Insurance Commission which, incidentally, has been underserved because it's got far less complaints in the first two years than it expected, by a quantum number. They expected to have to be staffed dramatically higher.

Those are the questions the insureds are asking us. Those are the answers we're giving them. It's my experience that OMPP in its current form has been successful in providing more dollars more quickly to insureds and has dramatically stabilized premium costs at a time when other Canadian jurisdictions have experienced sizeable rate increases. British Columbia drivers, for example, are seeing rate increases this year of 9.5% after 19.5% last year, and if you want to go back further, they've had increases every year since 1988. In Ontario we haven't had any since 1991, and in fact decreases.

OMPP has also been successful in opening the market to so-called grey risks, those in Facility, the problems we've had with availability prior to companies being able to expect to make some kind of profit, whose only problem was that they did not have a clean and continuous driving record.

Unfortunately, when I speak after a lawyer I have to make sure I clarify that am a layman, and as an informed layman, I believe, tackle the issue of the right to sue. I can summarize it all, and I'll try to do it in the end because this may be a little difficult to follow.

The current right to sue for physical injuries of a permanent and serious nature causes concern to the legal profession as an infringement of an individual's right if the threshold is not met since no compensation is available for pain and suffering. The proposed solution in Bill 164 attempts to address this by way of a universal right to sue, but only for pain and suffering and subject to a $15,000 deductible. This bill proposes replacing the right to sue for economic loss when seriously and permanently injured with complex formulas, regulations and unlimited liability on the part of the person's own insurer—not the at-fault insurer, not the at-fault driver—to whom he paid the premiums.

This isn't a Cadillac of coverage; it's a Formula 1 racer. Under the laws of Ontario auto insurance it is compulsory, in the amount of $200,000 as a minimum. You must buy $200,000. The majority of auto policies in Ontario, well over 60%, are purchased with $1 million of coverage.

None of this creates any serious problems for insurance companies and reinsurers. It is a benefit that can be costed and priced and sold to the public. But unlimited liability through a combination of accident benefits with no caps and the right to sue will be difficult if not impossible to provide at a reasonable cost, since the current regulations apparently make it impossible to factor in past losses to current rates.

They have to be approved by the OIC, and the example currently that I can tell you is that the Facility Association recently requested approximately 16% rate increases based on its experience. Part of the increase was denied. They said, "No, you can't have 16%, because part of that's because you lost money last year. You can have 8% approximately because that's what we feel you need for the current benefit." In OIC regulations, it's not allowed to take into consideration past losses.

What's the answer to this? I believe personally that you should retain the current right to sue as it is, with the immediate addition of psychological trauma. That's something the Insurance Bureau of Canada has agreed to. They have suggested that it's not a problem to the current definition. This allows the courts the necessary latitude to deal with unusual situations, and here I do agree with Mr Monforton. Let's not regulate every situation so that we've got regulations 250 pages long. Let the courts take care of the unusual situations of economic loss, such as farmers, self-employed, students, any number of others who are unable to be taken care of without great regulation and confusion.

Should you wish to recognize pain and suffering in lesser situations, you could provide compensation on some arbitrary basis. I don't know what: length of time disabled, the type of injury? As Mr Monforton pointed out, every lawyer in every insurance company in Canada knows how much pain and suffering is worth in a certain case, based on pre-Bill 68 rulings of the court. If it's $15,000 and that's what the court would do, make it part of the system. That's fine. It's priced, it's available and the company gets something that you can give a price to.

In that situation, make it subject to a smaller deductible, certainly not $15,000; perhaps to avoid the small cases, a few thousand dollars. But without the necessity of implementing a lawsuit and with predictable payouts, the costs should be reasonable. I want to emphasize that. The point I'm trying to make here, and I know I haven't made it very well, is that before Bill 68, before the no-fault benefits, yes, everybody had the right to sue, but what was the total you could get? Whatever the other driver had. If he had $1 million in coverage, that's all you could get. If he had $200,000, that's all you could get. The insurance industry provided a benefit that you could buy yourself, get yourself. If you had $1 million, you could get $1 million, but you didn't get $5 million, $3 million or $7 million.

No matter what the courts said, you only got what the other person purchased. Under Bill 68, you're getting most of your benefits payable. If you don't think the $500,000 cap is enough, raise it, but don't make it unlimited. It is unfeasible. Leave that to the courts. They're the ones to decide the serious, permanent injuries, both of a physical and psychological nature.

A couple of the other issues that concern us are expanded regulations and cabinet powers. Every time government makes a new regulation, there's a cost attached for compliance. I don't know whether it's $1 or $1 million; I have no idea. I know that the OIC is talking about having to hire 100 new staff. I don't know; that's up to you people to decide.

In the case of the insurance industry, the OMPP has already created additional costs to pay for the Ontario Insurance Commission—it's paid for by the persons who have the insurance policies; it's assessed to the insurance companies—and substantial additional costs to many small companies whose requests for rate changes to the OIC must be accompanied by actuarial charts, and which will apparently be required to have an actuary on staff in future. These and other compliance costs must be passed on to the consumer. Additional regulations, particularly as complex as those being proposed, simply add to costs.

With regard to cabinet powers to make regulations, this process we're going through right now is good, but cabinet powers to make regulations with regard to a uniform rating system seem to be counter to the process we're involved in right now. We're all here because we want to see the best for the consumers. As an insurance broker, I don't want to be put in the situation of telling the drivers with good records, or a young female driver, "Your rate's going up because cabinet says so." I want them to be aware of what's happened in this process.

As an industry, we are committed to providing, explaining and servicing whatever product the public wants at an appropriate price. In the last several years, there has been more dialogue between brokers, companies and regulators than ever before. The cooperation level is much higher than most people would lead you to believe. This should be an initial forum for suggested changes, not a massive change in regulation now.

On an issue that I really must admit not being an expert on, because I'm not an actuary or a CA, the insurance industry profits and the ability to absorb part or all of the increase resulting from Bill 164 changes are of paramount importance. The public will not accept large rate increases. I assume that if we had a crystal ball today and knew that rates would increase substantially—let's say by $150 per policy a year—if we knew that now for sure and we weren't arguing about that, this committee's deliberations would quickly be focused on how to reduce the costs.

I'm not an actuarial accountant, but the Ontario Insurance Commission has professionals on its staff to review the individual submissions of companies based on their actual experience. The OIC has received requests for increases in rates based on 1991 experience—that's now; that's not based on Bill 164 increases—and, in the view of its experts, rate increases are justified and have already been approved. They're not substantial—3%, 4% or 5%—but they have been approved, based on 1991's experience, for 1992 rates.

Obviously, if the Ontario Insurance Commission finds these rates can increase from current levels without Bill 164 costs, it follows that any further cost increase associated with Bill 164 will have to be passed on to the consumer.

Will companies apply part of their "record profits" to mitigate this increase? I don't think they can. I know a lot about insurance companies and finances and small business and big business. First, corporate taxes have to be paid, and 50% of that money went to the federal and provincial governments of Canada. Without that, you would have to find the money someplace else. You've got to tax somebody. It doesn't work very well.

This is in addition, in Ontario's case, to a 3% premium tax that the Liberals removed in Bill 68 and the NDP put back by regulation, so last year the coffers of Ontario profited in excess of $120 million in premium tax. How much tax can the consumer take? He's paying it; we're a pass-through industry.

Second, a reasonable return must be paid to investors who are taking the risk of years of losses such as occurred from 1985 until 1990: five successive years of record losses. What happened to the record profits? Are the companies not entitled to some balance here? The OIC says, "You can't charge more next year because you lost money this year." What can you do? There has to be a fairness here. I'm not saying what that level is, but the level that the OIC has set has been met and rate increases have been allowed for this year.

Third, investment income accounts for all of 1990's profits and 80% of 1991's profits. Companies are now experiencing the same declining interest rates on those investments, just like you and me. If you happen to be a retired person and you're worried about your pension and it's all in investment moneys, you're not going to get 11% any more. You're not going to get 12%. You're going to get 6%. They have to plan on that too. So the record profits, if left alone, would be half as much in two or three years, because they're all investment income profits.

Fourth, claims reserves set up in 1991 may be inadequate in light of lengthening periods of disability and rising costs of medical and rehabilitation treatment. The Ontario government itself has found that OHIP cannot be paid at 100% for everything, yet the insurance companies must pay whatever is reasonable. The costs are going up.

I've talked to some company people and I know you'll be hearing from the Economical Mutual Insurance Co in Ottawa later. They have found that the Mercer estimates are way too low in their own absolute experience, and they'll show you those things on Monday. But the number of claimants on disability over one year in their company is twice as high as the Mercer estimates would indicate.

As brokers, I must emphasize, we welcome changes that enhance benefits or make it easier for our clients to understand and use the claims system, but we know that our clients' first concern is affordability. We do not believe that Bill 164 accomplishes this delicate balance between coverage improvements and affordability.

I thank you for the opportunity to make these comments to your committee.

The Chair: Okay, up first is Mr Ward and then Mr Lessard on the government side.

Mr Brad Ward (Brantford): Thank you, gentlemen, for your presentation. It was thought provoking, I think, for every committee member here today. Are you a member of the Insurance Brokers Association of Ontario?

Mr Kelk: Yes, I am. Both Jerry and I are.

Mr Ward: You generally support that organization and association?

Mr Kelk: That's correct.

Mr Ward: On January 27 representatives from that association presented a brief to this committee and in that brief a statement was made by the representatives that says, "We agree that improvements are needed"—and referring to the OMPP—"and we note that Bill 164 takes some positive steps towards further protecting and enhancing the interests of our clients." Do you agree with that statement made by the representatives of the association?

Mr Kelk: Yes. It is a positive step. In fact some of my comments can be taken as a balance in the cost factor. I think in the presentation that I have read the Insurance Brokers Association of Ontario emphasizes again and again, "We are in favour of them, but the cost has to be there." The cost issue is the biggest factor.

Mr Ward: Would you agree that under Bill 164 over 97% of the full-time earners will receive some form of income replacement compared with 73% under the OMPP? That is a positive step, would you agree?

Mr Kelk: Yes, it is a positive step and I think it may be a little—

Mr Ward: That's fine. That's fine.

Interjection: Let him finish.

Mr Kelk: It may be a little different. I agree that it should be that way. The thing is of course that this is a second-loss coverage in that most high-income earners already have some form of disability insurance and, as such, perhaps should be given some rate decrease because they provide that coverage themselves.

Mr Ward: Would you agree under Bill 164 that it ensures all long-term disabled accident victims will have adequate benefits for life, whereas the OMPP does not? Is that a positive step?

Mr Kelk: Yes, it is positive. I think if you go further in that report, you'll see again that cost is an issue and the unlimited aspect of it does give everyone that, but yes, it is a positive step.

Mr Ward: A positive step?

Mr Kelk: If we can afford it.

Mr Ward: Yes. Under Bill 164, which ensures the seriously injured who are not at fault get recognition for pain and suffering—OMPP does not. Is that a positive step?

Mr Kelk: It is in the fact that the right to sue, and there should be some recognition of that, is offset in my personal opinion by the fact that the serious cases no longer have access to the courts.

Mr Ward: In reference to supplementary medical benefits and rehabilitation benefits, the association told us, "We are pleased to note the caps on these important coverages have been removed." Do you support that position?

Mr Kelk: I disagree with them because I don't think it's cost-effective. I support the position again if it's affordable, and they have stressed again and again in that presentation that while they agree with those and they're good, positive moves, affordability is a central issue to the consumer.

Mr Ward: Thank you. I'll turn it over to Mr Lessard.

Mr Wayne Lessard (Windsor-Walkerville): Thank you very much for your presentation. You've certainly reinforced the message that cost is an issue, and I don't have any disagreement with respect to that.

With respect to the current legislation, you say it's your experience that you're seeing more benefits being provided more quickly to accident victims. I'm going to suggest to you that there are some people who are left out by the current system as well. There are some losses that aren't being compensated for and part of the reason, I suggest, that the regulations we've presented are as complex as they are is we've tried to address that factor.

The Tories have suggested that perhaps people should have to buy extra insurance for economic loss beyond what Bill 164 might provide. Do you think people would buy that type of insurance and, if they would, how much do you think they might pay? You've given some specific examples from your studies about what people thought the limits were.

Mr Kelk: As a general rule, and I think this applies to most insurance coverages, if people know what the cost is and they're willing to pay additional—if you're talking about additional, probably no more than about $50. But let me answer the crux of your question. Having two systems in place, you can buy this or you can't, if it was really affordable.

In other words, if it was $20 benefit, then we as insurance brokers and I think most insurance professionals in Ontario, would add it as a matter of course. If it was expensive, nobody would buy it. If it's $100 a year or more, our experience is that people even now don't buy it even though they've been offered it—the additional benefit for income replacement—because it costs money. It's expensive and they don't see the benefit.

In that sense, if the benefit is available—and I think it goes back perhaps to what Mr Kormos has always wanted. He wants all of the enhanced no-fault benefits plus all of the right to sue, no matter what. There has to be a balance in that affordability, in that issue. You can't do that whole thing with what is being proposed. In that issue, you're proposing exactly to do that, to have an unlimited right to sue and unlimited accident benefits on both sides, just as that scenario is difficult to cost with the way it is now, if you add that other benefit back in.

Sure, we can cost it as $8 million of protection for economic loss. That's easy because we know how many are catastrophically injured. It's the unlimited aspect that causes problems, and the cost thing I have no idea because I'm not an actuary, but if it's available and at reasonable cost, I think you'll end up being of benefit on all policies. If it's an expensive benefit, people will not buy it.

Mr Lessard: Okay.

The Chair: I have to go on to Mr Mancini, and Mr Callahan had his hand up also. You've got five minutes.

Mr Mancini: I appreciate the presentation made by the insurance brokers of Windsor and Essex county. You are the people who deal face to face with the consumers. Is that not correct?

Mr Kelk: I'd say so, yes.

Mr Mancini: You are the people who have to hand people their insurance bills and say, "I'm sorry, but Bill 164 has driven up the cost of your insurance." You're the people who are going to have to do that. When Bill 164 is passed by the NDP members and insurance rates go up, when people who have not had accidents, people who have been good drivers ask you why their insurance rates have gone up, what are you going to tell them?

Mr Kelk: Basically we have to tell them that's the law and that's the cost of the product and that while we are in favour of enhanced benefits, we did bring to the attention of the government and the committee the cost issue and that we were representing their best interests in a balanced product.

Mr Mancini: Mr Lessard wants to gloss over what this is going to do to consumers. Let me tell the committee and everyone who's listening what Bill 164 means to the average household consumer living here in Windsor and Essex county. It means an increase in automobile insurance rates of $208. That's what it means. Have you seen figures to substantiate that increase?

Mr Kelk: Yes, I have.

Mr Mancini: Are you aware what this legislation is going to do to senior citizens in this province and are you aware of the United Senior Citizens of Ontario organization?

Mr Kelk: I've seen their presentation, yes.

Mr Mancini: Are you aware that the United Senior Citizens of Ontario, representing 300,000 senior citizens, has said that regardless of who is right or what the final outcome will be, rate increases of 4% to 20% will take place and that seniors can expect further rate increases higher than that? Are you aware of those statements?

Mr Kelk: Yes, I am. I think those come from two issues. Again we reiterate, every person who's studied this knows there are more benefits, and you know you can't get something for nothing, so the cost will go up. How much is a serious issue.

But the second issue of the seniors is going to be addressed also in the cabinet regulations. If the cabinet can do a plan which eliminates all discounts and says everybody gets the same if they're driving 10 years or more, then the seniors are going to pay more because they generally are in receipt of discounts because of long-term good driving and because seniors represent a lower risk.

Mr Mancini: Would you agree with me that most women earn less than most men?

Mr Kelk: Absolutely.

Mr Mancini: Are you aware of statistics that show that under Bill 164 female drivers over the age of 21 and 24 years of age will have substantial rate increases?

Mr Kelk: I understand that's correct.

Mr Mancini: Do you feel that the cost of Bill 164 to the consumer is worth some of the enhanced benefits that the NDP is trying to promote?

Mr Kelk: Not in my opinion, no.

Mr Mancini: Thank you very much.

The Chair: Mr Callahan.

Mr Callahan: Actually, this was for the other gentleman who was here, but I think I'd still like to put it on the record.

Mr Lessard: What do you think? Would you like to give up your space?

Mr Callahan: We ran out of time. I think the government members should listen. Maybe they'll learn something.

I inquired as to the facilities available for head injury rehabilitation in this province outside the room. He indicated to me it's nil. If that's the case, then the NDP's proposal in terms of taking away the right to sue for economic advantage, as well as the $100 per day that's allowed for a person who is brain-damaged, of course creates a situation of, where are we going to send them? Is the NDP going to enlarge the already outrageous deficit in order to provide these facilities, or are we going to send them across the border like we did with drug and alcohol problems?

The additional factor is that with the $15,000 deductible, there isn't going to be a county or town lawyer who is going to be able to deal with a client. It's going to become a very small-knit group, because as was explained to you by Mr Monforton, trying to figure out what fits into that $15,000 category is going to take a great deal of expertise and perhaps a few court decisions to determine that.

The net result could be that some county lawyers might decide to take on a case, get to court and find that they win $14,999, and their client will be ecstatic, but in essence that client has won nothing, except to pay the costs of his own lawyer as well as the costs of the opposition's lawyer. So that's an absolutely looney tunes approach to what the Premier promised, which was public auto insurance, and he sort of got a foot on either side of the bridge and is not accomplishing either one of those, so I'm putting him on the record, Mr Chairman.

The Chair: I'm sorry, Mr Callahan, I didn't hear a question.

Mr Callahan: Mr Chairman, you're supposed to be independent when I speak about the Premier's promises and his failure to keep them. You should not be coming into the fray.

The Chair: I am independent. The time has run out. I'm sorry. We'll go on to Mr Tilson.

Mr Tilson: I'd like to talk a little bit about the comment on cost and have you clarify some of the remarks you made. There's no question that all of the insurance companies, including yourselves, the brokers, the adjusters, everyone in the insurance industry says that rates are going up. Depending on who you talk to, is it 4%, is it 20%? The insurance industry believes it is closer to 20% that insurance premiums are going to go up.

That can be challenged, I suppose, just like Mercer can be challenged. But the fact is that they're going up over and above the normal increases that rates would normally have. So one wonders about the merit of all that. At the same time, emphasis has been put on what the cost is going to be to educate the brokers, educate the claims people, educate the companies, educate the lawyers, educate the doctors; of course, the innocent accident victim has been left out.

One of the major complaints about the previous system or systems, which I'm not necessarily so sure I agree with, is the tremendous cost of advocacy. This government has taken away the advocate of the innocent accident victim. There's no advocate. I'm getting to my point finally. I believe that the insurance industry is going to be put under so much pressure as to the cost of operating its businesses that rates are going to go up.

The minister has said, "Rates are not going up." He said that numerous times. If rates aren't going up, and yet the industry says they're going up by 20%, all right, so they can freeze it like the Liberals did. I suppose they can make some funny cabinet regulation, as the act's going to allow them to do. You people are going to become more and more difficult to deal with, because you have to survive.

My question again is getting back to the theme that was being developed by some of the earlier delegations. What is going to happen to the innocent accident victims, when you people are being forced to be not as nice as perhaps you have been in the past?

Mr Kelk: I must agree with your comments, but I must say, first of all, that Mr Charlton and Mr Rae are both aware that rates are going up and that the Ontario Insurance Commission has in fact already approved rate increases for companies.

Mr Callahan: That's not what they say.

Mr Kelk: I know. Mr Rae and Mr Charlton would then talk about the profits, and I addressed that issue. Those profits are gone in taxes and in other things. It's a situation where it's nice to talk about one year in isolation, but let's talk about the whole situation.

Mr Tilson: Wait a minute. I'm not talking about the rates from day to day. Let's talk about the projected 20% that this government's going to impose on this province.

Mr Kelk: Again, I am not an actuary, but that 20% estimate, by most estimates, is a combination of a slight increase because of current underfunding. The cost attributed to Bill 164, this is where it's not as wide apart as you think, because Mercer says 4.5% and Wyatt says 12.5%. The other part of that 20% increase is the fact that rates do have to go up even now to fund the lengthening disability periods, the lengthening benefits that consumers are receiving. So the total appears to be around 20% for the total package of rate increases in 1992 if this bill is passed; if it isn't, then there will still be a rate increase of about 4%.

Mr Callahan: The Premier knows that, does he?

Mr Tilson: The difficulty I have is with the whole issue of rates, which is why this whole mess got started in the first place.

Mr Kelk: That's correct. That's exactly right.

Mr Tilson: The OMPP said rates were going to go down.

Mr Kelk: Rates did go down. Rates went down in 1991.

Mr Tilson: I suppose the innocent consumer is going to say: "What in the world's going on? Who do you believe in this world?" I'm not suggesting that you're not telling the truth. I'm just saying that there's a lot of strange stuff going on here.

Mr Mancini: It's the NDP that didn't tell the truth.

Mr Tilson: I have one more question. How much time do I have?

The Chair: About 30 seconds.

Mr Tilson: I'll give it to Mr Kormos.

Mr Kormos: Gentlemen, it's nice to be here with you. You know what's really strange? This committee sat last week in Toronto; it's sitting around the province this week hearing from people. No more than a number I can count on one hand came forward saying there might be some good things here. Nobody supports it; almost everybody opposes this legislation. They didn't receive a single letter, a single note, a single phone call from anybody asking them to jack up premiums and reduce benefits. Who in the Lord's name is the government catering to with this wacko, made-in-Bucharest bill? Do you have any idea? Surely you people didn't call on the government to introduce higher premiums and lower benefits, did you?

Mr Kelk: No. I emphasize that we would love to have unlimited benefits, but we have to answer to the consumers and we have to give them that balance. No, our consumers are not asking for increased benefits. There are some cracks that have to be filled, but this is like tearing down a wall, instead of just filling the cracks.

Mr Kormos: This is a victory of the guilty over the innocent.

The Chair: Mr Kormos, you're out of time.

Mr Kormos: It's bad legislation.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee.

Mr Kelk: Thank you for the opportunity.

The Chair: We have a cancellation for 11:30, and the clerk would like to make some announcements here also.

Clerk Pro Tem (Mr Franco Carrozza): This concerns the accommodations here. You have until 3 o'clock to remove your belongings. After that, bring your luggage down to the River Run Bar after 3 pm. It's on the first floor by the front door.

The Chair: Okay, we're going to be recessed until 2 o'clock.

The committee recessed at 1136.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1401.

The Chair: Good afternoon. This is the standing committee on finance and economic affairs, Bill 164, An Act to amend the Insurance Act and certain other Acts in respect of Automobile Insurance and other Insurance Matters.

WINDSOR AND ESSEX COUNTY
INSURANCE BROKERS ASSOCIATION

The Chair: I'd like to welcome the Windsor and Essex County Insurance Brokers Association. Gentlemen, if you don't mind identifying yourselves for the purposes of Hansard, you may begin. We have until 2:30. In that period of time, at the very end of your presentation, you can leave time for questions from the committee members. You may begin.

Mr Stephen Savage: Mr Chairman, members of the legislative committee, ladies and gentlemen, for the record, my name is Stephen Savage. I'm the president of the Windsor and Essex County Insurance Brokers Association. I'm also representing here Kent and Lambton counties and the Bruce-Grey association. With me today is John Comisso, the past president of the association, and Mr Bruce MacDonald. We are insurance brokers, and in this capacity we wish to welcome you and your committee to a beautiful, sunny day here in Windsor. We want to thank you for the opportunity to express our views regarding Bill 164.

As insurance brokers, our first and foremost concern is for our customers. From a practical point of view, we are dealing daily with their concerns and questions. We advise them regarding product availability, policy wordings and price. We assist them with their buying decisions and help them through the claims process. We are in the best position to know what our customers want, what their concerns are and how legislation may affect them. We are here today to try and provide you with some local feedback regarding this proposed legislation, its strengths and its weaknesses.

In our view, the Ontario insurance consumer is seeking a product that is straightforward and easy to understand and, in the event of a claim, that pays benefits or repairs their vehicles quickly and efficiently and does not involve excessive paperwork, costly delays or the time and expense of court proceedings.

Since the introduction of the Ontario motorist protection plan in June 1990, our customers have experienced a stabilization in the marketplace, premiums have reduced, claims are settled more quickly and efficiently and income replacement benefits are delivered within 10 days of the filing of the appropriate paperwork.

Our sense is that the system seems to be working well. In our office, we've experienced very, very few complaints regarding the new system. This sentiment is common in most brokerage offices. We were therefore surprised that Bill 164 was proposed, with some significant changes from the existing legislation. We are not suggesting that a continuing review of the legislation should not be undertaken; our industry regularly consults with and makes recommendations to the Ontario Insurance Commission. However, we are concerned that some of the proposed changes in the legislation may not be in our customers' best interests.

Our first concern is for the areas that the bill does not address. We believe that in order to control the costs of auto insurance, you must first address the problem. Auto insurance premiums are driven by the cost of claims: the more claims, the higher the cost. This bill does not deal in any way with this issue. Instead, its proposals will add to the cost of the auto insurance product. The government seems to be addressing a problem that the general public has not expressed. It's a bit like the physician providing a patient with another pill for his pain without removing the nail from his foot. The Road Ahead: Ontario's Strategy for Automobile Insurance Reform did place, and we believe rightfully so, a considerable emphasis on safer roads and accident reduction.

Our industry, in the spring of 1992, recommended that graduated licensing should apply to all novice drivers. Statistics from countries that have introduced this plan have indicated a dramatic decrease in fatalities. For example, in New Zealand prior to the implementation of graduated licensing in 1987, fatalities among 15- to 17-year-olds were increasing. The new system halted the trend, and within two years traffic deaths and injuries for this age group dropped approximately 40%. The strengthening of driver test standards, hazard perception testing, compulsory driver education training programs, night curfews and zero blood alcohol content are a number of additional recommendations to address the real problem in auto insurance. Yet there seems to be a reluctance on behalf of the government to take legislative action. We do note, however, that the provinces of British Columbia and Nova Scotia have recently announced that they will be taking action to implement these kinds of road safety plans.

The road safety agency created under Bill 39—which, by the way, has not received second reading—is focused on the promotion of safer driving through licensing, road safety research and education. We believe this should be the priority of the government. We would strongly encourage the government to focus its energies in this area of accident reduction and, ultimately, cost control, instead of proceeding with Bill 164.

As brokers who deal with the public daily, we are painfully aware of our customers' concerns regarding the cost of auto insurance. Times are tough for many, and it becomes more obvious as we see clients stretch their payments, delete coverages or simply drive vehicles without insurance. We know that cost is their primary concern. Our concern is that the introduction of this legislation, with the indexation of benefits, the removal of medical and rehabilitation caps and increased access to the courts, will increase the cost of the product, and eventually this increased cost will be borne by the consumer.

There have been several actuarial reports published to date regarding the impact of Bill 164, and although they may differ in the methodology used to develop their results, they all have reached the same conclusion: Bill 164 will increase the cost of the auto insurance product.

It's not our intention to review with you in detail the specific contents of Bill 164. However, we feel it's important to comment on several areas.

Complexity: We referred earlier in our submission to the consumers and their need to have a straightforward product that is easy to understand. As we worked through the document, we became more and more concerned with its complexity. The 70-odd pages are very detailed and will, in many cases, require interpretation. We do not know the full impact of these new proposals or the additional costs associated with their implementation and regulation. It has been suggested by Don Scott of the Ontario Insurance Commission that it will require 100 additional staff to implement the benefit package of Bill 164 and $5 million more a year.

Our customers are just now becoming familiar with the Ontario motorist protection plan. We are concerned that additional costs and confusion will not be in their best interests. The clients who do not understand what they are buying, what they are entitled to or when it's available are impossible to satisfy. This dissatisfaction will be levelled at the government as it proceeds with the implementation and passing of this legislation.

Tort: The introduction of the right to sue with a deductible may return us to the problem of the 1980s, when higher court awards forced auto insurance premiums upward. We are concerned that the $15,000 deductible will either prohibit our customers from taking an action or cause the courts to inflate awards to compensate for the deductible amount.

Senior citizens: The proposals in the bill will increase the cost of auto insurance, yet there is little in the bill that will benefit senior citizens. Since many seniors are not employed and live on a fixed income, they will not benefit from the higher weekly accident benefits, yet they will be forced to pay the additional costs associated with these benefits.

Income replacement calculations: We believe that our clients will be disadvantaged by the new formula to calculate income replacement. It seems to us that if the average income for a family with two children is $45,000 and the after-tax income is $33,000, the new 90% of net income calculation will entitle the client to $29,700 annually. Under the existing Ontario motorist protection plan, the same client would be entitled to 80% of the gross income, or $36,000 annually.

Economic loss: The right to sue for economic loss has been replaced by a no-fault benefit capped at $1,000 weekly. We are concerned that the clients whose present or future income potential exceeds this threshold are disadvantaged by the proposed changes. Take, for example, a doctor in a specialty area who is in her last year of residency. Her annual income may be $40,000. The following year, her income could jump to $200,000. Under the proposed plan, she would remain uncompensated for her loss of future income.

Let's take a less extreme example. A young insurance broker two years in the business is building his client base. His income is $30,000. Over the next few years he expects to double his income as he increases his client base. Unfortunately, the proposed legislation does not allow him to sue for this future economic loss, thus placing him and his family at a distinct disadvantage.

Cabinet's power: Bill 164 gives cabinet the power to implement changes to the insurance classification plan and rating method. This bypasses the requirement for parliamentary debate or for public discussion like the one we're having here today. We are unsure how this is in the public interest or why it was introduced to the bill in the first place. We believe the Ontario Insurance Commission has the insurance expertise and that its present consultative approach with the insurance industry provides invaluable assistance in creating and maintaining the insurance system.

The government has indicated that it intends to homogenize or simplify the classification plan. We are concerned that these decisions made by cabinet without public scrutiny or input may result in substantially higher premiums for young female drivers or senior citizens.

In conclusion, we are pleased to hear the government's announcement regarding the task force on rehabilitation and long-term care benefits for those injured in automobile accidents. We think that this type of consultative approach for changes to the Ontario motorist protection plan makes good sense.

Many groups have expressed their opposition to the bill: Mothers Against Drunk Driving, The United Senior Citizens of Ontario, the Ontario Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Paraplegic Association, the Toronto Taxicab Owners and Operators Association, the Insurance Bureau of Canada. We here in Windsor would add our name to the long list of organizations opposed to the bill in its present form. We have also been asked to include our colleagues the Hamilton insurance brokers, who were not given the opportunity to appear before this committee.

We, the insurance brokers, are on the front line. We act as the liaison between the companies and the public. We have heard few complaints about the Ontario motorist protection plan and its operation. If we hear so few complaints, we are certain that the Ontario Insurance Commission is hearing even fewer. The deputy minister, Blair Tully, indicated that the government did not even take the time to survey the public to determine if the bill is necessary or wanted. We wonder why this plan is being proposed at all. We believe it's the wrong plan at the wrong time.

Thank you for the opportunity to share our thoughts today. Mr Comisso, Mr MacDonald and myself are here to answer any of your questions.

The Chair: Mr Harnick, five minutes.

Mr Harnick: I notice that in your brief you state a concern you have that the $15,000 deductible would possibly prohibit your customers from taking an action. I want some sense from you of where this line or threshold or deductible should be. I appreciate that it's pretty difficult for anybody to be precise, but would you agree with me that when one of your customers suffers an injury that could be considered serious, he should have the right to make a claim?

Mr Savage: Sure.

Mr Harnick: That's pretty basic, I would think, and I would think that in spite of the fact that you haven't heard a great deal of criticism about the OMPP, the one thing you have heard is that some of your customers have probably been involved in accidents and have found out after the fact that the right to claim has been taken away from them. Has that been your experience?

Mr John Comisso: If I may, Mr Harnick, if we assume what you're saying to be true, unfortunately the answer I'm giving you is that we're not hearing from those particular clients or customers that they're concerned or that they're upset that the existing policy does not give the right to sue. It doesn't necessarily follow automatically from your premise that there are complaints. We just don't hear them. There are three brokers here representing thousands of clients, and we're not hearing those complaints.

Mr Harnick: What I'm specifically interested in is the experience of those who have suffered accidents and have suffered serious injuries. You'll acknowledge that under the OMPP only 3% are getting through the threshold. There are 97% who aren't and, of that 97%, there are an awful lot of serious injuries. I suspect that among you three, at least some of your customers might unfortunately have been involved in an accident in which they've suffered some kind of serious injury. What's happening to these people?

Mr Bruce MacDonald: If I could make a comment, it's my experience that most of them, by and large, when they have a $600-a-week coverage, it's getting into their hands very quickly and they're pleasantly surprised at that; it's much better than the previous accident benefits schedule, and it means they don't have to wait around for a year or two or three for the litigation of the court to decide (a) if they were at fault, and (b) how much they're going to get. By and large, initially at least, they're much happier.

Mr Harnick: You see, what concerns me and what's confusing people—I don't take any objection to the fact that people who are entitled to accident benefits receive accident benefits that are reasonable, but what I really want to know from you is, in addition to the receipt of those accident benefits, if somebody suffers a serious personal injury, shouldn't they be entitled to make a claim for their pain, suffering and loss of enjoyment of life?

Mr MacDonald: Yes, I agree with that. I guess with the current threshold it's serious and permanent, and while I suppose that exact threshold is yet to be determined—there haven't been that many cases that have tested it—they still have the right to sue.

Mr Harnick: That's right, and the one thing I am concerned about is that people seem to be saying that the pain and suffering aspect is all part and parcel of the accident benefits aspect, and in reality they're two different things. They may go hand in hand, but you should get your accident benefits on a timely basis; you should get your rehab on a timely basis, but that doesn't detract from your right to get your pain and suffering and loss of enjoyment of life claim in addition to your accident benefits. Correct? One doesn't negate the other, if the injury's serious.

Mr MacDonald: I agree, and actually we as brokers support pain and suffering, and psychological trauma and those things, in some way working their way in if the injury is serious and permanent.

The Chair: Thank you. Mr Lessard.

Mr Lessard: I want to thank you, gentlemen, for taking the time out of your busy schedule to appear before the committee today. I wanted to know whether you were members of the Insurance Brokers Association of Ontario.

Mr MacDonald: Yes, I think three quarters of the brokers in the province are members of the trade association.

Mr Lessard: Are you aware of the presentation they made to the committee last week?

Mr Savage: Sure.

Mr Lessard: In that brief, it says, "We agree that some improvements are needed and we note that Bill 164 takes some positive steps towards further protecting and enhancing the interests of our clients." Would you agree with that statement?

The Chair: Wait a minute. Did you get that, Hansard?

The mike didn't go on. Would you please answer again so we can pick it up?

Mr Savage: Yes. In the affirmative.

Mr Lessard: In the bottom line of your presentation you say you wonder why the plan is being proposed at all and that it's the wrong plan at the wrong time, but that seems to contradict the submission that's made by the association.

Mr MacDonald: I think the position that Mr Savage is trying to put forward today is that we as brokers do feel that in any system there's always room for reforms that improve the current system. If it can be done in an affordable manner, we're quite in favour of that.

Our concern, from our customers' point of view, is that many of them are crying the blues about their current premiums. There are tremendous economic problems in many areas of the province. Some are not working, some are worried about being laid off, and they worry very much about their premiums going up. If we can find a way to fix some of the things that need to be tidied up—psychological trauma, pain and suffering or whatever—and still do it in an economic way that makes sense, fine, but the bottom line is that it's got to be affordable to consumers.

Mr Comisso: If I may, Mr Lessard, bring it down to a Windsor level: If an individual is looking at buying a Chrysler minivan and you ask him whether he would like the standard Chrysler minivan or the one with all the bells and whistles and options that are available to it, I don't think there's very much deliberation that has to go on. But when it gets down to the bottom line, what that individual has to pay for the Chrysler minivan and what he can afford may be two different things. While we might be in favour that perhaps there may be some enhancements included in this bill which are nice to have, it's a question of who's going to pay for them.

The Chair: Mr Ward.

Mr Ward: I'm just referring to the brief, gentlemen, so I can get an understanding. I think you mentioned that you do support the association, and it did give a presentation. Some of their suggested positive aspects of Bill 164 obviously deal with the supplementary medical benefits and the rehab. They say, "We are pleased to know that the caps of these important coverages have been removed." I'm assuming you agree that this was a positive amendment to Bill 68, in the sense that the caps are no longer there. I believe that was a concern of brokers throughout Ontario, was it not?

Mr MacDonald: I have read the report you're referring to several times, and yes, we do agree that perhaps it's a positive thing. I do think the same report refers several times to the issue of affordability in many areas, and the balance is that you have to strike the balance that works.

Mr Ward: So you also support the creation of the task force, which will look at long-term costs and ensure that the costs are contained, to a degree, where the driving public obviously can afford that particular benefit. You support the creation of that task force as well, do you not?

Mr MacDonald: Yes, both briefs do.

Mr Ward: Mr Chairman, how much more time do I have?

The Chair: You have one minute.

Mr Ward: Would you not agree, looking at the enhanced benefits, that Bill 164 will offer some type of income replacement for 97% of full-time earners compared with 73% under the OMPP, and that it ensures that the seriously injured who are not at fault get recognition for pain and suffering, which obviously is not in the OMPP? Those two in particular are positive as well, again recognizing that there are no free lunches and every enhanced benefit has a cost to it, but would you not agree that that's a positive as far as Bill 164?

Mr MacDonald: It's positive in theory. Under the current system the standard is $600 and you can buy it up. I as a broker and I think my colleagues here would join with me in saying that we've offered it to many hundreds of clients and hardly any of them buy it. The problem is that when you force it at $1,000, many people who will never ever be able to claim from it have to pay the freight: the seniors, the students or whoever.

Mr Mancini: I want to thank the association for its brief this afternoon. Gentlemen, in your brief you asked a very straightforward question that the NDP has been refusing to answer since the first day of these hearings. You asked, "Why was this bill introduced?" I think I have the answer for you. Do you know who Mel Swart is, the former NDP MPP for Welland-Thorold?

Mr MacDonald: I understand he spoke to you last week.

Mr Mancini: Can I tell you—

Interjections.

Mr Mancini: Can you control the parliamentary assistant, please?

Interjections.

Mr Mancini: Mr Swart said—and I know this hurts—"Bill 164 is before the Legislature only because after the NDP leader and members made so much fuss in opposition they couldn't be seen as doing nothing now." "They couldn't be seen as doing nothing now." That's what Mel Swart had to say in answer to your straightforward question as to why this bill is before you.

You are supporters of the road safety program?

Mr MacDonald: Definitely.

Mr Mancini: Are you aware that I and other people who have served in the role of Transportation critic for the opposition parties have more or less given our support for the road safety agency program? Are you aware of that?

Mr MacDonald: Yes.

Mr Mancini: And there is absolutely no reason for the government not to move forward with the road safety program, because we're prepared to join with them in passing this important program.

Are you aware that in the Mercer report, the government's New York consultants, when they came up with their 4.5% increase, actually factored in a road safety program that wasn't even in place? Are you aware of that?

Mr MacDonald: I think I read that somewhere, yes.

Mr Mancini: And are you aware that if they did not factor in that road safety program which does not exist, the government consultants would come up with a rate increase of not 4.5% but almost 10%? Are you aware of that?

Mr MacDonald: Yes.

Mr Mancini: Those are the facts. Are you aware that farmers, particularly farmers in Essex county who are in grave financial distress, will have to pay more to insure their vehicles? Do you insure farmers?

Mr MacDonald: Yes.

Mr Mancini: Do you think farmers are flush with money these days?

Mr MacDonald: Most of them, no.

Mr Mancini: Do you think they can afford $200 per vehicle more just for Bill 164?

Mr MacDonald: No, I do not.

Mr Mancini: Are you aware that senior citizens are going to be hammered by this legislation?

Mr MacDonald: We are.

Mr Mancini: Are you aware that after the government eliminates the age-of-driver rating factor, senior citizens in Windsor—and I want to highlight this to Mr Lessard because he failed to point it out—may face a rate increase of up to 23%?

Mr MacDonald: I don't know the exact percentage, but we're expecting seniors to get increases, yes.

Mr Callahan: I'm sure you'll hear about it.

Mr Mancini: You're expecting seniors to pay more. Do you think seniors get any benefits out of Bill 164 in exchange for these higher rates, sir?

Mr MacDonald: Not as many as other groups, no.

Mr Mancini: Are you aware that the Toronto taxi association made a presentation to this committee, and are you aware that it stated before this committee that its rates were lowered because of the Ontario motorist protection plan? Are you aware of that?

Mr Savage: Yes.

Mr Mancini: Is the taxicab business in Windsor flush with business?

Mr Savage: Certainly not.

Mr Mancini: Do you think taxi drivers, people who make that kind of money, taxi owners and people who use the taxi services are able to pay more for these services in exchange for all these grand benefits that the NDP members say we're going to get for Bill 164? Do you think the taxicab industry can pay more?

Mr Savage: No.

Mr Mancini: Would you agree with me that consumers are fed up and have had it with tax increases, with rate increases, and with everybody sticking their hands in their pocketbooks?

Mr Savage: Couldn't agree more.

Mr Mancini: Thank you. Mr Callahan, you have a minute.

Mr Callahan: I find it interesting that all the things my colleague has said, it seems to me, say that the NDP is simply bringing this in rather than public auto insurance, which is what it promised, that this is sort of a halfway measure. I think that's a lie, a lie that's being imposed on the people of Ontario, and I think people in Ontario are looking for politicians who tell the truth.

Mr Owens: Who's that? Is that you?

Mr Callahan: The parliamentary assistant says, "Who's that?" It's certainly not the parliamentary assistant or his party.

But I'd like to inquire. This morning we had a fellow, a lawyer actually, who was talking about people who had brain injuries. As you're aware—

The Chair: I'm sorry, Mr Callahan, your time is up. You only had one minute.

Mr Mancini: He was interrupted by the parliamentary assistant.

Mr Callahan: That's fine.

The Chair: Okay? Gentlemen, I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee.

You had a short question, Mr Mancini, the one day with a 10-second question. Didn't you get that one out and get an answer right back? You don't remember?

Mr Mancini: I supported Mr Callahan in asking a question.

Mr Callahan: I appreciate that. That's right.

NIGEL GILBY

The Chair: The next group to come forward is Mr Gilby. This will be for 20 minutes. You may begin.

Mr Nigel Gilby: For those of you who do not know me, my name is Nigel Gilby. I am a lawyer. I am also the chairperson of Dale Services, which is a transitional living centre for brain-injured people, and a board member of the Canadian Paraplegic Association. I am and have been for the past four years the chairperson of FAIR for regions outside of Toronto and have been active in fighting for the past four years for innocent accident victims in this province.

I'd like to say that after fighting for accident victims for the past four years, having presented accident victims before the hearings on the present OMPP, having met with the minister, Brian Charlton, personally with a number of accident victims and many other government members, including Mr David Winninger from London, I come here with no illusion of fairness to innocent accident victims. That illusion was shattered when this government failed to keep its pre-election promises to accident victims and the millions of voters like myself who voted for Bob Rae and his party because of those promises.

Instead of keeping its promises, this government has come up with a system that is universally condemned by insurers, innocent accident victims, rehabilitation specialists, members of its own caucus and its own party. I suppose that if they want to congratulate themselves for something, they have been able to find a common bond between insurers and innocent accident victims.

Having said that, I hope there is still some integrity left in this government to at least recognize the inherent problems and change them. Ten minutes is not enough time to deal with all of those problems, so I'm going to deal with only a few of the problems that I see with this legislation.

One of the biggest problems is that it is complex. If the members of this committee have read this legislation, and if they are honest with themselves, I would bet that to a man and woman they couldn't stand up and say that they understand this legislation and all that it entails or means. It is simply too complex. As a person trained to interpret legislation, whose job day in and day out is to interpret statutes, I can tell you it's a very complex piece of legislation. Imagine what the poor, untrained, innocent accident victim is going to have to deal with once this legislation is implemented.

You have to understand that individuals are going to be going up against insurance companies, and insurance companies are going to have experts, people who are well trained, who are going to represent them in mediations, arbitrations and court proceedings. There is nothing in this legislation that I've been able to see that provides for any legal counselling on the part of innocent accident victims.

When you look at section 33, it talks about financial counselling, about rehab counselling, about all sorts of counselling, but there is nothing in there for legal counselling. It may sound self-serving, but legal counselling, in my opinion, is just as important as the other counselling, because it's only through interpretation of the statute that somebody is going to understand what rights he has, what benefits he's entitled to, what rehabilitation he's entitled to.

This piece of legislation is absolutely useless if people don't know what it means and don't know how to use it. In my opinion, you have to, provide for that. All you have to do in section 33 is add to the other counselling "legal counselling." You have to provide for that. You're betraying innocent accident victims if you don't.

The other thing I'd like to talk about is death benefits. I have provided a handout—I don't know whether everybody has that or not; it's clear-faced—and I want to show you some examples. If you turn to the first tab, on fatalities, these are actuarial calculations. What they do is show the existing legislation, which is really pre-OMPP as well, because of course you have the right to sue in a fatality under the present legislation, as you did before it, and the proposed Bill 164.

I have taken people earning not a lot of income. The first example: If you take a married person, male or female, aged 30, who has a gross income of $25,000, you will see that under the present legislation that person would receive benefits of $435,000 by way of having a tort claim. Under Bill 164, that same person and his family are going to get $93,000. They've paid $340,000 for this piece of legislation.

Example 2: A married male or female, aged 40, income of $50,000—we're not talking large incomes; these are the blue-collar, union workers who are making that kind of money, who have supported this government for years—$623,000 with the right to sue; $149,000 is all the family's going to get under Bill 164. They're getting ripped off for $450,000.

The last example: A male or female, aged 55, with an income of $35,000; $396,000 if they have the right to sue, $97,000 under this legislation. It's cost that family $300,000.

What's even more abhorrent is that you do not have any exclusion for people who drink and drive or are impaired under part X. So what you've got is a drunk driver coming through a stop sign who kills himself and another person, and the drunk driver is going to get the same or potentially better benefits for his family than the family of the innocent accident victim. What this legislation is doing is saying to the families of people who are killed by drunk drivers, "Not only are we going to take away your husbands and take away your income, we're going to pay it to the guy who killed your husband."

Mr Kormos: Drunks win and victims lose.

Mr Gilby: Exactly. Let's talk about the $15,000 deductible. I have attached, at the next tab on damages, some examples from Goldsmith, and as my friend Mr Winnerger will be able to tell you, as a lawyer, that is an authoritative text that deals with personal injury claims for pain and suffering damages. In fact, it is put out and used by the insurers throughout Canada.

We are not talking about damages in this country that are massive, like you read about in the United States. The first example: It's a 1988 case. The person had an amputation of his leg. They get $100,000 for pain and suffering. Anybody here going to say he'll give up his leg for $100,000? Yet you're going to penalize them, not only on the basis that it's not a huge award but by taking $15,000 away from them.

Look at the second example, A 14-year-old who had a laceration on her right forehead of two to three inches, permanent scarring. She had a knee injury that prevented her from participating at school in team activities and is going to be dealing with that problem for the rest of her life: $16,000. You're going to give her $1,000. No action is going to be pursued for $1,000. It absolutely would never be warranted.

The case of Giannone is a six-year-old girl who had a compound fracture of her arm. It was cast improperly. The result was she got gangrene. She had to have her arm amputated. A six-year-old girl under our present damages gets $125,000. You're going to take $15,000 away from that little girl.

The construction worker, aged 46, had a fracture of his left femur, shoulder injury, fractured ribs, an injury to his lower back. It required the insertion and removal of a rod, and it required a bone graft. The court found that he would be unable to return to his old job, which was one requiring heavy labour. The court awarded him for pain and suffering $15,000. You're going to take $15,000 away from him and I can go on and on.

If you look at the example of Le and Tang, 1992—I mean, I'm not picking cases from the 1960s and 1970s here. We're talking current cases. A 23-year-old seasonal fisherman suffered a broken nose, a fracture of his left zygoma, which is the bone in the eye, a cut on the left temple and had a closed head injury and a perforation of the small bowel. The court found that he would have ongoing pain, difficulty breathing, blurred vision in his left eye, pain in the area of the cheekbone and left temple, sharp pain in the stomach: $22,000. You're going to give that person $7,000. I mean, you really should be ashamed of it.

I want to also talk about one last thing, and that deals with the idea of first-party insurance. If you're going to bring this legislation in, at least provide for a specific stated piece of legislation that says individuals can buy—whether you want to call it an endorsement or a rider on the policy—additional coverage to cover those economic losses they are going to suffer. Insurers will price it out on the basis that they've always priced it out and that is to make some profit on it. Individuals will be able to buy it and will be able to at least have some additional protection. I've also provided you with a paper from the professor that deals with a number of examples of people who are going to be severely disadvantaged.

My friends before me talked about examples, such as the person who is in medical school and about to graduate, the person who is starting off in the brokerage business, the person who is just starting off in farming. This legislation freezes life. It takes a picture of life backwards for one year and says that's the way things were always going to be and always will be and that's how we'll compensate. Well, that's not reality because people's incomes go up, people's incomes go down and people progress through certain stages. A person at 55 is in a far different situation in terms of income than a person at 23 or 24 just starting off, and you're penalizing them.

The paper I have provided to you is the paper by Douglas Welland, so if I can recap before any questions I would ask that you provide for the right to legal counsel. It has to be there. Without it people are going to be victimized once again. If you're going to leave this legislation, you've got to do something with the fatality section. It's a farce, really it is, when you think about any member and the income that you earn if you were killed and what your family would get. You have to do something about the $15,000 deductible. Given what else you're taking away from people, it is far too punitive.

This legislation is so complex. I do agree and I do support what the insurers say in regard to the fact that you're going to have three systems going. You've got pre-OMPP, you've got people falling under OMPP and people who will fall under this new legislation. There is going to be a bureaucratic nightmare in the insurance companies of this province. Unfortunately, it is going to put pressure to put premiums up.

Mr Winninger: It's always a pleasure to hear from you, Mr Gilby. At one point during your—

Mr Mancini: It sure is.

Mr Winninger: I'm sorry; I don't want a repeat of this morning when I take my few minutes allotted and I get constant interruptions. You mentioned that this plan has been universally condemned. I suggest you might want to talk to Judge Killeen in London who calls this plan the best in North America. He claims to have adjudicated 700 jury trials.

Mr Gilby: He may be the only one then.

Mr Harnick: Why doesn't he come before the committee and tell us then.

Mr Winninger: He did testify before the Slater committee. I would suggest also that if the regulation is too complex—I'm sorry, Mr Chair.

The Chair: Address the Chair. Don't address the opposition.

Mr Winninger: If the regulation is too complex, maybe people who can't afford to retain a lawyer would be able to avail themselves of legal aid in circumstances where they need advice on their policy. But I'd like to cut to the chase here, if I may. You presented many cases here under your damages brief which were foreclosed under OMPP. I think we should be clear on that.

Mr Gilby: Not all of them, but some of them.

Mr Winninger: Death benefits, yes; but most of the others, no.

Mr Gilby: Quadriplegia, loss of legs, no; I would hope those would fit under OMPP.

Mr Winninger: What I'd like to do is draw your attention back to a case that you just had adjudicated—

The Chair: You have about 30 seconds.

Mr Winninger: Where did all the time go?

You had a case in 1987. It went to trial in 1992: Hutchins and Nevin, innocent passenger in his own car. Case dismissed, $14,000 loss of income, which represented half your claim for the differential in income over those years, assessed at 25% contributory negligence. What did he get out of the tort system?

Mr Gilby: Can I answer that question? Number one, that case is under appeal, and you're being unfair when you don't indicate what the facts of that were. That was a case where the defence that was put forward was a defence of insanity. The driver of the car at the time was insane and could not have had civil culpability. The reason that case was decided that way was because of an Ontario Court of Appeal decision from the 1940s which, until the Court of Appeal adjudicates on this case, was and still is the law of this province. You're picking an isolated example—

Mr Winninger: I only had 30 seconds. I think there's somebody there—

The Chair: Mr Mancini.

Mr Mancini: Mr Callahan would like to take the floor.

Mr Callahan: I find it strange that Mr Winninger is asking the questions he's asking, because as I recall in the election, he and his party were behind full tort legislation.

Mr Kormos: You've got it, and it still is.

Mr Callahan: In any event—

Mr Gilby: That's why I voted for them, anyway.

Mr Callahan: That's why a lot of people voted for them. But I'd like to ask you—you talked about brain-injured people. Can you tell me, from your experience, how many facilities there are in the province of Ontario to treat brain injuries?

Mr Gilby: For services like Dale Services, of which I'm the chairperson, there is the one in London, there is one in Kingston, and I believe there's the one in Hamilton. There are about four.

Mr Callahan: All right. Fairly limited.

Mr Gilby: Yes.

Mr Callahan: So it's going to require this government to come up with a significant amount of additional facilities. Do you think that their changes in the long-term care provisions are going to help these people?

Mr Gilby: They're not going to help them if they don't understand what their rights are and don't have any opportunity to ascertain what their rights are, no. This legislation, without effective representation, is useless.

Mr Callahan: I'm more specifically concerned about the question of approximately $100 per day. That will not deal with a person who has a serious brain injury.

Mr Gilby: Yes, the $3,000 a month. You will not get attendant care taken care of for that kind of money. They will be institutionalized.

Mr Callahan: Okay, the final question—

The Chair: Mr Tilson.

Mr Callahan: Oh, now, come on.

Interjections.

The Chair: Mr Tilson.

Mr Tilson: Mr Chairman, thank you. I'd like to ask the parliamentary assistant to comment on Mr Gilby's second major concern, and that is the issue of fatality, the illustration particularly, which I think is an excellent example, and what his ministry plans to do about resolving that unbelievable discrepancy.

Mr Owens: Which case was this?

Mr Gilby: The tab under "Fatalities"; the three examples that I gave.

Mr Tilson: If he can't, perhaps Mr Winninger could comment on it. I'm just interested in what the government plans to do with an issue that I think is quite real and quite a concern to the people of Ontario.

Mr Winninger: I think the protocol with—

Mr Harnick: This is like a ping-pong game here.

Mr Tilson: Whoever wants to answer it.

Mr Harnick: Somebody should justify this government position.

Mr Owens: I would ask ministry staff to respond.

Mr Harnick: Now it's staff, passing it off to the ministry staff.

Mr Mancini: It's a political decision.

Mr Tilson: I'm interested in the political decision.

Mr Harnick: "After you, Alphonse."

Mr Callahan: I think it's a marvellous brief. It points out the real inefficiency.

Mr Tilson: My time is going, Mr Chairman. Let's try the first question, if no one's prepared to answer that one.

Mr Mancini: The parliamentary assistant should give us an answer. He's here representing the minister.

The Chair: This is the gentleman asking the question: Mr Tilson.

Mr Callahan: Let's send it to Switzerland for an answer.

Mr Tilson: My time's flying. Let's try another question.

The Chair: Okay, I've given you that time, adding it on. So just carry on.

Mr Tilson: All right, I'm going to try the other question, because that's the one that's been raised more frequently; that is the issue of the complexity of this legislation and what the innocent accident victim is going to do. You've taken away the whole issue of the legal people, and you've explained all that. The question is—and this has been raised in almost every delegation that has come forward, and Mr Gilby has certainly made an excellent presentation on that point—who is going to provide the legal counselling to the innocent accident victim?

Mr Owens: In terms of the advocacy question, there are a couple of things that will happen. First of all, as Mr Winninger indicated this morning, the Advocacy Commission is in the process of being set up. The Substitute Decisions Act has been passed.

The second leg of this answer is that the ministry is studying ways to provide advocacy to victims, which may or may not include—

Mr Callahan: You guys are out of business. That's it. You're done; you're out of business. They're going to have advocates do this.

1450

The Chair: Wait a minute.

Mr Callahan: Sorry, Mr Chair, I was just getting back a few of the seconds—

Mr Owens: We are entertaining submissions through various advocacy organizations such as ARCH, and the best system will be worked out.

Mr Tilson: Quite remarkable.

The Chair: I'm sorry, the time has run out.

Mr Tilson: I thought it might.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee.

Mr Harnick: A point of order, Mr Chairman.

The Chair: Okay, a point of order.

Mr Harnick: The parliamentary assistant says that there's more here being worked out. My understanding is that we have—

The Chair: I don't think it's a—

Mr Harnick: No, it's a point of order. I want you to hear it to the end and then rule. The least you could do is give me the courtesy of listening till you rule me out of order.

The Chair: Okay.

Mr Harnick: The fact of the matter is, we are here examining Bill 164. We're also here examining the regulations. Now I hear the parliamentary assistant telling me that there's more coming and there's more being worked out. What's going on here? Do we have the bill and the regulations in front of us? Are there more coming? What's going on here, Mr Chairman?

Mr Winninger: Are you writing the rules of order, Charles?

Mr Harnick: What's going on here? I thought we had everything in front of us. Now I hear from the parliamentary assistant that there's more coming.

To me, that's a very valid point of order. What are we going to about this, Mr Chair? Are we going to hold the bill up and wait till the rest of it comes so that we can resume these deliberations?

The Chair: For one thing, we're dealing with the bill, not with the regulations.

Mr Harnick: The minister certainly laid the regulations before us and the minister in his speech spoke extensively—

The Chair: Okay, I'm going to rule on that—

Mr Harnick: Let me finish.

The Chair: No—

Mr Harnick: You just raised the regulations. Surely—

The Chair: You're debating with the Chair.

Mr Harnick: No, surely I have a chance to respond. The minister made a speech and referred to those regulations. Is there more coming?

The Chair: Okay, we are not going to debate it. We have other witnesses coming forward. If you want to discuss this with the Chair after and with the parliamentary assistant, fine.

Mr Harnick: We heard what the parliamentary assistant—

The Chair: Okay, I excuse you, sir, and thank you for coming.

Mr Gilby: Thank you, and I hope that more than lipservice will be paid to these comments.

Mr Callahan: I hope so too, but don't hold your breath.

WILSON, WALKER, HOCHBERG, SLOPEN

The Chair: The next group to come forward is Wilson, Walker, Hochberg, Slopen.

We got a call this morning that the London Chamber of Commerce has cancelled out, so this is why we're going to the next group.

I'd like to welcome you before the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. We have one half-hour.

Mr James H. Cooke: My name is James Cooke and I'm an associate member of the firm of Wilson, Walker, Hochberg, Slopen, a firm that represents persons disabled as a result of injuries in the workplace through slip and falls, product liability, medical malpractice and automobile accidents.

Although our clients come from a varied background, the one thing they have in common is that they have experienced a traumatic event in their lives and for the most part they are in a very vulnerable state.

Our role as lawyers is to make our clients' lives whole again after a very traumatic event. As lawyers, we are there to ensure that they are expertly represented and that in making their claim they stand on an equal footing with Ontario's large private insurance companies.

I'm also, as many of you know, related to Dave Cooke, who's my brother and a member of the Ontario government. As difficult as it is for me, as a lawyer representing disabled persons I must oppose both the proposed reforms and the current system that is now in place.

I am not going to go through a lot of what my very able colleagues have indicated are the problems with this legislation. I'd like to focus on one specific area and that is the question of equality of power between victims of accidents and private insurance companies, something which I think is a very serious flaw both in the current and proposed systems.

Automobile insurance was originally created by individuals who are able to afford automobiles but require protection from the potential devastating result of being negligent in an automobile accident and finding that they're liable to an innocent victim for a large sum of damages. When compulsory automobile insurance was introduced, it was recognized in Ontario that all victims of accidents should have access to a stable and large pool of funds to compensate them as a result of someone else's negligence. Any proposed system of auto insurance can protect the negligent driver. Provided that there is a pool of funds which is available to him to compensate a victim, it really doesn't matter what system is in place. The only problem with insurance and insurance reform is ensuring that victims are adequately compensated.

In my respectful view, there is no public interest in a system of automobile insurance which merely protects the so-called right to drive and sacrifices the goal of adequately compensating innocent victims. The goal, especially of this government's automobile insurance reform, should be a system of adequate compensation that makes the victim whole within a system of insurance available to responsible driving adults. No system of automobile insurance will be affordable to all persons. That's simply a fact of life, as no automobile is affordable to all persons.

As a lawyer, I'd like to explain to some of you who may not be fully aware of what it takes to prosecute a claim on behalf of a victim of any tort, but especially a motor vehicle accident. What is required is, first of all, competent medical specialists to assess a victim's injuries. These specialists are often orthopaedic surgeons, psychiatrists, neurologists or neuropsychiatrists.

Secondly, these experts often are required to prepare detailed medical reports after a detailed medical examination. Those reports are then used as evidence in court proceedings or hearings before, under the current system, mediators or arbitrators.

Thirdly, rehabilitation specialists are required in order to assess the future potential of the accident victim in the workplace.

Finally, especially under the proposed system, an economist or actuary is required in order to put some numbers to the proposed or the potential economic loss of the victim.

Without these tools—without specialists, without medical reports and without the assistance of economists—the victim of the accident cannot and will not be properly represented.

Lawyers have a very significant role to play in the representation of innocent accident victims and at-fault accident victims under the current and proposed system. Unfortunately, one of the things the lawyers have to do is deal with the myriad of regulations under the no-fault benefits schedule, under the former schedule C of no-fault benefits and under the proposed no-fault benefits schedule.

I've had to deal with all three and still do, and I must frankly say that the worst of the three is the proposed no-fault benefits schedule. It is a 67-page regulation which I can honestly say I've read for the 11th time today and I still don't understand it, and I've been practising law for seven years. I have colleagues of mine in my firm who have practised law for in excess of 20 years and they can't understand the regulations at all. It is impossible to expect that any layperson will be able to understand the proposed regulations.

There is also in place, and will be preserved, a complicated dispute resolution system with uncertain limitation periods which require consultation with lawyers.

Finally, under the proposed system there will be a proposed $15,000 deductible from non-pecuniary damages, which requires a significant input from a lawyer as a victim must be advised whether it is economically justified to bring a lawsuit against the tortfeasor.

Lawyers are able to assist their clients through the proposed regulatory nightmare. I hope they will. Perhaps after 20 readings of the regulation, I might finally understand it. They are able to advise their clients of the advisability of bringing a claim for non-pecuniary damages. Most importantly, under the former system lawyers were able to financially assist innocent victims with their disbursements and legal costs pending the resolution of the tort action.

Under the current and proposed system, I would like you to imagine the current or any Ontario government decertifying every single bargaining unit in Ontario and outlawing permanently trade unions. Former members of trade unions would become, in effect, powerless against what are typically large and powerful employers. In my opinion, the current and proposed system of insurance reform has decertified victims of accidents.

The plain truth of the matter is that it is not economically justifiable for lawyers to represent victims or for victims to retain lawyers under the current and proposed system. Whereas under the former tort system the cost of prosecuting a claim would be paid out of a lump sum award of damages and costs, there will be no pool of capital to fund the costs of prosecuting a claim on behalf of innocent accident victims under the new and current system.

In those circumstances, the odds are stacked against innocent victims. Limited periodic payments set at an arbitrary level and made in fewer cases can't possibly pay for the significant capital outlay required to properly represent innocent victims of accidents. Lawyers being businessmen, and practical businessmen I hope, will no longer fund these disbursements because they risk never being compensated for their capital outlay in the event that the award cannot cover the cost of disbursements.

Non-pecuniary damages, under the old tort system, were typically a very small component in the overall damage award in respect of the clients I represented who were for the most part very seriously injured and permanently disabled from the workplace. Now, with an arbitrary $15,000 deductible in respect of the personal damage award and a $5,000 deductible in respect of the Family Law Act award and the outright prohibition of making any claim for economic loss against the at-fault driver, it will no longer be economically justifiable to represent most victims of accidents.

Lawyers, my colleagues in Windsor, are already leaving this particular area of practice and entering other areas of practice which are economically justifiable both from the lawyer's point of view and from the client's point of view. Even those victims whose non-pecuniary damages exceed the $15,000 deductible—and that is a matter of guesswork in some cases—will not obtain proper representation, as the return on the required outlay cannot possibly be justified from the client's point of view.

In other words, a client who may be entitled to a non-pecuniary award of approximately $25,000 will go unrepresented as an award of $10,000 cannot possibly cover the disbursements and legal fees which must be incurred in order to collect that amount. Insurance companies are going to know this, and it is my view that the insurance companies are not going to be inclined to settle these borderline claims, as many in the government and those who support the legislation have indicated.

The sad truth is that under the current and proposed system most innocent victims are going to go unrepresented, or if they are represented, they will be represented by laypersons or persons claiming expertise in this area without having the formal and important training that lawyers have. In effect, they will be left, metaphorically, to collectively beg, as are workers who are non-unionized, for benefits from a large, private bureaucracy whose only goal is to maximize their employer's profit.

Under the former tort system, despite all its faults, and I must say many of them were administrative and the fault of the government itself, both the former and the current government and the federal government—ie, inadequate numbers of judges and court staff—the court was a level playing field between the innocent victim and a large insurance company. The skills of the defence counsel and the plaintiff's counsel were basically the same, and with the access to a lawyer's floating loan account which could fund disbursements, they were fairly equal in terms of the amount of money they could spend on prosecuting a claim as well.

Under the proposed and current regime, the level playing field is gone. Now victims are going to be left on their own. They are left on their own and have been disempowered. Metaphorically speaking, this government and the former government have decertified accident victims.

In conclusion, one of the stated goals of this government has been to redistribute power more fairly in society. The government has taken many concrete steps towards that laudable goal, and I'm thinking in particular of the labour law reforms and other reforms in the areas of pay equity and employment equity. In many instances, the government has been unfairly criticized by what I would call career politicians unwilling to accept the legitimacy of the current government.

As I have stated in my written statement, I do not question the motivation of this government in establishing the proposed reforms. I think there's a genuine belief that these are an improvement from the current and former system. On paper, they may appear to be a substantial improvement from the current plan. However, the sad fact is that this plan does not live up to the government's goal of redistributing power more fairly in society. The proposed plan disempowers one of the weakest groups in society, innocent victims of accidents.

I ask all the members of this committee—and it doesn't appear that you can, but if you could—to put aside your partisan differences and cease using victims of accidents as political pawns. I ask you to sincerely consider the valid criticisms of the current and proposed plan which have been put forth by my colleagues and myself, and I especially wish to address the members of the current government, many of whom I am personally acquainted with. I ask, I beg of this government to live up to its potential and to meet its goals and restore the level playing field to victims of accidents.

Mr Mancini: I hardly know where to start. I'd like to say to Mr Cooke that I deeply resent your accusation that some of us are using accident victims as political footballs. The Ontario motorist protection plan was introduced well before the election, and the electorate knew what the plan was and had a choice to decide whether or not to support that plan and the political people who introduced that plan, as Mr Nigel Gilby said just before you sat down.

He voted for that government because it made three specific promises on automobile insurance. They promised government-owned automobile insurance, and they broke that promise, Mr Cooke. They promised full tort, and they broke that promise, Mr Cooke. They promised lower automobile insurance rates, and they broke that promise.

If you're concerned about people not keeping their political promises and if you're concerned about people using accident victims as political footballs, I'd advise you not to look in this direction. Our policy, whether you like it or not, was in place before the election, and you had the choice before the election to decide whether or not you agreed with that plan. You and other people like you listened to promises that you liked, and those men and women sitting across the aisle from us didn't deliver.

Mr James H. Cooke: Do you have a question, Mr Mancini?

Mr Mancini: Yes, Mr Cooke, there is a question.

Mr James H. Cooke: I wish you wouldn't make a speech on my time. I've taken quite a bit of time to prepare this statement, and what I don't need is some pathetic attempt by a member of a failed and incompetent government to justify a sellout to the insurance companies that, I might add, nearly resulted in your losing your seat.

Mr Mancini: I might add, Mr Cooke, that—

Mr James H. Cooke: We've all made our judgement on your government, Mr Mancini. Would you please ask me a question or let somebody else ask me a question.

Mr Mancini: Mr Cooke, you used your time the way you wanted to. The Chair has allocated me a certain number of minutes, which I will use in the manner that I see best fit.

Mr James H. Cooke: The people watching this committee and listening to you, Mr Mancini, are fed up with your type of politicians, and this is exactly what I'm talking about. You're trying to make political points off me, sir. Why don't you just ask a question?

Mr Mancini: Mr Cooke, you are the one who has tried to make all the political points. You've delivered the most political brief of any group, individual or organization that's been before this committee, and you are the person in your brief who accused members of this committee of using accident victims as political footballs. You made that accusation. I have not accused the government members of that. I was not going to bring this matter up until you accused me and my colleagues of that particular action. You should be ashamed of yourself.

The Chair: Mr Mancini, I'm sorry, don't badger the presenter.

Mr Mancini: Don't badger the presenter?

The Chair: You are.

Mr Callahan: I didn't see you intervene when he was badgering the member, Mr Chairman. Be independent. You're supposed to be independent.

The Chair: Okay, go ahead. I'll let Mr Mancini carry on here. You've got one minute more.

Mr Mancini: He has sat there and insulted members of the opposition since the moment he sat down, and if he thinks he can use this platform to protect his brother and his government, he's sadly mistaken.

Mr James H. Cooke: Oh, that is pathetic. You should be ashamed of yourself, Mr Mancini.

Mr Mancini: You should look in the mirror, Mr Cooke.

Interjection: It's more than most members do to come here and say what he did.

Mr James H. Cooke: You should be ashamed of yourself and you know what, Mr Mancini—

Mr Mancini: Mr Cooke, in your time—

Mr James H. Cooke: Will you please let me finish, sir.

Mr Mancini: In your time, Mr Cooke—

Mr James H. Cooke: Sir, I'm paying your salary to be down here. Would you please let me finish.

Mr Mancini: You made not one mention of the road safety program that the government promised; you made no mention of that.

Mr Cooke: I'm not going through your litany of questions, Mr Mancini.

1510

Mr Mancini: You made not one mention of rate increases that people can't afford to pay; you made not one mention, Mr Cooke, of the increase in rates for senior citizens, of the increase in rates for women, and all of these other things that are affecting people. All you wanted to do was accuse the opposition of badgering or not looking after accident victims. That's what you used your time for.

Mr James H. Cooke: In answer to your question, Mr Mancini, that great quote from Shakespeare, "Methinks he doth protest too much."

Mr Mancini: You're the one who protested too much. We read your brief, Mr Cooke.

The Chair: Mr Harnick.

Mr Harnick: Mr Cooke, I appreciate your coming here today. It was a very courageous thing that you've done in light of who your brother is.

Interjection: Particularly courageous, I'd say.

Mr Harnick: Quite frankly, I like your brief and I think there's a lot of food for thought in this brief. What I want to talk about—because you are obviously a person who the people sitting opposite me may listen to and may have some respect for—I want you to explain, if you can, this idea of melding tort and no-fault.

One of the things—and I'm accused of it every day by my friends opposite because I also make a living the same way you make a living, helping innocent accident victims who've been involved in car accidents. I try to get them as much money as I can to put them back in the position they would be in had they not had the accident. My friends think that what I'm doing for innocent accident victims is somewhat illicit; it's wrong to try to get them back to where they might have been had the accident not happened. They think that because I believe in that system, you can't have a belief in no-fault at the same time, that you can't have a belief in melding these two functions and at the same time ensuring that the innocent accident victim has the opportunity to claim everything he lost.

They won't listen to me and they won't listen to any of the other witnesses. Maybe they'll listen to you if you explain to them what this is really all about.

Mr James H. Cooke: I read and believed in the then opposition New Democratic paper called Highway Robbery. There was a very nice metaphor used in there, and that is that you don't get caviar if you're only willing to fork out enough money for hot dogs or something to that effect. I know it talked about groceries.

What Highway Robbery proposed was a no-fault and tort system combined that provides adequate compensation not only to innocent victims but to those victims who are also at fault because, after all, the victims who are at fault require some sort of stabilization in their lives as well. They too, while they may have been at fault in the accident, are victims of a tragedy in their lives. No one is suggesting that at-fault drivers are in any way intentionally trying to cause an accident. They go out there and something terrible has occurred and, as a result, their lives are destroyed as well.

I might add, as a representative of accident victims, I very often represent people who are at fault. Just last year, before Christmas, I spent an entire day driving out to Chatham representing a young hockey player who, unfortunately through his own fault, got seriously injured in an accident as a pedestrian. I represented him before the Social Assistance Review Board, I might add, at no cost to him.

I think most personal injury lawyers are concerned about adequately compensating all victims of accidents. But the fact is that innocent victims of accidents shouldn't have to pay in order to adequately compensate at-fault victims of accidents. As Highway Robbery stated, if it's explained in a rational and calm fashion, as many of the policies of the current government have to be explained, people in Ontario will be willing to pay increased benefits for more adequate coverage, just as we're willing to pay more for better-tasting groceries, as they said in Highway Robbery.

Mr Harnick: Wasn't Bob Rae the author of Highway Robbery?

Mr James H. Cooke: Yes.

The Chair: I'm sorry, I've got to cut you off. Mr Owens.

Mr Harnick: Can we file Highway Robbery as an exhibit to this committee? May I do that, Mr Clerk?

Mr Owens: I'm being interrupted.

Mr Harnick: Mr Clerk, may I do that?

The Chair: You can file it up here with the clerk.

Mr Harnick: I'd like to file Highway Robbery, submissions to the Honourable Mr Justice Coulter A. Osborne, commissioner, presented by Bob Rae and Mel Swart, MPPs representing the New Democratic Party.

Mr Owens: Mr Chair, I'm being interrupted.

The Chair: Mr Harnick, will you give it to the clerk?

Mr Harnick: It's got the New Democratic logo right there.

Mr Winner: On a point of order, Mr Chair: I hope this doesn't cut into the government's time.

Mr Harnick: You can have all the time you like.

The Chair: Mr Owens.

Mr Harnick: Take all the time you like.

Mr Owens: I'm being interrupted, Chair.

The Chair: Mr Harnick.

Mr Harnick: Yes, sir.

The Chair: You know, I came close this morning to calling a recess and having a little talk with you.

Mr Harnick: Close only counts in horseshoes.

Mr Owens: I'm being interrupted, Chair.

The Chair: Go ahead, Mr Owens.

Mr Owens: Thank you, Chair.

I'd like to thank you for your presentation. You presented an interesting perspective this afternoon: counsel as businessperson, rather than the heroes that some of my friends opposite want to portray personal injury counsel as. My question to you, sir—

Mr Harnick: Pardon me. Who said that?

Mr Owens: I'm being interrupted.

Mr Harnick: On a point of privilege, Mr Chairman.

The Chair: What's your point of privilege?

Mr Harnick: My point of privilege is that I have been maligned by the parliamentary assistant and I want him to withdraw those last comments.

Mr Mancini: Mr Chairman, on the same point of order: I have been sitting in these hearings since the first moment that these hearings commenced. I cannot recall one member of the opposition even insinuating what the parliamentary assistant has stated, and I would support my colleague and ask him to withdraw that comment.

Mr Winner: Mr Chair, on a point of order: Yesterday—

Mr Harnick: Will you deal with my point of personal privilege first? I raised the point of personal privilege and I want you to rule on it first. You can't start doing something else. I have the floor.

Ms Haack: A point of order outweighs your personal privilege.

Mr Harnick: No, it doesn't.

Ms Haack: Yes, it does.

Mr Harnick: No, it doesn't.

Ms Haeck: A point of order, please.

Mr Harnick: I want him to withdraw that remark.

Ms Haeck: A point of order.

Mr Winninger: Point of order.

The Chair: I haven't got the record in front of me to read—

Mr Paul R. Johnson (Prince Edward-Lennox-South Hastings): Did you withdraw yours yesterday, Charles?

Mr Harnick: Which one?

Mr Johnson: The liar one.

The Chair: Wait a minute, Mr Johnson.

Mr Harnick: You didn't ask me to, because you obviously agreed with me.

Mr Johnson: I said it was unparliamentary.

The Chair: Turn the mikes off. A recess for five minutes.

The committee recessed at 1517 and resumed at 1526.

The Chair: Mr Harnick.

Mr Harnick: Go ahead and call me all the names you like. I'm withdrawing my point of privilege.

The Chair: I listened to the tape. Your name wasn't mentioned. It might have been eye contact.

Mr Harnick: Oh, I know my name wasn't mentioned. He was looking right at me, that's right.

The Chair: Okay, eye contact. Thanks a lot. We can carry on.

Mr Harnick: For all my transgressions, I ask forgiveness.

The Chair: We've got five minutes. Mr Owens.

Mr Owens: Just in terms of your comments respecting the courtrooms as a level playing field, how would you see them as a level playing field, when under the former system our calculation is that somewhere in the neighbourhood of only 5% of those who qualify break through the threshold and 95% of victims don't qualify, and those who actually get into court may or may not win? So how is that a level playing field, and why would you not describe that as a minefield?

Mr James H. Cooke: I am not suggesting that the OMPP was a level playing field. In fact, for the majority of innocent accident victims, it wasn't. What I'm suggesting is that the system that was in place before OMPP was a level playing field, and when clients are expertly advised and capable lawyers are able to look at the facts of the case, they are more than able to assess the degree of fault and expertly advise their clients as to what they can expect in the courtroom.

When you're facing a lawyer or a firm, I might add, without bragging, of our calibre—I can tell you that our firm is on a par with any firm that defends insurance companies from legitimate claims of innocent accident victims. It's the only place where victims are going to get a fair hearing, because they're represented by people who equalize, just the way that unions equalize workers with their employers.

Mr Owens: In response to a question from Mr Tilson with respect to advocacy, I indicated that the government is currently entertaining submissions on how advocacy can be given to those in the system as they work their way through. Do you have any suggestions in terms of the kind of language you would like to see in the regulation with respect to advocacy? Do you see the reg needing to be more directive or do you see the reg needing to be more general in nature?

Mr James H. Cooke: I think that if you're going to try to regulate the advocacy system, you should talk to the victims of industrial accidents, because if you talk to any victims of an industrial accident and you ask them if they'd rather have me represent them or the worker adviser, or have any other lawyer who represents victims of accidents represent them as opposed to the worker adviser, 99% of the time, when they're making an informed decision, they will choose a lawyer.

If you attempt to regulate the advocacy system, you'll regulate it out of existence and accident victims will be even worse off. Lawyers are self-regulated. We've been doing this for a long, long time and we don't need more regulation. Members of the public have been crying out for less regulation of their private lives, and I've urged the government not to interfere with what is a sacred relationship between a client and her lawyer.

Mr Owens: How do you propose the system deal with those victims who lose in court?

Mr James H. Cooke: Hopefully, you will retain a substantial degree of the accident benefits you already have, but if a victim is innocent and has been injured as a result of someone else's negligence, he ought not to lose in court. I can't speak hypothetically. If someone should have won in court and has lost, there are other recourses as well. But innocent victims, to my knowledge, do not lose in court when I represent them.

The Chair: Thank you for appearing before the committee today. I know your brother sometimes—the name Cooke gets hostility in the House also.

Mr James H. Cooke: If I could add one thing that I've told the media here, this has nothing to do with my brother. I'm not here as Dave Cooke's brother; I'm here as a representative of innocent accident victims.

The Chair: Yes, I understand.

Mr James H. Cooke: I don't want anybody to use this against my brother who, I think, has done an excellent job.

The Chair: Okay, thank you.

The next group to come forward is the Essex County Chiropractic Association.

Interjection.

The Chair: What's that? Can you call them in?

Interjection.

The Chair: They're not here now; they're downstairs.

Interjection: Let's take a short recess.

The Chair: Okay, we've got time because one group didn't come. We'll take a 10-minute recess.

The committee recessed at 1533 and resumed at 1540.

ESSEX COUNTY CHIROPRACTIC SOCIETY

The Chair: Our recess is over and I see that we have the Essex County Chiropractic Society present before us. I'd like to welcome you to this committee. It's been awful warm in this room this afternoon, so that's why we've got the door open. We have one half-hour. In that half-hour, if you can leave some time at the end of your presentation for members of the committee to ask questions, you may begin. Please identify yourselves for the purposes of Hansard also.

Dr Madeline Crnec: Good afternoon. My name is Dr Madeline Crnec. I am a chiropractor here in Windsor and the immediate past president of the Essex County Chiropractic Society. With me is Dr Jan Kempe. He also practises in Windsor and he is the chair of the Ontario Chiropractic Association insurance committee. Many relevant cases pass by his desk every day in the course of his duties in that position.

The Essex County Chiropractic Society is a regional branch of the Ontario Chiropractic Association and represents the chiropractors here in Windsor and in the county of Essex. In this brief submission, the society wishes to address the proposed auto insurance reforms found in Bill 164.

The society is encouraged by several of the proposals therein which are consistent with the multidisciplinary approach fostered in the new Regulated Health Professions Act, 1991, specifically section 44 and section 47 of the statutory accidents benefits schedule which deal with initial and ongoing certification of disability, respectively. These proposals are further supported by the recommendations made by the Osborne inquiry into motor vehicle accident compensation in 1988. Those recommendations are attached to the submission you've been given.

These proposed changes would rectify a great injustice which has discriminated against accident victims who have chosen chiropractic treatment as a right, but who were required by insurers to obtain medical certification for benefits. The hardship arose if, and oftentimes when, the medical certification for chiropractic treatment was unjustly withheld.

It seems imminently more appropriate that the capacity to issue disability certification should encompass chiropractors, dentists, optometrists, psychologists, as it is now proposed, allowing for a more accurate evaluation of these specialized areas of health care.

The society is also in support of the multidisciplinary approach being encouraged in Part VIII, the rehabilitation benefits, section 33, "case management related to the design and coordination of a rehabilitation plan." This would allow, again, a multidisciplinary approach to rehabilitation.

It is now well documented in many fields that soft tissue and joint injuries most commonly sustained in auto accidents respond most effectively to active therapy and to early rehabilitation measures. This coordinated approach is not only cost-effective in the long run for the insurer, but will serve to limit the suffering and loss of quality of life and productivity for the accident victim. Increasing emphasis on this aspect of care must result in a win-win situation for both insurer and accident victim.

A concern which has been raised by the members of this society, as well as in other circles of our profession, is the issue of collateral benefits as it impacts on chiropractic care. Chiropractic is unique in the medicare scheme of Ontario in that there is a modest annual dollar ceiling placed on the services provided. Patients who are involved in auto accidents must exhaust their annual allotment for chiropractic care before the insurer pays for the full fee for service.

This significantly disadvantages patients who are accident victims who, once recovered from an accident injury, develop some other uninsured problem for which no medicare coverage remains. In effect, this allows the chiropractic patient only one problem a year, including the possibility of an auto accident.

Considering the percentage of Ontario accident victims who seek chiropractic care and considering the unique financial arrangement that chiropractic patients have with OHIP, it is our contention that it would be a modest financial impact—maximum allowed under the OHIP plan is $220 a year per patient—and much fairer to the insured if the insurer paid the full fee for services for auto accident victims. This would leave the OHIP chiropractic coverage intact for other required services throughout the year.

In conclusion, as health professionals who see accident victims on a daily basis, often over a significant period of time, we are aware of the injustices and hardships that have been created by the current Ontario motorist protection plan. It is the society's impression that several of the proposals in Bill 164 address these injustices, and we would encourage a closer examination of one more.

We are heartened by the increased accessibility to the courts. Perhaps we more than any other health care provider see people whose lives are affected, whose lifestyles are affected, whose quality of life is affected by the pain and suffering related to soft tissue injury. Soft tissue injury is very hard to document and is not well compensated for in the current system, and not having access to courts did, I think, create quite a hardship for many of our patients.

The final paragraph is only our introduction that I put at the end, and you've heard that, so this completes our presentation at this time. We are very anxious to answer any of your questions.

The Chair: We have seven minutes per caucus; Mr Tilson to start off.

Mr Tilson: I appreciate your remarks, how this deals with your particular industry. One theory that has been put forward dealing specifically with the $15,000 deductible is that all kinds of games will be played, first to qualify for the liability, and second, to qualify for accident benefits, whatever they may mean. We're having lawyers and insurance companies and probably yourself coming forward and saying, "What in the world do these pages and pages of regulation mean?" You may wish to comment on that.

One of the theories that's been put forward is that to try to reach this magic figure for whatever purpose, people are going to be encouraged to seek more and more treatments. In other words, this could be a great boon to your industry.

To demonstrate a higher degree of pain and suffering, whether for litigation or whether for benefits, you'll get all kinds of business, because lawyers—and whether it's the advocates we're now hearing about, this new advocacy group that's going to come forward—people will be recommending that the innocent victims go and see people like you to qualify for those benefits or to qualify for the $15,000 deductible. Have you any thoughts on that? Do you agree with that? Is that a genuine fear?

Dr Jan Kempe: Under the current regulations, there is no provision for an insurer to monitor what a chiropractor is doing, as far as it relates to the efficacy or the necessity of care.

Mr Tilson: Don't misunderstand me. I wasn't challenging the efficacy of your industry.

Dr Kempe: I think overtreatment may at times be a legitimate challenge. It's my understanding that under these proposed regulations, there will now be some mode for insurance companies or for insurers to ask for or demand an independent opinion, either from another chiropractor or from an MD. I would think that would go a long way to precluding that type of eventuality.

In the Ontario Chiropractic Association we have, over the last number of years, formed what we call an insurance consultants' committee. Their function is solely to intervene in such situations and to judge if one of our members or even one of our non-members might be thought to be overtreating a patient and to make subsequent recommendations.

Mr Tilson: It's going to become awfully tempting, whether it's the advocate or the lawyer or someone else who's trying to assist these people, for the chiropractor who's going through all these difficulties that you're describing. But meanwhile, you're going to get all kinds of business—I really believe that—because of this terrible $15,000 deductible issue. I guess that gets to my real question: What do you think of the $15,000 deductible, and not necessarily just from your own industry?

Dr Kempe: I have personal opinions on that. I don't know if they represent society's opinion. Probably $15,000 deductible is a moderate and reasonable scale compared to what it was before the OMPP as we now know it.

Mr Tilson: You support it?

Dr Kempe: Yes.

Mr Tilson: I'd love to have time to debate it with you, because I can tell you that the person who goes all the way to court and receives damages of $20,000 or $25,000, pays his or her legal fees and comes away with $5,000—it's not fair. The innocent accident victim is what we're talking about, sir. I'll tell you that when people suddenly realize what this legislation is doing with this particular claim—it's penalizing the innocent accident victim.

I respect the concern you have for your industry, but I can tell you that on that last point I've got a great deal of difficulty. I don't see how anyone—in fact, you're the first person I've heard, other than this group, who comes along and supports the $15,000 deductible. I haven't heard one group come forward to this committee and say that. If it is your personal view, that's fine. I hope it's not the view of your association, because I can tell you that you're all alone. Those are my questions.

The Chair: Before I go to Mr Lessard, did you get a copy of the brief that your association put in, Mr Taylor in Toronto with his presentation? Did you get a chance to see it?

Dr Kempe: I'm aware of their brief and I have a copy. I can't say I've read it.

The Chair: I know it's hard to come across with all the answers, so feel comfortable there if you don't have the answer.

Dr Kempe: I'm not uncomfortable.

The Chair: Okay, fine.

Mr Lessard: Thank you very much for your presentation. We certainly appreciate your taking the time out of your schedule to appear and make your remarks before our committee today. You're fairly critical of the OMPP in your brief, and you refer to the changes in this legislation—and this is to quote your submission—that they “rectify a great injustice,” and also you refer at the end to “injustices and hardships created by the current OMPP.”

Other people have come before us and have used examples of cases that they've run into in their own businesses to either criticize or support this proposed legislation. I wonder if you can give us some examples of situations that you might have run into in your own practice that demonstrate to you those injustices that you're referring to.

Dr Kempe: I see a number of problems that arise between the insured and insurance companies as they relate to chiropractic, certainly on a weekly if not a daily basis. The most recent one that was referred to me within the last week was an instance of a chiropractor treating a patient who had attended him as a primary contact practitioner. The patient was doing well. The patient was satisfied. The chiropractor was satisfied. The rehab counsellor, out of necessity, had to attend an MD to get the various certifications signed.

As it turns out, the rehab counsellor and the medical doctor, without consultation with either the patient or the chiropractor, determined on a prescribed set of services that the chiropractor should render and it is leading to disagreement, of course, between the rehab counsellor, who thought he was being perfectly reasonable in his duties, and the patient, and of course is causing some tension between the two providers, both of whom attend the patient.

Mr Lessard: I guess what we're really talking about is the best course of treatment for the person who's been injured. There may be some disagreements, I suppose, with respect to that, depending on what profession you're in. I wonder whether, in that example, what you're referring to really is a course of treatment that seemed as though it had been begun and then got changed. Is that the example you're referring to?

Dr Kempe: It was changed without consultation with either the practitioner or the patient, the accident victim. In this case, it was changed by the rehab counsellor, again, I don't think with any malice, and an MD who was not really cognizant of the patient's complaints at that time.

Mr Lessard: What sort of impact do you think that might have, changing the procedure or the treatment after it had been begun, or maybe halfway through?

Dr Kempe: Of course, the worst consequence is that the chiropractor and the patient come to the agreement that really they can't continue. If it's been prescribed by another person, without consultation with either one of them, it leads to interrupted care and the patient being sort of steered from pillar to post and to different types of treatment, all of which, again, begin at the beginning and all of which begin with an expensive workup and reports and the like. I think it's an expense, certainly an unjustified expense, to the insurer. It's an inconvenience to the patient and probably prolongs his treatment regime, and it causes undue stress to both the MD and the chiropractor.

The Chair: Ms Haeck.

Ms Haeck: I appreciate your comments. We've heard from a number of organizations and individuals who in fact are involved in rehabilitation. In fact, one of them was the St Michael's Hospital head injury group, who were very much in favour of the multidisciplinary approach, people basically as service providers, health care providers, getting together and working out what in fact the treatment program will be. One of their major supports of all this legislation was the fact that the rehabilitation program happens immediately. I would suppose from your position that that is something you would strongly support as well.

Dr Crnec: It's also something that all the literature strongly supports: the sooner the better.

Ms Haeck: The other concern raised by a group that was here this morning was in relation to standards and guidelines that a certain number of almost fly-by-night rehabilitative services currently do not abide by. Do you have any comments on what you're seeing out in the rehabilitation field and the kind of guidelines you might be giving to the task force that is dealing with the rehabilitation costs?

Dr Kempe: The rehab industry is somewhat new, not as it applies to head injuries, of course, but certainly as it applies to motor vehicle accidents. There are a number of organizations that have been formed in the last year or two, including a committee by our own profession, to determine what we think are reasonable guidelines for the conveyance of rehabilitation to the patient. We're still in the process of setting up those guidelines as they apply to our own profession, and certainly we've taken a very proactive step in determining those and in policing that, but they're not complete. I have a meeting in two weeks' time to continue with that process. As far as they apply to any other profession, I have no comment.

Ms Haeck: I would encourage you also to keep in touch with the task force, because obviously your input will be sought after.

Mr Callahan: I'm curious, because I practised somewhat in this field, and under the tort system lawyers were reluctant—and this is not a slight of your practice—to use a health professional unless a doctor had prescribed it, because there could always be the argument by the other side that the procedure used was not the most appropriate one and perhaps added to the injury.

I now look at your brief, paragraph 10 of your brief. In your conclusions you say, "It is the society's impression that several of the proposals of Bill 164 address these injustices, and we would encourage closer examination of one more." I gather you're talking about sections 44 and 47. Is that right?

Dr Crnec: That's right.

Mr Callahan: I've looked at sections 44 and 47, and they're going to make the Workers' Compensation Board look like a picnic. I refer to certain things like 47, which you'd need a Philadelphia lawyer to understand: It's got some 20 provisions to it, and after you go through a whole slew of steps—I hope your profession is not going to have to send out all these notices, because you're going to need forms; your mailing costs will be outrageous.

Just when you get to the stage at item (12), it says, "If the insurer and the insured person have not agreed on a health practitioner to conduct the examination within"—I mean, these all have time limits, and if you miss the time limit, tough luck. So I hope there are advocates out there to help lawyers, because I'm sure they're going to screw up on time limits or the public is going to screw up on time limits. In any event, the one time limit says:

"If the insurer and the insured person have not agreed on a health practitioner to conduct the examination within fourteen days after the insurer received notice from the insured person under subsection (9), the insurer may require the (insert name of appropriate committee established under section 7 of the Insurance Act) to select the health practitioner."

Then we get into, "The committee shall promptly select a health practitioner who, in the opinion of the committee is independent of the insurer and the insured person and has the expertise necessary" etc, etc, etc.

I don't know about you, but I find it interesting, because recently Minister Churley was saying she wanted to put everything into ordinary language. I hope this isn't going to be part of my policy, because I couldn't possibly carry it around; I'd get tennis elbow. But if what the government is trying to do is make things clearer for the public, do you not agree with us that those things would require probably a master's in law? Are you fully cognizant of these draft regulations? Do you know what's in here?

Dr Crnec: I've reviewed it.

Mr Callahan: You've read it. Do you understand it?

Dr Crnec: I don't have a master's in law, so perhaps I misunderstand it. However, we are accustomed to dealing with deadlines; as you well know, WCB is living with them.

Mr Callahan: Yes, and WCB causes you people a lot of problems.

Dr Crnec: They're equal opportunity aggravators.

Mr Callahan: I see. So you have actually read through these draft regulations?

Dr Crnec: Yes, sir.

Mr Callahan: Well, I commend you for it. Did you read them once or twice?

Dr Crnec: It depends on the paragraph.

Mr Winninger: Better than no times at all.

Mr Callahan: My colleague across the floor says, "Better than no times at all." I wonder if anybody over there has even read them. I doubt it.

In any event, you've said it gives you the impression that several of the proposals of Bill 164 address these injustices. Have you got any definitive opinion from anybody that says they do address it? "Impressions" is a rather minor word. It doesn't tell me that you're sure about this; you're a little fuzzy about it. Is that a fair comment? Are you fuzzy about it?

Dr Crnec: My impression with law and regulations in general is that it's very difficult to know how it's going to work until it's up and running. The intent of the proposals, as I have read them, is encouraging to us. The fact that chiropractors will have the ability to issue disability certification with regard to injuries that are appropriately being treated by chiropractors is encouraging to us.

Mr Callahan: So that's the sum total of what this brief is about: that you're encouraged that no longer will an individual have to have a doctor say that it's all right for a chiropractor to examine the patient and therefore have it extracted from their—what is it, once a month or something, or a certain amount under OHIP that you're entitled to recover? Is that what it's all about?

Dr Kempe: The new regulations have nothing to do with what's extracted from OHIP. I have no recollection of either myself or Dr Crnec saying that that's the sum total of our impression of these regulations.

Mr Callahan: But what I was getting at, to be fair, is that you're coming here today—and we certainly encourage anyone to come before this committee—and my reading of your brief and what has been said—and I don't want to be unfair, and if I'm wrong, please tell me—is that the highest it's at, your impression is that with the regulations that have been drafted in conjunction with Bill 164, you will now be able to treat an accident patient without the necessity of a doctor's referral.

Dr Kempe: We can already treat patients without a doctor's referral.

Mr Callahan: I appreciate that, but it comes out of their OHIP allocation.

Dr Crnec: It does now.

Dr Kempe: Nothing is changed by these regulations in that vein.

Mr Callahan: It is. What it does, I suggest to you with the greatest of respect, is that it gives you the opportunity to have another source from which to be compensated other than that OHIP access, which you want to reserve. I think it's fair to say, for people for things that might happen to them during the year other than the accident they have. It gives you another access, another fund out of which to recover that money, isn't that right?

Dr Kempe: It's certainly not another fund. We already bill insured's companies. The regulations, as proposed, don't change what you're alluding to.

Mr Callahan: That's not the impression I got from your brief.

The Chair: Mr Callahan, we've run out of time. I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee and for being able to get here a little sooner than when you were scheduled.

Dr Crnec: We hope this means your day will be a little shorter.

The Chair: Well, we got it extended a little there for a while.

MARY ELLEN LOCKYER-CHENEY

The Chair: The next presenter is Ms Mary Ellen Lockyer-Cheney. Would you come forward, please. We have 20 minutes, until 4:30, and we have your brief in front of us. Can you leave some time at the end for questions? It looks like it will take 20 minutes to read this brief, or do you have it so that you can go off the top of your head on this one?

Ms Mary Ellen Lockyer-Cheney: I don't intend to read to you the entire brief.

The Chair: Fine. This will all go in the record.

Ms Lockyer-Cheney: In June 1990, my renewal for my automobile insurance coverage came due. Prior to this occasion, I was aware of proposed changes to the Insurance Act. However, I had not been able to obtain any real facts on the changes, nor had I been contacted by a representative of that industry to give me any information regarding this issue. So much for my understanding of the insurance.

Enclosed with my premium notice was one sparse pamphlet, which at best was very vague, but it did tell me that in the event of need, I would never need to concern myself about benefits; in effect, that the new system should run much smoother than the previous system.

Upon my contacting not one, but several people in the industry, I was given answers such as, "We really don't know what is going to happen" or, "It will be okay. Just renew your policy. You need the coverage anyway," types of scenarios.

On August 9, 1990, I found myself eastbound on Highway 401 just east of Toronto. It was at this time that I became the victim of a motor vehicle accident and began to learn first hand just what our new insurance was and, more to the point, was not about.

At the scene of that accident, I felt very victimized and invaded by the apparent injustice and consequences of the negligent person who had hit me and then proceeded to verbally abuse me. However, what I felt at that time was to become very minor-league compared to the humiliation, degradation and victimization I was to feel and continue to experience as a victim of the system of the "new and improved legislation." I was to continue to learn that this following quote, read prior to this legislation, would become a truthful nightmare:

"The government's publicity about its new plan makes it seem as if it is the solution to automobile insurance in Ontario. It is not and will never be. It is a vicious and mean plan, more unkind to accident victims than any compensation plan in existence anywhere."

I, as a victim, am outraged, as I have gradually become aware of the rights not just violated but stripped away.

At no point in any of this process was I offered encouragement, guidance or assistance with any part of my difficulties. In the beginning, I was bombarded with a ridiculous number of forms—I ask you to judge for yourselves—because at this point I was barely able to carry out my own personal hygiene, and I was forced to find ways on my own to procure information from my employer, repeated medicals and in duplicate, week after week, just to survive financially.

Imagine yourselves with both hands swollen, blue, numb and encased in braces because they were sprained on impact; a blinding headache brought on by pressure fractures to vertebrae; bulging discs in my neck; a face swollen to the point that my eyes were all but swollen shut, and to be told bluntly to get it done the best way I knew how and within the time criterion or go without.

At a later date, after much therapy and with the prognosis of returning to my former position looking rather bleak—in fact, the doctors specifically told me at one point to forget about my former occupation and get on with my rehabilitation—I began at this point to inquire about this issue of rehabilitation and I was told by the adjuster that I would have to wait for the two-year anniversary and that I should continue to seek the therapy, since my OHIP would take care of that for me—wonderful news to someone who is self-motivated and progressive. At this point I was finding more relief for my pain with the help of a chiropractor and, with the blessing of my doctor, proceeded to do this and found almost instant resistance to payment on the suggestion that OHIP would pay if only I would be satisfied with the services available at the local hospital.

It was at this point that I continued to pursue this issue of rehab through lawyers, MPPs and rehab people, to find that no one could give me a hard and fast answer as to why or when I could access some form of progressive rehabilitation. In effect, I was very much encouraged to become a couch potato for the next two years. I have found no one to date, either in or out of the industry, who can give me any constructive information, let alone factual, regarding rehabilitation. This, in my opinion, is like unto a lottery in many respects.

Please understand that I am sharing with you my personal experiences of the system, and I do not believe that I am alone in my convictions. The industry has proven to me that not only is it resistant to payments but that the delivery of benefits promised is random at best. No, I'm not looking for charity and I never have. In fact, I dislike being dependent on the system for my very existence.

Prior to my injuries I was involved in a career that was very important to me, not just financially but in many of the same ways that I presume your respective jobs are to you. I feel like I'm begging when, every two months, I have to call Toronto to see where my cheque is, only to talk to a no-name, no-face adjuster who tells me that she has no time to look at or through my file and, "Your cheque is in the mail."

Why must I be subjected to such demeaning treatment when I was not at fault to begin with? I am only asking for what you told me I was entitled to when you proposed this system. I am quite certain that all victims, for the most part, have been handed the proverbial soother in the hopes that we will go away. I ask how many other uninformed, unaware victims have gone on to be brutalized by this system. As a victim of the system, I have been forced to learn the hard way that I must be persistent and assertive to get just a morsel of what was promised to me. I have armed myself with a copy of Bill 68 in an attempt to decipher from it for myself what rights to benefits and rehabilitation there are there for me. You tell us in this bill that there's a lifetime cap of $500,000 for supplementary medical and rehabilitation and that the proposed change would have no cap. Well, lovely. Who is regulating this? From my personal experience, I am at the good graces of the insurance industry and the whim of the individual adjuster.

I feel like I'm playing "roll the dice" to see who can give me an answer, regardless of the medical documentation, as to who will decide whether or not I can have what I may be entitled to and how much they'll spend. Any exposures that I have had to rehabilitation have come about initially from my own efforts and resourcefulness. The one example that I choose to give you is this. When a doctor, who by the way is whom the insurance company sent me to, documented for that company that I would benefit from a water exercise program, no one moved on it. When I questioned that adjuster about this, I met with the proverbial bureaucratic stone wall. Until I was forced into being assertive with them, nothing was done.

I myself researched and contacted facilities in the area that I live in, and when I was referred to someone with a background dealing in injuries and made mention of this to the adjuster, there was much passing of the buck and the response was, "Well, isn't this service available through the hospital?" Is this the kind of response I should have met with? I think not.

When it was finally agreed upon that I could use this service, I was asked to go ahead and procure this. The policy of that facility is membership, and it is billed annually. This too was agreed upon. Out-of-pocket I paid this fee and, as instructed, presented the bill to my adjuster and was immediately told that the company would not pay for a year in advance but would pay quarterly. I received one quarterly payment at that time and waited an entire year to be reimbursed. It was not paid until I had placed numerous phone calls, written requests, and solicited the advice of a lawyer.

During this process, I was told again in Toronto that she was too busy to look through my file for the original receipts and that I would need to provide her with proof. It was at this time that I was also reminded just how large my file was. I did not appreciate, nor do I feel that I as an innocent victim deserved, this type of demeaning treatment. This example is not isolated to one incident. It has been repeated many times since August 1990. Must I continually remind the industry that I am not brain-dead? My body does not function the same any more, but my mind still works. Since when, in this democratic country of ours, do we waste such a commodity?

I dislike having to resort to using the system. It is my fervent desire to recuperate to the point that I can return to meaningful employment. When asked why I am not working, I feel it necessary to explain about my lack of mobility and the chronic pain that I live with daily, because, as you can see, on the outside I look okay. A common assumption is that I am being rehabilitated, and it was a promise that victims would have access to rehab. Instead, I spend more time and energy fighting for my rights than I do concentrating on full-time recovery. It was my understanding that my full concentration and energy should be on recovery, with the goal of returning to gainful employment, not an all-out war with the insurance industry. Is this a fair and just system? I have personal knowledge of a victim who went to mother's allowance because she could not cope with this frustrating and degrading system.

I find it necessary to address the lousy and uncertain threshold you have set forth. You make no provisions for the victim with debilitating soft tissue injuries, nor do you address retroactivity of those injured at the beginning of the no-fault system. What are we, human guinea pigs? Your main focus seems to be to decrease claims, at any cost to human suffering, and increase profitability. What is to happen to me at the three-year anniversary, when I am to be reassessed? Your policy tells me that my payments will cease because I will probably fall short of your unforgiving threshold due to my soft tissue injuries, which, I am told, will affect me for the rest of my life. I wish I could push a magic button and exchange my aching body for a new one, but I can't.

My specialist told me on my last visit that I can expect to be in therapy for a long time to come, and to continue with what I'm doing. His comment was, "I know how much you want to go to work, but you only have about two hours in a day at best, and then not on a consistently daily basis." My future is to be decided by an industry which has already demonstrated to me that it does not know what it is doing and which does not view me as human, only another dependent liability. I pray that the powers that be will be having a good day. How long shall I be forced to pay for the actions of another human being who, along with his insurance company, has complete immunity? Am I next in the welfare line? Is it my fault I have no job left to go to?

I am not alone in this dilemma. The underlying assumption that as a victim I will be dealt with fairly is a false one. We are not only the neglected consumers; we are opaque victims, not seen and not heard. People injured in accidents in the early stages of this no-fault nonsense live in a grey zone and have indeed been left largely on their own to determine our own rights and to find our own way through the rehabilitation systems and to seek reimbursement for our losses. Is this what I deserve for my expensive premiums?

I thank you for allowing me the opportunity to make this presentation. If you have any questions, I'll do my best.

The Chair: Mr Johnson, two minutes.

Mr Johnson: Thank you very much for your presentation.

I think you've made it very clear in your presentation that accident victims have had a difficult time obtaining the justice they deserve under the system. I want to say that you've pointed out your very specific case and very difficult situation that you were involved in: first of all the accident itself and then trying to get redress and trying to get the rehabilitation that you so badly want.

I don't want this to sound like it's just another comment from another politician. However, I want you to know that the government has set up a task force on long-term care and rehabilitation so that people like yourselves and situations like the one you were involved in, we hope, can be eliminated.

This task force wants to examine exactly situations and circumstances like yours in order—well, specifically, in order to establish standards and guidelines so that you won't have to go through this undue delay in trying to get the rehabilitation that you so badly need. It's very evident that you want to get back to work. We all laud you on that point and I hope that through your persistence you can get the rehabilitation you need and indeed do get back to work. It's more of a statement than a question, but I just want you to know that.

Ms Lockyer-Cheney: I appreciate your comments and I am aware of the task force.

Mr Callahan: In looking at your previous work experience, you were obviously a person who was on her way up very seriously and enjoyed what she was doing. Looking at your injuries in relation to what we were given this morning by a gentleman who came before our committee, Mr Nigel Gilby, who's a lawyer, you probably would not reach the threshold of the $15,000. If you did it would be very close and you'd wind up taking a risk of perhaps having to pay your lawyer's fees as well as the opposing lawyer's fees.

I feel great empathy for you in that you've lost your opportunities economically, obviously. I'm not quite sure in reading your brief whether these are your objections to the present changes under Bill 164 or not.

Ms Lockyer-Cheney: Yes, they are objections. In the preceding summary I have voiced most of those. I do have other areas; however, time just didn't allow for me to get to them all.

Mr Callahan: I think we can appreciate that. When we look at the regulations that have been shown to us, not a lot of people understand how regulations are made. They're made by the cabinet of the government of the day and they really never get to the floor of the Legislature, so they can change them in the blinking of an eye, which I think adds to the confusion that people in this province will have because of those regulatory changes.

Thank you, Mr Chairman, for those questions.

Mr Tilson: I think we appreciate the victim, which is what you are, coming before this committee and telling us your personal story. The incident appears to deal with OMPP, the existing law before this province, although you obviously, as a result of your unfortunate experience, have become knowledgeable in the current legislation as well and you're probably as much of an expert as the rest of us.

I don't mean to be flippant, but if you were left alone on the previous legislation, this is Left Alone 2 because you're going to be far worse off. If this bill passes and the incidents that you've described occurred under Bill 164, the frustrations that you've had dealing with insurance companies, with legal people, with medical people, will be far worse, if only for the very reason that a lot of people simply don't understand it. It'll take years for courts and advocates, whoever they are, to tell us what all these funny words mean.

I don't know whether you have any thoughts on that. In other words, obviously your demeanour is very bewildered and very frustrated and "Why me?" and I understand that, but looking at Bill 164, having just gone through Bill 68, can you tell us what your thoughts are for Bill 164?

Ms Lockyer-Cheney: How much time do you have?

Mr Tilson: Probably about 30 seconds.

Ms Lockyer-Cheney: I have many areas of concern and I don't like Bill 164 a whole lot better than I liked the previous bill, to be quite honest with you. I find very few positive things there for the victim, and I feel that I'm speaking for a cross-section of victims. It is my personal opinion and the opinion of those few I've spoken to that our main interest is to keep premiums down. Well, if you charged me nothing for my premiums and didn't deliver, it's still not worth it. So I'm concerned about areas of education for the industry at the service levels. I would like to be able to pick up the phone and talk to somebody who knew an answer or who could find one for me.

Mr Tilson: Hopefully the government will listen to your thoughts. Thank you very much.

The Chair: Mr Mancini, you have one little, short one.

Mr Mancini: I have one short question. A lot of the difficulties that you've explained in your brief, and to all the members of the committee, appear to be with the administrative and the follow-through, the policy implementation portion of the existing legislation. How would you feel about the existing legislation if your phone calls had been answered properly, if there were people at the other end of the line who treated you with a little bit of respect and dignity, who were willing to take your file out and say, "Okay, let's go over it together. We're willing to help you meet with your time lines and with your medical needs and all of those things," and if you weren't forced to fight for the income you were entitled to? How would you feel about the existing legislation if those things had been changed and had worked appropriately?

Ms Lockyer-Cheney: I still have grave concerns, even with those amendments, could they be made, about all areas of that system. It falls so short in dealing with people with soft tissue, with people in other areas. Your descriptives, excuse my expression, are lousy.

Mr Mancini: In the bill, you mean, Bill 68?

Ms Lockyer-Cheney: In the bill. You just can't understand them. People in the insurance industry obviously don't understand them. I am a consumer who has bought and paid for. I'm now a victim—I don't plan to be one again—who can't get to the root of anything, and you've made no provisions for that.

The Chair: Thank you for appearing before this committee today.

Ms Lockyer-Cheney: Thank you.

Mr Lessard: I just want to take a few minutes to say to the committee members who have attended here how grateful we are that you've attended here in the city of Windsor. I hope that everybody has an opportunity to return when they can spend some more time. I know that you're going to be on your way to Ottawa—

Mr Owens: Where's that casino, Lessard?

Mr Lessard: Yes, we'll invite you all back when the casino is up and running.

I want to thank the staff here who assisted in setting everything up as well, and making sure that everything ran smoothly here in Windsor today.

The Chair: I'd like to thank Mr Lessard for the invite back. This committee will be adjourned until 10 o'clock, in Ottawa, tomorrow morning. Some of the members seem to say that the Chair has a hard time telling time. Anyone who's not there at 10 o'clock, I'll have a session later on in the day on how to tell time. Okay? Thank you. Goodbye.

The committee adjourned at 1634.
